The priestess swallows thickly, and when she speaks—her own voice is thick with tears.

"General Hua...I..." Her voice cracks. "I messed up."

Xie Lian sighs, rubbing her back. He very much doubts that, even in this situation.

"...General?" Fu Yao mutters, realizing—then, his eyes widen. "You—!"

Xie Lian glances up with a shaky, slightly awkward smile.

"That was my tombstone in the cave," he admits. "Sorry for not mentioning it before."

"You..." Fu Yao sputters, glancing around the group with wide eyes. "You were—! How did you end up in that situation?!"

"Well..." the prince thinks back with a frown. "Remember what I said about the circus?"

"I...what?" Fu Yao questions, exasperated, but San Lang pipes up with no issue.

"About the clown who choked during his act?"

Xie Lian nods, sheepish. "That...was partially my fault. Among other things that went wrong."

"Other things?!"

"...And for that, and other personal reasons, I needed to get away for a while," Xie Lian explains. "So, I ended up hiding out on the border of Yong'an, near the desert. As I recall, I was busking—and doing so well that the local soldiers didn't believe I was bind, so..."

"...You got drafted into the army?!" Fu Yao groans, wiping a hand down his face. Honestly, it's the worst luck—

"And while I was there, I ran into a little girl scavenging for food," Xie Lian continues, stroking Banyue's hair. "She had no parents, so I looked after her as best as I could. And the rest...happens just like the tombstone said," Xie Lian finishes with an awkward little laugh, but—

San Lang doesn't seem to find the story very funny. "It said that you died."

Right. Well.

"I...pretended."

"It was my fault," Banyue croaks, "General Hua was trying to protect me."

"I—" Xie Lian sighs, shaking his head. "I was trying to break up a riot, when I saw her in the crowd. I got her out, but I was too injured to escape myself, so I just...played dead."

He can feel everyone watching him, and he waves his hands with a nervous little laugh, trying to wave off the concern. "It wasn't so bad! I didn't even end up buried, that would have been much more inconvenient! They just threw my body in the river! But..." Xie Lian sighs.

"...By the time I came to, I had already drifted all the way back to Yong'an because of the current, and I wasn't able to find Banyue again, so...I never knew what became of her."

The young woman swallows thickly, rubbing at her eyes. "I...General Hua, after you died, I..."

She hangs her head. "My life was like before, but worse, and...I was so angry at everyone, for what happened to you...and guilty, and..."

"Oh, Banyue..." Xie Lian frowns. "It wasn't your fault—"

"There's—a ghost—one that you can pray to," she explains, her voice tense. "If people are being cruel to you. He—he helps children who are being mistreated, takes revenge for you."

Xie Lian finds himself curious. He didn't realize that there were ghosts out there that people prayed to. It's...a surprising concept.

"She's speaking about Hua Cheng."

Fu Yao's voice is cold now—certainly more than a little judgmental—and Banyue does seem at least somewhat remorseful, though not for that reason.

"I prayed to him...but when he came, I didn't want him to slaughter the people that were hurting me, I..." Banyue sighs. "I just never wanted someone to get killed trying to protect me again. Like—Like you did," She bites her lip. "I told him I wanted to be strong, and...he taught me magic for a little while."

"Is that your story?" Fu Yao frowns, crossing his arms. "The Ghost King corrupted you?"

Banyue sits up in Xie Lian's arms, shaking her head vehemently. "No! He didn't do anything like that, I—I made my own choices," she mutters. "I came back to my homeland, ended up in a position of power, and I..." She trails off, hanging her head once more. "I messed up."

Fu Yao seems to have heard enough, pulling a length of spirit binding rope from his pocket. "That's enough information for now."

Xie Lian stiffens, his arms tightening, and the deputy god sighs.

"I respect the fact that you two have a history—but you were the one who wanted to investigate the Crescent Moon Pass. We can't ignore the crime just because the perpetrator happens to be an orphan you used to look after."

Xie Lian grits his teeth, and Banyue smiles.

"It's okay, General Hua...I'm glad you came to investigate. Otherwise, I never would've known..."

Xie Lian lets her go, however reluctantly—but as Fu Yao is tying her up, he comments —

"I don't think it was her doing all of this."

Fu Yao glances up with a frown. "What?"

"Before you came down, Ke Mo told us that they weren't the ones bringing the merchants here. That they were drawn in by the Shan Yue fern, usually because they needed to cure their own snake bites—but Banyue—she can't control the snakes the way she used to. Isn't that right?"

"...They'll listen to me most of the time," Banyue explains hesitantly. "But sometimes —they just ignore me. I don't know why."

Fu Yao crosses his arms, thinking. "…Why don't you show us, then? Try summoning one now."

After an encouraging nod from Xie Lian, Banyue agrees.

She lifts her hands, muttering a low incantation—and, surely enough, a snake appears. Launching itself towards her and wrapping itself around her bound wrists.

Compared to the others—it seems rather tame.

"Hey!" Fu Yao shouts, glancing around. "I said just ONE!"

Xie Lian stiffens, and, just as Fu Yao said—he can hear the sound of several snakes slithering closer in the pit, encircling them—but Banyue shakes her head, her voice distressed—

"I didn't summon those!" She cries. "It wasn't me!"

"You expect us to believe that?!"

He barely manages to dodge one as it lunges at him, summoning fire to incinerate those on the ground, and Xie Lian notices—

The snake Banyue summoned as tame—it's the others that are aggressive. Summoned with a different purpose.

"Would you QUIT IT?!" Fu Yao snarls.

"It REALLY ISN'T ME! I swear!"

It takes Xie Lian a moment to understand, but then he hears it.

Hundreds of forms whipping through the air, plunging towards the pit.

The sky, it's—

It's raining Scorpion Snakes—right down on top of them.

Everyone is Right, and Everyone is Wrong

Chapter Summary

CLANG!

The blow that Xie Lian hears now makes him clap his hands over his ears with a gasp, because—

That level of force is somewhat shocking, two high quality weapons crashing against one another with extreme force. Enough to make Ke Mo look like a gnat in comparison.

And this time, Xie Lian still doesn't recognize the ring of the metal from before. It's of a quality unfamiliar to him. But the other he's quite familiar with.

The steel of a Heavenly weapon.

"Huh?" San Lang muses, sounding completely unruffled—but intrigued.

"Well, what do you know—there really is a sixth person down here," he smiles, eyes flashing in the dark. Not from fear, or anger—but the eager anticipation of a fight that won't be completely boring. "How interesting."

He passes the umbrella off to Xie Lian.

"Wait here for a minute, gege," the youth murmurs, flexing his fingers as he runs into the dark shadows of the Sinner's Pit.

"I'll deal with him."

Chapter Notes

You can find me on twitter and keep up with current updates of the story HERE

"LOOK OUT!"

Fu Yao tries to use a blast of fire on the first wave, crying out—

"Can't you see?! One of them must be lying!"

Xie Lian finds himself yanked close against San Lang's side, raising an eyebrow, "What do you mean?"

"Either she lied about the snakes—or it's that friend of yours!"

San Lang stiffens against him, and Xie Lian places one hand on his arm with a frown.

"It isn't San Lang, Fu Yao."

"Your highness—I know you're not a fool, you know exactly what he is!" The Deputy God snaps. "Why trust him?!"

"He hasn't given me a reason not to."

Fu Yao's eyes nearly bulge out of his head with frustration. "That shouldn't be the standard! How can you even stand beside him in a situation like this?"

Xie Lian smiles, scratching his head. "Well...his side doesn't have any snakes."

San Lang lets out an affectionate chuckle.

Just then, the sound of falling snakes gets louder, the hissing building to a dull roar, and Xie Lian frowns, concerned—just as he hears something opening up overhead, shielding him from the venomous downpour—

An umbrella.

"Don't worry, gege." San Lang murmurs. "They won't dare come under here."

Xie Lian nods, not particularly worried about them—or Banyue for that matter, controlling them or not, the snakes aren't a threat to her—but Fu Yao is out in the open.

"Fu Yao—can't you make more fire?!"

The Deputy God is barely able to dodge between the falling serpents, using palm strikes to kill those that get too close—but it's a precarious process.

"Don't you think I could if I would?! That thing beside you is suppressing my spiritual power!"

San Lang's expression darkens slightly at the mention of being called a 'thing,' rather than a person—but Xie Lian disregards Fu Yao's argument entirely.

"It's not me."

"I know," Xie Lian assures him, patting his arm once more. "But with Banyue and Ke Mo incapacitated..."

And with Xie Lian not able to use any of the spiritual power he borrowed from Nan Feng earlier, along with Fu Yao's being suppressed...

"There must be a sixth person down here," he mutters.

"Are you kidding?!" Fu Yao snaps, moving in a flurry to strike at the snakes.

It's a precarious business, just not getting bitten by any of them.

"It's an open pit! No one else jumped in—we would know!"

Before Xie Lian can explain any more, he hears a surprised gasp, and his stomach turns to ice.

"...Banyue?!" He cries, looking around.

Her aura is nowhere to be found—but Xie Lian knows, with that spiritual binding, she wouldn't have been able to leave the pit by herself. "Does someone have you?!"

"I...!"

He hears her voice, however briefly, before it disappears again. "Banyue!" He cries in a blind panic.

He whips around under the umbrella, trying to find a glimpse of her spiritual energy —but when he tries to run, San Lang's grip, which has been gentle up until now, turns to that of iron, locking him in place.

Xie Lian is stunned—and something else that he'd rather not say—to find he couldn't escape the younger man's grip right now, not even if he wanted to.

But instead of being afraid, he only feels desperate.

"San Lang!" He turns to look up at him, "Help her, please."

San Lang stares down at him for a moment, his expression unreadable—but when he replies, his voice is surprisingly soft, given the current state of things.

“Of course.”

Before Xie Lian can say much more, he finds himself hoisted up once again.

This time by just one arm, though it still feels as though it must be as easy for San Lang as carrying a feather as he moves across the floor of the Sinner’s Pit, moving Xie Lian down to a section clear from the combat before setting him down once again.

“...San—?”

CLANG!

The blow that Xie Lian hears now makes him clap his hands over his ears with a gasp, because—

That level of force is somewhat shocking, two high quality weapons crashing against one another with extreme force. Enough to make Ke Mo look like a gnat in comparison.

And this time, Xie Lian still doesn’t recognize the ring of the metal from before. It’s of a quality unfamiliar to him. But the other he’s quite familiar with.

The steel of a Heavenly weapon.

“Huh?” San Lang muses, sounding completely unruffled—but intrigued.

“Well, what do you know—there really is a sixth person down here,” he smiles, eyes flashing in the dark. Not from fear, or anger—but the eager anticipation of a fight that won’t be completely boring. “How interesting.”

He passes the umbrella off to Xie Lian.

“Wait here for a minute, gege,” the youth murmurs, flexing his fingers as he runs into the dark shadows of the Sinner’s Pit.

“I’ll deal with him.”

Xie Lian opens his mouth, but—

CLANG!

CLANG!

CLANG!

Now, it's several more blows of the same quality and force.

An actual duel now—between two fighters who very clearly know what they're doing, but—

One clearly seems to be dominating the other with an aggressive, somewhat wild style, his attacks utterly ferocious.

CLANG!

CLANG!

Xie Lian sighs, summoning Ruoye back to him. The fall probably injures Ke Mo severely, but— Xie Lian couldn't care less.

The bandage quivers around his wrist when it returns, and Xie Lian strokes it calmly, "Don't be nervous," he mutters, glancing around. "Banyue? Can you hear me? Banyue!"

Fu Yao is clearly becoming exhausted, his breathing ragged as he fights off the remaining snakes, completely without aid, "Maybe she's the one who attacked you just now!"

"No," Xie Lian shakes his head, "Banyue is a small person—she wouldn't resort to that type of force."

He glances around, still trying to find a trace of her aura, but...

All he sees is that of Fu Yao, and a flash of crimson, pulsing with each clash of blades.

CLANG!

CLANG!

"...And that was one hell of a blow," the prince mutters. Not comparable to what he could do—but still

It's more than what the average ghost could do, including Banyue. Even by the standards of Heavenly officials—no one from the middle court could do that.

"Who could it be..." He mutters, contemplating—and Fu Yao groans with frustration.

"She could be hiding her strength from you, your highness—traitors like Banyue and Xuan Ji—they're birds of a feather!"

Then, just like that, it all clicks together. Xuan Ji.

"Why do you trust her?!"

"...Xuan Ji," he mutters. "That's it."

"What about her?!"

"I've got it!"

Fu Yao almost stops, then gets clocked in the face with a falling snake, barely able to avoid getting stung before he kills it.

(Which requires punching himself in the face.)

"You might as well stop now!" Xie Lian calls into the dark. "I know who you are!"

CLANG!

CLANG!

"...You think I'm bluffing?" He glares. "Just give it up and come out, General Pei Junior!"

Fu Yao squawks with surprise, nursing a bruised cheek. "What are you talking about? What does he have to do with this?!"

"Think about it," Xie Lian mutters.

"For 200 years, the Heavens remained completely oblivious to this matter."

Gusu was imprisoned for half that time—and unlike the Crescent Moon Kingdom, travelers were left unharmed. There was no reason for those outside of the city to know.

"Someone was keeping it quiet."

Xie Lian mutters, glancing around, still searching out that aura.

CLANG!

CLANG!

"And do you remember what you and Nan Feng told me about him on Mount Yu Jun? What Pei Junior did before his ascension?"

Massacre.

He massacred a city, supposedly.

"You're saying that city was the Crescent Moon Kingdom?" Fu Yao mutters. "If that was the case—why lure travelers here? What does he have to gain from it?"

Xie Lian isn't entirely sure when it comes to motive. Slaughtering a city isn't uncommon in times of war, sadly enough.

It might make acquiring new worshippers difficult, but...

With great victory in battle, there are always great atrocities. Pei Xiu's patron, Ming Guang, is the poster child of such things.

The rise of Xuli was infamous—but there's a terrible price for all conquests.

"The key to everything is the snakes," Xie Lian mutters. Something Fu Yao, who is currently trying not to be strangled by them, isn't thrilled to hear. "They're the reasons the travelers were drawn in. Ke Mo is terrified of them, and they don't listen to Banyue, so..."

Xie Lian glares in the direction of the fighting, while Fu Yao shakes his head, confused.

"How could Pei Xiu be running Ming Guang's affair in the heavens while doing all of this? It wouldn't work."

"Not unless he isn't actually here," Xie Lian points out "It could be a clone."

The mention of clones makes Fu Yao fall silent.

"I lived in this area for years and never saw a Scorpion Snake," Xie Lian mutters. "Which I initially thought was odd—but it did create a need: for someone to guide you through the desert."

Now, Fu Yao seems to be understanding.

"When we saw that thing in the ground earlier," the fighting still carries on, even now, "I thought it was just trying to lure us in, saying it recognized one of us from sixty years ago. But what if it was telling the truth?"

CLANG!

CLANG!

"That's..." Fu Yao trails off, his eyes wide.

Plausible.

"I thought it was strange for such a calm, level headed young man to eagerly throw himself to his death—but you just wanted to get out of the way, didn't you, Pei Xiu?"

CLANG!

CLANG!

"Or should I say—A'Zhao?"

Finally, there's silence, and Xie Lian feels San Lang return to his side, a hand at the small of his back.

On the other side of the pit, a new figure appears—one in dark robes with long, black hair, and smoldering eyes of amber. Banyue remains safe—cradled carefully in his arms.

"Banyue?!" Xie Lian cries her name again, now that he can see her spiritual energy— but now she's unconscious, unable to answer.

"She's alright, just exhausted from releasing the Array," Pei Xiu murmurs. That's understandable, after keeping it up on her own for two centuries.

Although heavily injured, Ke Mo still manages to glance up, leaning against the stone wall of the Sinner's Pit. "Who are you?!"

Pei Xiu barely spares him a glance. "General Ke Mo," he mutters. "You haven't changed at all."

The General's eyes widen suddenly with recognition. "...YOU—! IT WAS YOU?!"

"The scorpion snakes were obviously being controlled by you," San

Lang interrupts the ghost without a care, watching Pei Xiu. “Did Banyue teach you that?”

The Deputy General looks rather worse for wear, beaten and bloody.

San Lang, however, is unscathed.

His clothes aren’t even rumpled—and, at best, he seems bored once again.

“...She didn’t,” Pei Xiu admits. “I was able to learn the method on my own.”

“Not surprising,” Fu Yao mutters. “Pei Junior has always been of high intelligence.”

Much like his patron.

“And how do you two even know one another?” Xie Lian questions.

Still hovering in the air, Pei Xiu looks down at Banyue’s face, bloodied and limp, his expression somewhat...anguished.

“I suppose it makes sense that you wouldn’t recognize my voice, General Hua.” He sighs.

“I was just a boy back then.”

But that fact is all Xie Lian needs to stir his memory, remembering—

“You...” He frowns, glancing up at Pei Xiu’s aura, “You were Banyue’s friend from back then! The Yong’an boy!”

Her only friend, to be honest. The only child that was kind to her.

Xie Lian had thought of him as a kind young man—one with quite a bit of potential. It had been a disappointment, when he got dragged into the army as well.

“That’s me,” Pei Xiu replies softly. “I only just recognized you as well.” “HEY!” Ke Mo crows.

“GET DOWN HERE! I DON’T CARE WHAT THAT BLIND FREAK DID TO MY ARM, I’LL FIGHT YOU ONE HANDED!”

“Speak that way again, and you won’t have any limbs left at all,” San Lang remarks coldly.

Xie Lian gives him a light pat on the arm, “Don’t mind him, San Lang. I’ve heard worse.”

Somehow, that doesn’t seem to bring the youth much comfort.

“I DON’T CARE WHAT HAPPENS TO ME! I JUST WANT AT THAT MONSTER!”

“Ke Mo,” Pei Xiu looks down on him, almost irritated by the reminder of his presence, “we already fought 200 years ago, and you lost. Second of all—how am I the monster?”

“What else could you be?!” Ke Mo howls, clutching his arm as he struggles to his feet. “If not for you two colluding against us—we never would have lost!”

“Delusional.” Pei Xiu shakes his head, his expression cold.“Even if I only had two thousand men—I was always going to break through your gates, Ke Mo. And even if I hadn’t—Yong’an was a vast empire with deep pockets. You really think there wouldn’t have been repercussions for your actions? That they wouldn’t have come down on you?”

“MY actions?!” The general shouts, his rage growing palpable. “HOW DARE YOU?!”

“...If victory was inevitable, like you say,” Xie Lian murmurs, “Why did you need Banyue to open the gates?”

Pei Xiu hangs his head for a moment—finally seeming to feel a measure of shame.

“I couldn’t let anyone leave the city alive,” he mutters. “I needed her to open the gates before they could organize an evacuation.”

The idea seems so horribly cold, it almost stuns Xie Lian—a long time veteran of war himself.

“...Because they didn’t give us a choice.”

Pei Xiu’s tone turns hard, now—glaring at Ke Mo. The loathing between the two men runs so deep—it’s almost difficult to fathom.

“Even if we won the battle, Ke Mo and his officers trained the citizens of the Crescent Moon to flee into Yong’an with explosives.”

Listening to the story—the sheer brutality of it—is almost grotesque.

"They were going to take down as many people from Yong'an as they could. Leaving any of them alive created a risk."

Xie Lian's voice is soft when he asks—

"Is that true, Ke Mo?"

"…Yes, and so what?!"

The sheer scale of the grotesque nature of the plan leaves Xie Lian speechless.

"We weren't the ones who started the conflict! It was Yong'an, for constantly invading our borders!"

"Invading?" Pei Xiu rolls his eyes. "No one agreed to those borders but the Crescent Moon."

"You declared the desert ours, and kept the oasis to yourselves."

The argument is as old as time. Older than Yong'an and the Crescent moon. Older than Xianle, even.

"It was OUR ancestral land! You had no right to it!"

"All we wanted was to pass through for trade—you were the ones constantly starting fights on the borders. Allowing horse thieves to travel into our borders and slaughter our people, then shielding them from our authorities!"

"You gave us NO choice!" Ke Mo staggers forward. "We HAD to defend ourselves!"

Xie Lian has been a student of conflict, politics, and diplomacy his entire life—and he remembers that time in the world well.

In truth, the initial blame probably lies with the kingdom of Yong'an.

By Pei Xiu's own words—they were far larger, more powerful, and wealthy. Even if they were in the process of a decline, it had only just begun.

The central plains are vast, filled with fertile land—they didn't need claim over the Oases of the desert.

And, in fairness—they had deep water ports and rivers that ran through the continent, so it wasn't about a need to be able to trade.

Passing through the desert was just faster—a cost saving measure. And the proud, unreasonable people of Banyue were an irritating obstacle.

But their transgressions to the Crescent Moon, while disrespectful, were relatively harmless. They truly had no intentions of invading, only passing caravans through.

But life in the desert is harsh, and it left the people of the Crescent Moon distrustful of strangers.

Still—while the Kingdom of Yong'an was wrong for violating their sovereignty, the response from the Crescent Moon was unjustifiable.

Slaughtering innocent people in the border towns who had very little to do with imperial trading policy. Weaponizing their own citizens.

Insurgencies are common when a much weaker state faces off against a larger empire in a war. Blending the military in with the civilians makes an opponent that is almost impossible to defeat.

But it also makes casualties skyrocket—and the crimes of war become far more violent.

And Ke Mo's actions towards the end—they were vengeful and stupid. He doomed his own nation, placing Yong'an in a position where they felt the citizens of the Crescent Moon posed an existential threat, not only the soldiers.

Their blood is on his hands, as much as Pei Xiu's.

So yes, Yong'an might have started the war—but the Crescent Moon had no right to fight it in the way that they did.

Both sides are right, and both sides are wrong. That's usually the way things go.

"You know...Most people from Yong'an are shameless." Ke Mo mutters. "But you..." He staggers towards him, "YOU'RE THE MOST SHAMELESS OF ALL!"

It's a pathetic attempt at an attack—but still, Pei Xiu deigns to kick him. So hard that he's sent flying back against the wall of the Sinner's Pit once more, spitting out blood.

"Just ADMIT IT!" He screams. "YOU DIDN'T SLAUGHTER MY PEOPLE TO SAVE LIVES! IT WASN'T FOR YONG'AN! IT WAS ABOUT YOUR OWN CAREER! THE SON OF AN EXILED MAN, DESPERATE TO MAKE A NAME FOR HIMSELF! YOU USED BANYUE, MADE HER BETRAY HER COUNTRY—AND SHE STILL THINKS THE WORLD OF YOU! IT'S PATHETIC!"

"Her 'country?'" Pei Xiu questions coldly. "Yong'an was just as much her country as the Crescent Moon—but we never punished her for her blood. Banyue was no traitor —she simply chose a side early on, and she stuck with it to the end."

He holds her closer now, almost protective.

"You dare call her a traitor?" His voice—normally so calm and level, takes on an entirely new tone. "You speak to me as though I'm the one who used her, when she was never more than an animal to you people until she became useful?"

Pei Xiu's gaze narrows into a hateful glare.

"You were always the monsters," he hisses, "and I have no remorse for executing you."

In that moment, his motive becomes clear:

'It was for her,' Xie Lian realizes, his breath catching. 'All of this—he did it for her.'

Now, a new voice rings out across the Sinner's Pit.

"No remorse?" It's artificially loud, clearly being projected by magic. "What a statement!"

A wind rips through the open chamber, powerful—and to Xie Lian's wary recognition, familiar.

"Then what about the innocent people you lured here? Do you feel remorse for that?"

Before Xie Lian can say or think anything more—they're swept up again by a powerful cyclone, sucking every one of them up and out of the pit.

San Lang keeps hold of him this time—and with the help of the umbrella, they land safely on top of the wall.

Fu Yao lands heavily beside them, coughing, only for someone to catch him by the wrist, the other batting at his hair.

His chin snaps up with a glare, “Are you SERIOUSLY still touching my—?!”

That hand grips his hair then, fingers intertwining with the locks at the base of his skull, yanking his chin back so his partner can glare down at him. “Say something about me touching your hair,” he snarls, “ONE more time!”

Fu Yao doesn’t say anything, actually.

He just stares up at him, eyes wide, lips slightly parted—and both deputy gods start to realize how the whole thing looks, their cheeks darkening.

“...Nan Feng!” Xie Lian cries, clearly relieved. “You’re alright!”

He lets go of Fu Yao immediately, bowing his head.

“Yes, your highness—I’m glad to see that you’re alright as well.”

“...He’s been beaten half to shit, though,” Fu Yao comments, poking at one of the bruises on Nan Feng’s cheek—clearly amused.

Xie Lian pauses, surprised. Did those two women really—?

“Your highness,” that same voice from before speaks up again—that of a woman, warm and friendly. “It’s a pleasure to finally meet you.”

“Ah...” Xie Lian smiles awkwardly, taking in the familiar auras before him before politely extending his arms in a bow. “Greetings!”

Honestly, he feels pretty bad now, for mistaking her and her companion for evil spirits...

What he can’t see now, is the way that San Lang is eyeing her companion, the two of them making tense, sharp eye contact.

The dark haired woman lifts her chin, almost defiant—and San Lang’s eyes flash with warning, his fingers tightening slightly around the handle of his umbrella, but saying nothing.

From behind them, Pei Xiu drops down to his knees, bowing his head.

“Lord Wind Master.”

The...Wind Master?

"...Nan Feng," Xie Lian whispers, leaning over to his friend, tugging at his sleeve. "Why didn't you tell me that this was the Wind Master sooner?"

The deputy god rankles, clearly un comfortable. "How should I know?! I've never seen the Wind Master like this!"

San Lang watches as the Wind Master speaks to Pei Xiu, her expression stern, then explains herself to Xie Lian.

All the time, He Xuan's voice is ringing in their private array.

'I didn't know it was him, when I sent that fireball. And the storm wasn't even me!'

Silence.

'You think you can just give me the silent treatment forever?'

Hua Cheng doesn't even look in her direction, his arms crossed.

'This isn't—'

'If you think I'm bothered by a tiny ball of fire, you have severely misread the situation,' Hua Cheng responds coldly.

Then, he makes the water demon's blood turn to ice— 'I'll deal with you later.'

In the meantime, the Wind Master determines that she'll take Ke Mo and Pei Xiu back to the heavens herself, while Banyue is left in Xie Lian's custody.

A courtesy on her part—one he's grateful for.

"I'll handle the rest of this," She murmurs, holding her whisk aloft, "I would lay low, for now."

"Could we hurry up and leave?" Ming Yi grouses, unamused.

"Don't rush me, alright?" The Wind Master whines, but—alas, they should hurry back. "Until next time, your highness!"

They disappear in a flurry of wind—and San Lang watches with an air of approval. "She's a rather courteous one, for doing that."

Xie Lian glances at him curiously. "Is she really?"

“She’s sparing you from dealing with Pei,” Nan Feng explains. “He’ll definitely be offended.”

Xie Lian sighs, not entirely surprised. After all—it explains Ling Wen’s initial warning.

She must have known far more than she let on.

“Understandable, I’m sure he was very invested in Pei Xiu’s career, but...” Xie Lian glances up with a frown. “What about Lord Wind Master?”

“Won’t Pei be angry with her as well?”

Nan Feng shrugs, shaking his head. “She’s half your age—but she’s far more popular in the Heavens.”

Xie Lian winces, a little sheepish.

“Besides—Pei wouldn’t dare. She has a patron he wouldn’t want to anger.”

A patron more powerful than Ming Guang? Xie Lian struggles to imagine who that would be, other than Jun Wu himself.

Then again, it’s been a very long time since he was a part of the Heavenly court—the landscape has certainly changed.

It’s a simple matter, returning to where Fu Yao left Old Man Zheng and the other mortals in the desert, treating him with the Shan Yue fern.

As he recovers, the young boy—Tian Sheng, walks over to Xie Lian’s side. “...Excuse me, Mr. Priest?” He questions.

“Yes?”

“You’re a god, aren’t you?” Xie Lian jumps, clearly startled.

“I—Ah—”

“I saw you throw yourself into the pit for me,” the boy explains, “but you and your friend game out fine!”

“...Well,” the prince smiles, glancing around nervously. “Don’t tell anyone?”

Tian Sheng nods eagerly, looking around. “We were lucky that you were there! And say—where’s that girl from before? She knocked all those soldiers into the pit. That was how we escaped! I’d love to thank her...”

“Ah, you see...” Xie Lian pulls out a clay pot, “She’s in here.”

Tian Sheng stares, somewhat disbelieving. “...That looks like something you’d use to pickle vegetables, gege.”

That draws a quiet laugh from the god. “It does—but weaker spiritual creatures can be stored in objects like this for travel. She’s rather tired now and needs to rest.”

The boy nods, rising to his feet. “...Really, thank you so much, gege.”

Xie Lian’s eyes widen slightly. Somewhat similar to Ling Wen—he isn’t used to being thanked.

“Without you—I’d never be able to see my loved ones again, so!” He pounds his chest, making a passionate vow.

“When I get back to my village—I’ll build a temple for you! It’ll be huge, I swear!”

San Lang watches the scene from a distance with his arms crossed, a smile on his face.

“Well...” Xie Lian straightens, holding the pot in his arms, “thank you very much then —and safe travels!”

The merchants go on their way after that—leaving Nan Feng, Xie Lian, and San Lang standing together in the desert, watching them go. Fu Yao left already, accompanying the Wind Master back to the heavens.

“...You shouldn’t worry about Pei, even without the Wind Master.”

San Lang is the one to make the comment, his hands clasped behind his back as he watches the party go—and Xie Lian turns to him with a curious expression.

“He’s proud—he won’t be petty, or resort to cheap tricks. Keep to yourself, and you should be fine.”

Nan Feng watches him closely now, like he’s slowly beginning to realize something.

“...Maybe that’s why you looked familiar before,” He mutters, watching San Lang closely. “You look kind of like Pei Xiu and Ming Guang.”

What with the posture, the hair, and the menacing aura of overwhelming arrogance.

Xie Lian can barely remember what Pei looked like, so it’s hard to judge—and he has no idea what Pei Xiu looks like as an adult man.

“Is that so?” San Lang replies breezily. “I’ve never met him, so I wouldn’t know.”

Xie Lian turns his head back and forth between the two, before clapping his hands together. “In any case!” He exclaims, “I owe both of you for all of your help on this investigation. I should treat you.”

He turns to Nan Feng with a warm smile, “Would you like to come to my shrine for a meal?”

Of course, the immediate spike of his heart rate and the blood draining from his face was an intended response, but Nan Feng is polite about it, pretending to get a message in his array.

“I, ah...General Nan Yang has urgent business for me, your highness,” he mutters. “I should return to the heavens at once!”

Xie Lian smiles, unsurprised. “That’s too bad...tell him I’m thankful for his help once again, will you?”

In a matter of moments—Nan Feng has left.

Leaving them alone in the desert. Normally, Xie Lian would be worried about making their way back, but...

“...What would you like, then,” he murmurs, turning his head in the direction of his companion, lifting his chin and opening his eyes, revealing his shackle.

“Hua Cheng?”

Before him is a sea of crimson once more, expanding across the entire desert horizon, but...there, in the middle, is a silver core. Warm, inviting—not frightening at all.

“...” The Ghost King is quiet for a moment, examining Xie Lian’s expression closely, looking for...

Fear—disgust, or disapproval.

Finding none—he smiles, leaning in. So close, that Xie Lian can feel his breath, can sense how close their faces have become, and he doesn't know why, but his lips are tingling. Is that normal? He—

"I would prefer it if you called me San Lang."

Shades of Regret

Chapter Summary

> Regret is a complicated feeling. Like a weed that climbs and twists inside of you, ivy on brick. It starts as something small, but it never ends that way.
>
> It can wear the face of hope or desire.
>
> But sometimes, regret is one side of a coin flip, and the other....
>
> Is revenge.

Chapter Notes

> You can find me on twitter and keep up with current updates of the story HERE
>
> CONTENT WARNING: this chapter contains a sex scene.

Feng Xin's life has always been defined by battle tactics, in one way or another. It's the first language he ever learned, from the hands of his father.

There are three modes of living: attacking, defending, and retreat. When he was young, everything was about the attack.

Feng Xin attacked things he didn't understand. Things that frightened him. Things that frustrated him. He protected what he loved ferociously—and never retreated. Not until he was ordered to.

He hasn't changed since then—but he often wishes that he had. And now, he...

The minute he steps back into his palace, he's slammed against the wall, his eyes widening slightly as he instinctively reaches out, grabbing his attacker by the front of the shirt, twisting them around and pinning them down, only to get pulled in.

...He's usually on defense.

But there's really no defending from someone who knows every weak point in your armor. From someone who has a key to the castle gates.

Mu Qing has always tasted familiar, even the first time, when it should have felt alien. And now, after eight centuries of battles, there's nothing more familiar than this.

"That other skin of yours…" Mu Qing mutters, hands bunched up in the front of Feng Xin's robes, words cut off between kisses and stolen breaths, "Is fucking hideous…"

He says that about every form Feng Xin wears, but it never stops them from ending up back here. Except—

It's been quite a while since they did this. Three centuries, in fact.

And this is the only time that Mu Qing has initiated physical contact.

Usually, his form of 'initiating' is antagonizing Feng Xin until he starts it, that way he can dangle it over the god's head teasingly after, but this—

Feng Xin slides his hand up into Mu Qing's hair, fingers tightening, just as they did before, earning a small moan in response.

"…You really liked that, didn't you?" He mutters, a frustrated grunt slipping out when Mu Qing's palm presses against his chest, shoving him away.

"More like I was testing a theory," the god drawls, staring up at him impassively, his arms crossed.

"…Theory?"

Mu Qing doesn't answer him, leaning back against the wall for a second, working through the process of catching his breath.

It's been three centuries, yes—three centuries of avoiding one another, since the last fight they had.

That's one misconception about them:

Whenever people see them arguing, it's always, 'Oh, Nan Feng and Xuan Zhen are fighting again, what else is new.'

But that isn't them fighting. Those are spats. Or maybe you could call them disagreements.

When they actually fight, someone always gets hurt, and the scars linger.

And three centuries ago—the scars that they left on one another ran deep.

Mu Qing hasn't spent that much time with Feng Xin since then, not until these last two missions. And being down there, on either side of Xie Lian, arguing over stupid shit that doesn't matter, it…

It was reminiscent, in many ways, of the way that they used to be—and it made Mu Qing wonder…if they did this again…if it would feel the same. If Feng Xin would respond in the way that he always did.

And, no surprise, the most consistent person Mu Qing knows hasn't changed.

He just really thought—always thinks, in a way—that Feng Xin is going to push him away in disgust one day. That eventually, his dislike of Mu Qing will no longer allow him to indulge in…

Whatever this sexually charged game of cat and mouse is, anyway.

When Feng Xin sees that Mu Qing is about to leave, however, he does have something to say.

Something that isn't quite playing defense. "I have a theory too, you know."

Mu Qing stops, one foot towards the door, then turns around and crosses his arms. "Oh, this should be good."

"About your cultivation method."

Finally, the other god goes stiff—his eyes slightly wide.

"…What about it?" He questions flatly, his shoulders already hunching defensively.

"It requires being pure of mind and body," Feng Xin explains, staring him down. They both know—Mu Qing has only ever achieved the latter with complete success.

Someone 'pure of mind' wouldn't react that way to someone pulling at their hair. They would probably smile with serenity and start reciting the ethics sutra.

Like Xie Lian would—but not Mu Qing.

"If you have a point," the martial god mutters, his gaze sharp, "Go ahead and make it."

Feng Xin's father was a soldier, his grandfather before him. He comes from a long line of imperial guards of Xianle, and in many ways, it's still all he knows.

Attacking, defending.

And when he's been attacking—almost always—the target has been Mu Qing.

This isn't entirely meant to be an attack. It isn't meant to cause harm—but that doesn't mean that it won't.

"You've been here long enough to learn other cultivation methods," Feng Xin points out. "But you haven't."

Mu Qing's eyes have always been incredibly dark, but full of depth—and now, they seem even more shrouded than ever. "Most gods don't."

But Mu Qing clearly isn't disinterested in physical intimacy—despite his claims of not missing out on much.

"I think it's because of me."

Because if celibacy wasn't a barrier to entry, Mu Qing wouldn't have an excuse to stop this, over and over again.

Normally—Feng Xin isn't so pushy. Mu Qing shoves him away, and he grouses, but he lets it go. But—

They're getting too old for this.

Feng Xin isn't delusional. He isn't living under the pretense that they'll ever be more than something between friends and enemies. But—

Wouldn't their lives just be easier if they got whatever this tension is between them out of their systems?

Maybe then they could move on.

Because eight centuries of rising tension is exhausting to navigate, and if they just broke it—

Maybe he wouldn't end up going back to Mu Qing like this, over and over again. Mu Qing's first instinct, his only instinct really, is to think of something hurtful.

That's what he's doing right now. Running through scenarios in his head. Trying to find the one where he hurts Feng Xin just enough to make him back off—

Like a snake rattling its tail. A warning.

Don't come close. Don't hurt me. I'll hurt you first, and I'll hurt you worse.

But then he remembers something. Something that makes him stop.

What Xie Lian said, when Fu Yao tried to say that he wasn't heartless.

'I've always known that.'

At first, Mu Qing distrusted it. Thought it was just an attempt to look generous and saintly, but…

'I think that sometimes, he's so careful about guarding his emotions from others… people misunderstand him.'

That felt sincere. And—if that's true—

Mu Qing isn't particularly brave. He doesn't like putting himself in the position to feel afraid, or insecure.

And he especially doesn't like change, so he's never tried to change himself, either. Treated any opportunity to grow like an existential threat, but—

For once, he tries something different, even if it might not initially seem that way.

"If that theory of yours was right—have you ever thought of why I would want an excuse not to sleep with you?"

Feng Xin stops, his eyebrows knitting together with frustrating (and somewhat endearing) concentration.

He's not stupid, but fairly lacking in emotional intelligence.

"I always thought it was about pride," Feng Xin admits—because that's what it is for him.

And hearing that—it wounds Mu Qing a little bit, because no. He isn't particularly prideful. He has a self aggrandizing veneer, but actual pride—

That requires self worth.

For Feng Xin, sleeping together would mean admitting the attraction exists. Bending his pride. But—Mu Qing admitted the attraction so early on, it's just an accepted fact for him.

He's been far more aware of his own feelings for far too long.

"...Why," Mu Qing is quiet, his tone not overtly harsh, the way it usually is when he asks Feng Xin a question, "would I want to put myself in a vulnerable position with someone who thinks so little of me?"

He was desperate enough for that when he was young.

Feng Xin could have had him in any way back then, and Mu Qing would have accepted it—because he was so desperate for a form of acceptance that he could trust.

And someone wanting him like that—that felt concrete. He could believe that.

Until—

'Your highness...'

There's no way to describe that kind of heartbreak. It isn't special. It's actually fairly normal, but that doesn't make it easier.

To be a teenager, in love for the first time—wanting someone that badly—and feeling someone else's name against your lips, said with such longing.

Mu Qing might be self destructive by nature, but he doesn't have it in him to put himself through that again.

That was why he left. Because he knew, when Xie Lian came back—if he ever came back—

Mu Qing would hate him a little bit, even if it wasn't his fault.

Feng Xin stares down at him now, his face still pinched with thought, trying to wrap his mind around what Mu Qing is saying—

"I don't—"

"You're only pushing this now," Mu Qing stares back at him, eyes expansive in their lonesomeness, “because of the last few weeks. Because you saw me helping the prince. I don’t know if it made you think I had changed, or what—but you don’t think I’m a good person. You never have.”

And Mu Qing can admit—he probably isn’t.

But Mu Qing knows how Feng Xin treats someone he respects. Someone he cares for. He doesn’t treat Mu Qing that way. He never has.

And while Mu Qing is open to many forms of self destruction, he isn’t particularly brave. Not brave enough to let Feng Xin in that deep, just to make it hurt all over again.

“…I don’t…” Feng Xin swallows dryly, struggling.

“Don’t what?”

“…I don’t think that,” The martial god mutters, averting his eyes.

Liar.

Mu Qing grits his teeth, his throat tight.

Liar, liar, liar.

“You honestly expect me to believe that?”

“Why would I lie about it?”

Mu Qing’s chest hurts. Breathing feels punishing.

Because he wants Mu Qing to give him what he wants. Even if he’s never been like that before—

People are always like that. He—

Mu Qing feels like a rubber band rapidly reaching the end of its elasticity, ready to snap.

He’s tired, he hurts, and he’s scared.

“…You still treat me like you did when we were teenagers,” Mu Qing mutters, staring pointedly at the floors. “Like I’m some uppity servant waiting to fleece my master the first chance I get. And you expect me to believe that you don’t think I’m a bad person?”

"...Fleece your—?" Feng Xin throws his head back, pinching the bridge of his nose. "I never once accused you of stealing from him back then. Why is that always the first thing you go back to?"

"You didn't have to say it out loud," Mu Qing mutters, shaking his head "You hated me."

"Mu Qing—I-I really didn't," It's hard not to lose his temper, in the face of what he views as an asinine refusal to be reasonable—but Feng Xin tries. "And it's been eight centuries. You want me to say I don't think you stole the pearl?"

He throws his arms up, exasperated.

"Fine, Mu Qing—I don't think you stole the STUPID fucking pearl! And his highness was never going to let something happen to you, even if you had. It's been eight centuries—why does it even matter?! What's the point in being so goddamn paranoid?!"

"I had a reason to be!"

"What, because you didn't give back a block for a golden palace one fucking time?!" Feng Xin groans. "You think I cared about that?"

Of course, Feng Xin wouldn't understand. His position was never that precarious. But —

Mu Qing's eyes snap back up to him sharply.

"You really don't think I'm a bad person?" He repeats, watching the building frustration in Feng Xin's eyes.

"How many times do I have to say it?!"

Mu Qing doesn't trust him. He doesn't believe him, but— He gives Feng Xin a chance. One, solitary chance to prove it.

"Then I'm going to tell you something," Mu Qing mutters, his arms so tight around his middle that his ribs physically ache, just to hide the fact that his hands are trembling. "And if you can honestly look me in the eye and say that again the next time we're in this position..."

And let's be honest—there will be a next time.

They always end up here.

"I'll believe you."

Feng Xin crosses his arms, clearly mimicking Mu Qing's posture—but not in a mocking way, more like he's bracing himself. "Fine. What is it?"

"It wasn't about the golden palace."

Feng Xin stares, trying to understand what he's getting at, because it seems so out of the blue—and Mu Qing takes a deep, shaky breath.

Some secrets are so old, so horrible, that telling them feels like peeling off your own skin.

"That wasn't why I was so paranoid back then."

So terrified of losing his place. Of what would happen to him if there was the slightest hint of suspicion on him—for any reason.

Of what would happen to him. To his mother. His little siblings.

Feng Xin stares, watching how pale Mu Qing has become—the way his lips tremble.

After eight centuries—whatever it was, it bothers him that much?

Because right now—Mu Qing looks absolutely terrified.

"Mu Qing, what—?"

And of anything that Feng Xin could have guessed in the moment before Mu Qing spoke—

"I was a murderer."

—it wouldn't have been that.

Feng Xin is silent for a moment, trying to wrap his head around that statement. "You...what?"

He was that paranoid when they were teenagers—that worried about something as small as being accused of stealing an earring—because he—?

"By the time the palace even hired me."

That makes Feng Xin even more wary, struggling to wrap his mind around what Mu Qing is trying to say, because—

That was before Feng Xin even knew him. And— They were thirteen when they first met.

How could he…how could he have—?

“Was it…”

For once in his life—Feng Xin speaks cautiously, his tone lacking the anger or aggression he had before.

Just…shock.

“…Self defense?”

Because for someone that age—he can’t imagine another— Mu Qing breaks eye contact, hanging his head.

“…No,” he croaks. “It wasn’t.”

There’s a difference between killing someone and murdering them.

Feng Xin and Mu Qing fought a war side by side. He’s seen Mu Qing kill countless times.

But he used the word murder intentionally. It was carefully phrased.

Mu Qing feels almost nauseous. His knees are weak.

“I slit someone’s throat in their sleep. It wasn’t self defense. I made a choice.”

One that he would have been executed for, easily. Or his mother, if she had tried to take the fall for him.

And Mu Qing knew, in his bones, that she would have. She thought it was her fault.

“…Did anyone else know?” Feng Xin questions, because—

He doesn’t think Xie Lian could have. When they were that age…the prince honestly thought the worst thing that could happen to a person was being forced to eat something green.

“My mom,” Mu Qing mutters.

Feng Xin isn’t entirely surprised. Mu Qing’s family was poor, but incredibly close knit. Especially after his father’s passing.

“...and the King.”

But that—that completely throws Feng Xin off kilter, making him sputter with shock.

He doesn’t think Mu Qing is lying, but...

How could the King, knowing that, allow Mu Qing close to Xie Lian? And—

Why would he bring a murderer into the palace to begin with? It—

Feng Xin’s stomach sinks with discomfort, and his right arm aches painfully from a ghost injury. An unpleasant memory.

It sounds like a coverup—to protect someone of higher status.

The King had done such things many times before. Which implies...

That there’s more to it than what Mu Qing is saying, because Xie Lian’s father would have had little reason to protect him.

“...What were the circumstances?” He questions, eyeing Mu Qing closely. The martial god doesn’t say a word, his hair hiding his expression.

“I’m not talking about that.” He mutters, his voice hoarse.

Feng Xin’s brow furrows—frustrated and confused.

“Then why tell me?”

“You want me to believe you didn’t think I was a bad person all this time?” Mu Qing mutters, lifting his chin.

He’s all naked bravado now. Pale, with gaunt eyes and quivering lips—but— Feng Xin’s heart aches as he watches Mu Qing attempt to sneer, even now.

“You’ve known me for more than eight hundred years. You can think back on how you felt about me all that time—and you can decide if you think I had a good reason or not.”

He turns around quickly, his hair slapping Feng Xin in the face.

“Then—maybe next time, I’ll believe you.”

He makes a show of marching out, his head held high—but really, he's fleeing. And by the time Feng Xin has recovered from the shock enough to speak—

He's standing alone in the entryway of his palace, and Mu Qing is gone. It was a terrifying thing to do, and Mu Qing...

He doesn't handle fear particularly well.

When he makes it back to his own palace, he ignores his own deputies and servants, making his way down to his rooms, and doing the same thing he used to do, when he was small.

He hides under his own desk.

Knees pulled against his chest, arms wrapped around himself, taking comfort in a small, enclosed space until the hyperventilation stops.

It's been so long, but peeling that back, even speaking those words— It felt like breaking open an old scar.

He's never been honest with anyone about it. He's never given anyone the chance to accept him, in spite of it.

No one has ever had the chance to reject him either.

And it might be karma. It really might be fucking karma, because— In the end, he would regret telling Feng Xin.

Regret is a complicated feeling. Like a weed that climbs and twists inside of you, ivy on brick. It starts as something small, but it never ends that way.

It can wear the face of hope or desire.

But sometimes, regret is one side of a coin flip, and the other....

Is revenge.

If there's one thing He Xuan has developed over the years...

"O-oh god—!" She chokes, fingers tightening in his hair, thighs quivering around his ears, heels digging into the muscles of his shoulders.

He smirks, hands tightening around her hips. ...It's a sense of irony.

"In a place like this," he murmurs, turning his head to nip at the soft skin of her inner thigh, "you're going to have to be a little more specific."

She opens her mouth, but all that comes out is a choked cry when he dives back in, working his tongue over her.

It's been a long day, he's built up quite an appetite—and before he sleeps... He Xuan wants the simple pleasure of devouring something.

"M-Ming-Xiong!" Shi Qingxuan pants, eyes rolled back into her head, nails scraping at his scalp as she pulls at his hair. "I-I—!"

His tongue dips inside, and she actually squeals, her legs flailing against his back, spine arching as her other hand clutches at the pillows behind her head—and he smirks.

Cute.

"I c-can't!" She sobs, turning her face into her own bicep, hips rocking into his mouth.

"I—"

She's such a fucking baby, tears pricking at the corners of her eyes, toes curling in pace with his tongue as it flexes inside.

"I really, really can't!"

He Xuan has had her in every possible combination of form since they started doing this.

With every possible version of himself. Well. Except for the real one.

And in every single one, she's been desirable. If he was feeling generous, he would say that Shi Qingxuan was beautiful in every iteration.

But it's been a long day, and he's not feeling kind.

He likes her like this, though. Likes how soft and supple her thighs feel around him. Craves the narrow dip of her waist under his hands. Memorizes the sight of her breasts heaving with pleasured gasps.

But most of all, he likes watching the way her makeup runs when she cries.

Eyeliner running and streaking from the corners of her eyes, smeared lip stain— giving her this ruined, half undone look.

It makes every inch of him pulse with want, like a lion waiting to go for the jugular.

“I-If you don’t stop, I-I’m gonna—!”

“And?”

They make eye contact, even if the sight of his face…there…makes her flush and squirm, held in place by the iron grip on her waist.

“I can make you finish as much as I want, when you’re like this…” He muses, maintaining that eye contact as he rolls his tongue over her again.

“O-oh—!”

“So,” his hands slide down from her hips, gripping her inner thighs instead, wrapping all the way around as they dig delicious bruises into her flesh. “Go ahead.”

He dives back in, with such a ferocity that it makes her tremble, both hands sliding into his hair.

Thankfully, Ming Yi’s palace doesn’t have any deputy gods or servants crowding the halls.

“M-MING-XIONG!”

She can scream to her heart’s content as her body convulses, heart pounding in time with the throbbing between her legs, and—

He Xuan devours her climax, insatiable.

Swallows every inch of pleasure, every scream, moan, and whimper whole.

He starts kissing his way up her torso before she’s even stopped shaking, nipping at her navel, her ribs, lavishing her breasts with his teeth and tongue.

And she says that name, over and over.

Ming-Xiong, Ming-Xiong, Ming-Xiong.

But not his name. Never his name.

She only knows how to repeat the lies he told her. “Ming—!”

Shi Qingxuan cuts herself off with a choked moan as his hand envelops her throat, squeezing.

He stares down at her, eyes dark, churning.

Shi Qingxuan knows him as the earth master, but she’s never thought the title suited him, not really. There’s something about him that reminds him of the waters she used to watch outside her window at night, as a child.

Black and swirling, dangerous—but tempting.

It’s the mystery that draws you in, when you see the sea at night. The way it blends in almost seamlessly with the midnight blue of the horizon.

It seems like the biggest thing in the world, and you have no idea what lies beneath. Not that she ever tried to find out.

Ironically enough, despite being sibling to the God of Water—Shi Qingxuan has never been a strong swimmer.

When He Xuan looks into her eyes, he sees something markedly different.

Bright, vibrant shades of green. Colors that remind him of warmth, forests, and summer.

They’re hopeful. Full of good memories, hope, promises for the future.

Those eyes are all of the things that He Xuan cannot be.

All of the things that were stolen from him.

Shi Qingxuan pants, wrapping one hand around his wrist—and her gaze turns questioning.

“M-Ming—?”

She’s always tight in the wake of an orgasm—and now, when two fingers plunge inside, there’s a pleasurable stretch in the feeling of being spread open, her eyes rolling back into her head as they make scissoring motions inside.

He watches, eyes dilated in the dark. Takes in every inch of the sight.

How small her throat looks under his fingers. The way her hips tremble as they rock into his hand.

Shi Qingxuan isn't big, for a man—but as a woman, she's even smaller. Vulnerable, eyes half lidded from the pleasure as his fingers work deeper.

He could crush her right now. It would be so stupidly easy. And she would let him, drinking in pleasure until the last second, never knowing what was coming.

Instead, he slips a third finger inside, watching the way her lips part with a silent gasp, eyes growing wide.

This wasn't part of the plan.

He Xuan doubts anyone would believe him, if he said that. This position doesn't exactly leave him looking particularly innocent.

But at the end of the day, he's a starving man who is prone to his indulgences, and she...

She wanted him.

It started as sneaking glances and touches that lingered a little too long. Teasing that was too embarrassingly obvious to be mistaken for anything but flirting, even if the little idiot thought it was subtle.

And He Xuan, he...

He wanted her. And he couldn't stop it.

And when those eyes focus in on him once more, they seem so open, so trusting.

It's in moments like this, when it becomes so easy for him to almost forget that he doesn't have a heart.

That it died centuries ago, and ironically enough—it was for her sake.

For just a moment, staring up at him in the dark, Shi Qingxuan thinks she sees those eyes flash with gold, burning down at her with an unnatural glow.

But then she blinks, tears sliding down her face—

And then, his fingers are sliding away, making her whine from the emptiness.

But not for long, before he replaces them with the thing that she really wants, making her arch beautifully underneath him, an unrestrained moan slipping from her throat as he lets it go, gasping.

His hands brace against the mattress on either side of her head as he rocks in.

Deeper, deeper, deeper.

Until she feels pleasantly hollowed out, her arms clinging around his neck, ankles crossing behind his back.

His mouth is against her cheek, not kissing it, but— Drinking in her tears with satisfaction.

Still, she pleads.

"M...Ming-Xiong..."

There's a powerful thrust that draws a broken cry from her, arms trembling around his neck.

"K...Kiss me," she mumbles, the tears flowing faster, but He Xuan isn't worried. "P- Please?"

She likes it when he makes her cry.

Still—sometimes, he indulges her, kissing slow and deep.

She hugs his neck closer, and he nips at her lips until she smiles, opening further for him, and he asks—

"Still okay?"

Not because he cares, but because it's something that Ming Yi would do. He's the sort with a hard exterior, hiding affection underneath.

Even so, that smile widens against his lips, even as her own tremble.

"M-Mm' okay," She mumbles, rocking up against him for emphasis, making his own lips turn up at the corners against his will.

His mouth trails back up her cheek.

“Crybaby…” He murmurs, slamming in harder.

Drinking in those tears, as they flow faster.

“M-Mean…!” She cries, whimpering all sorts of things.

That he’s a bully. Relentless. A tormentor of the cruelest kind.

Even as he wrings out climax after climax, not stopping until they start to blend together in one long crest.

But that’s alright, because she loves it when he’s mean, and he loves it when she cries.

She’s passed out against his chest by the end of it, limp, breaths trembling against his throat as He Xuan keeps one arm wrapped around her back, staring at the ceiling.

Maybe he overdid it.

That’s entirely possible, but…

‘I’ll deal with you later.’

It seems somewhat likely that statement will be coming back to haunt him sooner rather than later. And if He Xuan is going to have to deal with that, well—

His arm tightens around her back, his expression unreadable.

Shi Qingxuan is loud. Overstimulating at times. But—being around her, it’s enough to keep his mind quiet when he needs it to be.

Which is necessary—because sometimes, it becomes unbearably loud. Like it is right now.

And by the time it quiets down again—it’ll be too late.

Pei Ming could not possibly begin to explain how grateful he is, for the fact that he ascended before he ever had children.

Realistically, he probably did—but he was lucky enough to never find out. Because dealing with children?

Not his forte.

“Listen,” he wipes a hand down his face.

Normally, he could shrug this sort of thing off with a laugh.

But this is Pei’s thirteenth mission in one month, and he just received some incredibly unpleasant news from the Heavens.

“When I tell you to stay back, you stay back.”

The Martial God of the West stares up at him blankly, clearly not seeing any problem. “You said to get out of the way, Ming Guang. I think that’s different.”

Pei is smiling, but his eyebrow is twitching consistently. “And did you get out of the way?”

Quan Yizhen blinks. “No.”

Honestly, the worst part is that Quan Yizhen isn’t even a child. He’s just so goddamn eccentric that Pei Ming doesn’t know what else to call him.

He’s tried everything to get the Martial God under control on missions. Threats. Asking nicely. Guilt tripping.

Making promises he doesn’t intend to keep. Absolutely none of them are effective.

“Look around you,” Pei’s smile is so strained, it looks more like a grimace now as he grabs Quan Yizhen by the front of his robes, “and tell me where we are.”

The younger god obeys in near comical fashion, turning his head and looking around him in a slow, exaggerated fashion, expressionless as he takes in the sights around them, before looking up at Pei Ming and answering promptly:

“Qinghe.”

“Very observant,” Pei hisses.

And the worst part?

Quan Yizhen actually seems a little flattered by the praise, incapable of detecting Pei’s blatant sarcasm. “Thank you.”

Pei wants to kill himself. No. He wants to kill Quan Yizhen, then himself. Murder suicide. That’s the way to go.

“And whose territory is it?”

“Yours.”

“And whose mission is this?”

“Yours.”

“And who is the senior god present?”

“You.”

“You understand all of these things.” Pei Ming is normally a fairly easy going person. Go with the flow. Shi Wudu and Ling Wen hate that about him.

But right now, he’s exhausted. He’s been exhausted for the better part of a decade now, because that’s how long this stint of increasingly difficult missions has been going on.

And Quan Yizhen is possibly the most effective help there is in a fight, but he’s also a liability.

“And have you listened to a single goddamn thing I’ve said this entire mission?”

He has these big, hazel eyes, and they stare up at him with a level of earnestness that borders on stupidity.

“No.”

The mission seemed simple enough, in the beginning—not so out of the ordinary.

There was a savage ghost preying on young women in the area—spiriting them away to the point where not even their corpses or ashes could be traced.

Jun Wu has been concerned about high level ghosts recently, because, for some reason, he thinks Mount Tonglu is going to reopen.

Soon.

And by his logic, sending Pei Ming, the most consistent martial god available, to eliminate the strongest savage ghosts available before it does, is somehow the best means to make sure the next Ghost King to be born isn't particularly powerful.

Pei doesn't understand it—because Jun Wu didn't ask him to look into it when He Xuan was created, or Hua Cheng before him. The only rationale he can discern is that two powerful ghost kings are a pair, but three make a worrisome party that Jun Wu doesn't want to deal with.

And what's worse—not every ghost Jun Wu has sent him to eliminate has been violent, or even a threat to humans. In which cases, Pei Ming felt more like a glorified butcher than a protector of mortals.

At no point has Qi Rong's name come up, despite his destructive nature, and…

With each assignment that gets passed down, Pei Ming becomes more and more wary each time that he might see the name of the savage ghost Ren Song on the mission file.

He relishes in a good fight, and ten years ago—he would have leapt at a conflict with Hua Cheng.

But now?

The thought exhausts him more than it thrills him.

Still—in this case, the threat turned out to not even be from the ghost. Not in the way they expected.

There's a local cultivation clan—one who started from a family of butchers, known for using sabers as their weapon of choice

The only problem was—they were using the resentful energy from animals and other forms of beasts to cultivate with said sabers.

And when the cultivator wielding the weapon died, it left that energy with nowhere else to go.

Forming multiple, incredibly violent blade spirits.

Slaying those that currently existed was one thing—one difficult, incredibly violent task—but this was a cultivation clan that had existed for the last century and a half.

That meant hundreds of graves, hundreds of spirits.

In the end, he was able to work with the clan leader to work out a feasible solution— sealing the remaining sabers in stone castles with corpses of their dead counterparts to keep the spirits sealed, but...

Wrangling them all was a bloody process. And a dangerous one.

One that cost many cultivators their lives—and quite frankly, almost severely injured Quan Yizhen several times, because the stupid little shit doesn't listen—

But, Pei digresses.

And now, they're standing here, basking in the real tragedy of the situation: The Ghost.

Initially, the killings were blamed on a local spirit known to hide in the forest, one that everyone thought to be harmless—but, when the violence escalated, well...it was the most obvious candidate.

Simply because it was old. Old enough that the stories traced back centuries.

The stone castle built to house the blade spirits just so happened to be within that very forest—and, in the process—

The cultivators attacked the ghost, who was entirely innocent in the situation, leaving it to slowly disperse, alone.

Like a wounded animal left to die.

The leader of the cultivation clan glances back and forth between the two gods, seeming to think that their disagreement must be coming to an end, bowing to Pei apologetically,

"I should have had better control of my men, General Ming Guang. Deepest apologies."

Pei lets out a tired sigh.

The Nie Clan is an honest group of cultivators, if not unconventional. Nie Feng, their leader, is no exception.

“They’re cultivators. They attacked a ghost they perceived as a threat. There’s nothing to apologize for,” he mutters, shaking his head.

Still, it’s difficult not to pity the creature.

“...You go,” the god sighs, pushing his bangs back from his forehead. “Take your men and celebrate your victory. We'll report back to the Heavens shortly.”

After a moment the clean leader nods, bowing deeply to show thanks.

Once he leaves, Pei Ming and Quan Yizhen are left alone in the forest, watching the ghost slowly begin to fade.

It’s far more ancient than Pei realized before. Not a matter of centuries, no.

This spirit is older than him. And, Pei suspects—

It could be even older than Jun Wu.

“...What’s your name, friend?” He murmurs, watching with a sympathetic gaze.

The old man shakes his head, his face a gnarled mess of wrinkles, eyes reduced to dark pits, sporting a head of white, scraggly hair.

“My name is Deng Shihong,” he rasps. “And you are not my friend.”

Slowly, his eyes drift over to Quan Yizhen, flashing with something Pei Ming doesn’t quite recognize.

“Young man...” He murmurs, “you’re a warrior, yes?”

The Martial God of the East shrugs with a nod. “Why?”

“...Come,” the ghost murmurs, “I have something for your emperor.”

He lifts one trembling hand to coax the young god forward, fingers gnarled nearly beyond recognition. “He’ll want it, I’m sure.”

Quan Yizhen’s eyebrows raise slightly—but his curiosity has been piqued enough for him to listen, stepping forward.

Deng Shihong smiles.

There’s a flash in his eyes, and in that moment, Pei realizes—

It’s a mistake.

“Quan Yizhen!” He barks, “STAY BACK!”

But, in typical fashion, the little idiot doesn’t listen, leaving Pei Ming with exactly one choice:

Grabbing him by the back of his robes and yanking him away.

But in doing so—

Thud .

Pei Ming grimaces when there’s a sharp pain in his side, and when he looks down—

He sees the hilt of a dagger sticking out between his ribs.

One with a hilt unlike any he’s seen before. Intricate, with a gilded snake curled around the pommel.

“...Ming Guang,” Deng Shihong smiles, revealing a mouth full of sharpened teeth, “I remember you clearly.”

The pain is noticeable—enough to make him grit his teeth—but when Quan Yizhen tries to rush forward to assist, Pei reaches behind, shoving him back.

“You’ve done enough.”

He snarls the words, turning back to the ghost, who seems pleased.

“I always thought it was fascinating, how a man responsible for so much bloodshed could have such honor...” Deng Shihong smiles. “You didn’t hesitate to throw yourself in front of the blade for that young man.”

Responsible for so much bloodshed.

Pei Ming’s eyes flash slightly from the reaction, and he glares.

“What were you trying to do?”

Rather than answering his question, the ghost shrugs, his form becoming somewhat transparent.

“How many children were buried, because of you?”

Pei Ming's expression doesn't change, trained with stoicism, his eyes narrowed—

But there's a flash of pain there. An old, infected scar being jabbed at viciously.

"I suspect you're a killer too," he replies, his voice calm. "You wouldn't have lasted this long if you weren't."

Deng Shihong smiles thinly, his head leaned back against the trunk of the tree behind him, "Yes," he sighs, "but not of humans. That...honor lies with you, my friend."

Pei rests his elbows on his knees, knelt before the ghost, watching his face with an eerie sort of stillness.

"I thought you said we weren't friends."

The ghost barks out a broken laugh, shaking his head, "No, no...I suppose I did..."

Slowly, his gaze trails down to Pei Ming once more, and he adds—

"...It would have been more poetic if I went for the throat, don't you think?"

The General's eyes narrow sharply, then widen with recognition.

"...Is that it, then?" He questions wearily. "You're from Yushi?"

Deng Shihong shakes his head, the pits of his eyes glittering with amusement. "That was long after my time. But I watched you, Ming Guang."

The Martial God's expression finally twists with shame. "I saw what you did."

What he did.

He...

"...And what," Pei mutters, staring him down.

Not the smiling, fun loving, easy going version of himself. Not the non-threatening personality he projects to most.

This is a side of himself he's only shown to one other person in the last few centuries. Never intentionally, only ever in moments of weakness, aching to be understood.

And he was.

“What were you trying to do? Slay a god on your way out? Make a legacy for yourself that way?”

The ghost shakes his head, his expression one of deep satisfaction. “I already have a legacy, my boy.” He murmurs, nodding towards Pei Ming, but, more specifically—

To the dagger buried between his ribs.

“I only wish…” His voice takes on an echoing quality, fading.

The face that stares back at him now is that of a soldier, worn and battle weary. Haunted.

A last sight befitting a ghost such as him, Deng Shihong thinks, eyes gleaming one final time.

“…I could see the look on Jun Wu’s face, when he sees it…” And just like that, he’s gone.

“…” Pei Ming rises to his feet, yanking the dagger out with a wince, tucking it into his belt. “Let’s go.”

“…That was my fault,” Quan Yizhen mutters—and for once, he seems to understand the consequences of his own stupidity.

Pei sends him a tired glance, waving him off.

“It was,” he agrees. “But no harm done.”

After all, a wound like this is nothing to him.

And now, all he wants is to get back home. To his liquor, to his bed—and to the person he wants to see in it, but—

He stops, reaching up to touch the corner of his mouth.

When his hand comes away—

There’s blood there, staining his fingertips.

And when Pei Ming looks down at his abdomen, expecting to find his wound healing from the spiritual energy he's pouring into it—

It's still bleeding.

"...Ming Guang?"

The general stumbles.

"...The hell?" He mutters, pressing his hand against his side, staunching the bleeding.

It—

It's not healing.

Suddenly, he finds himself looking down at the weapon at his hip with greater suspicion, his eyes narrowing.

...Just what kind of dagger is that, anyway?

Foolish, but Brave

Chapter Summary

> “Taizi dianxia,” He replies easily, and the way he says it… Xie Lian swallows hard.
>
> “…You’ve never called me by my title before,” he murmurs.
>
> That’s not technically true. But it was a transgression, one that Hua Cheng corrected the moment he could do so without suspicion.
>
> “How do you like it?” The ghost smiles, leaning his elbows back against the counter.
>
> “It…” Xie Lian struggles to find a way to phrase it that doesn’t sound…odd, “…sounds different, coming from you.”

Chapter Notes

> You can find me on twitter and keep up with current updates of the story HERE

See the end of the chapter for more notes

Returning to Puqi Shrine is far simpler than the first leg of their journey. After all— with no further reason to hide his strength, Hua Cheng is perfectly willing to draw an array that takes them back in one jump.

It’s nighttime once again, the crickets chirping outside.

Xie Lian stands before the stone counter on the far wall, carefully chopping up vegetables before sliding them into the pot.

In all honesty, he knows it’s not much of a meal to serve a ghost king, but… His skills must have improved over the years, at least a little, right?

And even if they haven’t—having an excuse to do something with his hands makes it a little easier to concentrate, which he often finds…

Difficult, when Hua Cheng is around. Which makes sense now, Xie Lian supposes. Ghost Kings must have that effect on most—he’s no exception.

But, rather than sit in comfortable silence—he supposes he has to start this conversation, one way or another.

“...So,” he murmurs, sliding a handful of chopped onions into the pot, “Crimson Rain Sought Flower.”

Hua Cheng leans against the counter beside him, arms crossed.

Xie Lian can feel it now, the weight of the Ghost’s eyes upon his every move. It isn’t unpleasant at all, and he really doesn’t mind, but—

It’s distracting, that’s for certain.

“Taizi dianxia,” He replies easily, and the way he says it... Xie Lian swallows hard.

“...You’ve never called me by my title before,” he murmurs.

That’s not technically true. But it was a transgression, one that Hua Cheng corrected the moment he could do so without suspicion.

“How do you like it?” The ghost smiles, leaning his elbows back against the counter.

“It...” Xie Lian struggles to find a way to phrase it that doesn’t sound...odd, “...sounds different, coming from you.”

Hua Cheng arches an eyebrow, tilting his head slightly. “Is that so? How?”

“It just sounds...”

The prince finds himself in the rare position where he really, truly wishes he could see Hua Cheng’s face—if only to see his expression.

“...Very respectful.”

Most of the time, when people call him ‘dianxia,’ it sounds...almost mocking, like a joke. From Hua Cheng, though...

It sounds reverential.

And the look on Hua Cheng’s face—the one he wishes he could see—

It’s a smile.

Soft, warm with affection.

“Good,” he murmurs, sounding rather pleased.

And Xie Lian, he…he shakes himself out of it before he can think about it too hard.

“…Anyway,” he mutters, “I’ve been meaning to ask…why did you pretend to be the ghost groom on Mount Yu Jun?”

Hua Cheng’s smile widens now, eyes glittering with amusement, “I never pretended to be the groom,” he replies.

And—

Well. Hold on actually. Xie Lian stops, sheepish.

Hua Cheng is right about that.

All he did was stand outside of the bridal sedan and offer his hand, Xie Lian was the one who just grabbed it and went along with him willingly.

And proceeded to call him…

Xie Lian stops, remembering now what he said that night. ‘…Hong’er?’

“…I’m sorry for the way I reacted to you,” he mutters, mortified, quickly placing a lid on the pot so he can allow it to simmer. “I…you just…” the prince bites the inside of his cheek, struggling to hide his feelings, “…Reminded me of someone.”

Hua Cheng’s case is heavier than ever now, weighing on Xie Lian in a way that makes him feel…almost stripped bare.

“It didn’t offend me—but can I ask who?”

That question—it couldn’t possibly be more difficult to answer. But Xie Lian, he…

He tries.

“Someone…” Xie Lian reaches up, touching the ring through the fabric of his robes, clearing his throat as he tries to steady his voice, “Someone no longer living,” he explains, “but…very important to me.”

It’s probably good, in the end, that he can’t see Hua Cheng’s face.

Because then, if he could—he would see that the Ghost King was in pain.

It's written across his expression—a kind of naked, long borne suffering. A longing that leaves it's bearer straining from the weight of it.

If Xie Lian saw that, he might think he caused it, and— He couldn't. He could never.

There have been so many people in Hua Cheng's life that have caused him pain. He's lost count by now, even if most of them have been long since slain.

But Xie Lian has never been one of them. He never could be. Hua Cheng's god could never hurt him.

"I'm sorry," the Ghost King mutters, half under his breath—but still, Xie Lian hears him clearly, looking over at Hua Cheng with confused curiosity.

"What for?"

After a pause, he simply replies—

"...For your loss."

Xie Lian smiles awkwardly, but his answer doesn't bring comfort. "It's alright, San Lang," he murmurs, lowering his hand from the chain around his neck. "It was a long time ago."

Hua Cheng closes his eyes and lets out a sigh, nodding his head with agreement— even if Xie Lian can't see it.

It was a very, very long time ago. That's true.

Blissfully unaware of Hua Cheng's inner turmoil, Xie Lian asks—

"Then...why were you on Mount Yu Jun that night?"

Hua Cheng watches him, like he's always, always watching him. Evaluating which step is best to take. "There are two options," he muses.

Now, he pushes off of the counter, moving to stand behind the god, leaning close—until his voice is next to Xie Lian's ear, murmuring—

“The first being that I came just for you, your highness,” he purrs, watching as goosebumps rise across Xie Lian’s skin, his pupils dilated. “...Or,” he leans back, throwing his hands up in a neutral gesture, “You could say that I was bored and looking for something to do.”

Xie Lian thinks it over, rubbing his chin.

“I suppose both are equally plausible, but...”

When Xie Lian thinks about everything Hua Cheng has done in the past week, helping out around the shrine, and then everything he did in the Crescent Moon...

“...It does seem like you’ve had a lot of free time,” he muses. An amused chuckle rings in his ears, making them burn.

“If you say so, dianxia.” He shrugs, glancing over Xie Lian’s face—his gaze lingering on the god’s eyes. “I see you aren’t trying to hide the shackle anymore.”

“...Well,” Xie Lian instinctively turns his face away, self conscious. “Heavenly Law only forbids showing mortals.”

That’s true—though not every god would feel so comfortable exposing an obvious sign of weakness before a Calamity.

“And...” the prince shrugs. “You clearly already know who I am—so there’s not really a point in hiding the fact that I have a shackle, even if it’s...”

He doesn’t finish his sentence, but Hua Cheng frowns, knowing what he means. “I don’t think it’s shameful at all, dianxia.”

Xie Lian’s lips turn up at the corners, somewhat tired. “That’s kind of you to say, San lang,” he mutters, but says nothing more.

The Ghost King frowns, struggling to hide his own frustrations, then comments—

“But you’re not completely blind, are you?”

That’s different from the way it was before.

Xie Lian tilts his head.

“That’s...a recent development,” he admits. “The shackle was damaged during my third ascension. Now—I can’t see physical objects, but...”

He shrugs, looking around at the sea of crimson all around them. “I can see spiritual power. auras from Ghosts, Gods, and Cultivators for the most part.”

Hua Cheng considers that.

“And that’s why you can see the butterflies.”

Xie Lian nods with a happy smile, fond as he remembers the sight of them that night, filling the darkness around him like hundreds of little stars. “They’re beautiful, I’m rather fond of them.”

That…makes Hua Cheng smile back.

“I’m glad to hear that. They’re…” He tilts his head to the side, his gaze suddenly far away, “…rather meaningful to me.”

It’s interesting to Xie Lian, how Hua Cheng can so easily go from being such a coy, teasing figure, to moments of such sincerity.

“…They are?” The god questions, “Why?”

His reply is so quiet—it’s not that Xie Lian struggles to hear him, that would be near impossible—

But the softness of his tone gives the prince pause. “Because they always come back.”

Suddenly, the god is reminded of what Hua Cheng said the night before, just before leaping into the Sinner’s Pit.

‘Don’t worry, gege—I’ll always come back.’

He…?

Hua Cheng makes the choice to change the subject. “What does my aura look like then, your highness?”

“Ah…” Xie Lian glances around him, thinking it over. “…Well—Crimson, which isn’t a surprise, I suppose—and also…” He struggles for the right way to describe it—one that doesn’t sound rude.

“…Huge.”

Hua Cheng sounds horribly amused.

“Is that so?”

"The biggest I've seen," Xie Lian nods, and Hua Cheng actually has to cover his mouth with his hand to bite back a snort.

"...Well," he lowers his hand, his voice even, "It's good to know that it's proportional."

It sounds like he's making a joke—not at Xie Lian's expense, but...

Xie Lian doesn't really get it, either.

"...But I don't want to be overbearing," the ghost muses, tapping his chin thoughtfully —and Xie Lian is quick to correct him.

"It's not at all, really!"

"But is this better?"

When the prince looks up, his breath catches.

Those trained in cultivation—or high level ghosts—have some amount of control over their spiritual power, controlling the flow and direction as it moves through their golden cores, but—

Hua Cheng's ability to mold it is unlike anything he's ever seen.

What he's done now, essentially, is taken all of that spiritual power, flooding Xie Lian's frame of vision, and shrunk it down to the surface of his skin—allowing the god to see the shape of his form.

It's more of a rough outline rather than actually seeing what he looks like.

Spiritual energy is a form of light, in a sense—and without shadow, there's little available to create any depth to what Xie Lian can see.

"Dianxia?"

"Ah..." Xie Lian's eyes are so wide, staring at him now, trying to take in everything that he can. "It's..."

He clears his throat, trying not to sound as affected as he feels, he—

Xie Lian has been on his own for such a long time now, and he's become accustomed to people thinking less of him, because of his impairment.

And the prince isn't proud, not anymore, but... He doesn't want to be pitied.

“It’s not…completely clear, but…that’s amazing,” he admits, his voice a little weak. “Thank you, San Lang.”

The Ghost King tilts his head, “Is the shape too loose?”

“No, no!” Xie Lian assures him, holding up his hands with a nervous laugh. “I just—can’t see natural shadows, that’s all—which I suppose isn’t something you’d really think about, unless you couldn’t see, and —well—”

Oh heavens, now he’s rambling.

“—for most, being blind is sort of an all or nothing scenario, so I’m lucky that I can see you at all!”

Then he stops, realizing how that sounded, and—what’s wrong with him? Why is he being like this?

“And just—anything in general. Like—other auras. And your butterflies! I’m…ah,” he laughs again, ears burning, “very blessed, honestly!”

He hears an amused snort, ears burning hotter.

“I think I understand what you mean.” Good, because Xie Lian has no clue. “How’s this?”

Xie Lian brings up his gaze once more, eyes widening with shock as he watches Hua Cheng, essentially…

Use his spiritual energy to paint a living statue.

He can’t change the color of his spiritual energy, but he can change its concentration across his skin, creating varying areas of brightness, and it’s not the same as seeing him, but…

Xie Lian can see where his nose is. His mouth. Not individual locks of hair, but the shape.

And it’s the closest he’s come to seeing someone’s face, since…well…

Come to think of it—the last face he ever saw must have been Jun Wu’s, back in Lang’er bay, just before he put the shackles back on.

And now, come to think of it…

The colors of Hua Cheng's aura—

They remind him of the sunset from that day. The last sight he ever saw.

The thought of that—it makes him smile, even if the expression is a little bit shaky on his lips.

"That's amazing, San Lang—really—it's..." He shakes his head. "Thank you."

Now, he can vaguely see the curve of a smile on the Ghost's face.

It's not something he can do all the time, not with the amount of focus to detail that's required, but—

It's a beautiful gift, and Xie Lian is grateful for it. "You are very welcome."

Xie Lian finds himself struggling to look away now, drinking in the sight of another person for the first time in so long—but finally, he manages to mutter—

"You're so different from what the legends say."

Hua Cheng raises an eyebrow, intrigued.

"Really? Then how did you guess that it was me?"

Well. He wasn't trying particularly hard to hide it. If anything, Xie Lian thinks the guise of approaching him as a slightly ill behaved teenager was more about putting the god at ease than actual stealth.

And it worked.

"...Well, you were flawless," Xie Lian shrugs. "No matter how much I tested you—so, you either had to be a human, or a Calamity. But you were also highly intelligent, powerful, and fearless in battle—by the time I saw your aura again in the Sinner's Pit..."

It was pretty obvious who he was.

"Who else could you have been, but Crimson Rain Sought Flower? That only confirmed it."

Hua Cheng crosses his arms once more, watching the god fondly. "Can I take that as a compliment?"

Xie Lian smiles warmly, “Isn’t it a compliment already?”

Before the ghost king can say more, there’s a rattle against the floor, and when he looks down—Xie Lian can see the faint purple outline of Banyue’s jar rolling across the floor, gently thudding against the door.

“...You want to go outside?” He questions softly. “Alright.”

He opens the door for her, watching as the little clay pot rolls over to settle down on the porch, where the red wooden pillars that make up the overhang lead to a small drop off made from stacked stones.

Xie Lian walks over, sitting down beside her with his knees pulled up, arms wrapped around them.

“...General Hua?” Banyue murmurs, her voice taking on a slightly echoing quality from inside the jar.

“Hmm?”

Banyue appears now, mimicking his pose as she looks up at the sky.

“...Do you know what’s going to happen to Pei Xiu?” She murmurs, her voice strained with concern.

“I don’t know,” Xie Lian replies slowly.

In truth—he does.

Exile is the punishment of choice for such serious wrongdoings.

“...But he will have to be punished, at the very least.”

Banyue frowns, her arms tightening around herself.

“...He isn’t that bad, you know,” she mutters, shaking her head. “Ke Mo always said that he was using me, or manipulating me, but...”

She says the next words with no small amount of shame:

“I was the one who chose to do it.”

Of course—she means opening the city gates, and Xie Lian...

Even if he couldn’t understand that choice—and certainly, he does understand it—he wouldn’t be in a position to judge it.

He reaches over, patting the lid of the pot gently. “It’s alright, little one,” he murmurs.

Hua Cheng leans against the doorframe of the shrine, arms crossed over his chest as he watches the two—mainly Banyue—his expression unreadable.

“It’s in the past now,” Xie Lian continues. “You can’t hold onto these things forever.”

He knows that better than anyone.

“...I’m sorry, General Hua,” she mutters again, pressing her face into her knees, her eyes saddened, and Xie Lian...

He sighs, shaking his head. “Banyue...why do you keep on apologizing to me?”

She’s quiet. Banyue can’t cry now, without a physical form—but she would if she could.

“...I want to save the world,” she mutters, her eyes peering up, the purples around her irises so vivid in the dark.

Xie Lian stares blankly in her direction, tilting his head. “...What?”

“That’s what you used to say,” she explains, and Xie Lian gawks, completely floored.

“...I did?” He mutters, disbelieving.

How—how could he have ever said something like that?

Him, save the world?

He could barely save one city, and he got beaten half to hell in the process, no, he—he can’t.

Banyue nods rather seriously. “You said that was your dream.”

Maybe when he was a teenager, sure, but...

Oh, that’s—

Xie Lian winces, pressing his face into his hands.

That’s embarrassing, particularly when he knows that Hua Cheng is listening to their conversation.

“...And Hua Cheng Laoshi...” Banyue shrinks with guilt. “I’m sorry.”

The Ghost King doesn’t speak when she looks up at him, simply raising an eyebrow from where he leans against the doorframe to the shrine, his arms crossed over his chest.

“...You taught me magic to protect myself,” Banyue mutters, shaking her head. “Not to hurt people.”

Her eyes drift back out over the night, watching the fireflies drifting lazily through the air, listening to the sounds of the crickets. It’s peaceful here. But Banyue—she feels like she doesn’t deserve to Rest In Peace.

“I tried,” she mutters, pressing her face into her knees. “I tried so hard to save the people of Yong’an, but I...” her voice wavers, and her shoulders tremble. “I ended up destroying the Crescent Moon kingdom.”

Xie Lian’s chest aches, and he remembers a time when he was just like her. So young, so hurt, and so disappointed in himself.

Crying in his mothers arms, whispering the same words—

‘I tried.’

‘I tried so hard.’

“I...know you don’t think much of Ke Mo either,” Banyue mutters, and Xie Lian can’t hep but grit his teeth in response, remembering what that man did. “But before...he was good to me.”

Xie Lian didn’t admit it back in the sinner’s pit—but he’s far more of the same mind with San Lang. He doubts Ke Mo’s loyalty was to Banyue as a human being, but to her usefulness as a weapon.

“The soldiers respected me, and I...” Banyue grimaces. “They weren’t evil, General.”

Xie Lian believes that much. The foot soldiers of war rarely ever are. They’re usually young men. Sons and brothers and school boys, marching to death for reasons they can’t possibly understand before their time comes.

“But I...I got them killed...and I couldn’t even free them.”

Banyue's fingers tremble where they grip her shins, her lips pressed together tightly.

"General Hua...I know I've made mistakes, but...where did I go wrong?" She whispers. "What should I do?"

There was a time in his life when Xie Lian probably would have given some arrogant, well intentioned speech about believing in herself. In always doing what she believed was right, even if it was hard.

But now—now, Xie Lian only sighs, resting his hand on top of the jar.

"I'm sorry, little one," he murmurs, shaking his head. "I didn't know the answer back then—and I still don't."

The ghost hangs her head, biting her lip to the point where, if she had physical form— it would bleed from it.

"...What have I been doing for the last two hundred years?" She mutters, her voice filled with shame. "Such a failure..."

Xie Lian stares into the darkness ahead contemplatively, his expression unreadable.

Then what was he doing for the last eight centuries?

He's a far greater failure.

Finally, Hua Cheng speaks up from his perch in the corner, arms still crossed as he observes the two.

"I didn't teach you magic for self defense, Banyue." He murmurs, taking on a different tone now, than the one he's used with Xie Lian.

There's something stern about him now.

It makes him seem older—less like the young man he posed as for Xie Lian's benefit, and more like the Ghost King he actually is.

And it's a keen reminder—he must actually be close to Xie Lian's own age. The thought makes his stomach flip inexplicably.

"I gave you the freedom to make your own choices." Hua Cheng concludes, watching her with an evaluating gaze. "You said just now that opening the gates was your choice, and yours alone. Remaining in the Crescent Moon Kingdom—that was your own choice as well."

Banyue hangs her head even lower. “They were mistakes, Hua Cheng Laoshi.”

“Mistakes are the result of free will.” The Ghost King replies calmly. His tone almost sounds flat, unfeeling—but Xie Lian doesn’t think that it actually is.

It’s more like…the ‘tough love’ approach.

“Be grateful that you had the opportunity to learn from them, and move on. Don’t apologize to me.”

Hua Cheng has too many mistakes of his own, he doesn’t have time to bear someone else’s remorse.

With that, he turns around to walk inside, giving her space—and Xie Lian quickly makes the decision to follow, rising to his feet, giving the younger ghost a gentle kiss on top of the head before leaving her with her thoughts.

The door shuts, and Xie Lian sighs.

“…That was good advice,” he mutters, shaking his head. “I wish I…”

He almost says that he wishes he could follow it—then realizes how silly that must seem.

“…Thank you,” he glances up with a somewhat pained smile. “For teaching her, I mean.”

“Even with how it turned out?”

Xie Lian thinks about it for a moment—and then he nods, “Because if you hadn’t, she probably…”

She probably wouldn’t have survived very long, and certainly couldn’t have risen as a powerful ghost.

It’s such a selfish way of thinking, but…

If Xie Lian could have had the first person he lost come back to him as a ghost, he would have. He can’t say he’s not grateful to at least have her.

“I never would have gotten the chance to see her again,” Xie Lian shrugs, swallowing hard. “So, thank you.”

The Ghost King stares at him, long and hard, and Xie Lian isn't sure if he's not going to answer, or if he just doesn't know what to say, so he asks—

"There's one thing I don't understand," he mutters. "It was pretty obvious that Pei Junior was trying to help her, but..." Xie Lian frowns, pondering the matter. "Why not just destroy the ghosts trapped in the pit himself, if that was the trouble?"

After all—it would have ended so much unnecessary suffering and death.

"Because he was using a clone," Hua Cheng replies with ease.

It's almost startling at times, the way he seems almost omniscient. Xie Lian supposes it makes sense, given what he is, but still—sometimes, it's like talking to a walking dictionary.

"His spiritual power was greatly reduced. He couldn't have dispersed all of the spirits."

Hua Cheng watches as Xie Lian goes to his altar, feeling for some of the flowers that were left earlier that day as an offering, arranging them more delicately.

Of course, as a prince, he was trained in many refined arts. Dancing, singing, calligraphy—and floral arrangements.

Naturally, he can maneuver the flowers into a more appealing shape just by feeling the petals—and Hua Cheng watches him, thoughtful.

"Just feeding humans to the creatures was probably the fastest way to appease them," the ghost concludes, plucking one blossom from the bouquet. He twirls it between his fingers for a moment, commenting, "After all, for a Heavenly Official— human lives are like that of ants."

Xie Lian sighs, but doesn't protest. He doesn't necessarily agree that all Heavenly Officials are like that, but some of them are, and...

Obviously, someone from the ghost realm would have a different perspective—but that doesn't mean Hua Cheng's experiences are less valid.

Particularly when you consider the fact that he slaughtered 33 Heavenly Officials— and after spending time with him...

Hua Cheng had a reason.

Xie Lian has no idea what that reason could have been—but he's spent enough time with the man to understand that he's not violent without provocation.

Sure, maybe he doesn't need much provocation—but still. "I suppose —"

Then, the ghost does something that makes him pause.

He reaches out with little warning, on a whim, really, no— An impulse. And he...

Tucks that flower behind Xie Lian's ear, pushing some of his hair back with it before pulling his hand back, watching the god closely.

Xie Lian's expression is frozen, difficult to read. Remember.

That's what Hua Cheng is thinking, his gaze burning into the curve of Xie Lian's cheek, his posture relaxed, but everything inside of him is tense.

He can't say his own name. Can't answer when Xie Lian calls him.

Don't you remember?

And he can tell from the twist of Xie Lian's mouth—he does.

Remembers the day he woke up with a flower tucked behind his ear. Remembers the Ghost he snapped at over it, ungrateful.

It was the day I kissed you.

It was the only kiss that Xie Lian chose. The only one he wanted.

And Wu Ming was so gentle. He—

He was the last person that was so gentle with Xie Lian. The last person who—

Hua Cheng watches his god's lips tremble, and after letting out a shaky breath, he—

"Your clone," Xie Lian mumbles, his voice small, "...how is it so powerful, then?"

There's a pause, and—

Hua Cheng closes his eyes briefly, forcing his chest to relax, unwinding the knot in his stomach.

It's alright. He—

This isn't about him, and it's alright.

Slowly, he opens his eyes—and a sly, cocky smile spreads across his face. "This is my real body."

"...Really?" Xie Lian snaps out of it now, eyes wide as he looks him over curiously, taking in the form that Hua Cheng is still projecting for him.

"Authentic," Hua Cheng agrees, that smile turning slightly lopsided with affection as he watches that intelligent curiosity.

And he's not the only one that's prone to being impulsive, not between the two of them.

Xie Lian finds himself reaching up without thinking, both palms pressed against the Ghost King's cheeks—just because he wants to see what a Calamity's skin must feel like, and—

He realizes three things very quickly.

First—his skin is cool. Not unpleasantly so—but noticeable.

Second, it's perfectly smooth, not a scar or blemish in sight.

And third—he has a dimple in the right corner of his mouth.

They stare at one another, eyes wide.

Hua Cheng, from the silent delight of the fact that his god would deign to touch him so easily, and—

Xie Lian, from mortification that he dared to touch Hua Cheng so easily. He—He was just curious, he hadn't even been thinking.

And the ghost's cheeks might be pleasantly cool, but Xie Lian's are on fire, burning an alluring shade of pink that Hua Cheng can't seem to take his eyes off of.

He yanks his hands away quickly, hiding them behind his back, rocking on his heels awkwardly.

“...Nice,” he croaks.

Hua Cheng’s eyes flash slightly with annoyance, not necessarily with Xie Lian, never him, but...

It’s not the word he wanted to hear.

Still, he smirks, taking on a teasing tone.

“Oh?” He muses, leaning closer. “This skin looks nice to you?”

Xie Lian isn’t used to the sensation of eye contact anymore, even if he can’t see Hua Cheng’s clearly, he—

He breaks it, clearing his throat. “...Yeah...” He mumbles, then realizes — “If that’s a skin, then...”

He looks over the tall, broad form before him.

“...This isn’t actually what you look like?”

“No,” Hua Cheng admits, shaking his head. “Not precisely.”

“Then...” Xie Lian tilts his chin back up, even if his eyes are still averted, “...could I take a peek at the real one?”

The pause is long, and a little...tense.

“Ah...it’s not that serious,” Xie Lian smiles awkwardly, taking another step back, “don’t worry about it—”

And then, a scent tickles his nose—burnt soup.

Oh, he forgot!

He spins around, going to see if it’s salvageable, and...

It’s hard as a rock against the pan, smoldering.

So much for improvement.

“...I can make another—?”

“It’s alright,” Hua Cheng assures him. It’s already late, after all. “I’m not particularly hungry.”

They make ready for bed, and when Xie Lian is combing his hair, Hua Cheng offers him a small bundle to use as a pillow.

“Oh,” the god takes it with a smile, “thank you, San Lang.”

It’s only when he lays down, his cheek pressed against it, that he realizes. It smells like the forest. Like rain. It’s—

It’s San Lang’s outer robe.

Xie Lian’s cheeks heat up slightly as he curls on his side.

He can’t remember the last time he blushed this much, for this long—all in the span of one evening. And honestly—

Xie Lian doesn’t think it’s ever happened.

He tries to sleep, to will his mind to just stop, but…

His eyes blink open, and his fingers twitch restlessly.

“…San Lang?” He whispers into the dark, “are you awake?”

There’s a soft chuckle in response, and Xie Lian is a little sheepish, knowing he sounds like a child sleeping over at a friend’s house.

“Yes, dianxia,” the Ghost King replies. “I’m awake.”

“…”

The prince rolls over onto his stomach, fiddling with his fingers, looking to see if Hua Cheng is still projecting his aura across his skin, and…

He is, kicked back and relaxed, one leg pulled up and slightly bent, his arms folded behind his head.

He’s so…

“I’ve been wondering,” Xie Lian mumbles, eyelashes brushing against his cheeks as he speaks.

Hua Cheng has counted each of them a hundred times, long, thick, and dark.

“Don’t you have to report back to the Ghost Realm at some point?” He questions. “Won’t you get in trouble?”

The younger man cracks a lopsided grin, raising an eyebrow, "Report to who, exactly?"

Xie Lian pauses, thinking—

"I'm the strongest there is." Hua Cheng reminds him—cocky as ever, but gentle in his casual arrogance.

The prince nods, his stomach doing a small backflip.

He certainly is. What he did in the Crescent Moon Kingdom—Xie Lian doubts that required even the smallest effort with him.

Hua Cheng enjoyed himself, but he toyed with Pei Xiu, like a cat batting a mouse between it's paws.

Xie Lian hopes that someday...

He might get to see what it looks like, to see San Lang go all out.

Just imagining what such a battle might look like sends a thrilled shiver down his spine.

"Besides," the Ghost King continues, taking Xie Lian out of his day dreaming, "ghosts are rather independent creatures."

"...Oh?" Xie Lian mumbles, his nose tickling against Hua Cheng's robe, feet kicking slightly behind him, "I always assumed the structure would be parallel to the Heavenly Court."

"I suppose it could be, if that was what I wanted," Hua Cheng shrugs. "But that's not my philosophy."

The thought of that gives Xie Lian pause, because...he never considered the idea that such things were a matter of choice.

After all—the Heavens function the same way that they always have, even in the dynasties that predated Jun Wu, as the emperor has explained before.

Is he just a traditionalist? Xie Lian—he doesn't think so.

After all, Jun Wu always seemed so remorseful about enforcing the rules when it came to him. Like it pained the emperor to do so. Xie Lian doesn't think he would have done that if he had a choice.

"Then...what is your philosophy?" He questions.

Hua Cheng shrugs, fiddling with one lock of hair, rolling something braided into it between his fingertips.

“Free will,” he replies.

Xie Lian can’t help but smile.

Right—like what he was saying to Banyue, before.

“...Then have you met the other Ghost Kings?” He muses, curious. His feet are still kicking in the air slightly as he speaks, the hem of his trousers slipping down slightly, bunching at mid calf.

It reveals the shape of his ankles. Slender, surprisingly delicate, and...

That cursed shackle, the one he tried to hide from Hua Cheng the first night he slept here, is on display.

The Ghost King loathes the reminder of his god’s punishment, but reluctantly appreciates the shape of his legs, nonetheless.

Then, averts his gaze to the ceiling respectfully when he catches himself doing so. “What about the green ghost, Qi Rong?” Xie Lian continues. “Have you met him?”

“...That tasteless piece of shit?” Hua Cheng mutters.

It’s the first time Xie Lian can remember hearing him swear.

“I’ll drop in and visit him every now and again, but he usually runs away as soon as I greet him,” the Ghost King drawls. “Such a shame.”

“...What sort of greeting is it to make him run?”

Now, his eyes lower back down to meet Xie Lian’s, his smile turning impish.

“The same kind that earned me the name Crimson Rain Sought Flower,” he replies easily.

“...” Xie Lian props himself up on his elbows, back curving slightly. “Is there bad blood between the two of you?”

‘Oh, you have no idea.’

“He’s an eye sore and an embarrassment.” Hua Cheng shrugs. “Black Water feels the same way.”

"...Black Water Sinking Ships," Xie Lian recalls. "Are you two friends?"

He doesn't answer immediately, but Xie Lian doesn't interpret this silence as a refusal to answer. He's just...thinking very carefully.

The god waits.

"...We know one another very well," Hua Cheng finally replies, choosing his words carefully. "And he's my only peer."

"He's equal to you in strength, then?" Xie Lian's eyebrow arches slightly, and the ghost shakes his head.

"Nine times out of ten? I'm significantly stronger."

"...And the one time out of ten?"

The prince is curious—after all, there are always exceptions.

"In his lair," Hua Cheng explains with a shrug. "Any ghost is at their strongest within their own territory."

Even Jun Wu wouldn't dare fight Hua Cheng in Ghost City, for instance.

"And any other ghost, well..." the Ghost King shrugs. "They don't have the right to speak to me unless I allow it."

Xie Lian smiles faintly. "I see," he murmurs, rolling onto his back. He's certainly cocky, but...not in an abrasive way.

"By the way," Hua Cheng turns his head, "that was a nice line."

Xie Lian blinks slowly, his expression a mask of confusion. "What line?"

The young man grins, a sharpened canine glinting.

"'I want to save the world,'" he replies.

"..." Xie Lian yanks his robes over his face with an embarrassed whine. "San Lang!"

The Ghost King rolls onto his side, propping his chin up on his hand so he can watch him, chuckling with fond amusement.

“What? Is there something wrong with it?”

Xie Lian’s voice is muffled under the robe, slightly high pitched with sheepishness. “It’s so silly…”

One lock of the princes hair is peeking out from underneath his robes, strewn across the bed—and Hua Cheng is just bold enough to twirl it between his fingers, “The fact that you dared to say it out loud means that you were willing to try,” the ghost murmurs. “Of course I admire that.”

It doesn’t make Xie Lian feel any less silly, but…it’s very kind of the ghost to say, and so the prince peeks his face out from under the robe, however hesitantly.

“…I suppose I said sillier things when I was young,” he mutters, relenting.

Hua Cheng’s eyes never leave him. As if he would ever want to look away. “Like what?”

“Well…” Xie Lian trails off.

He almost never talks about it. Not anymore.

He’s told little stories here and there, vague on the details, but…

He trusts San Lang.

In a way that a person trusts their instincts. Less of a choice, and more of something that just comes naturally.

“…After my first ascension,” he murmurs, “I met a young boy. And he—he was just about as lonely and miserable as a human could be,” the god recalls. “San Lang, he—he was so young, and he was saying that he wanted to die. That the world was so cruel that he wanted to destroy it, and then kill himself.”

And Xie Lian’s life—it was so beautiful back then. He couldn’t understand how someone so young could be so broken.

Because the world hadn’t been cruel to him yet. Because he hadn’t known what it was like, by then, to be utterly alone.

“…He asked me why he was still alive,” Xie Lian murmurs. “And if there was any meaning to life. And do you know how I responded?”

Hua Cheng's gaze is distant, but when he replies—his tone is filled with a sort of gentleness that has only ever had one witness.

"How did you respond?"

"...I said, 'If you can't find a meaning in life,'" Xie Lian repeats, biting his lip, "'then allow me to be that meaning.'"

Just saying it out loud now makes him feel so arrogant.

"I told him to live for me. To use me as his reason to go on."

The god falls silent after that, and after a moment, Hua Cheng probes.

"And what did the boy do?"

Xie Lian's heart aches with bittersweet adoration.

"Oh, he did..." Xie Lian stops, composing himself.

He can't cry these days, even when he knows he needs to.

Unless it's about Hong'er.

"He did exactly what I asked, San Lang, he—" Xie Lian swallows thickly. "He completely devoted himself to me for the rest of his life."

But he deserved so much more.

"...and his reward," Xie Lian mutters, clearing his throat, "was getting murdered trying to protect me. So—I couldn't say anything like that now. I'm not..."

He huffs out a long sigh.

"I'm not worth it."

He just deserves to be—

"I disagree."

Xie Lian glances up, startled, and Hua Cheng averts his gaze, looking up at the ceiling.

"You just told me he followed you until the end of his life. That means—until the moment he passed, the boy's life had meaning. More than it did before." The Ghost King reminds him.

"You gave that to him. That's worth more than you could ever know."

But was it a fair trade? Xie Lian still couldn't tell you that. Every second of every day, he struggles with it.

And yet still, he…

"…Thank you, San Lang," he murmurs. "That means…a lot to me."

The Ghost King watches him, allowing the lock of hair he was fiddling with before to slip through his fingers. "I meant it."

Xie Lian knows—it's not something a person would lie about.

"I don't think I could say that again now, though." The god admits, swallowing hard.

"I only said it back then because I…" He presses his lips together tightly, and his voice gets so small, "…I really thought I could do anything I set my mind to."

Little does he know, the person Xie Lian is speaking to now is the only one who still believes that he can.

Hua Cheng opens his mouth to reply, then stops when he hears a voice, entering a private communication array.

'Hua Chengzhu.'

His eyes flash with irritation at the interruption, but his expression doesn't change.

'Not now.'

Normally, he never has to ask Shuo twice.

'I need to know where Blackwater is, he isn't answering in his array.'

Hua Cheng fights the urge to allow his eyebrow to twitch, and he simply replies—

'In the Heavenly Capital, most likely. I'll deal with him tomorrow.'

'But—!'

'Unless someone is about to disperse you, don't contact me again until tomorrow morning.' The Ghost King replies flatly.

After a few beats of silence, he returns his full attention to his god once more.

“It might have been a foolish thing that you said when you were young,” he murmurs, watching Xie Lian nod with agreement. “...But it was brave.”

The prince pauses, seeming genuinely surprised that anyone would say that but... He smiles, nonetheless.

Still, Hua Cheng feels like he has to ask—

“Now that you’ve poured your heart out to me—don’t you want to know what my intentions are?”

Xie Lian considers it, tapping his thumb against his chin—and Hua Cheng silently hopes that he’ll insist, but—

“I don’t think I need to.”

Hua Cheng bites back the urge to scold him, knowing how odd that would seem, but —

He’s too trusting.

And that’s alright for now, because Hua Cheng knows he would die before he harms his love—but the rest of the world isn’t so well intentioned.

“If you want to tell me, you will,” Xie Lian shrugs. “And even if I decided I didn’t like the answer, and I drove you away—what could stop you from coming back with a different face? I’m sure you’re clever enough to fool me a few more times.”

Hua Cheng doesn’t feel particularly guilty, because he isn’t keeping information from Xie Lian by choice, but...

Technically, he’s already done what Xie Lian is saying—and despite hinting, the god has no idea.

“...And what if my true form is hideous?” He questions softly.

Xie Lian smiles, in spite of himself—remembering the last time he was here, in this very shrine, and someone he cared about said the words —

‘I’m not beautiful.’

And he was such a little liar.

“It isn’t.”

Hua Cheng raises an eyebrow. “How could you know that?”

Xie Lian shrugs, “I just have a feeling.”

And he suspects the form that held him in the Sinner’s Pit might have been the real one. Xie Lian didn’t get to see it, or feel very much, but…

He very much doubts that it’s ‘hideous.’ “I wouldn’t be so sure…”

Hua Cheng reaches over, allowing one fingertip to shift into a long, menacing claw before teasing it lightly over Xie Lian’s knuckles, watching as the god shivers, but doesn’t flinch away.

“It could be quite monstrous.”

Xie Lian very much doubts that, but even so…

Claws are a rather useful feature to have. Practically speaking. What’s so wrong with that?

“…Even if you were,” Xie Lian shrugs, turning his head to look over Hua Cheng’s aura, “we’re friends, aren’t we? So, we should be genuine with one another. I promise I won’t—”

He stops, then—noticing that the Ghost King’s shoulders have begun to shake.

…Was it because Xie Lian showed so much trust in him? Did that make him emotional, or—?

Then, he hears a soft chuckle, and his lips turn into a slight frown. “What’s so funny, San Lang?”

Of course, it’s just—

‘Friends should be genuine with one another.’

Xie Lian couldn’t know, because Hua Cheng can’t tell him, but… He literally cannot be genuine with the man, and it’s so—

A full blown laugh slips out of him, and Xie Lian huffs, giving his shoulder a light shove.

"San Lang!" He cries out, his face turning pink all over again, "Why are you laughing so much? Did I say something wrong?"

"N-No," The Ghost King snickers, covering his mouth.

Xie Lian frowns. Honestly, with the way his lower lip juts out, it's more like a pout, and Hua Cheng, even in his laughter, finds his gaze narrowing in on that mouth longingly.

The prince pulls his hand back, huffing. "You're so insincere!"

He starts to pull his hand back, but before he can—Xie Lian feels long, slightly cool fingers enveloping his wrist, holding firm before tugging him forward, and—

When Hua Cheng presses Xie Lian's palm over his chest, the prince bites back a gasp, eyes widening sharply.

There's a sharp contrast now, between the heart underneath his palm—one that no longer beats—and his own, pounding unsteadily against his ribs.

He's firm under Xie Lian's palm, the cotton of his undershirt smooth to the touch. He —

Xie Lian hasn't...

It's obvious, that most people cannot touch a prince. Xie Lian was treasured as a child and a young man—carefully protected. And as a god, he cultivated in such a way that mandated keeping firm physical boundaries.

But what most people don't consider about being a prince, is... You learn not to touch anyone. Ever.

Xie Lian hugged his parents, but rarely—and only in moments of distress. He used to be somewhat closer with Hong'er, because...

Because he was so new to being in the dark, and Hong'er made touch into something beautiful. A comfort.

And then, Bai Wuxiang...

He made it into something that petrified him.

But nothing ever felt so violating as that day by the river, when he wore Feng Xin's face. Xie Lian knows, it's unreasonable to still feel so…hollowed out by what happened. To still hurt, when he remembers.

The last person he allowed to touch him casually was Wu Ming. Since then, in the last eight hundred years…

Nearly every touch Xie Lian has experienced has been that of violence. There were occasional exceptions, but…

This feels different. It feels… Personal, somehow.

Hua Cheng touches him gently, but firmly. In a way that isn't terrifying, but… grounding.

His fingers are long enough to overlap where they wrap around him, thumb pressed against the inside of his wrist—where he must feel Xie Lian's pulse throbbing.

A hummingbird heartbeat.

And when he speaks again, initially—he leaves the god speechless.

"I swear," he murmurs, his voice low, resounding, like he's taking an oath of the most serious kind, "That on heaven and earth, you won't find someone more sincere than me."

Oh.

Thump .

Xie Lian…

Thump .

He can hear blood rushing in his ears. And his heart—

Thump .

Xie Lian can't remember the last time it pounded like this.

And he's not completely oblivious, he—he can tell that there's an underlying meaning to Hua Cheng's words.

Even if he can't understand that meaning—he knows it's there. And he's—

Xie Lian shrinks his arm back, swallowing hard—and Hua Cheng lets him, Xie Lian's wrist slipping out from between his fingers.

He's overwhelmed.

"I—we—"

Xie Lian rolls over onto his side, facing away from him, still pressing the wrist Hua Cheng was holding to his chest rather tightly.

"It's already late," he mutters, his cheek pressed against Hua Cheng's outer robe. "We should try to sleep."

The Ghost King doesn't protest.

Instead, he just watches the curve of Xie Lian's shoulders as he starts to relax, his breathing slowing down. The way his hair fans out all around him, completely loose.

His fingers seek out one strand again, and this time...Hua Cheng lifts it to his lips, closing his eyes.

"Next time," he murmurs, "when we see each other again—I'll meet you in my true form."

Xie Lian's head moves slightly in response—and while he's likely half asleep...

Hua Cheng is fairly sure that the god heard him.

And not much longer after that, he completely drifts off.

Hua Cheng has never been under the impression that he was a good person. He's said that many times before.

He was a selfish child. A selfish teenager, and now...

When his body flares with warmth, he knows Xie Lian will unconsciously press back against him, leaning close.

Allowing Hua Cheng to lean his chin against his god's shoulder, one arm draped over him. Not daring to hold him close, but aching from the satisfaction having him near.

He's a selfish man.

A low sigh slips out of him, his cheek pressed against Xie Lian's hair.

He mouths the words, but he doesn't put any air behind them.

They're always there. Lurking behind every action, every touch, every word he speaks, slipping between the syllables.

They rattle against the inside of his teeth, begging for release, but he doesn't have the right to say them.

'I love you.'

Those are Hong-er's words, not his. They—

They wouldn't hold the same meaning, hearing them from Hua Cheng. And at first, he thought he might…

When he gave Xie Lian that flower, he thought—at the very least—he might be able to get close to the god by getting him to realize that he was Wu Ming.

The Crown Prince trusted Wu Ming. Cared for him. Hua Cheng felt that.

But then, he saw the look on Xie Lian's face.

And it was in that moment, that Hua Cheng realized—

Wu Ming is a painful memory for him. A reminder of a time that he clearly regrets, and…

He squeezes his eyes shut now, biting his lip until one of his sharpened canines breaks skin, blood beading up.

This isn't about him.

'If your beloved knew that they were the reason you haven't moved on…it might cause them pain.'

It's never been about him.

'Then I just won't let them find out.'

As badly as Hua Cheng wants to be recognized, it wasn't Wu Ming that Xie Lian asked for that night.

It was Hong'er. He—

There's a voice in his mind again, in spite of his orders, speaking into their private array. He's irritated by the presence, ready to snap, but...

'G-gege...'

When he hears Ren Song's voice, his attention sharpens.

Trembling—and horribly frightened.

Hua Cheng's eyes snap open, burning in the dark as he whips his gaze towards the door, pupils narrowing into cat-like slits.

'Shuo?'

'I...'

The ghost's voice breaks, and Hua Cheng can't decide what they're frightened of—

An enemy, or Hua Cheng.

'I...m-messed up...'

Hua Cheng listens silently as they stumble through their explanation, eyes flickering about the room as he takes it in—and when Shuo is finished—

The Ghost King is furious.

'I...'

'Come home. ' He speaks into the array firmly. ' Now.'

'Gege, he—'

'Now. I'll be there soon.'

He doesn't dare sever the connection, not until he knows the ghost has made it back to the city safely—but when he listens, he can hear Ren Song using distance shortening magic—

They'll be safe. For now.

He sits up slowly, looking down at Xie Lian's sleeping form, remorseful.

"...I'll see you soon," he murmurs, reaching town to tuck some of the god's hair behind his ear.

The flower is still there.

His fingers trail down to the god’s neck, finding the chain there—gently pulling until a silver ring slips from the front of his robes.

He lifts the ring up, holding it in the flat of his palm for a moment, examining it in the moonlight streaming in through the window.

Ironically enough, it’s the first time in close to a millennia of the afterlife that Hua Cheng has touched his own ashes.

They feel warm.

That’s from Xie Lian, though—not him.

Slowly, so carefully, not daring to wake him, the ghost king leans down—pressing a kiss against the God’s forehead, the touch featherlight as the ring is carefully slipped back inside his robes.

“…keep taking care of me until then, love.”

When he rises to his feet, he walks silently through the shrine—and when he opens the door into the nice, there’s the gentle rattling of dice.

Clack!

Clack!

Clack—!

“HEY!” One of the Ghosts barks, “It’s Hua Chengzhu!” “Welcome back, my lord!”

“Did ya have a nice—?”

The moment the crowds in the streets of Ghost City see the look on Crimson Rain Sought Flower’s face, they scatter like tiny birds swooping out of his way as he stalks down the street.

‘Where are they?’ He barks into another array. Yin Yu’s response is quiet.

‘Paradise Manor.’

He doesn’t even bother walking across the city, rattling his dice irritably in his palm.

Clack!

Clack!

Clack!

With his next step, he's in the entrance hall—stalking past servants and messengers, boots thudding sharply against marble floors.

The door to the bedroom rips off of it's hinges from how forcefully he wrenches it open, not that he's particularly concerned about property damage—and when he sees the occupants within, he takes a deep breath, shoulders slumping subtly.

She's fine.

Wearing a female skin today, curled up on the floor beside the bed, hissing like an angry cat as Yin Yu tries to wipe the blood from her cheeks with a cloth, baring her fangs defensively, but—

Ren Song isn't angry, she's just frightened— And the blood isn't hers.

But her eyes are bloodshot and swollen, cheeks wet with tears when she looks up at the Ghost King, lips trembling apologetically.

"I-I tried to..." She starts, then stops, deeply ashamed.

Shuo finds value in ability, and berates herself brutally for the smallest failures. But this wasn't Ren Song's mistake.

"...I know."

Hua Cheng's tone isn't harsh now, not the way it was in the array.

He walks over, kneeling down beside Yin Yu, taking the rag from his hands. Ren Song doesn't shove his hand away, when he presses it against her cheek.

Instead she gulps, pressing a hand against her chest.

There isn't a heartbeat there, and she doesn't need to breathe, but—

She can't stop hyperventilating.

"He—they're—when they find out what I did—"

Ren Song will become a target.

"He'll d…disperse me…"

Hua Cheng is calm, mopping the blood from her cheeks, reaching down to do the same with her hands.

Of course—she means Jun Wu.

"Did anyone else see you?"

Ren Song shakes her head, eyeliner streaked at the corners of her eyes. "B-But he…s- sent the…"

People will come looking.

"Did you leave any evidence?"

The younger ghost shakes her head, sniffling.

Ren Song rarely feels fear anymore, but when she does—it overwhelms her.

"Look at me."

She shakes her head, whimpering, and Hua Cheng repeats himself.

"Look at me, brat."

Slowly, she does.

One eye stares back at her, the color of a darkening scar, and in the place of the other, a dark eyepatch.

The gaze she's known since she was small—and unlike the rest of the world, living and dead—it's never frightened her.

"Even if they did come for you," he replies evenly, sitting back on his heels. "What do you think I would do?"

The mere possibility of Jun Wu setting foot in this city—or sending one of his lackeys —with the intention of taking Ren Song would be signing a death warrant.

And Hua Cheng would be the executioner.

Yin Yu watches the exchange between the two…surprised.

He was always aware of the fact that Shuo had a long history with the Ghost King— and while Hua Cheng isn't a particularly affectionate man...

He can be protective in rare moments.

Usually over territory. Belongings. Things he views as his.

But never over a ghost. Yin Yu hasn't seen that until now.

After a moment, Ren Song's form begins to shift again—this time shrinking smaller and smaller, until she's just a small child again.

Curled up into a ball.

Yin Yu glances over at Hua Cheng, confused, and the Ghost King sighs, explaining.

"This is how old she was when she died," he mutters, not protesting when the little girl crawls into his arms, clinging around his neck. "She's aged past it, but, when she's destabilized..."

Shuo regresses until she calms down. Yanlin used to do the same thing—but far more often, given how much more easily shaken she was, compared to Shuo.

"She'll be over it in a day or so," Hua Cheng mutters, rising to his feet with the ghost in one arm, hitched against his hip.

He walks over to Yin Yu, making like he's going to hand her over, and the former official stumbles back, holding his hands up in confusion—

"What do you want me to do with her?" He mutters, confused.

Hua Cheng stares at him like he's lost his mind. "Put her to bed, obviously."

"I..." Yin Yu blinks, looking down at the tear streaked face of a little girl—one who more often than not presents as a grown man—a grown man that bullies him at times—

"Wouldn't she rather have you do it?" He mumbles, clearly uncomfortable.

Hua Cheng glares, "Maybe, but I have to deal with the one that caused this mess." He holds her out until Yin Yu relents, gingerly picking the little girl up in his arms.

Ren Song doesn't seem thrilled either, but clings to him anyway. "...But..."

Yin Yu looks down at her, then back up at his boss, muttering—

"Didn't she cause it?"

Hua Cheng's expression darkens as he shakes his head, turning around, stalking out of the room.

"No," he mutters, rattling the dice in his hand. "She did not."

The two ghosts are left alone in the manor after that, and when Shuo starts demanding bedtime stories before she'll let Yin Yu tuck her in—he can't even enjoy the prospect of holding it over Ren Song's head later.

"Do the voices!"

And he really, really needs that raise.

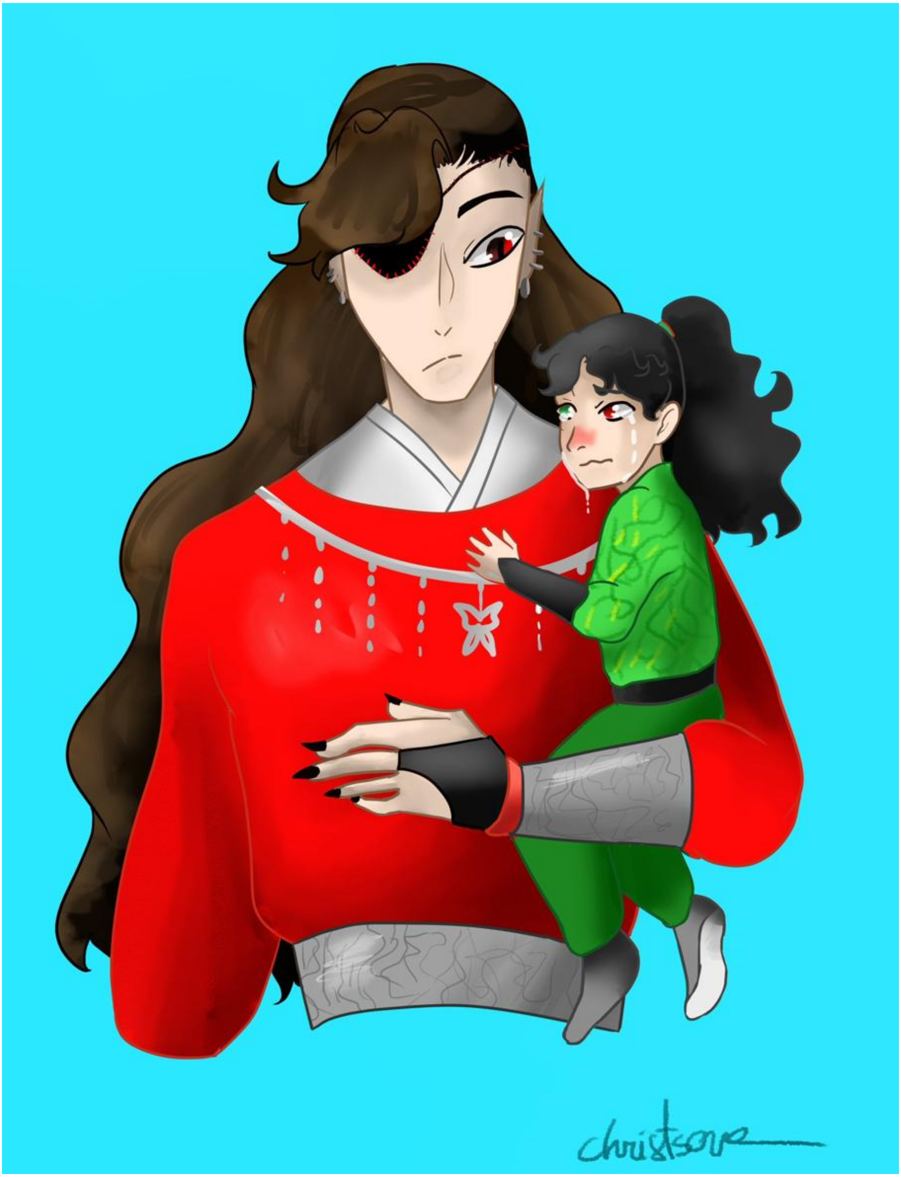
ARTWORK INSPIRED BY THIS STORY

Included with permission from artists, do not reproduce or repost for any reason.

Ren Song (Male Form)

CREDIT: PRI

Hua Cheng and Shuo/Ren Song (child form)



christsove

CREDIT: EVE

Ren Song (female form) CW: blood

[image]

CREDIT: SEONG

XIONG LI

CREDIT: YUE LING

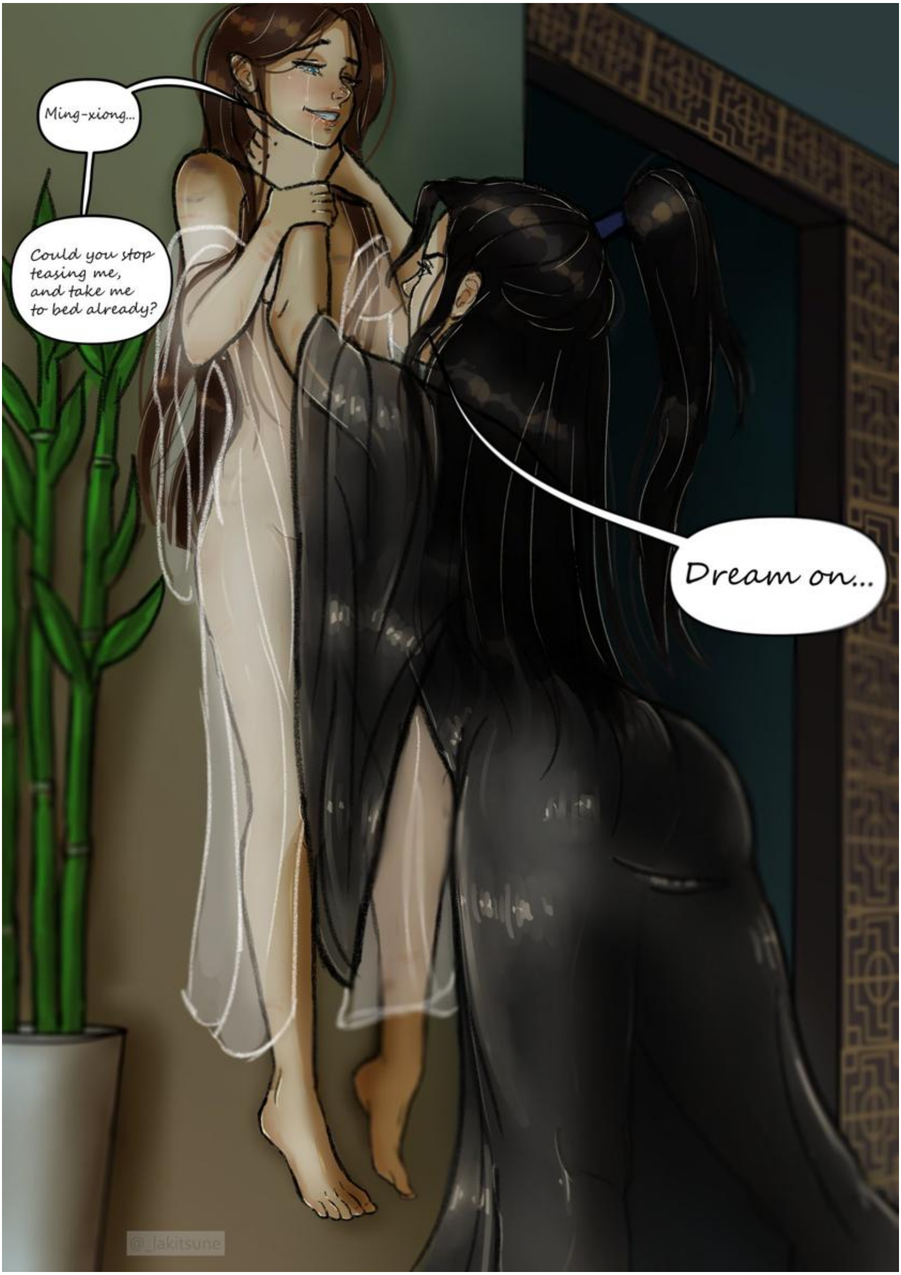
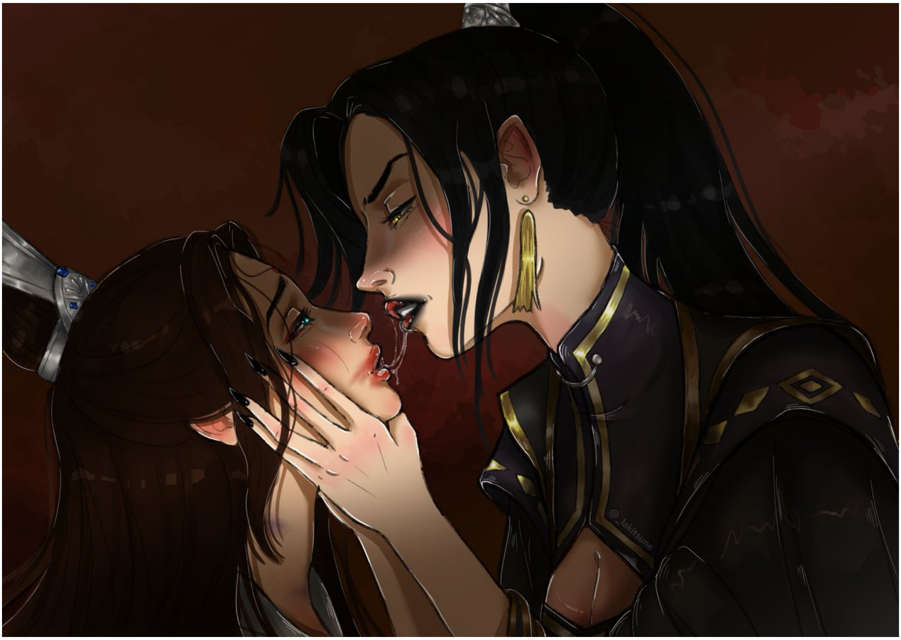
(wlw) Beefleaf getting Frisky (NSFW version is in the twitter replies!)



Ming-xiong...
Could you stop teasing me, and take me to bed already?
Dream on...
@_lakitsune

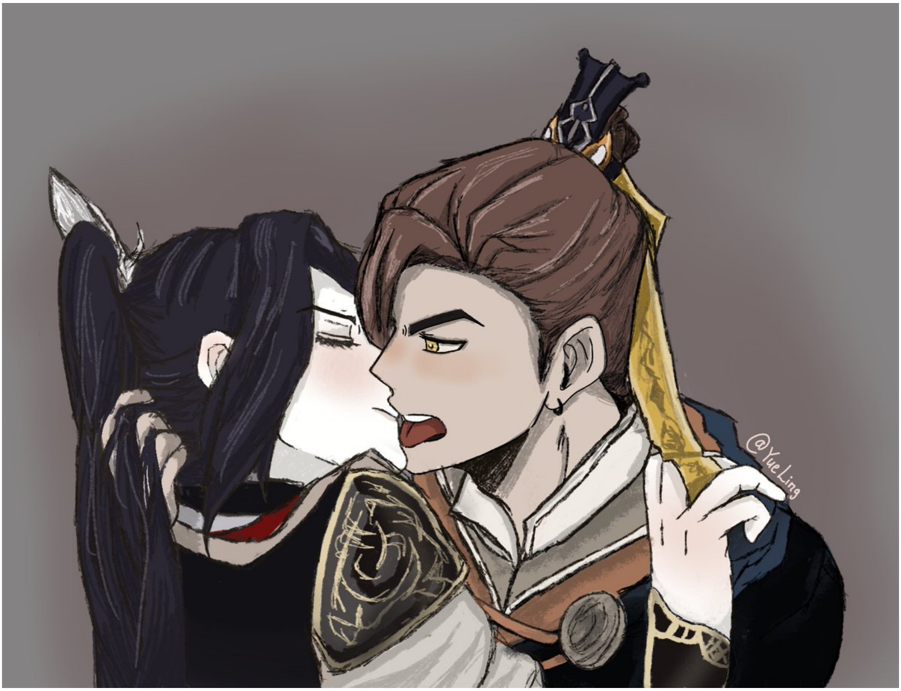
CREDIT: LAKI

"Good Girl..." (wlw) Beefleaf



CREDIT: LAKI

Feng Xin touches Mu Qing's hair...again.



CREDIT: YUE LING

THERE IS ALSO A NSFW ILLUSTRATION OF THE BEEFLEAF SEX SCENE THAT I, FOR OBVIOUS REASONS, CANNOT INCLUDE. BUT PLEASE ENJOY CASS'S WORK HERE.

Chapter End Notes

> Thank you to Seong, Cass, Yue Ling, Laki, Eve, and Pri for their beautiful artwork, and allowing me to share it!
>
> xoxo, Evie

The God Slayer

Chapter Summary

> "Xianle."
>
> The prince stiffens, his shoulders straightening at the sound of that voice.
>
> "You're here."
>
> As if Xie Lian ever would have refused a summons, but…his stomach twists with uncertainty, trying to read the emperor's tone.
>
> He sounds…happy to see Xie Lian, which is…
>
> A relief, but surprising.
>
> "I'm sure you also know why you've been summoned here."

Chapter Notes

> You can find me on twitter and keep up with current updates of the story HERE

See the end of the chapter for more notes

When Xie Lian wakes up that morning, he can feel that the mat beside him is empty— and at first, that isn't startling. San Lang wakes up before him most mornings, making breakfast, or doing chores just outside, but…

It's quiet in the shrine, and the god's stomach plummets.

"…San Lang?" He mutters, sitting up quickly. Maybe a little too quickly, because his head spins slightly in response.

Xie Lian presses his palm to his temple, looking around for the Ghost King's aura, his heart pounding in his chest.

Where is he? Did something happen? Did he—?

Xie Lian's throat constricts suddenly with horror, and he wonders if something happened, and he slept through it.

There's no logical thought, only—

Only the memory of what happens, when he falls asleep beside someone and wakes up alone.

"S-San…San Lang!"

Clink!

That sound makes Xie Lian whip around in the proper direction, scanning around for any sign of him, for more footsteps, but—

Instead of seeing a sea of crimson, or the more tailored form that Hua Cheng made for him last night—it's mostly darkness.

Except for one thing.

A butterfly, sitting on the blankets beside him, wings flapping gently.

Trembling, Xie Lian extends one finger—and when he does, the creature lands on him delicately, sparks of warmth firing into his skin.

'Dianxia.'

Xie Lian lets out a shaky sigh, covering his mouth.

It's clearly a recorded message, left behind for him, but—

Still, just hearing an echo of Hua Cheng's voice makes him ache with relief.

'I wanted to wait until you woke up before leaving, however—urgent business came up, and I was forced to deal with it personally.'

Xie Lian lets out a breath he didn't know he was holding.

'I'll see you again soon.'

After a moment—Xie Lian has the chance to feel mortified for even panicking to begin with, having had no reason to think that San Lang was in danger, but…

At least now, Xie Lian knows that he's alright. That's all that matters, even if… It'll be a little quiet, until San Lang comes back.

Even still, Xie Lian should be used to the—

'Your highness?' The sudden intrusion of Ling Wen's voice startles him. 'You've been summoned.'

Xie Lian might not be particularly keen on lingering in the Heavens more than he must—but even he knows better than to refuse a summons to a meeting of all officials of the upper court.

After all—this is likely about his actions in the Crescent Moon pass. He can't avoid it.

He makes an effort to become presentable, only to find his hair doesn't have any tangles from sleeping through the night—something that's happened all week, and he finds it somewhat unusual, but...

He stops curiously when his hand lands on the counter, reaching for the white ribbon he normally uses to tie up his hair, finding something that wasn't there the night before.

A hair piece—crafted from ivory and jade, from the feel of it, with a flower caved into the face.

Somehow, and he couldn't tell you why—Xie Lian has the sense that the flowers must be white, just like the...

He shakes himself out of it, taking the hair piece between both hands, examining it more thoroughly.

It must be a gift from Hua Cheng, but...what for?

Xie Lian certainly hasn't done anything to deserve a gift. San Lang is the one that has gone out of his way, over and over again in the last week—all to cater to the God's wishes...

He'll have to thank the Ghost King, the next time he sees him. And... Xie Lian turns the hairpiece over between his fingers, thoughtful.

It's not like he can't give the Ghost King something in return. He should, actually— after all, he's done so much, and Xie Lian managed to burn the meal he tried to cook him in gratitude beyond recognition.

Xie Lian resolves himself to the new plan, using the new hairpiece instead of his usual ribbon. It's surprisingly easy to maneuver, despite the fact that the God hasn't used anything like it since his first ascension, even if it's slightly less ostentatious.

But if this was anything like the jewel encrusted, golden pieces he used to wear—Xie Lian probably would have been too uncomfortable to use it in public.

Not because he doesn't enjoy fine things or find them frivolous—that isn't it at all, he just…

After everything that has happened, Xie Lian doesn't deserve to accept that sort of luxury, and even if he did—after 800 years of living off of scraps on the streets…he wouldn't know how.

In any case, Hua Cheng's gift…he doesn't deserve it, but the prince certainly likes it.

Given the importance of the meeting in question, Xie Lian goes through the effort of changing into a different robe. It's his usual shade of white, but…

This time, Xie Lian reaches for a piece he had meant to sell, one with a simple outline of a floral pattern stitched into the hems of the sleeves in silver thread.

Nothing like the robes he used to wear—Xie Lian would feel embarrassed, wearing something like that now.

Still, he's an ascended god once again, and…

Xie Lian sighs, straightening as he reaches for where he left his hat hanging by the door, surprised to find…it's far sturdier than it was before, with the addition of a simple, translucent veil.

Did San Lang do this as well?

In spite of everything, the god can't help but smile, lifting the hat up and over his head, tying it off underneath his chin.

San Lang really is good at everything, isn't he?

The Heavenly Officials he spoke to before—they made Ghost Kings seem like such inelegant creatures.

That they were violent, almost animalistic beings with little humanity left to them, but after spending time with Hua Cheng, Xie Lian…

He suspects there's more to becoming a Calamity than what meets the eye.

When he ascends to the heavens once more—the first thing he notices is all of the movement.

Generally, the Heavens are a somewhat tranquil space. No one rushes anywhere, there's no need to.

But now? All of the officials seem to be moving about in a flurry.

Most of them are deputy officials, as the meeting in the Grand Martial Hall is supposed to start any moment—Xie Lian is the one that's running late, but still...

All of this over Pei Junior?

Xie Lian doesn't mean to belittle the loss of life, but...

It isn't necessary to bring the entire Heavenly Court into the matter to deal with it.

Xie Lian grimaces, remembering his own trial before his first banishment.

Such a matter—it doesn't need to be an act of public humiliation. And General Ming Guang won't be pleased.

Which isn't particularly good news for Xie Lian, since he's the reason that—

"Your highness! Your highness the crown prince!" A voice cries out, strained—and Xie Lian halts in midstep, lifting his chin to try and figure out who is calling to him.

After all—no one does.

Not here, anyway.

But the figure calling out—he rushes past Xie Lian, chasing down...

Xie Lian squints ahead, making out an orange aura in the distance, bright, flickering slightly like a flame, and...just underneath it is a shape that looks like that of...

A tiger spirit?

"Your highness," the deputy official stops by the martial god's side, breathing hard— so much so that he has to bend over, pressing his hands against his knees as he wheezes. "Goodness, how could you forget your identification pass before leaving for the meeting?!"

“Oh!”

The sound of that voice—that bright, familiar voice—makes Xie Lian freeze, the color draining from his cheeks.

“I was in a hurry when I realized I was running late—so I forgot it,” the young god admits, scratching the back of his head with a laugh.

It’s...

‘Guoshi! Guoshi! Did you see me? Did I get it right this time?’

Oh.

It takes Xie Lian a moment to realize that the figure has twisted around to look at him, feeling the weight of someone’s gaze on his face, or, well—not just anyone.

The Martial God of the East: Lang Qianqiu. There’s a pause—but it’s a brief one.

Xie Lian raises one hand in greeting, a gentle smile on his face, his eyes shut as he greets his fellow Martial God.

“Hello, your highness the crown prince,” he murmurs graciously.

Lang Qianqiu stares for a moment, his eyes wide.

Taking in that face, one that he’s never seen before, but...

He grins widely, eyes shining as he waves back at the white robed god, waving his own hand in greeting.

“Hello!”

Xie Lian’s smile softens slightly with fondness.

He always was such a friendly child—even to people who were strangers to him. And, as far as Lang Qianqiu is concerned, Xie Lian might as well be a stranger.

The Deputy God beside Lang Qianqiu sighs, rubbing his temple. “Your highness, you’re already running late...”

“Alright, alight...” The martial god mutters, turning his head as his tiger continues the journey towards the grand martial hall, paws thudding softly against the ground.

Xie Lian stays there for a moment, listening to the whispers. Talking about how awkward this must be for him

Talking about how, as the prince of a kingdom that destroyed Xie Lian, Lang Qianqiu must be more powerful.

And how, if Lang Qianqiu were to fall as Xie Lian had—he would never lower himself in the same way.

Ah, those rumors still exist then, don't they? In any case...

Xie Lian ignores them.

"Your highness?"

Good Heavens, is there another member of royalty nearby that Xie Lian just so happened to—?

Ling Wen's voice draws closer, "You must be careful when you go into the Great Martial Hall later."

In her arms are several scrolls worth of evidence, ready to present, and she's flanked by two civil gods, each even more weighed down with material than she is.

"Pei Junior is likely to be exiled," she explains calmly. "So the General might have words with you."

"There are worse things than exile," Xie Lian replies calmly—and for once, Ling Wen seems a little chagrined, remembering who she's speaking to. "Has there been any progress on the search for the child from Mount Yu Jun?"

"...I'm afraid not, your highness," Ling Wen admits. "But we're doing our best, and will continue pursuing a thorough investigation."

Of course, Xie Lian believes her—and he can't doubt that an effort is being made. Ling Wen is audibly exhausted.

Even now, she's receiving memos, papers folded into the shapes of cranes fluttering around her head, a small storm of information and requests.

Xie Lian can't help but feel sympathy. "I'm sorry for troubling you."

"It's my job," Ling Wen replies simply. "I'll go on ahead."

Xie Lian isn't far behind her, ascending the steps of the Grand Martial Hall quietly, arms folded into the sleeves of his robes. He walks lightly, hoping to make his entrance as inoffensive as possible, but...

Inside, you could not hear a pin drop.

Even in a Heavenly Capital filled with golden palaces, the Grand Martial Hall easily dwarfs them all. With perfectly polished marble floors that almost look like black mirrors, wide pillars with dragons coiled around them.

The Dragon is Jun Wu's personal symbol, after all.

Engraved into the ceilings, above a throne so massive, it sits an entire meter above floor level.

The last time Xie Lian was in this room, it was for his own trial. And he—

"Xianle."

The prince stiffens, his shoulders straightening at the sound of that voice.

"You're here."

As if Xie Lian ever would have refused a summons, but...his stomach twists with uncertainty, trying to read the emperor's tone.

He sounds...happy to see Xie Lian, which is...

A relief, but surprising.

"I'm sure you also know why you've been summoned here."

The prince nods.

"I do," he bows, clasping his hands in front of him respectfully. "But I was under the impression that the matter had already been settled."

"That remains to be seen," A voice replies—deep and rumbling, echoing from behind him.

There's something undeniably attractive about the sound of it, and...familiar.

"Ming Guang." Jun Wu responds calmly, glancing the General over with a detached gaze. “I’m surprised to see you up and moving already.”

“It was against my orders,” Mu Qing grouses, his arms crossed.

Xie Lian raises an eyebrow, confused.

Is the General injured? How could that be?

“You thought I wouldn’t come?” Pei replies calmly, arching an eyebrow. “It involves my family, after all.”

And while Pei Ming is many things—he’s infamously protective over those close to him.

No one protests, but the figure standing the closest to Jun Wu’s throne watches him with a narrowed gaze, sapphire eyes flashing with frustration.

“Besides, I visited Pei Junior before coming here,” the General continues, stepping to the front of the crowd.

With one exception, every single Martial God wears armor—but for most, the protective gear favors form over purpose.

In the case of Ming Guang, however, it serves both. The heavenly metal gleams on his chest and shoulders, fastened to his robes with rubies.

Expensive—but battle worn—and unlike some martial gods who will return their gear to the heavenly armorers over the smallest of scratches, Pei Ming prefers to keep his.

Other than that on his left eye, he doesn’t have his battle scars anymore.

Gods have long memories, but in his experience, nothing teaches a better lesson than damage, forming a deep scar.

The throbbing pain in his side is a lesson he’s still in the process of learning.

And, as it happens—Pei Ming is the only god in the heavens that can look the heavenly emperor in the eye without being forced to lift his chin, given that they’re the same height.

“While Pei Xiu used a clone in the Crescent Moon Pass,” Pei explains, "it was still rather strong."

Xie Lian bites the inside of his cheek, not saying a word as the general continues, "Strong enough to handle most savage ghosts—but when he met the Prince in the Sinner's Pit, he encountered a young man dressed in red. One so powerful, Pei Junior couldn't even fight back."

That sends a rush of whispers throughout the room, but the Prince of Xianle doesn't react, his expression smooth.

"I apologize for my rudeness, your highness," Pei Ming turns back to Xie Lian, walking away from the throne.

Jun Wu remains silent, eyes slightly narrowed. "It's an honor to meet you again."

Xie Lian smiles politely, bowing his chin in acknowledgement. "The honor is all mine, General."

Pei's smile is infamously charming, and just from the sound of him and what Xie Lian can sense of his size alone...he's relieved not to see it.

And compared to the other martial gods in the martial hall—aside from the likes of Jun Wu, who's aura covers the entire capital—Pei Ming's is the brightest.

Shades of orange, red, and gold—reminiscent of the sunrises Xie Lian can hardly remember.

It's a pleasant sight, anyhow.

"I'm glad to hear it," Pei Ming muses—after all, while they haven't seen one another since Xie Lian was a teenager (and the prince can hardly remember that time)—there was never ill will between them.

After all—both men respect strength, and as such, each other.

"But I'm afraid I have to ask—that young man who was traveling with you," Pei lifts his chin, violet eyes surveying the hall, "...Which god is he?"

"..." Xie Lian clears his throat, then smiles.

"He approached my shrine as a normal young man several days ago, saying he had nowhere else to go. He was very kind and helpful, and when he offered to accompany me to the Crescent Moon, I allowed him to come along." The Crown Prince explains.

"He never did anything suspicious in my presence, and as far as I am aware, he isn't a god."

"...But your highness," Pei smiles, violet eyes watching Xie Lian's face intently, waiting for him to show any hint of dishonesty, "Pei Xiu told me the two of you were quite close."

Xie Lian stiffens with surprise. ...Did they?

"Far too familiar with one another to be simple strangers," the general of the north concludes. "How can that be?"

Xie Lian opens his mouth, then closes it, because...they really did only meet a few days ago, so...

"General Pei."

Xie Lian pauses when he hears a young man speak up in the crowd, his voice melodic, almost breezy in nature—but ringing clear.

"Your source is a man who has committed grave crimes, and is about to be exiled," the god points out, twirling a whisk between his fingers.

"Is he truly the most trustworthy source of information?"

The younger man steps forward, wearing robes of white, green, and gold. He's striking, with a delicately handsome face, emerald eyes, and long, dark waves of hair —and now, he's smiling at Pei Ming with veiled disdain.

"...Well," the general smiles back, eyes slightly narrowed, "That depends on Generals Nan Yang and Xuan Zhen."

The two men in question stiffen. They never mean to, but they always end up standing side by side at these things.

(Today, they were sitting in pointed silence.)

"If it's who I suspect, they should be able to recognize the wounds."

Before Xie Lian can question what he means, General Ming Guang snaps his fingers.

Crack!

A portal opens in the roof of the Great Martial Hall, allowing a figure to plummet forth.

WHOOSH!

The clone rushes down to the floor, coming to a sudden halt a few feet off of the ground, hovering.

Jun Wu glances to the two gods in question, sending each a nod to indicate that they should do as Pei Ming asks, leading both to step forward obediently.

The clone is empty now, just a limp, hollow shell, eyes staring up at the ceiling vacantly—but it's absolutely covered in lacerations. None of which seem meant to kill —

(Because if there had been the desire to, they would have.)

But the number of cuts is what's truly shocking.

After a moment, Feng Xin looks up with a nod, "It's him—"

"—it's the saber E'Ming," Mu Qing concludes the sentence for him with a nod.

There's an uproar among the other officials, and Pei Ming smiles, satisfied. "Thank you for confirming my suspicion, Generals."

He turns back to Jun Wu, clasping his hands before him before dropping his head in a shallow bow. "Please reconsider the matter, my lord. There's clearly much more to this than we currently understand."

"General," the young god from before speaks up again, his voice sharp.

"Are you trying to imply that the Crown Prince colluded with a Ghost King to frame Little Pei? And for what purpose would he do such a thing?"

Xie Lian doesn't recognize the young man, but he's defended Xie Lian twice now, which is two times more than what he's accustomed to.

"...I never said a thing about collusion," Pei mutters, rubbing his temple—and then he winces, pressing one palm against his side.

Xie Lian can't see how unusually pale the god is—but he can hear the slight strain to his breathing.

He is hurt then, isn't he?

"It's possible that Hua Cheng deceived him, after all," Pei Ming's eyes flicker back to Jun Wu, narrowing slightly, "the Crown Prince has been allowed to wander the Mortal Realm in a vulnerable state, despite his banishment being over."

Xie lian stiffens at that.

He can admit—he doesn't know why he still has his shackles either. But he isn't— He doesn't need Pei Ming's pity.

"In any case, it's not my place to question that," The General shrugs, not breaking eye contact with Jun Wu. "But it means Hua Cheng could have bewitched him."

"There were witnesses to Little Pei's confession," the younger god glares, crossing his arms. "Are you so blinded by family association that you would ignore that?"

Pei's eyes flash, and a new voice rings out, smoother than the others, Xie Lian notices —but stern.

"Enough."

Shi Wudu has stood near the front of the room, silent for the entire meeting—but now, he snaps his fan shut, sending his little brother a cold look, making Shi Qingxuan shrink just a little bit.

He pretends not to be bothered, of course, but no one enjoys a public scolding.

"You have made your point. If you want to squabble with the General for personal reasons, you won't waste the emperor's time while you do it."

Xie Lian has to admit—the tension between Pei and this young god does seem somewhat personal, doesn't it? Are they enemies?

In any case, he did speak up for Xie Lian several times, so the prince speaks up in return now.

"If you want to check for any trace of deceptive magic on my body now, Jun Wu is welcome to do so," he speaks out, lifting his chin. "And even if it was Hua Cheng in disguise..."

He can't see the way Mu Qing presses a palm to his forehead from behind him, exasperated.

“...He isn’t responsible for Pei Xiu’s actions. I witnessed his confession myself. Just because he’s a Ghost King—that doesn’t mean you can blame everything on him. That’s unreasonable.”

Pei Ming, Feng Xin, and Mu Qing stare at him, each wearing expressions of shocked confusion—all while Shi Qingxuan fans himself aggressively, clearly miffed from being publicly rebuked by his elder brother.

“Hear, hear!”

“You—?”

“The Water Master is correct,” Jun Wu stands up. “That’s enough. Pei Xiu has confessed, and his account matches that of Ke Mo. The issue is settled. Any further debate is unproductive.”

“...” Pei Ming glances at Shi Wudu, and Shi Qingxuan’s eyes narrow slightly, trying to understand the look shared between them.

“...Understood,” Pei mutters between clenched teeth, bowing his head in agreement. “But the matter of Hua Cheng’s involvement is concerning. Will there be an investigation?”

“Of course,” Jun Wu replies calmly. “But I understand there was another matter to be discussed.”

Xie Lian tilts his head to the side, confused—after all of that, he was convinced the meeting had been called because General Pei wanted to protest Pei Junior’s fate, but —

“I sent General Pei to deal with a series of attacks in Qinghe last week,” Jun Wu explains.

“I understand that, in the process of performing your investigation, you came across something rather serious that you wanted to report to the Heavenly Court.”

“...I did,” Pei agrees, reaching for something strapped to his hip. He lifts his chin, speaking loud enough for the entire room to hear. “The violence turned out to be the work of the local cultivation clan—unintentional,” he clarifies. “But in the process of resolving the issue, they dispersed an ancient local ghost, one who wasn’t involved.”

He steps forward once more, a crimson cloak fluttering gently behind his shoulders as he moves.

“When Quan Yizhen and I were watching the creature fade, it attempted to attack him with this,”

Now, he lifts the item up—the dagger gleaming in the air, black steel, wickedly sharp.

“When I defended him, I was the one that ended up getting stabbed,” the General explains, turning his gaze back to Jun Wu.

From the emperor’s side, the Water Master crosses his arms, his gaze turning tense. “And I haven’t been able to use spiritual power to heal the wound.”

That sends a worried murmur throughout the court, and now, Shi Qingxuan stops fanning himself, leaning over to whisper next to Xie Lian’s ear.

“It’s a knife, your highness. Or a dagger, I suppose. Is there a difference?”

“...” Xie Lian smiles, slightly endeared.

After all, it didn’t seem to occur to anyone else that he couldn’t see what was going on, so it was very considerate of the young man to say something.

“I figured that out when he mentioned the stabbing part,” the prince whispers back, “but thank you.”

Then, he adds—

“Daggers have two sharp edges. For a knife, only one side is sharpened.”

“Ah...” Shi Qingxuan murmurs, holding his fan up in front of their faces to muffle them, whispering, “It’s a dagger, then.”

Mu Qing’s eyebrow twitches. “Would you two keep it down?”

Just as he speaks, Jun Wu looks at him, arching an eyebrow. “Xuan Zhen. I understand you were the one who treated him upon his return?”

Mu Qing clears his throat, stepping away from the other two gods as he speaks, “Yes, my lord. General Ming Guang lost a considerable amount of blood, and even with the help of Nan Yang, Ling Wen, and the Water Master lending spiritual power, I wasn’t able to heal him.”

That doesn’t seem to set the room at ease, and even Xie Lian is slightly startled. After all—he doesn’t even have spiritual power, and his body recovers remarkably well from damage.

He would know.

How could a weapon harm a god—one as powerful as Pei at that—to that degree?

“...His blood is clotting, and the mortal medicine I performed on his body seemed to take,” Mu Qing explains. “The wound will heal—but at the same pace as it would if he was a human.”

Shi Wudu’s expression is calm, but he’s tapping his closed fan repeatedly against his wrist.

It’s a subtle gesture, one that could be mistaken for impatience, for anyone who doesn’t know him well. “So, what?” He questions flatly, sounding vaguely irritated. “Is the great General Ming Guang a mortal, now?”

“Oh, no.” Pei shakes his head, waving that notion off. “I stabbed myself with a normal weapon this morning to make sure—and that wound healed just as it should have.”

The Water Master’s eyes narrow.

“...You what?” He questions sharply, voice flat.

“I told him it was moronic,” Mu Qing mutters, rolling his eyes. “My deputy fainted.”

“But, we have our answer.” Pei shrugs, striding calmly towards the throne, holding the weapon out to Jun Wu, flipping it casually between his fingers, catching it lightly by the blade between his thumb and index finger, so the Emperor can grip it by the handle.

“He asked me to bring it to you, before the ghost dissipated completely,” the general shrugs. “I don’t know what his intentions were.”

Jun Wu grips the weapon, staring down at it for a moment in complete silence, and…

Pei watches his expression closely, seeing…

Fear.

Briefly. Only a flash of it before Jun Wu's gaze returns to its usual demeanor of eternal calm.

"…Well," the emperor mutters, not lifting his eyes from the weapon. "You, Ming Guang, are very lucky to be alive."

Pei shrugs, taking a step back from the throne—unimpressed.

"I've been told that before."

Jun Wu turns around, examining the blade more closely—allowing no one else to see his expression. "This weapon is older than even me," he murmurs, examining the characters on the hilt. "I'm assuming you couldn't read this?"

"…No," Pei Ming agrees with a frown. "Even Ling Wen couldn't."

"She's too young to know it," Jun Wu sighs, his knuckles white where they grip the hilt. "It's called the God Slayer."

Every official in the room falls silent with a hush, fear ringing in the air.

The…what?

"It renders Heavenly flesh mortal." The emperor continues, still facing away from the rest of the room, his head slightly bent. "If you had been hit in a vital point…"

The gravity of the matter hits Xie Lian, sending shivers down his spine. Ming Guang would have been slain.

And, despite being the potential victim—he seems calm about the matter. That much Xie Lian can understand.

A soldier has tempered nerves, after all.

"Are you familiar with the weapon, my lord?"

There's a long pause, one where Jun Wu does not speak.

It’s unlike him.

As a matter of fact, of all of the gods here—and, as the eldest aside from the Rain Master, Ming Guang has known him the longest—

He’s never seen Jun Wu seem shaken.

“...I know the stories,” the god mutters, slowly lifting his chin. “From the Heavenly Dynasty before mine.”

It’s well known that this isn’t the first Heavenly Dynasty, nor is Jun Wu the first Emperor. But his reign has gone on for so long, there isn’t anyone left to remember what came before.

Finally, he asks the room a question:

“Are any of you familiar with the name Zhao Beitong?”

Of course—no one replies.

Slowly, the Heavenly Emperor turns back around—his expression grim, but a mask of calm. “This was the blade she used to assassinate my predecessor,” he explains. “She plunged it into his heart, as the histories once said.”

...Assassinated?

Gods often die in battle, or fade away into obscurity, but...

Assassination? Of one as strong as a Heavenly Emperor?

“...Was she a goddess?” Shi Wudu questions, eyeing Jun Wu with veiled suspicion.

“No,” the emperor shakes his head. “Zhao Beitong was the world’s first Calamity.”

Another chill runs down Xie Lian’s spine as Jun Wu descends down the steps from his throne, dagger still in hand. “As the stories go, she lived over two millennia ago, in a long destroyed kingdom. A commoner, who captured the heart of a prince.”

It almost doesn’t sound real. More like a legend, than something that actually happened, but...

In Xie Lian’s experience, most legends are based in truth.

"But she wanted more," Jun Wu explains, rubbing his thumb over the snake on the hilt of the blade, his gaze unreadable.

"When their Kingdom fell into war, a god approached her with a choice: to save them from certain defeat," Jun Wu's eyes slide over the room, before finally settling on one set of eyes. "But at a terrible cost. And she would not know the price until it was paid."

Shi Wudu stares back at him, silent, his expression inexplicably pale.

"...And in the beginning, there was victory—seemingly at no cost, until..." Jun Wu trails off, keeping his eyes on the Water Master. "She lost the dearest thing in the world to her—her son."

Xie Ian feels slightly nauseous, listening to the emperor tell the tale, reaching up to grip the ring on his chest for comfort, stroking the metal as he listens.

"She found him in his crib, seemingly asleep—only to find that his soul had been taken," Jun Wu concludes grimly.

"It was a curse that followed her for the rest of her life. She was forced to give up her second child as a hostage in peace talks. And her third son..."

His eyes slide away from Shi Wudu, who seems eager for the opportunity to step back.

"...Fell to his death, tragically."

Xie Lian grips Hong'er tighter between his fingers, struggling to understand the depth of such grief.

Losing a child is a different kind of pain, and losing three? He...

"Her kingdom fell shortly after—and with no one else to blame..." Jun Wu sighs. "She turned to the Heavens."

A tragic choice, the prince supposes—but the poor woman must have been mad with grief.

"But instead of turning on the one god who offered her that choice in the beginning— she turned to the one thing she had left, her husband."

Jun Wu glances down at the dagger, staring at his reflection in the steel.

“She told him that she had been tricked. That the gods had conspired against him, jealous of his cultivation. After all—he was on the cusp of ascending as a god himself.”

“But then…his heart was filled only with hate. And as the stories say—Zhao Beitong was a blacksmith, by trade. She forged powerful weapons, all in the name of getting her husband to slaughter the gods she blamed for her children’s deaths.”

Jun Wu lifts his gaze from the dagger, and now—

Now, he turns his eyes on Xie Lian—who can’t see that he’s being stared at, but shrinks under Jun Wu’s gaze nonetheless.

“He did as she wanted—and in the end, Zhao Beitong was a calamity, and her husband, a Ghost King.”

The next words he says—while not explicitly so—are targeted.

“He became the White Clothed Calamity, Bai Wuxiang.”

The Prince goes completely still, fingers tightening around Hong’er until they ache.

She…what?

“Of course, I thought it was just a story, but now…”

Jun Wu sighs, “Seeing this dagger, one straight out of the legends…it would seem that it was true.”

Pei Ming frowns, watching as Jun Wu tucks the weapon into his sleeves. “But if that’s the case…why did that ghost have it? And why did he want me to bring it to you?”

The Heavenly Emperor shrugs, looking down at the empty shell of Pei Xiu’s clone. “Given what the blade was used for—I assume it was made as some sort of threat against me. And between Hua Cheng and Qi Rong, two prominent ghosts have been on the move in recent days…”

Xie Lian frowns, not wanting to see the blame cast on Hua Cheng once again. After all, he was with Xie Lian for the entire week—and confirmed to the prince that it was in fact his real body, not a clone. He couldn’t have been involved in the incident with the dagger.

“But he—”

But, to everyone's surprise—it's the Water Master who speaks up, interrupting the prince, speaking in a way that makes everyone—even Pei Ming—stare at him with surprise.

"This couldn't be Hua Cheng," Shi Wudu sneers, staring Jun Wu in the eye. "It's not his style."

Feng Xin frowns from Mu Qing's side, crossing his arms. "I think going after Heavenly Officials is exactly his style, with all due respect."

Shi Wudu doesn't even look at him, keeping his gaze on Jun Wu. "Crimson Rain Sought Flower isn't a coward," the Water God explains. "He's well known for sending very direct messages to those he wishes to fight. He doesn't need lies, threats, or manipulation to impress upon people that he's powerful."

Xie Lian agrees wholeheartedly. Hua Cheng did threaten Ke Mo in the Sinner's Pit, but...It was quite direct.

If Hua Cheng had wanted to threaten Jun Wu, he would have done so directly—and it would have been followed up with a swift follow through.

Not to mention the fact that Hua Cheng wouldn't use a weapon that nearly assured victory.

He loves a good fight far too much for that.

Jun Wu stares at Shi Wudu for a long moment, watching as the Water Master snaps his fan open, nonchalant, slowly fanning it towards him as they stare one another down.

And yes, there is anger lingering underneath that gaze. But it's directed toward the Water Master, and him alone. And It stops Pei from asking any more questions.

"...That's an excellent point, Shi Wudu—as always," Jun Wu replies calmly, showing no hint of tension in his posture or tone. "We'll have to conduct a thorough investigation of the matter in order to uncover the truth."

Xie Lian is honestly surprised that any god dares speak to Jun Wu so candidly. Not that the emperor has ever been anything but gracious or polite to other members of the Heavenly court, but...

It requires a certain level of audacity and pride.

Which, Xie Lian supposes makes sense—coming from the Infamous 'Water Tyrant' that San Lang described.

"...In any case," Jun Wu continues, looking back over the crowd. "There's nothing more to be done for more—and Ming Guang, you should return to bed rest. Meeting dismissed."

Everyone begins to make their way out of the Grand Martial Hall—with Xie Lian following close behind, lost in thought about everything that just happened, and what he should tell San Lang the next time he sees him—

"Xianle."

The Prince stops.

"We need to speak privately."

Xie Lian had hoped he could leave without incident—but he isn't surprised by Jun Wu's request. He nods, folding his hands inside the sleeves of his robes, waiting as the other gods filter out of the hall.

Shi Qingxuan stops beside him, looking like he wants to speak to him, but—

"Shi Qingxuan." Pei Ming stops beside him, one hand still pressed against his ribs, and Xie Lian sensed that he seemed irritated before, but...

Now, when he looks at the young god, the air around him seems tense with genuine anger.

"For your older brother's sake—you should think before making a scene like that."

The Wind Master stops, casting Pei Ming an irritated stare, eyes narrowing defensively. "General Pei, don't try to use my brother to intimidate me. I'm not scared of him."

That makes the General of the North pause, and when Shi Qingxuan looks into violet eyes, he sees something odd. Not the anger, no, or the protective frustration, but...

It doesn't seem to be about Pei Xiu. Not entirely.

"You're still such a child, aren't you?"

Shi Qingxuan startles, his grip tightening around his wrist. "I don't think—"

"No," Pei interrupts him. "You don't think. Not about how your actions impact him. You're four centuries old, that's old enough to know—"

"Don't involve yourself in family matters."

Green eyes, normally lighthearted and easy going, glare at Pei Ming with ever growing tension. "Gege despises people who get ahead of themselves."

It's always been just him and his brother, after all. That's the only family Shi Qingxuan has ever had.

Pei Ming has been a close friend and ally and friend of his brother since they arrived in the Heavens. And Shi Qingxuan never liked him. Never liked how easily he could capture Wudu's attention, taking it away from him.

But in the last century, things have been different.

Shi Qingxuan obviously isn't aware of the intimate details of his brother's personal life—but he does know that something has been wrong with him.

The nights in their palace are often pierced by the cries of nightmares. And he also knows that Pei has gotten closer in that time.

"...Even if I am ahead of myself," the general mutters, his voice low, "I'm not wrong. You're inconsiderate, ungrateful, and—"

"—And you're an arrogant, condescending—!"

"How about this," both men fall silent as the subject of their argument speaks up from behind them.

"You're being a brat," Shi Wudu directs the first criticism at his brother, pointing his fan at him with a sharp rebuke, making Shi Qingxuan flush slightly, and when Pei Ming (very maturely) snorts victoriously—

He ends up jabbed in his injured side with that very fan.

"Ai!" He cries, clutching his ribs, "Shit, what was that for?!"

“You stabbed yourself once today already,” the Water God replies coldly. “I presumed you must either not feel the pain, or you’re an imbecile. Clearly it’s the latter.”

Shi Qingxuan smirks. “HA! Gege, did you—hey!”

The Water Master grabs him by the scruff of the neck, bodily hauling him out of the Grand Martial Hall as he protests, flailing his whisk, “Gege, cut it out! This is so embarrassing—I’m not a kid anymore, you can’t just manhandle me whenever you want—!”

Pei Ming watches the Shi brothers for a moment.

In particular, he finds himself staring at how dark and smooth the elder’s hair is this afternoon, swaying behind him in a dark, lustrous curtain, pulled back with a clasp encrusted with sapphire and pearl.

“...I apologize.”

Xie Lian glances up, startled to realize that the General is speaking to him. “...Oh, please, the one who should be apologizing is—!”

“No,” Pei shakes his head, not allowing the prince to demure out of politeness. “You did nothing wrong. You just got...”

He doesn’t look back at the emperor, even if he can feel Jun Wu’s gaze on his back.

Pei is aware of the Emperor’s displeasure with him—but the reason behind it is a mystery to the general.

“...Caught up in the middle of something,” he concludes, shaking his head.

Before Xie Lian can really think about exactly what he means—the General strides out of the grand martial hall, and...

Xie Lian and Jun Wu are left alone, standing in the empty, cavernous space. “Xianle.”

The prince remains quiet, his arms folded as Jun Wu addresses him.

Jun Wu’s boots click softly across the floors as he approaches, “Crimson Rain Sought Flower...” He muses, watching the way Xie Lian’s shoulders tense, then slump. “The Scimitar E’Ming...tell me, what’s happened?”

They haven't spoken in eight centuries, and still… When Jun Wu says the word Xianle—

His first instinct is to feel shame.

"I'm sorry—"

Without even thinking, his knees start to buckle as he drops to his knees, head sinking low, but large, strong hands catch his elbows, gripping firmly as they lift the prince back to his feet.

"Do you know what you've done wrong?" Jun Wu questions softly, not letting him go, even now that Xie Lian is standing once more. His grip on the prince's elbows isn't painful—but it stops him from retreating.

"If so, tell me."

Xie Lian keeps his chin down, his stomach twisting with remorse and shame, because…even now, Jun Wu's tone is gentle. He isn't angry, or resentful. Just… concerned.

And Xie Lian had come here with every intention of lying to him, after all of Jun Wu's kindness.

It's shameful.

"…Never mind," the emperor sighs, turning away from Xie Lian as he walks towards the doors leading to the private chambers beyond the grand hall. "Come."

Xie Lian follows, pushing down any reluctance.

The first time he stood in this room, he was little more than a child.

Trailing behind Jun Wu like a lost little duckling, plucked from his palaces, his servants, his parents—even his Guoshi. He was so eager to charge forward, to be grown up, to impress the heavenly emperor, but…

In the end, Jun Wu became more of a parental figure than a peer.

When Xie Lian was a boy, this room was made from white marble, veins of gold running through, with pearls embedded into the ceiling, symbolizing the grand martial temples in the world below.

There were many, even back then—but Xie Lian imagines there must be a sea of them now.

It's a little different in other ways.

The chamber used to be completely closed off, but now the far wall has been opened up, marble pillars and steps leading down to a courtyard, the near entirety of it covered in a koi pond, lily pads floating across the surface.

After all, one has to adapt.

His wife taught him that, if you are going to lie—if you get caught, everything falls apart.

The Prince of Xianle taught him that it's easier to mold something when it's broken. He applied those lessons, going forward.

When he looked to pull someone under his control again, he didn't lie. Misled, manipulated, maybe—but never lied. Chose someone that was already fractured.

But Xianle also taught him the importance of never keeping too firm of a grip. Enticing was better than intimidation.

So, when he saw a young elemental god seeming forlorn, ill at ease within the enclosed walls of the Grand Martial Palace, he opened some of those barriers up. Allowed flowers to grow. Brought in a hint of life.

And for a time, it worked rather well.

Until there was outside interference, anyway.

Now, there's an opportunity to try again—and of course, there's...

Crimson Rain Sought Flower.

Jun Wu's eyes narrow for a moment, his brow creasing for a moment before becoming smooth once more.

"...If you're apologizing for what has happened in the past..." The emperor shakes his head. "Put it from your mind. It's behind you now."

Xie Lian pauses, struggling to think of a reply, his tongue dry, pressing to the roof his mouth anxiously.

He can't do that.

He can try and smile through it, or ignore it even. Xie Lian does that every single day.

But he can't put it out of his mind completely.

Eventually, he allows himself a small wince, muttering—

"...How could I ever forget?"

Jun Wu walks ahead of him, staring at the pond.

"...Then try to look forward," he shrugs. "You saw in the meeting—we're living in difficult times. You'll be needed."

Needed.

Xie Lian's fingers twitch slightly, folded inside his sleeves, and all he manages is a small, tired chuckle.

"Xianle is no more than a scrap god, now."

It's funny—he never usually refers to himself in the third person, but...when he's with someone with such a large presence, it's hard not to unconsciously mimic certain mannerisms.

"I just hope to not get in the way more than I already have." Jun Wu's eyes flicker back to him.

"Why so self-deprecating?" He questions—his tone sharp enough to make Xie Lian pause, startled.

There was a time when people thought he wasn't self deprecating enough, after all. "You've handled these last two situations rather well."

The prince bows his head, reluctant.

"...and yet," The emperor continues, watching a set of koi fish swirling in the water— one with blue scales along the body and red fins, the other neatly entirely white, with only a smattering of red scales around the crown, "...you encountered someone extraordinary."

Xie Lian stares into the darkness ahead, his fingers fidgeting slightly inside his sleeves. Logically, he knows he has no right to be dishonest with Jun Wu in any regard, but...

"I just ran into a very interesting young man as I was traveling, and we spent a few days together."

It would be one thing if it was only about risking Xie Lian's reputation, but after how kind Hua Cheng was to him...

The prince doesn't want to cause him any trouble. Not that he thinks Jun Wu would leap on the opportunity to punish either of them simply for associating, but...

"And that child just so happened to be a ghost king..." Jun Wu trails off, finally looking up from the koi pond.

"...Xianle," the emperor sighs, shaking his head. "You must be more careful with how you speak in front of the others. None of them would have believed that."

Xie Lian isn't surprised by that, not in the least—but then again, regardless of what he has ever said or done, the Heavenly Court has its own perception of things.

"In any case," Jun Wu shrugs, turning to face the prince, resting one palm on his shoulder.

It sits heavily.

"I know that you wouldn't collude with the ghostly realm," Jun Wu assumes him gently, watching as the Prince of Xianle's shoulders slump slightly with relief. "That isn't in your nature. But if the two of you have a good relationship..."

He trails off, watching Xie Lian's face.

It's more of an implication than a question, but...

Xie Lian is a pleaser, at his core. Dislikes lying or upsetting others. And, the longer Jun Wu lets it sit in the air, eventually—the younger god caves.

"I have a high opinion of him," Xie Lian admits. "He's been very kind."

After all—after how much Hua Cheng was accused of in that meeting, not saying anything about how well the Ghost King treated him would be wrong. And...

"Then I'll have to take your word for it," Jun Wu shrugs, lifting his head. “But it does complicate things.”

Xie Lian glances up, a little weary. “...It does? I don’t think he had anything to do with Pei Junior’s actions, or the knife—”

“No, no...” Jun Wu waves him off, glancing up at the ceiling, the pearls glimmering down. “It’s nothing like that. There’s an unrelated situation.”

Beyond what happened in the Crescent Moon Pass? How could that have happened in only a few hours—?

“I didn’t need to summon the entire Heavenly Court for just Pei Xiu’s trial,” Jun Wu shrugs, his footsteps clicking down the hall once more as Xie Lian moves to follow him.

“After all—making a show out of it displeased Ming Guang,” Jun Wu admits, seeming somewhat remorseful. “Trials are normally more private affairs.”

It’s odd, because Xie Lian doesn’t remember his own trial that way at all.

It felt incredibly public.

But then again...

It was over eight centuries ago now, and of course—it was a humiliating memory at the time. Xie Lian probably just remembers it less generously for that reason.

“...then why was everyone summoned?” He murmurs, keeping his head low. Jun Wu reaches into his sleeve.

The dagger is still there, weighing heavily against his skin. He grasps the handle for a moment, contemplative—then explains.

“During the night—somewhere deep in the Eastern Mountains, witnesses saw a dragon made of flames rush into the sky, remaining for two incense times.”

Xie Lian listens carefully, his chin tilted back as the emperor continues;

“Despite the size and force of the dragon’s appearance, no mortals were harmed. Does that sound familiar to you?”

Of course it does—and it's far more worrisome than what the prince would have expected.

"...It's a Heavenly Spell," Xie Lian mutters, scraping through his memories. A costly one. Not the sort of thing that a person would use if they had another choice. "A distress signal to be sent out as a last resort. Using it probably killed the official in question."

Jun Wu nods in confirmation, "Correct. I summoned all of you back here to check and see which officials were able to return, but..."

He frowns, his eyebrows knitting together. "Other than those who normally wouldn't answer such a summons to begin with, everyone has reported in."

Which makes the situation even more puzzling. After all—only a Heavenly Official could have used that spell. But if everyone has been accounted for...

"Could it have been someone retired?" Xie Lian questions, "Or in exile?'

"If that's the case, it'll be a difficult search."

Most retired Heavenly Officials (of which there aren't very many remaining) eventually lose contact with the Heavens, choosing to live private lives.

"...For someone to force an official to use that spell, they must have been powerful," Xie Lian admits with a frown.

A savage ghost at the very least—but far beyond the power of that of Ke Mo or Banyue. And if not one of them, then...

A Calamity.

Xie Lian's stomach sinks, remembering the fact that, given when this occurred, and how Hua Cheng left sometime during the night...it seems...

Still, it couldn't have been him.

Regardless of whether or not circumstances forbid it—Shi Wudu made a rather salient point, back in the Grand Martial Hall.

Hua Cheng hasn't hidden his conflicts with the Heavens before. If this was him—he would have publicly taken credit.

But even still—whoever did this—they must be a ghost of considerable strength.

“…is there a place where evil forces gather?” The prince questions thoughtfully. “That might be the best place to start.”

Jun Wu glances back at him, eyes flashing slightly.

“…There is,” The emperor replies, “and it’s rather close.”

Under the pale golden light filtering in through the window, small moving reflections cast from the surface of the koi pond outside—his eyes gleam a particular shade of silver.

“Have you ever heard of a place called Ghost City?” Xie Lian falls silent for a moment, thinking.

“…I have.”

The bridge between this life and the next, but a real, physical place. A prosperous gathering place for ghosts. A haven, or a house of horrors—all depending on who you ask.

Xie Lian has heard stories of lost travelers happening upon the place, thinking they’ve found a trading post to linger for the night, only to find the food served inedible, or their hosts wearing macabre masks.

But there are other stories, always given from children.

That if you follow red lanterns in the night, you’ll find safety on the other end of the road.

It almost makes him think of…

“I sent several officials to investigate the area after the spell was cast,” Jun Wu murmurs, “but by the time they arrived, the culprit had fled.”

“It’s likely that—seeing the officials coming—the creature was hidden within the walls of Ghost City. In order to get to the bottom of this, I’ll need to send someone covertly to search for clues.”

“…” The Prince bows his head, clasping his hands in front of him.

“Please,” he murmurs, “Give Xianle the order.”

Jun Wu doesn’t speak at first, watching the Prince of Xianle bow with a satisfied expression. And when he does respond—his voice is filled with polite concern.

“You were the first person I thought to ask,” the emperor admits.

“But this would place you in an awkward position.”

Xie Lian glances up, hands still clasped before him, “...Why?”

After all, wasn’t that why Jun Wu took him aside to begin with?

“Because,” the emperor’s tone turns delicate, but it still leaves him startled. “The east is ruled by Lang Qianqiu. You would need to coordinate with him.” Xie Lian doesn’t react immediately, hands unmoving, his expression smooth. Does Jun Wu...

The prince’s stomach roils, chest stinging from the aching memory of a stake. ...Does he know about that?

It’s not exactly shame that makes him feel so startled, no. Xie Lian knows that he would do the same thing now, if given that choice all over again.

It’s the fact that—

He prayed to Jun Wu back then, desperate and frightened—just as he had so many times before, and he didn’t...

“...Please don’t worry,” Xie Lian’s reply is delayed, but his voice is calm. “That isn’t a problem at all.”

After all—Lang Qianqiu doesn’t know who he is, and Xie Lian has no intention of harming the boy even more by forcing him to live with the truth.

That would be cruel.

“...That isn’t the only problem,” Jun Wu murmurs, shaking his head. “Do you know who rules the territory of Ghost City?”

Suddenly, he remembers what Jun Wu said in the beginning of this conversation—

“...It’s Hua Cheng, isn’t it?”

Jun Wu’s silence is answer enough.

“The two of you have a good relationship,” The emperor sighs. “I know that you don't say that you have a high opinion of someone lightly. If this is too awkward for you—"

Given how much Jun Wu has been willing to overlook for him—does Xie Lian even have a right to feel awkward?

"It's alright," the prince mutters, shaking his head.

He bites his lip, raising his fingertips to his chin.

The fingers that gripped him the night before were cold, but his wrist still burns.

'I swear—you won't find anyone on heaven and earth that is more sincere than me.'

Xie Lian saw what happened out there, in the Grand Martial Hall. How willing people were to throw Hua Cheng under suspicion with the slightest provocation, and little to no evidence.

If Xie Lian allows someone else to look into this matter...

Would they just ignore the facts and blame him anyway? If they did, the prince doesn't doubt Hua Cheng could protect himself, but...he won't have to, not if the prince makes sure the job is done fairly.

"I wish to investigate the matter personally."

"...I see."

Xie Lian can hear that Jun Wu sounds pleased—but what he cannot see, in that moment, is the vicious twist of his smile, eyes gleaming with satisfaction as he asks—

"Are there any officials you would like to see assigned to the mission with you?" Given the nature of the case...

"...Someone easy to get along with," Xie Lian mutters. "And I might need to borrow spiritual power—so someone powerful would be preferable."

Jun Wu thinks that over. "I suppose that eliminates Nan Yang and Xuan Zhen as options, then."

The prince laughs, surprised. "...I suppose so," he admits.

In any case, given the clear bias the two have against Hua Cheng—Xie

Lian wouldn't have requested their presence on this mission anyway.

"Have the three of you had a chance to speak?"

"…A little," Xie Lian shrugs.

Jun Wu quirks an eyebrow. "After eight centuries of no contact, you really have spoken so little? Come, now."

There's a slightly critical tone to his voice, and Xie Lian dips his chin, about to explain, when—

"When you were banished a second time, I did ask you to check in."

Xie Lian pauses, confused. "I…"

Didn't he, though? He—

He prayed to Jun Wu. Desperately. Countless times over that century, clawing against the dark. Did he—?

"But you chose to roll around in the dirt instead," Jun Wu sighs, somewhat exasperated.

…Did he really not hear?

That's the only explanation that makes sense, but—Xie Lian—

He swallows dryly, struggling to discern whether or not he's just…remembering it incorrectly?

After all, it was three hundred years ago, and he…wasn't in a clear mental state. It felt like someone heard him, but…

Jun Wu doesn't have a reason to be dishonest about it, and he…

There are other explanations, of course. The shackles. Xie Lian's own…emotional frailties at that time. Could he have even prayed coherently back then? What was he thinking, expecting anyone to be able to hear?

He bows his head again, taking a moment to collect himself, not wanting his voice to come out hoarse. "I apologize, my lord. Xianle was…"

He inhales slowly, evenly, eyes closed.

Not allowing himself to remember more than he has to, shutting those memories away.

“...Stubborn.”

“No need to apologize,” Jun Wu shakes his head. “And I suppose it makes sense that the three of you haven’t had the chance to speak, given the destruction when you arrived again...”

Xie Lian blanches slightly at the reminder, scratching his nose awkwardly. “Yes, well...”

“I paid them back already, so...Oh,” he blinks, “I never got the chance to thank you for assigning me to the Mount Yu Jun case. Otherwise, I never would have been able to make up for the merits...”

Jun Wu tilts his head, raising an eyebrow.

“Don’t thank me—thank Nan Yang.”

Xie Lian pauses, his own brows raising with confusion.

“Feng Xin? What does this have to do with him?”

“...He asked Ling Wen not to tell you,” Jun Wu warns, “but he was the one who asked her to waive the costs for reconstructing his palace.”

The prince stops following, startled

“He...really did that?” Xie Lian whispers, biting his lip once more.

The conversation has gradually left him feeling more and more off kilter, but that... remembering the last thing he said to Feng Xin, before all of this...

‘Then don’t follow me anymore.’

“Privately, but yes.”

And with the intention that Xie Lian would never know, which makes the prince feel guilty hearing it now, even if Jun Wu’s intentions were good, but...

There’s no statement in the world more useless than asking— ‘Don’t tell anyone.’

Xie Lian learned that the hard way.

"In any case," Jun Wu continues, easily breezing through the topics, even as he watches the building distress in the set of Xie Lian's expression, "if Xuan Zhen and Nan Yang won't work—the Wind Master would be an excellent option."

Xie Lian snaps out of it then, surprised.

"Really? She would want to help me again so soon?"

After all—she certainly went out of her way in the Crescent Moon Pass situation, and Xie Lian already put her through enough trouble with Pei Xiu and Banyue...

"You made a good first impression," the emperor shrugs.

"Besides—as an elemental master, the Wind Master is strong, and well known for having a friendly personality. That should fulfill both of your requirements, yes?"

Xie Lian nods with a small smile, pleased to find that...well...any heavenly official has a good impression of him.

"If that's all, then you can go on to the Palace of Xianle, and I'll send the Wind Master to you, you remember where it is I'm assuming?"

"Ah..." the prince smiles awkwardly. "Before it was torn down, yes. But I'm afraid I don't have the merits to rebuild..."

"Nonsense."

Jun Wu turns around, placing a hand on the small of Xie Lian's back—startling the god as he guides him to walk back towards the grand marital hall.

"You can't be expected to cram into that small shrine all the time. I granted you another."

Xie Lian can't imagine he'll get much use out of it, but...

It was kind of Jun Wu to make such a gesture, nonetheless. He won't insult the emperor by refusing it.

"Thank you, my lord..." Xie Lian replies—and then he stops, standing just outside the doors to the grand hall.

Jun Wu watches him curiously, and after a moment of waiting, he asks—

“Is something wrong, Xianle?”

Xie Lian fiddles with his fingers inside of his sleeves for a moment, debating whether or not he should, but…

“I was just…confused about something.” Jun Wu stops behind him.

That hand is still on his back—and just like before, the emperor’s touch weighs heavily on him. Like a painful reminder of something, but Xie Lian has no idea what.

“What is it?”

The younger god swallows dryly.

“I just…when my first banishment ended…”

He almost considers not saying anything. After all, there must be a reason for it, but…

The question is already halfway out of his mouth, and Jun Wu is watching, expectant.

“…My shackle was released,” Xie Lian mumbles, finishing the sentence. “But this time…it wasn’t.”

At first, he thought maybe it was because of the chaos following his third ascension, or maybe the property damage.

The first time his shackle shattered, Jun Wu was present—and this time, Xie Lian hadn’t had the chance to see him until, well…now.

“And you’re wondering why?”

Xie Lian can’t bring himself to answer directly. Just like how he couldn’t bring himself to ask for the shackles to be removed outright.

Instead, he just waits, keeping his chin low, feeling the weight of Jun Wu’s gaze against the back of his head.

“…Xianle,” Jun Wu sighs, sounding…

Xie Lian’s stomach sinks sharply, his chest tightening.

“I’m not the one with the answer to that question.”

…Disappointed, despite the fact that he hasn’t accused the prince of doing something wrong.

Xie Lian swallows hard.

“I don’t…” He starts—then stops, startled by how small his own voice sounds. How unsure.

And there’s that overwhelming desire again. To seem strong. Grown up. Not like the child that he used to be.

Because Xie Lian isn’t a child anymore, and he doesn’t deserve pity.

He clears his throat, takes a deep breath, and when he speaks again—he’s calm. Poised. Trying not to be—

Disappointing.

“I’m sorry, but I don’t understand what that means,” he murmurs, not lifting his head.

It’s quiet, the silence only broken by the occasional breeze.

“Let me ask you this,” the emperor sighs, dropping his hand from Xie Lian’s back— but his presence still looms behind the prince. Unintentionally smothering, but it leaves him feeling almost claustrophobic.

“Do you think that you no longer deserve them?” Xie Lian grows still.

‘Deserve’ is a complicated question. One that has, in one way or another, always haunted him.

When Xie Lian was a child, he thought he deserved quite a few things. After all, he had been raised to believe that they were his birthright.

Back then, the world was simple by nature.

If he did a good thing, he was rewarded. If he did something wrong, he was punished. But—

Back then, when his parents would send him to his rooms after throwing a fit, or when he wouldn’t be allowed to play outside if he became cross with his tutors…

That was about learning.

About things like patience, self awareness, and consequences. And when he got older, and his mistakes became more serious—so did the punishments.

But Jun Wu—he didn't say, 'Do you think you still need the shackles?' He wasn't asking if the lesson had been learned.

(And it has. It was learned the moment Xie Lian lost Wu Ming, watching as that blank, smiling mask disappeared behind a cloud of smoke.)

He asked if Xie Lian still deserved them.

"You were the one who asked for them, after all." The emperor reminds him quietly. "If you tell me that you want them removed, that's all it will take."

And if Jun Wu had opened the conversation that way, Xie Lian might have been able to ask for that. Maybe with some difficulty or anxiety, but now...

'Do you think that you no longer deserve them?'

Xie Lian might be capable of moments of shamelessness, asking for things he knows he doesn't deserve, but—

"I'm sorry," he mutters, his voice hoarse. He can't lie. Not to Jun Wu. "Let's forget that I mentioned it."

In the end...

Xie Lian knows that he'll always deserve them.

Because no matter how many times he learns his lesson, the damage has already been done. The scars are already carved deep into his soul. There's no undoing it now.

And when a man is willing to accept so much blame—there's no punishment he won't endure.

But blame is a complicated beast. A dagger that can be turned inward, or hurled out towards one's enemies with blind abandon.

To blame someone, something, yourself or someone else—it's an action that lays on the knife's edge between rage and guilt.

Xie Lian lives there.

But the same cannot be said for others.

For some, blame is a sharpened, angry thing. A tool to be used against one’s enemies.

However, more often than not—it rarely hits the intended target.

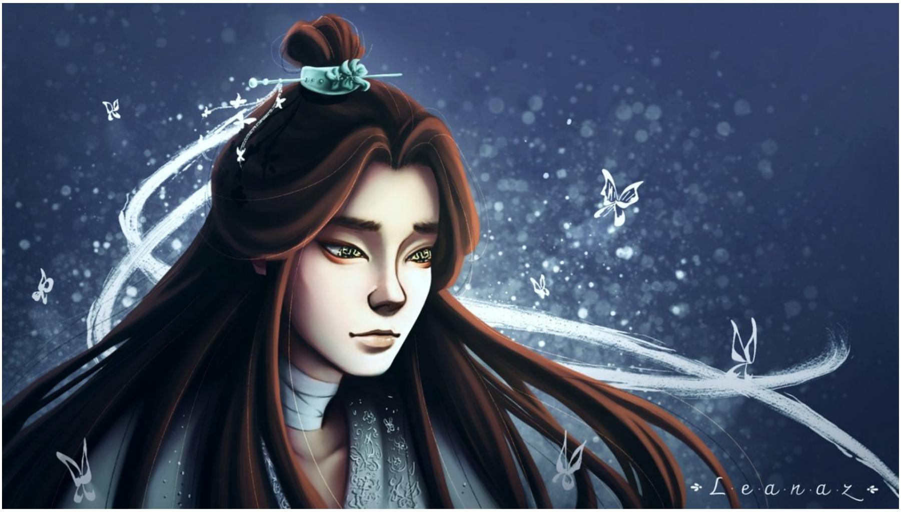
ARTWORK INSPIRED BY THIS STORY

Included with permission from artists, do not reproduce or reuse for any reason.

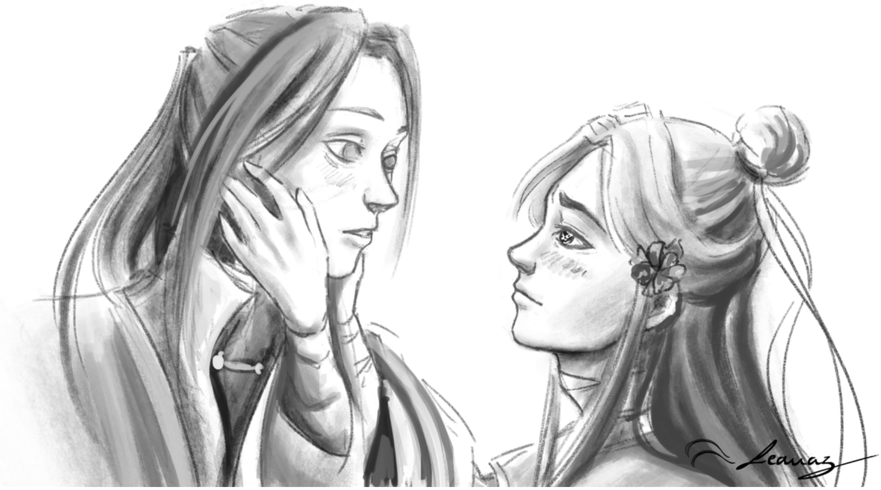
@Currant_bliss
@JunkyArtist

CREDIT: JUNKY

Xie Lian + The New Hair Accessory



CREDIT: LEA



CREDIT: LEA

Zhao Beitong, "The God Slayer"

[image]

CREDIT: KRIS

Chapter End Notes

Thank you to Lea, Junky, and Kris for their beautiful work, and allowing me to share it!

xoxo, Evie

New Friends and Old Wounds

Chapter Summary

> Xie Lian smiles warmly, bowing his head in greeting.
>
> “Hello,” he murmurs, relieved that, if he has to bump into another official right now—at least it’s someone pleasant.
>
> The younger god comes to a stop beside him, catching his breath.
>
> “I’m sorry, I had some business to attend to,” he looks up with a quick smile, chestnut curls bouncing around his shoulders. “Ready to go?”
>
> “I’m...” Xie Lian pauses, eyebrows knitting with confusion. “I’m sorry, but I’m waiting for someone.”
>
> “Oh? Who?”
>
> “The Wind Master,” he explains politely, “the emperor has placed us on an assignment together.”
>
> “But...” Shi Qingxuan blinks, confused. “I am the Wind Master!”
>
> Xie Lian stares back at the other god blindly, just as confused as he is. “I...what?”
>
> “Don’t you recognize me?”

Chapter Notes

> You can find me on twitter and keep up with current updates of the story HERE

The walls are rattling.

The floor, too, stones quivering under the ghost’s feet.

They’ve never had to use this room before.

It’s cold, damp, craggy, characters burning red against the stone walls in the dim lighting.

A powerful array, meant for one purpose:

To seal something in. Someone, in this case.

And the rattling, well—

That’s from the roaring.

A figure sags, each hand chained to the wall over his head, dark hair hanging in front of his face. His chest and shoulders heave from ragged, enraged breaths.

Another ghost sits against the opposite wall, knees pulled against their chest.

They shift slightly, the heels of their boots scraping against the floor—and golden eyes snap up in their direction, burning in the dark with an outright feral sort of rage.

“You…” He Xuan snarls, the muscles in his arms straining as he pulls at the chains around his wrists. “What the HELL did you do?!”

Ren Song’s arms tighten around his knees, his mouth pressed against them, eyes peering out silently.

The water demon has been raging at him for the better part of an hour, ever since Hua Chengzhu dragged him here by the hair, locking him in.

Generally, Crimson Rain Sought Flower and Black Water Sinking Ships are reluctant allies. Each stays within their own sphere of influence, and boundaries are rarely crossed.

Well. Until now.

“Don’t blame him,” Hua Cheng’s voice is barely more than a hiss.

“He’s the only reason Ming Yi didn’t stumble into the Heavenly Capital while you were in the middle of…”

Well, he doesn’t exactly have to say it out loud—but they both know what He Xuan was doing.

He Xuan’s stare is venomous.

“I had it all UNDER CONTROL!”

He snarls, thrashing at the chains once more, iron digging into his wrists and throat, but it never breaks—after all, they were forged by a Ghost King.

Hua Cheng barks out a laugh—cold, sharp with frustration. “You think THAT was control?!”

Blackwater bares his teeth, pupils narrowing as his struggles more violently. “I didn’t ASK the brat to help me!”

CRACK!

The slap rings through the chamber, Hua Cheng’s nails leaving two long, deep scratches in He Xuan’s cheek.

His fingers twist into the water demon’s hair, yanking until he’s forced to look up at Crimson Rain, his face a mess of cuts and bruises.

Ren Song watches as the ghost king’s bare their fangs to one another, snarling—like two predators caught in a duel to the death.

“You have lost focus,” Hua Cheng would say he’s always extended patience to He Xuan. More than he has to most. But now, he growls—one solitary eye gleaming down at him in the dark. “Along with any sense of priorities—”

“This IS my priority!”

The water demon tries to lunge forward, only to get slammed back against the wall, stones fracturing under his skull from the force of it.

“This has ALWAYS been my priority!”

“And what about ending up balls deep inside the Wind Master?” Hua Cheng questions flatly.

Hua Cheng has moments of crassness—but he chooses them with intent.

Now, he does it with the express intention of watching fury broil inside He Xuan’s gaze.

“Was that part of the plan? Or did you just trip?” Blackwater’s claws slice into his palms, blood pouring down.

“Don’t bring him into this.” The water demon hisses, and Crimson Rain’s laugh returns once again—even sharper now, filled with bitterness.

"Well, now isn't that hypocritical? Aren't you the one who dragged him into the center of it all?"

He Xuan shakes his head vehemently, hair whipping around him as he does.

It's been a long time since either of them—since anyone—has seen the Water Demon's true form. Far larger, far more imposing than the earth master's skin.

"His BROTHER did that, not me!"

Hua Cheng glares into those eyes, dark and endless, filled with a bottomless pit of rage.

Crimson Rain Sought Flower understands that kind of fury. Feels it every time he remembers pained screams. His god, begging for death.

A sneering smirk.

'Your story could have been so boring...but look at you now.'

That rage pushed him forward. Forged him through fire into something stronger. Something more hateful.

But the rage in Blackwater's eyes isn't something that fuels him. Not anymore.

It's consuming him.

Like a dying star, on the edge of collapse.

"...Have you ever considered what's left of you, after?" Hua Cheng's voice still crackles with rage, but the words on their own aren't hateful.

They ring with concern, voiced from a man who has always claimed not to care.

And in the end, if He Xuan is set on becoming that sort of creature, Hua Cheng isn't sure that he does care. Not beyond the fact that he needs the Water Demon for his own ends.

"What does that mean?!"

The ghost king snarls, repeatedly trying to shift forms, but the chains around his wrists and throat snap him back into place—and it's fruitless.

They’re in Hua Cheng’s territory, and his power within this space is absolute.

“When your enemies are dead, and there is no one else left to blame,” Crimson Rain’s fingers are still knotted tight in his hair, forcing He Xuan to meet his gaze—even if he doesn’t want to.

“What’s left of you, He Sheng?”

“...” Amber eyes glimmer back at him hatefully.

“You don’t get to call me that,” he whispers, clawed fingertips trembling with rage.

“My mother gave me that name.”

Ren Song shrinks further back against the wall, watching as the only authority figures he’s ever known rip at one another, all snarled words and sharp teeth.

“You don’t...” He Xuan’s words are shattering, aching with a pain that runs deep, warping and twisting into hate as they plummet from his lips, like rain turning to hail before it comes crashing down.

“You don’t get to ask for mercy for her murderer...and then CALL ME THAT NAME!”

The roar of it is so loud, the stone walls of the room shudder once more.

“I didn’t ask for mercy,” Hua Cheng glares, letting him go as he takes a step back. “But that boy didn’t hurt your family, Blackwater. You know that.”

The Water Demon hangs his head, shoulders trembling.

Maybe not.

“That doesn’t matter.”

After all—his bastard of a brother didn’t care about that when he destroyed so many other lives. He only cared about saving one.

A-Zhong, Qin Meirong, his parents, He Xuan himself...

They were all just an unintended consequence.

And in the end, it only makes sense.

He and Shi Qingxuan have always been two overlapping creatures, ever since the beginning.

Sharing birthdays, fates, a name.

It makes sense, now, that they would both become collateral damage.

And Hua Cheng could ask him the obvious: why not just kill the Water Master, and leave the matter at that.

Because simply dying isn't particularly painful. They've both been through that. It's having something you love taken from you that hurts far, far more.

"Oh, but it does." Hua Cheng sighs heavily, anger and exhaustion warring inside of him, the emotions tugging at him so viciously, he feels half pulled apart. "You speak like I don't know you."

But he does.

They've both seen all there is to see of one another.

Every single memory of the beginning of their lives has been shared. The pain, the loss, each injustice.

And as such, Hua Cheng knows He Xuan's greatest secret.

"Like I don't know exactly why you took the Wind Master into your bed."

It wasn't out of hatred. Or vengeance.

It was a mistake.

A very selfish, very human mistake. One that he can't take back now—

And one that he'll regret.

Because he's—

"...Shut up," He Xuan whispers, his voice trembling, unable to lift his head.

"Shut up."

His heart died long ago, and still—aches.

'You're a…good man, H-He Xuan…'

"SHUT UP!" He screams, covering his face with his hands, claws ripping into his flesh.

He isn't. He wasn't. He never was—

Green eyes flash before his eyes. Laughing, full of life, warmth, and hope. All of the things that He Xuan cannot be.

Everything that was stolen from him.

He Sheng was a weak man. And he lost everything.

He Xuan isn't a good man. He's hateful, vindictive, and vengeful.

He's become something monstrous, and he knows it.

But it's so much better than being helpless.

"Stop acting like you're BETTER!" He Xuan screams, wrists bleeding from how hard he thrashes against his bonds. "AT LEAST I ACCEPT WHAT I AM!"

After all, they're both soaked in blood.

Love might seem like a better justification for violence—

But Hua Cheng is a killer himself.

"…" Crimson Rain kneels down in front of him, staring He Xuan down, his rage fading from a burning fire, down into something dark and cold.

"I know exactly what I am," the eldest ghost king replies evenly, one eye gleaming back into his. "And that I'm far worse than you."

Hua Cheng used to be an expert in the concept of self pity.

He was born into a world that despised him. Viewed him as a warped, twisted thing. The only exception being his mother.

And the world, being the cruel, twisted, stupid thing that it is— It tore her apart.

That memory is buried deep, deep inside. So far down, even Zhao Beitong never said a word of it, when she saw. And when He Xuan witnessed it—he endeavored to forget.

Hua Cheng doesn't have such a luxury. His memory is long, and he rarely forgets a single moment.

And god, it made him hate the world.

Made him despise every beautiful thing. Every act of kindness. Because it always felt like a lie.

He wanted to destroy everything, and everyone. Then, to destroy himself. Xie Lian didn't make that hatred disappear, it's still there.

But—

'If you can't find a meaning in life, allow me to be that meaning.'

Worshipping his god, loving him—it was so much better than having nothing. Than loathing the world for what it had taken from him.

And—

'This world is his future.'

Hua Cheng knows. And if he hadn't accepted that, there would still be so many things about himself that he wouldn't know.

That he likes drinking. How satisfying it can be, learning something new. How fiercely he enjoys a good fight. That sunsets are beautiful. And…

His eyes flicker back, watching Shuo's small, uncharacteristically meek form, shrunk against the far wall—like a stray cat, watching two dogs tear one another apart in a back alley.

He wouldn't have learned that gamblers, even the unlucky ones, can be steadfast friends.

How fast children can grow, when you aren't paying attention.

And that, while nothing could ever come close to what he feels for his god—Hua Cheng isn't incapable of caring about others, or forming attachments.

He simply never learned that lesson until he lost them.

But He Xuan isn't wrong.

Hua Cheng is a human. A man who loves fiercely, and lives selfishly.

But Hua Cheng is also Crimson Rain Sought Flower. The bane of the Heavens. A ghost king.

And he is a monster, he knows that well.

He's slaughtered countless, over the centuries.

In some cases, for something so minor as merely insulting the love of his life. He doesn't regret that.

When he looks up at He Xuan now, though—he sees a man torn between those two sides.

The man and the monster, unable to resolve one to the other.

"I know exactly what I am," Hua Cheng repeats his words, watching redness gather at the corners of He Xuan's eyes.

Calamities, in their true forms—they don't shed human tears. Their sins are far too great for that.

Their tears are the blood that they have spilled.

They run in two crimson lines down He Xuan's cheeks, dripping down his cheeks.

"But unlike you," Hua Cheng rises to his feet, "I know what my priorities are."

And there's the very real fear that—by the time Blackwater begins to see his desires clearly—

It will be too late.

He turns away, looking to Shuo, "Stay long enough to make sure he doesn't rip his own throat out. If something else comes up—contact me."

The savage ghost nods, not saying a word as he watches Blackwater struggle. "I don't warrant any more of your time?!" The water demon sneers

Hua Cheng pulls a set of dice out of his pocket, rattling them against his palm.

Clack!

Clack!

“I have to go and make sure Shuo isn’t hunted down like a dog for cleaning up your mess,” Crimson Rain replies coldly. “So no, you don’t.”

The door opens—and then, he’s gone.

Ren Song watches him go, eyes carefully blank before they return to Blackwater once more.

“...” He Xuan sinks down, arms bound above his head, glaring at the other ghost vengefully. “I didn’t ask for your help.”

Their positions almost mirror one another now. “I know.”

Ren Song’s cheek presses against his knee, lingering baby fat smushing slightly, making him look young.

So, so young.

“Then why did you?”

His arms tighten around his knees.

“I tried to get you to deal with it, but you didn’t answer.” He mutters.

“...and how did you know Ming Yi escaped?”

“You think gege feeds your weird little pets himself?” Ren Song questions dryly. “I do. And when I got there, he was already halfway back to the Heavens.”

He Xuan grimaces.

“Why do you call him that?”

“...Call who what?”

“He’s not your brother.”

He Xuan mutters the words carelessly, uncaring—only realizing what a painful reminder they are when he sees Ren Song's eyes go wide.

Still, he doesn't take them back.

"You think he gives a shit about you? About me?" The water demon rolls his eyes.

"He saved my life because I made myself useful." He Xuan watches him, looking for some sort of reaction. "I'm sure he keeps you around for the same reason. The only one he cares about is—"

"Xie Lian." Ren Song cuts him off, his voice calm. Blackwater's eyes widen, surprised. "I know."

Even if he looks young now, there's a gravity to him. Something that only comes with hard learned lessons.

"I know my place, and I don't care."

It baffles He Xuan, because Shuo...he's disobedient, mischievous, and stubborn.

But not with Hua Cheng. Never him.

He Xuan is quite sure that, If it ever became necessary—Shuo would die for Crimson Rain without hesitation.

He already took that risk today, for He Xuan.

And he doesn't understand. It—

Why stick his neck out for them? It doesn't make sense. It's pathetic.

"Do you really?"

Blackwater glares, his throat feeling tight whenever he looks at the boy. Loathing that loyalty. Hating the way it hurts.

Remembering what happens to younger siblings who idolize their brothers. Where it leaves them in the end.

He's just relieved that Ren Song isn't wearing their female form anymore. When she does, she looks too much like A-Zhong, and it makes him feel sick.

"Because sometimes, it's like you think we're a happy little family," The calamity sneers. "Don't be naive, kid."

Ren Song finally lifts his head, staring He Xuan down with that uneven, multicolored gaze of his.

“I’m four centuries older than you,” The ghost reminds him flatly. “At the moment, you’re the one who seems like a child to me.”

It’s easy to forget, most of the time.

After all—Shuo never got the chance to grow up. That was stolen from him. Along with so many other things.

Technically, he’s not much younger than Hua Cheng.

Technically, he’s ancient.

But in many ways, he can’t grow as much as he wants to.

He’s been in love before, but never been loved back. Never known what it was like to grow old.

He’ll never have a wife, or a husband. Never have a family of his own.

He tries, and he tries, and he tries, but it’s everyone else who moves on.

It’s never him. He’s still here.

“…You don’t know how I died, do you?” Shuo questions softly, watching He Xuan with a tired expression. “It’s not like you ever bothered to ask.”

And maybe he doesn’t particularly care to know now, but… It’s not like he’s going anywhere, anyway.

“I was born at the end of the war,” Shuo explains, “everyone always talked about what it was like before. My dad fought in it, and he—”

The ghost smiles, bitter—but the reason is subversive.

“He used to talk about what an honor it was, to fight for the crown prince of Xianle.”

Shuo can’t remember a time when the prince wasn’t tainted, but oh—his parents used to look back with such an ache. Remembering what their lives were like before.

“I was the youngest of six. Five big brothers,” the ghost mutters, tracing imaginary patterns in the air.

“Two of them died in the war, I don’t remember them. But Bao—he was only a couple of years older, and we were always together.”

And most boys that age—that get annoyed, always having to look after a younger sibling.

But never Bao. He took being a big brother so seriously.

Always made Shuo hold his hand, when they went to the market. A boy wouldn’t stop pulling at his hair once, and he broke his nose.

“But most people didn’t die in the war, they never do.”

He Xuan’s expression turns grim.

“...It was human face disease, wasn’t it?”

Ren Song’s fingers pause in the air, long, manicured nails gleaming in the candle light, painted black.

“...It killed my mother,” he agrees. “And all of my brothers. It killed Bao, too.” But there’s one person left off of that list.

And He Xuan—he’s reluctantly curious.

“...But not you?”

Ren Song curls his fingers in, nails biting against his palm.

“I was the only child in my village who didn’t catch it,” he murmurs, his eyes far away. “I have no idea why.”

None of the adult men caught it—but nearly all of the women and children did. “But my father—he was furious.”

Ren Song remembers, day in and day out. Watching as the man who raised him, who claimed to love him unconditionally, began to watch him with resentment.

“He lost his wife. Five sons. All he had left was me.”

And Shuo was the least valuable.

“That’s better than nothing.” He Xuan mutters, irritated with that reasoning—

"Not when you're a girl."

The water demon stiffens with surprise, and Shuo smiles tiredly.

It's not exactly something he advertises. Hua Cheng is the only one left who knows.

"I wasn't born like this."

He spent his entire human life desperate to be someone else. Wishing his body was different. And back then, he thought it was because his father never wanted a daughter.

But then he died, and his spirit came back...

In a way that felt right.

Bao recognized him—and given the fact that they were dead, trapped in a battlefield of ghosts, and being hunted by a demented psychopath that hung spirits from trees, well—

Shuo's gender was the least confusing part, and he accepted it. He Xuan is surprised, but not baffled.

That happens sometimes, with ghosts. The shell of a soul doesn't always match it's character—but in death, such barriers drop away.

He's had ample reason to suspect that Shi Qingxuan is the same way, even if he's never said so explicitly.

"...The day Bao died," Shuo continues, his tone even, "It was just me and my father. It was so quiet, and the house felt so lonely."

So empty.

"But he told me I should sleep," he murmurs. "And that everything would be better in the morning. I believed him."

Because he was his father, and he was all Shuo had left.

"...But I never woke up."

He Xuan stays quiet now, taking that in.

Ren Song reaches for the collar of his robes, unclasping them, pulling them aside to reveal his chest.

There's just one scar there, over his heart.

He can erase every imperfection on his body if he wants to—but he can't hide the blow that killed him.

He Xuan's eyes linger there, the emotions…complex.

The ghost pulls his collar back up, snapping the clasps back into place.

"All because you were a girl?"

Ren Song shrugs, "I was a mouth to feed. And he wanted to start over."

He never told Bao. His older brother saw the scar one day, figuring it out for himself.

"…And he did," he concludes, his tone bitter. "We went back to find him later. He was already dead by then, but…"

His lips quirk up into a tired, heart sick little smile.

"He married again. Had three more sons. Died of old age. And when he died…"

Finally, there's a small tremble in his voice.

"He got to Rest In Peace."

There was no ghost. No lingering spirit to take vengeance on.

And that hurt the most. Because Shuo—he knew his father didn't love him that much. Knew that he was the last one his father would have chosen to survive, but—

He at least thought the man would have felt guilty enough to linger on.

But he didn't care enough to feel remorse

Of course, Shuo was a stronger spirit than Yanlin and Bao.

Because he started his life feeling so hurt, so angry, and so worthless.

"So, if you're trying to tell me someone I care about doesn't give a shit about me," Shuo smiles, his voice wobbly. "I'm pretty used to it."

And it’s not that he thinks Hua Cheng doesn’t care at all, Shuo knows that there’s some degree of attachment there. He couldn’t get away with so much otherwise, but…

He Xuan wasn’t wrong either.

Shuo is useful.

Useful enough to keep around, sure.

But the moment Bao’s spirit dispersed, Shuo knew he was alone. That he would never be someone’s priority again, and whatever existence he had left…

He would always be the second choice. A pawn, maybe.

And that’s fine. He’s made his peace with it, even if it aches.

He found other things to live for.

“…and he was right, you know.”

He Xuan stares at Ren Song, feeling that twisting, jarring pain rattling through his chest.

Now, it’s so hard not to look at him and see A-Zhong. And he doesn’t want to think about her.

Doesn’t want to contemplate what she would think, if she saw what he was doing now.

“Right about what?”

“Asking what will be left of you, when it’s finished.” Ren Song mutters, rising to his feet. “Didn’t you ever wonder why I haven’t dispersed Qi Rong?”

He has wondered.

After all, it’s not a question of ability. Ren Song is far more powerful than he seems, and Qi Rong’s bark is far worse than his bite.

“I always assumed you thought torture was worse than death.”

“Maybe.” The savage ghost agrees. “But it’s also because I don’t have anything else,” he admits quietly.

And if he did disperse Qi Rong, there's a very good chance that Shuo wouldn't have enough resentment, enough purpose left to carry on. That he might disappear.

"...and he already killed my brother," Shuo concludes, looking He Xuan over with a mixture of emotions. "He doesn't get to kill me, too."

Before, he thought keeping Hua Cheng company might be reason enough, but... He's found his god now, he doesn't need that anymore.

No one needs him. He's nobody's first choice. And—

Qi Rong might be a shitty thing to keep him going, but he hasn't found something better. Not yet.

He lifts the dice out of his pocket, and before he rolls them, He Xuan repeats his question from the beginning:

"Why did you try to help me?"

Ren Song stops, dice clutched in his hand, glancing back over his shoulder.

"...Because if you got caught, the emperor might have dispersed you then and there," he mutters, like it's obvious.

"So?" Blackwater mutters, hanging his head. "Why does that matter to you?"

Ren Song stares, knuckles white, briefly biting his lip—and then he sighs.

"...Because I would miss you," he admits, watching as the water demon's eyes widen with shock.

"Family or not, naive or not—if you were gone, I'd be sad."

He Xuan doesn't respond—doesn't know what to say—and Shuo doesn't give him the chance, rattling his dice.

Clack!

Clack!

He steps through the door, leaving behind the darkness of He Xuan's cell for the red, over-saturated light of Paradise Manor.

It’s quiet.

“…” He kneels down in the hallway, alone, his head clutched between his hands. ‘Why do you call him that?’

He knows.

‘You think he cares?’

He knows, he knows, he knows.

But it’s lonely, and it hurts, filling him up with an ache that he’d rather leave as a void.

He’d rather feel nothing, than feel so worthless.

When Yin Yu rounds the corner, he sees a small figure kneeling alone on the floor, arms wrapped around their head, shoulders trembling.

And he sighs, because he thought his babysitting days were done, but…

Big eyes stare up at him, one green like the leaves in the trees, the other burning like a forest fire, lips wobbling.

Shuo holds his arms up, expectant—and the Ghost Officer sighs, lifting him up in his arms.

“Tired?”

He leans his head against Yin Yu’s shoulder, and he nods.

There are moments when Shuo wants to grow up so badly—but others when he just… Wants to feel safe again.

Yin Yu looks after him with a grim sense of obligation, so it isn’t ideal, but—

He reads the stories, and he does the voices.

Sometimes, that’s enough.

When Xie Lian first returned to the heavens—he thought the crowds made him feel out of place. That the bright, overbearing light all around was what made him feel so uncomfortable.

But all of that pales in comparison to standing in front of his own palace. It hardly suits him.

Xie Lian doesn't need to see the red glass walls to know that it's exactly as it was before—and while that was very well and good for a prince, it…

Feels far more like someone else's residence than his own. He'd feel like a joke, sitting alone in a large, elegant palace.

Instead of going in to wait, as Jun Wu suggested—he finds himself loitering outside, twiddling his thumbs, wishing he could have just waited in the grand martial palace. Or better yet, he could have descended down to his shrine and awaited the Wind Master there.

Really, that would have been better than—

"Your highness!" A voice calls out pleasantly—and Xie Lian can hear the sounds of boots clicking sharply against the pavement as someone hurries over.

The prince recognizes him immediately as the young god who spoke in his defense. Shi Qingxuan, wasn't it?

Xie Lian smiles warmly, bowing his head in greeting.

"Hello," he murmurs, relieved that, if he has to bump into another official right now—at least it's someone pleasant.

The younger god comes to a stop beside him, catching his breath.

"I'm sorry, I had some business to attend to," he looks up with a quick smile, chestnut curls bouncing around his shoulders. "Ready to go?"

"I'm…" Xie Lian pauses, eyebrows knitting with confusion. "I'm sorry, but I'm waiting for someone."

"Oh? Who?"

"The Wind Master," he explains politely, "the emperor has placed us on an assignment together."

"But…" Shi Qingxuan blinks, confused. "I am the Wind Master!"

Xie Lian stares back at the other god blindly, just as confused as he is. "I…what?"

"Don't you recognize me?"

"Um…" Xie Lian tilts his head, trying to decide whether or not he's being teased, and Shi Qingxuan's eyes widen apologetically.

"Oh, I'm so sorry, I guess my voice is too different, I didn't realize!" But now that Xie Lian is paying attention…the is rather familiar.

The aura around him is a bright, inviting shade of green, fluttering at the edges, like leaves in the wind…

"Oh," the prince concludes, trying not to be rude. "But before…was there a reason for —?"

"Me appearing as a woman?" The Wind Master finishes for him.

Xie Lian manages an awkward nod, and Shi Qingxuan responds with an easygoing smile.

"Did I sound cute?"

"…" Xie Lian scratches his ear, slightly off kilter due to the topic. "I suppose you did."

"Well, I looked cute too, take my word for it!" He beams.

"Do I need another reason?"

Xie Lian never thought of it that way before. But there doesn't seem to be any harm in it—and is it really so different from Hua Cheng changing skins?

"No, I suppose you don't," he agrees.

It's the easiest acceptance Shi Qingxuan has ever received.

His eyes brighten and his smile widens as he reaches for Xie Lian's arm, grasping his hand firmly. "Let's get going then!"

He drags Xie Lian towards the gates of the heavenly capital, the older god stumbling in tow.

"I—ah, hold on—!"

Xie Lian protests weakly, a little sheepish to admit it, but—

“I don’t have the best luck with descending, you might want to stand clear—!” Shi Qingxuan laughs brightly, still holding onto his hand.

“Don’t worry your highness, I’ve got it!“

“I don’t think..!”

“Just get a running head start,” The wind master assures him, “I promise it’s fun! Even Ming Yi and gege like descending with me, and they’re both the biggest sticks in the mud EVER!”

Well…

What’s the worst that can happen, besides knocking into a few more clouds?

“…Okay,” he mutters, allowing himself to be dragged all the way to the gates, and once there—he sucks in a deep breath, taking a running jump off of the edge.

Shi Qingxuan beams, hands on his hips. It’s so satisfying, getting people to take that leap of faith—

Oh. Oh right!

He has to jump after him!

The wind master charges, fan in hand, cackling with delight as he leaps off of the edge with a dramatic little twirl, swooping his arms around him.

For a moment, as Xie Lian plummets, it feels like a pretty terrible idea.

He’s in a rapid free fall, even less controlled than his last two attempts, preparing for the inevitable moment when a cloud smacks into him, but…

That moment never comes.

Instead, just when he’s starting to panic—the wind catches him, swooping him up in a current of air.

At first, it’s disorienting—sort of like when he was swooped up in the desert before, worried about where San Lang was, if he was alright, but now—

Now, when he allows his body to stop struggling, it—

Xie Lian can't describe it in any way other than saying it feels like flying.

It takes him a moment to feel comfortable with it, the way the wind occasionally swoops him higher before letting him glide down, his stomach flipping pleasantly with the pull of gravity, but once he does...

It actually is...

A cautious smile spreads across Xie Lian's face.

It's fun.

His hair whips around him as he drops again, and this time—he lets out a surprised laugh, arms spread out around him, gasping as he coasts again.

It's—

"See what I mean?" Shi Qingxuan calls over, a few meters above—much more poised, but that's to be expected.

"Y...Yes!" Xie Lian agrees breathlessly, "It's—It's really niIIIICE!"

The wind swoops him up out of nowhere, flipping him playfully before letting him drop again, and this time—Xie Lian actually squeals with surprise and delight, almost like—

Almost like being a child again.

When he was small, his father used to toss him up into the air, watching the little prince squeal and laugh as he came back down, catching him every time. Just...just like this.

Shi Qingxuan is laughing with him now, enjoying the sight of the ever calm, always thoughtful Crown Prince of Xianle devolving into happy, breathless laughter.

He looks so young when he does, and it's easy to imagine the happy, carefree prince that he once was.

Shi Qingxuan has heard the occasional story. Granted, most of them were rather critical, or often mocking—

But sometimes, they would describe someone of such incredible talent and beauty, beloved by the entire world.

Now, with Xie Lian smiling and laughing, not a single line of worry or concern left in his face—it's easy to imagine that.

When they finally do land, it's gentle—with the Wind Master resting on the balls of his feet, and Xie Lian coming down lightly on his knees in the grass.

"See?" Shi Qingxuan beams, shaking his hair out, earrings tinkling as he looks around, rather satisfied. "There's nothing to be worried abou—!"

He turns to look at Xie Lian, then stops, clapping his hands over his mouth to hold back a laugh.

"...Is something wrong?"

"No!" Shi Qingxuan squeaks between his fingers, using one hand to gesture frantically. "No, no no! Absolutely not, I just...your hair...!"

He hunches over, his ribs aching from the urge to keep quiet, and Xie Lian reaches up to check, eyes wide.

"...Oh my..."

"It's okay!" The Wind Master assures him, snapping his fan open once more, "I've got it! Just stay still, your highness!"

Of course—Xie Lian does, squeezing his eyes shut as another gale of wind sweeps past his face, whipping around him for a moment before going still.

"...There!"

Shi Qingxuan places his hands on his hips, looking over his work.

Well—it's still a little windswept, but definitely not the tangled mess it was before, and that's an improvement!

Besides, it's not like the Prince of Xianle ever looks bad, so it's fine!

The prince rises to his feet slowly, brushing his robes off, checking for the hairpiece on his head, and the chain around his neck.

After confirming everything is in place, he turns to the Wind Master once more, “Do you know the way to Ghost City from here?”

“Sure do!” Shi Qingxuan grins, spinning his scroll between his fingertips, similar to the one Xie Lian was given by Jun Wu before leaving the palace. “Shall we?”

He offers the Prince of Xianle his arm, and, after a moment, Xie Lian takes it. And this feels…almost familiar.

It feels like being seventeen years old again, with his friends on each arm, pointedly talking and laughing over them in order to end another petty argument.

That’s what this is.

It feels like friendship.

And it’s been a long, long time since Xie Lian had a friend.

Which also forces him to confront the fact that, while he called San Lang a friend, and he treated him as such—Xie Lian didn’t actually see him that way.

But what else could he be? What other word is there for the connection they had? More than strangers. Fond of one another.

It was just…Friendship. It must have been a different form of friendship. Xie Lian can’t think of another word to describe it.

“Your highness? Are you alright?”

Xie Lian grasps at the chain around his neck for a moment, biting his lip. “…I’m fine,” he mutters. “Lead the way.”

Friendship is important. But more so than having enough friends—it’s about choosing the right friends.

Pei Ming knows that better than anyone—he’s chosen wrong plenty of times before. But now, in what is objectively not his best moment—they’re the ones beside him.

Metaphorically speaking. Ling Wen is standing over Mu Qing’s shoulder, watching as the martial god reapplies the bandages on the General’s torso.

“Will the sutures hold?”

“As long as he doesn’t stab himself again,” Mu Qing replies flatly, seeming irritated by the hovering.

“To be fair,” Pei holds up one finger, correcting him, “I stabbed myself in the chest, not the stomach—”

“Don’t justify it.” Shi Wudu cuts him off flatly. He’s standing in front of the window, his arms crossed—expression hidden from view “It doesn’t make you sound less idiotic.”

Pei Ming snaps his mouth shut, huffing out a pouty little sigh, and Mu Qing straightens, bag in hand. “By mortal standards—it should be healed before the Mid- Autumn festival.”

Ling Wen arches an eyebrow. “Should?”

“He’s a god suffering from a wound delivered by an ancient cursed tool,” Mu Qing replies dryly. “It’s not an exact science.”

“He’s sturdy, Ling Wen.” Shi Wudu shrugs, staring down to the streets of Heaven below. “He’ll be fine. Leave Xuan Zhen to his business.”

The Civil Goddess crosses her arms with a shrug, watching as Mu Qing leaves the room—and thus, the three friends are left alone.

Pei isn’t blind to the tension in the air, and he lets out a heavy sigh. “Look, it’s not like I had a way of knowing beforehand.”

“Was there anything about this ghost in the brief?” Shi Wudu questions, his arms tightening around himself. “Do we know anything about him?”

“...No,” Ling Wen admits. “There’s barely more than a brief historical record of him.”

“How is that possible for a ghost that ancient?”

“I don’t know,” she isn’t accustomed to saying those words—and clearly doesn’t enjoy it. “Jun Wu would be more likely to know that than me, and he didn’t indicate any knowledge.”

“That doesn't mean that he doesn’t know,” Shi Wudu mutters, his expression turning dark.

Pei Ming's eyebrows raise at that as he sits up, bracing his arm against his stitches as he does. "Is there anything you'd like to add to that statement?"

The Water Master is still facing away from him, arms crossed.

"It wasn't a statement," he mutters. "Just an obvious fact."

"...It's possible he didn't want to divulge sensitive information to the entire heavenly court," Lin Wen agrees, her tone somewhat conciliatory. "But that's not the primary issue at hand."

"I don't see how it isn't," Pei sighs heavily.

"Whatever that ghost's intentions were—it essentially sent a tool for assassination to the largest pool of possible victims. It was a malicious move."

"Yes," Ling Wen agrees. "I plan on discussing that with the emperor in our next meeting. But you were almost killed, Pei."

"I think that's a little dramatic," the general starts—and Shi Wudu finally turns his gaze, his eyes sharp.

"You're lucky it didn't hit you any higher, or else mortal medicine would have been useless," the water master mutters flatly. "Don't call her dramatic."

The tension between the two is clear, and Ling Wen—she sighs, sliding her hands over the sides of her head to smooth her hair.

"You're both missing the point—Pei Ming, your survival impacts more than just you. Do you understand that?"

The Martial God blinks, raising an eyebrow.

"Ling Wen, if this is your way of saying you've FINALLY developed an emotional attachment to me—"

"Hardly." The civil goddess cuts him off coldly. "It's well known that, aside from his highness the emperor, power and influence in the heavenly court is divided between you two."

Pei Ming, the strongest of the martial gods—and Shi Wudu, the strongest of all of the elemental masters. And even if he isn't classified as a martial god—

Very few would be willing to take the Water Master in hand to hand, nonetheless.

“Your point being?” Wudu mutters.

“If either one of you is displaced, the balance in the Heavenly Court could shift dramatically,” she holds a hand up to stop Pei before he can start, “and before you go on about not wanting Jun Wu’s position—I know that. Everyone knows that.”

Except perhaps the emperor himself.

“But if something unforeseen ever happened to the emperor, everyone would look to you. That’s no small thing, Pei.” Ling Wen warns him, her gaze stern. “You should take it more seriously.”

There was a time when the general did, but—

He’s so tired now. He hides it well, but…

Those closest to him can see it clearly.

Pei Ming never would have been injured to begin with if he had been operating at full capacity.

“And I don’t know what you were thinking, contradicting the emperor in public.” Ling Wen turns her gaze to the Water Master. “I didn’t realize you were such a fan of Crimson Rain Sought Flower.”

“Oh,” Shi Wudu rolls his eyes, “Give me a break. I’ve never even met the creature.”

“Then why risk Jun Wu’s ire by defending him?”

“His ire?” Cerulean eyes drift towards her, turning snide. “Is his ego that fucking fragile?”

The Civil Goddess stares back at him, silent—and they both know his question might as well be rhetorical.

Pei watches the two, and finally—he breaks the tension. “It seems like there’s something else you want to ask, Ling Wen.”

“…Are you two hiding anything that I should know about?” She questions, mirroring Shi Wudu’s posture, her arms wrapped tightly around her middle. “Because I can’t plan for things without proper information.”

Pei thinks it over, and Shi Wudu turns his gaze back to the window.

“It would be impossible for me to spare every detail of my life—public or private,” the general murmurs. “But I can’t think of anything relevant that I’ve been hiding.”

Ling Wen’s gaze drifts to the Water Master, who has his back turned to both of them.

“And what about you?”

Shi Wudu glances back at her, startled. “What?”

Ling Wen watches him closely. “Is there anything you’ve been keeping to yourself that either one of us should know?”

“...” The younger god looks away, shaking his head.

He can’t say it.

If he did, they might try to do something.

And if they did, it would present the very risk that Ling Wen is trying to mitigate now.

Still—the Civil Goddess has her own suspicions behind the Emperor’s targeting of Pei, so she asks another question—this one far more blunt.

“And are the two of you still involved?”

Of course, she’s aware of the ongoing affair between the two. Has been since the Mid- Autumn festival forty years before.

But Pei doesn’t keep lovers for long, and she used the word ‘involved,’ which implies intimacy.

And, just as Shi Wudu opens his mouth to deny it—

“We are.”

Shi Wudu’s gaze snaps over to him, sharp, the tips of his ears turning slightly pink, and Pei Shrugs, holding his hands up in a neutral gesture.

“What? As of six days ago, anyway—we were quite involved.”

He didn't have to use the word 'quite' for Ling Wen to get the point.

And it leaves the Water Master entirely unsure of how to respond, his throat tight.

"...As involved as someone like Pei is capable of being, anyway." He replies flatly, turning away from them both once more. "Does that answer your question?"

Ling Wen watches, silent. "...I suppose," She agrees softly. "Pei, you should return to your palace and rest—"

"He can stay here," Shi Wudu mutters, arms still crossed, his shoulders stiff. "God knows what he'll do, left to his own devices."

It's a fair point, even if it barely veils his intentions.

Ling Wen sighs, shaking her head as she walks out the door. "We'll discuss this more later."

Obviously. Both men know that she isn't easily put off of a burning question, particularly one as serious as this.

When the door shuts behind her, Pei opens his mouth to whine. "Your brother is going to throw a fit—"

"Shi Qingxuan isn't here," The Water Master cuts him off crisply, his tone cool. "The emperor sent him on an assignment with the Crown Prince of Xianle."

"Oh," the older man arches an eyebrow. "They'll make an interesting pair."

Shi Wudu doesn't reply, still facing away from him, and Pei Ming sighs, fatigue sinking deep into him, wishing, rather childishly, that the younger god wasn't standing so far away.

"What—?"

"Take off your clothes."

The General snaps his mouth shut—surprised, but not upset.

"...What was that?"

"I said," Shi Wudu turns around, not sparing Pei Ming a look as he strides from the room, fan still clutched between his fingers, "take off your clothes.”

Of all of the Palaces in the Heavenly Capital—that of the Water and Wind Masters is by far the finest.

To be expected, given that the former is the deity of mortal wealth—but his tastes are also more subtle than that of the heavenly emperor.

Instead of being outright ostentatious, every inch of the place rings with subtle quality, from the floorboards to the furnishings.

Pei is rarely ever here, and when he is—he’s fighting off verbal barbs from Shi Qingxuan with a club, so he rarely gets the chance to enjoy the luxury.

Tonight, however, he’s allowed to indulge in one of the finest amenities the palace has to offer—

The baths, of course.

Hot Springs located behind the palace in a set of private courtyards, steaming with warmth, framed by smooth stones and red leaved maples.

It’s peaceful—beautiful.

Pei Ming watches the smooth, toned skin of Shi Wudu’s back from where he stands on the other side of the pool.

Heartbreakingly beautiful. That’s what this place is.

“You’re angry.” He sighs, bracing his arms against the rocks as he leans back against an underwater ledge.

Shi Wudu doesn’t spare him a glance, rinsing soap from his hair.

“Why would I be angry?”

“There are two options.”

“Oh?” Shi Wudu turns his chin just a hair, giving Pei a glimpse of the curve of his jaw, eyelashes brushing against his cheek. “Do tell.”

“...” The general swallows dryly, the pit of his stomach heating with want. “First, I was ‘idiotic.’”

“You were,” The Water God agrees. “And why else would I be angry?”

“...Because of what I said to Ling Wen,” Pei theorizes quietly, “though I don’t understand why that would make you angry. She already knew about us.”

But that implies that either one of them knows what ‘us’ means—which they do not.

And Shi Wudu is far more reluctant to question that now, when he’s been recently reminded of the fate of Xuan Ji.

What Pei does to those who get attached. Never cruel, never unfair. Nonetheless, it’s frightening—and so confusing.

Because everyone who wants to justify Pei’s liaisons—the hearts that he’s broken— they all say the same thing:

That he was always incredibly clear, right from the beginning, about what he wanted. But he’s never made such specifications to the Water Master at all.

And Shi Wudu couldn’t say if that was out of some genuine measure of affection—or simply because he’s a long term associate of Pei’s, and should already know what he’s like.

“Well,” the god murmurs, “those are both rather good theories.”

It’s a precarious position to be in.

“Are you going to tell me if one of them was right?” Pei questions, watching with a keen eye.

His lover doesn’t respond immediately, squeezing the last of the water out of his hair. “I think I’ll leave you in suspense.”

He’s not that angry, then—not if he’s being playful.

Still—he finally turns around now, the water moving easily around his waist as he makes his way to the other side of the pond, where Pei Ming is sitting.

“Did you mean it before?”

Pei has to force himself to look away from the beads of water slipping down Shi Wudu’s throat, arms, and chest. “Mean what?”

The Water God stops in front of him, watching Pei Ming’s expression, his own gaze unreadable. “When you said that you weren’t hiding anything."

Pei stares back at him curiously, arching an eyebrow. "Yes. I'd have to be stupid, to hide something from you."

Shi Wudu rolls his eyes, not in the mood to be sweet talked. "And why is that?"

Pei Ming reaches out, grasping his chin gently.

"Because you'd gut me like a fish."

The Water Master stares back at him, not seeming particularly satisfied with that explanation, but...

Pei looks honest, at the very least.

Which is more than Shi Wudu can be when the same question is sent back at him: "And what about you? Are you hiding anything?"

The younger god casts his gaze to the side, and he doesn't answer, not outright.

He's hiding many things.

What he's done. What's been done to him. What he feels, when Pei says the word 'us.'

He's not sure which secrets are worth telling, or if he'd rather be consumed by them.

Instead of answering verbally, he reaches out—fingertips brushing against the stitches in his side. They haven't gotten wet, despite the general being in the pool— Shi Wudu hasn't allowed it.

His expression is calm, eyes distant and guarded. But his fingertips tremble.

"..." Pei catches the water god by the wrist, not to push his hand away—but simply to hold it there.

"Were you worried?"

The corners of Shi Wudu's mouth tug downward, tired.

What an idiotic question.

Of course, he was worried.

No—he was terrified, when he heard.

“Hey…”

Pei tilts his chin forward, until their foreheads are pressed together.

Shi Wudu is proud. Fiercely so. Won’t admit fear or weakness easily. Not unless he feels…

“Talk to me.”

Not unless he feels like the person listening won’t judge him.

The water god bites his lip.

He runs through the secrets he has, from smallest to biggest. Tries to prioritize which ones are forgivable, and which ones would leave him abandoned.

He settles for the least offensive of them all—and the one that’s making his fingers tremble now, sitting on his chest.

“…It feels like it was my fault,” he mutters, wishing he could hide his expression—but in this position, it isn’t possible.

“Your fault?” Pei Ming questions softly, bringing one hand up to cup the back of Shi Wudu’s hair. “How could it be your fault?”

Still, the younger man doesn’t answer. Can’t seem to bring himself to, averting his eyes to the side.

“…If you’re worried about distracting me or something like that, don’t be.”

Pei’s smile turns sly, and Shi Wudu is already groaning in anticipation of whatever line he has in mind—

“You’ve been on my mind for centuries now, I’m used to it.”

A surprised little laugh slips out of the Water Master’s throat. “Is that so?”

“What’s so funny?” The martial god smiles, leaning forward to press his face into the side of Shi Wudu’s neck, earning a small, pleasured sigh when his lips find the younger man’s pulse. “I’m being serious.”

“Oh,” He rolls his eyes, shivering as he tilts his head to the side. “I believe you.”

Such words have never been uttered with so much sarcasm.

“I’m always being honest around you, you know,” Pei whispers against his skin, fingers bunching in the Water Master’s hair.

It curls when it’s wet, not so different from that of his little brother’s.

“Right…”

“So,” Pei continues, one arm wrapping around the small of Shi Wudu’s back, guiding the god forward until he’s straddling Pei Ming where he sits on the underwater ledge, “when I say that I missed you, you know that I mean it.”

The Water God’s heart skips a beat.

‘Missed you.’

Does he—?

Pei Ming has many talents—but first among them has always been making the person in his arms feel like the most important thing in the world, at that point in time.

“So?” He prompts gently, looking up into Shi Wudu’s eyes. “Did you miss me too?”

Yes.

Yes, yes, yes.

Being around Pei Ming aches, in a way that is both addictive and unbearable, and Shi Wudu feels moronic for becoming dependent on it.

But yes—yes, he did miss him.

He always misses him, hiding behind snark, sarcasm, and pride. But he doesn’t say that.

Pei makes a soft sound of surprise when hands press against his cheeks, pulling him in. There’s stubble there. His body has a tendency to start growing a beard, when he forgets to magic the new growth away.

But the Water Master appreciates the roughness against his palms. And he doesn't answer. Doesn't say the words out loud.

But Pei has never been kissed like this before. It's hungry—they always are—but with such a delicate yearning.

The kind of kiss that makes him shudder, fingertips digging bruises into Shi Wudu's back as he holds him closer.

He has him like that. There, squirming in his lap, arms wrapped around the Water Master's back as he arches, panting, crying out his name.

And the words 'Pei Ming' sound sweeter on the Shi Wudu's lips than any mortal prayer the general has ever received.

Even when it's done—and with General Pei, that always takes quite some time—they don't pull apart, remaining connected in nearly every way as their breaths and heartbeats begin to slow.

The martial god combs his fingers through wet, tangled curls, and the water master drifts his hands over Pei's shoulders, fingertips glowing with magic as he soothes the aches in his muscles.

A surprisingly tender gesture, from a man who won't say that he missed him.

"...I'm sorry about Pei Junior," he eventually comments, pressing in at the joint of his shoulder blade until Pei lets out a relieved sigh, his gaze suddenly far away. "Did he really never tell you?"

"No," the general responds, slightly irritable. "And I've got no idea why."

"...Maybe he didn't want to disappoint you," Shi Wudu shrugs, sliding one palm up the side of Pei Ming's bicep. "You're an idol to the boy, after all."

And he threw it all away for some dead girl that Pei has never met. "Disappoint me?" The martial god questions in disbelief.

"That would be ridiculous."

Sapphire eyes don't meet his gaze, focusing instead on the planes of Pei Ming's chest, thinking of the scars that must have once painted a very different picture, in his mortal life. "Is it?"

“My hands are covered in more sins than anyone’s.”

Most martial gods are dubbed ‘General,’ after all—but Pei Ming is one of the few who ever truly lived that title in his mortal life.

And wars aren’t glorious things. They’re bloody, desperate, and cruel.

“Maybe it was that famous honor of yours that intimidated him.”

After all, it’s a difficult thing to live up to.

Pei, the general who broke his sword. The man with all of the power in the world—but who refused to take it.

For all of his flaws, there’s a goodness in him. One that’s difficult to stand beside without feeling a shadow.

“...Honor is a matter of perspective, beautiful.” Pei Ming sighs, reaching up to trail a finger down the side of Shi Wudu’s throat.

It’s always been one of his most attractive features. The most satisfying place to leave a mark.

“And perspective changes.” That it does.

He’s been thinking lately, about visiting his Grand Temple. The one that was liberated only recently by the Crown Prince of Xianle.

He’ll be injured for a while. Jun Wu won’t be able to send him on missions for weeks.

And Pei Ming thinks Shi Wudu would like Gusu.

It’s peaceful there. A good place to forget one’s worries.

And the Water Master seems weighed down by something, more and more with each passing day.

But before he can say a word, Shi Wudu speaks first.

“Can you promise me something?” He murmurs, grasping Pei’s chin.

“If I asked you, would you swear it?”

After all, Pei is many things—but never an oath breaker. If he gives his word, it’s as good as stone.

And of course the general looks up into those eyes, haunted by the array of color, and he replies—

“Anything.”

Anything he liked.

He has hopes it might be for something more romantic, but—

“My brother.”

Those hopes are quickly dashed.

“...What about him?” Pei mumbles—no, nearly grumbles, not wanting to think about Shi Qingxuan at this very moment.

“If something happens to me...swear you’ll protect him?”

Shi Wudu’s voice turns small, however briefly—

And those eyes, those beautiful, spellbinding eyes, the same gaze that left General Ming Guang trapped the moment he saw them—

They seem almost frightened.

“...If something happens to you?” Pei questions, his eyes narrowing. “Has someone threatened you?”

And even if someone had, who could pose a threat to him?

“No,” Lies come easily to the water master, flowing from his lips like anything else. “What Ling Wen said earlier...it just made me worry.” He mumbles, leaning his chin against Pei’s shoulder.

“Promise me?”

Pei is reluctant, of course—but if only to set the Water God’s mind at ease—he swears.

Knowing that promise will never come to fruition—because even if someone could bring Shi Wudu harm, General Pei would never allow it.

But when they’re in bed later, he wonders.

Wonders about the pain in his side. The man in his arms, and the layers of hurt he always seems to be hiding underneath.

But more than anything, he wonders about that dagger, and what it means. After all—it didn’t live up to it’s name, Pei Ming survived.

But it won’t be long now, before that blade kisses the skin of another god. When it does—it will cut far deeper than before, cutting out lives, fates, and promises.

When that blood is spilled—it will stain the hands of many.

And a dragon will rear its head once again.

The Gambler's Den

Chapter Summary

> “...I’m sorry, but what sort of establishment is this?”
>
> It sounds rather loud inside after all—full of shouting and laughter. Some sort of pub, perhaps?
>
> “...” The young man glances up at the sign above the door, and when he speaks—it’s bittersweet.
>
> “...Money over life, and gains over shame,” he mutters under his breath, his throat suddenly tight.
>
> “...” Xie Lian tilts his head to the side, confused—to which the ghost just smiles, shaking his head.
>
> “It’s a gambler’s den, Mr. Hua. Everyone important in the city is in there.”

Chapter Notes

> You can find me on twitter and keep up with current updates of the story HERE

The path is long, though not so terrible when you have company. The Wind Master has even been so kind as to use his fan to blast them a few miles down the road here and there, much to Xie Lian’s delight—and now, it looms ahead, crimson aura gleaming in the twilight:

Ghost City.

“Have you ever been here before?”

Xie Lian has learned quite a bit about the Wind Master on their journey to the underworld. In part from sneaking his fingers over his scroll, and the rest can be blamed on the fact that the younger god never really stops talking.

“Oh, no—not really,” Shi Qingxuan shakes his head. “I’ve been trying to get Ming Yi to sneak down here with me—I’ve been horribly curious, you know—but he’s been dragging his feet on it...”

Ming Yi, Xie Lian has learned, would be the Earth Master.

Who also happens to be Shi Qingxuan's closest companion in the Heavenly Court— aside from his elder brother—and (presumably) the woman who was accompanying him in the Crescent Moon Kingdom.

And speaking of his brother…

"It's pretty amazing that two siblings from the same family both ascended as gods," Xie Lian comments, "your parents must have been incredibly proud."

As a matter of fact—he doesn't think he's ever heard of such a phenomenon up until now.

"You think so?"

Shi Qingxuan shrugs. "I wouldn't know—I never knew our parents."

Then, he stops to think.

"Well, I guess I knew them when I was a baby, but I definitely don't remember them."

"Oh," Xie Lian frowns, apologetic for bringing the matter up, "I'm sorry to hear that."

"Don't be!" The Wind Master's smile is as bright as ever—and from the sound of his tone, he genuinely doesn't seem bothered. "It's always been me and gege. He was my mother, father, brother, the whole thing. And he was very proud when I faced my own heavenly calamity, so you weren't wrong!"

It's a little jarring now, listening to the way that Shi Qingxuan speaks about his brother, the Water Master—because it contradicts so sharply with San Lang's description: the Water Tyrant.

The Ghost King described a cold, detached deity. A prideful creature.

And The Wind Master is describing a devoted elder brother. Xie Lian supposes both could be true—after all, people have many different sides to them, he knows that well.

Still, it's contradictory.

"And the way you spoke to General Ming Guang before, in the Grand Martial Hall…"

Xie Lian tilts his head, concerned. "He seems to have a friendship with your brother. You don't think that'll cause problems?"

That only draws a disbelieving snort as the Wind Master crosses his arms, flicking his hair over his shoulder irritably.

"If it did, that would be a relief—but no, gege knows I can't stand Pei. I wish he would stop hanging around with him. Honestly, the 'Three Tumors' thing hasn't helped with his reputation..."

So—he's aware of the 'Water Tyrant' title, then?

Xie Lian's eyebrows raise.

"...The three tumors?"

Shi Qingxuan blows a tuft of bangs from his forehead irritably, "I guess you haven't heard of them either, huh?"

But unlike nearly everyone else in the Heavenly Court—he doesn't sound critical when he says it.

"Well—the three most powerful gods in the Heavens—they aren't really popular, but they're each close friends with one another. Ming Guang, Ling Wen, and my brother. I don't actually know why everyone has an issue with Ling Wen, not other than stupid rumors anyway..."

Xie Lian lifts his chin curiously, "Rumors?"

He's found Ling Wen pleasant enough in the interactions they've had. A little cold at times perhaps—but always helpful, and never outright rude.

"Oh, just the usual bullshit when a woman does well," Shi Qingxuan rolls his eyes. "That she slept around to get her position, stuff like that. Which is ridiculous— everyone knows she only got promoted after the last head civil god imploded. People even say she's intimate with Pei and my brother..." He makes a sound of disgust. "It's a bold faced lie."

Xie Lian grimaces with silent sympathy. After all—it's a plight that he understands rather well. Whether he'd like to or not, but...

"And Pei Ming—he's as arrogant and self important as they come. Not to mention how many issues he's caused by sleeping around."

And there's no need to explain why Shi Wudu would be included in the three—his personality is reason enough to make him unpopular with the other officials.

“Oh—we’re about to enter the city now. Should I go ahead and give you some spiritual power? Just in case?”

It’s prudent, so Xie Lian nods in agreement, reaching his hand out, “I shouldn’t need too much, so there’s no need to overdo—”

He stops, startled to find that the hand underneath his own is much smaller than it was before, when Shi Qingxuan was dragging him out of the Heavens.

“...Did you change forms again, Lord Wind Master?” He questions politely. A distinctly female voice replies—

“Truth be told, I’m usually worshipped as a goddess, so I’m more powerful in this form!” She sighs.

Similar to Ling Wen, who is near exclusively worshipped as a god.

“Besides, women have stronger auras of yin,” she explains, robes swishing around her ankles as she walks. “So it’s better to travel in the ghost realm disguised as a woman. Really, you should try it!”

“Oh...” The Crown Prince smiles awkwardly, shaking his head. “I don’t think—”

“You aren’t worshipped as a god or a goddess anyway,” Shi Qingxuan points out, “so it won’t impact you—no offense,” she adds, realizing that might have been slightly hurtful—but Xie Lian doesn’t seem to mind.

“None taken, that’s correct.”

“And,” Shi Qingxuan rubs her chin thoughtfully, “if that boy who was with you before is really Crimson Rain Sought Flower—doesn’t he already know what you look like?”

Well—Xie Lian can’t argue that point.

“I don’t think I need to hide from San Lang...” The god replies, hesitant.

“We’re friends. I don’t think he would be upset if I chose to visit.”

“Certainly not,” Shi Qingxuan agrees, “but we’re not visiting—we’re investigating his territory. It might make things a little awkward…"

Xie Lian frowns, squirming a little with discomfort.

He's never used a spell to transform his body before—never needed to. And for gods and goddesses—it's not the same as a ghost shifting into a different skin, or using a clone. The actual spiritual body and form changes, and—

Well, what if Xie Lian and Shi Qingxuan got separated?

If he ran out of spiritual power and didn't have a means of getting more, he'd be stuck in that form—which would be rather embarrassing, but…

…It could make things awkward for San Lang, if he learned that Xie Lian was here, and his purpose…

"Do you not know how?"

"I know how."

Shi Qingxuan jumps at the sound of her companion's voice, turning her head to see— that—well—

It's already been done.

"Ah!" She claps her hands over her cheeks, bouncing on the balls of her feet. "Your highness!"

"…Did I do it incorrectly?"

"No! You look amazing, jiejie!"

The princess grimaces, fiddling with her hair—that much, at least, feels the same.

Jiejie is a new one.

She must be shorter now, she can feel that from the way her robes feel a little too long, dragging slightly on the ground behind her.

They're also looser in the shoulders now, and tighter in the chest—forcing her to adjust her belt slightly to keep the sleeves from slipping off to one shoulder.

"Do I look different enough?"

Shi Qingxuan stops, rubbing her chin in thought as she looks Xie Lian over.

In truth—the prince wasn't a hulking, hyper masculine figure to begin with, so the transformation isn't entirely unrecognizable.

She's smaller, her features slightly more delicate. Heart shaped face, fuller lips and all of that—not to mention the changes to her figure.

Shi Qingxuan probably wouldn't have recognized her if she hadn't transformed right in front of her. And honestly, unless someone was obsessed enough to have Xie Lian's form completely memorized—they wouldn't recognize her either.

So, it's fine!

"Absolutely!"

Well, if she sounds so sure—then there probably isn't much to worry about, is there?

Xie Lian reaches back, finding the hood of her robes, flicking it up and over her head, covering her eyes.

It's not long before they find a crowd of female ghosts to slip in behind, listening in as they chatter on about facials, finding new funeral garb for the change in season, and so on.

"I'm so glad Ghost City is open again!"

"Oh? Was it closed?" One of the ghosts questions. "I hadn't heard a thing about that."

"Oh, yes," her companion agrees rather seriously, shaking her head. "It was just after the Ghost Festival—though I am surprised, my friend said Hua Chengzhu returned last night in quite a state."

Xie Lian perks up, lifting her chin.

...Hua Chengzhu? It makes sense, after all—this is his territory, of course he'd be the lord of the city.

And yet, hearing him referred to that way makes her fingertips tingle with nervous energy.

Because of the task at hand, naturally. "A state?"

“Oh, yes—he was absolutely furious,” the ghost sighs, rubbing at her cheeks. “But no one knows what happened.”

“Who does, with that man?”

Xie Lian bites her lip.

Was he really that angry? Even if he has nothing to do with the missing official… Did Xie Lian offend him?

She can’t recall having done anything that offensive the night before, except, well… She did get a little short with San Lang just before falling asleep, thrown off by…

‘You’ll never find anyone in heaven and earth more sincere than me.’

But Hua Cheng didn’t seem so petty as to be upset over something like that, really…

Xie Lian doesn’t realize that she’s been leaning closer—all under the premise of being able to hear the conversation a little better—until one of the ghosts looks back with a start.

“Say—who are those two? They didn’t leave the burial ground with us.”

Xie Lian leans back, tugging her hood down a little further over her face with a nervous laugh, “Ah, well…”

“We came from a different burial mound,” Shi Qingxuan interrupts with an easy smile. “Greetings!’

Xie Lian is relieved in that moment to have the Wind Master with her—she has a relaxed way of speaking that makes her easy to believe whereas Xie Lian, well…she’s infamously terrible at lying.

And the other ghosts seem to accept that well enough, until…

“Say, meimei…” One of the ghosts leans close, examining Shi Qingxuan’s face rather closely. “That’s a nice complexion you have there…who does your facials?”

“Oh, I…ah…hahaha…” The Wind Master giggles, leaning back with a slightly strained smile. “I do them myself!”

It’s the wrong answer.

“What?!”

“Do mine!”

“No!” Another ghost huffs, grabbing Shi Qingxuan by the arm and yanking. “Me first!”

“Wait your turn!”

Xie Lian extends a hand helplessly, wanting to help, but at a loss for what to say; and…

Before she knows it, Shi Qingxuan has been dragged off.

Leaving Xie Lian alone on the streets of Ghost City, slightly dazed as she glances around underneath the hood, trying to get her bearings.

There’s just one problem—

There are far too many ghosts around, and the number of different pockets of resentful energy is…disorienting.

Not to mention how loud it is—with so many voices inhuman and otherwise barking out into the air.

How on earth is she supposed to look? And then, there are other problems.

“Hey, miss!” A shopkeeper grins, fangs gleaming as he leers over her. “Looking for a new tongue?”

Xie Lian starts, clapping one hand over her mouth nervously. Is a tongue something that a person can buy…?

“I like mine the way it is, thank you,” she squeaks awkwardly, hurrying past.

“Hungry, little lady? Fancy some chicken soup?”

“Oh, no, I’m fine—!”

“Hello, gorgeous!”

One stall owner goes so far as to grab her by the wrist, “Those boots look too big for you, what do you say to trying on some of my slippers? They’ll look amazing on that figure!”

"…" Xie Lian forces a smile, yanking her wrist out of his grip. "No, thank you! I'm in a hurry!"

But each time she wrestles herself free from one ghost, she just stumbles into another —and not only does it leave her exasperated, but—

How is she supposed to investigate like this? Her original form certainly wouldn't have drawn this much attention.

"Well look here…"

She backs up sharply when a voice echoes near her ear, hitting the wall of a nearby store, lips twisting into a grimace.

"Don't be nervous, little lady…" the ghost smirks, leaning in curiously. "I don't bite… much," he tacks on that little correction at the end, and she frowns.

Well, that's no way to talk to a lady, even if he doesn't know that Xie Lian isn't one. Still, handling this with fists would make quite a scene, and she…

"I'm just…looking for my husband, excuse me—"

"Husband!" The ghost barks out a laugh. "A young thing like you? Married?"

"She's trying to let you down easy, asshole." A voice barks out—this one feminine, but older, graveled—like someone who has spent a few centuries shouting at people. "Now leave her be."

Xie Lian let's put a low breath of relief, moving closer to the woman speaking.

"Oi, Lan Chang, who do ya think you're talking to?" One of the other ghosts grouses, taking a step towards her. "Everyone knows you run this block, running off a little competition is just pathetic…"

Xie Lian blinks owlishly under her hood.

Competition?

The ghost—Lan Chang, it would seem—rolls her eyes, and Xie Lian feels heavy, manicured hands land on her shoulder. "She's not selling anything, worm. Am I gonna have to ask you to leave her be again?" She hisses, baring her fangs. "You know I don't like asking twice."

While the two ghosts face off with one another, Xie Lian mumbles a few rushed words of thanks before ducking down, slipping out from under Lan Chang's hands and making her way down the alleyway.

Once out of sight, the princess clutches her head with a groan. This isn't working.

She can't work like this—and she wasn't expecting to be nearly so reliant on Shi Qingxuan, but, with this place being as disorienting as it is...

She lets out a sigh, fumbling for her spiritual power—what remains of it, anyway— going through the process to change back—

"Wait, you're a MAN?!"

Xie Lian freezes—and, mortifyingly enough—his first instinct is to press both palms against his chest to check.

And indeed, he is.

"Wait, Lan Chang, you're in with a cut sleeve?!"

"Am NOT!" She sputters, "How was I supposed to know it was a disguise?!"

"I don't know, don't women have a way of sensing one another?!"

"What the hell are you talking about now?!" She squawks. And when Xie Lian tries to inch away from the argument, he feels that same manicured hand from before grab him by the back of his robes.

"And just where do you think you're going?!" Lan Chang snaps. She's surprisingly strong, to Xie Lian's dismay, and though he can't see her glare—he knows that it must be formidable. "What are you doing, walking around like that?! Are you up to something—?"

Xie Lian opens his mouth, scrambling to think of an appropriate explanation, but all that comes out is—

"...Was I cute?" He asks in a small voice, feeling utterly ridiculous.

Lan Chang stops, looking at the ghost that was harassing Xie Lian before, both staring in confusion.

"...I mean...yes," the man agrees, scratching the side of his head—and when Lan Chang glares, he throws his hands up. "Well, what do you expect me to do, woman?! Lie?!"

"Then that's...reason enough!" Xie Lian mutters, his face getting hotter and hotter by the moment.

He can't exactly sell it the way that Shi Qingxuan can, but he's made an effort.

"That's..." Lan Chang starts, her eyes narrowed—

"Do we have a problem here?"

Oh great, another arrival.

Xie Lian doesn't know whether to laugh or cry.

The newcomer sounds young—maybe a teenager.

Probably male, though it's hard to tell exactly—

"N-No, sir..." The ghost who was bothering Xie Lian before shakes his head, bowing nervously, "None at all!"

Sir? A male, then, but also—

Xie Lian's stomach lurches hopefully as he peeks through his hood, but...

It isn't crimson.

Well—everything is crimson here, actually—Hua Cheng's aura covers the entire city.

Comforting, in a strange way, but nonetheless—there isn't the silver core that he's used to seeing at the center of it.

Still, the aura before him is strong.

For a moment, it's almost reminiscent of Shi Qingxuan's—a vibrant shade of green— but this is far brighter, far more powerful—and far less mobile, with sharp curves and edges.

And at it the center is a flickering core, almost like a flame—shades of orange and red shifting.

"Lan Chang," the young man questions calmly, "do you make a habit of harassing travelers these days?"

“Oh, no—” Xie Lian speaks up with a frown, surprising the female ghost when he takes up in her defense, “She was trying to help me at first, then she saw I was disguised…”

“Disguised?” The newcomer murmurs, arching an eyebrow. “For what purpose?”

“Probably to trick unsuspecting ladies!” Lan Chang grumbles, crossing her arms. “I was completely fooled!”

The younger ghost sends her a cold look.

“Lan Chang, are you trying to say the only reason someone might change their form is to prey upon women?”

She stops, her mouth frozen in a perfect ‘o,’ realizing how her statement sounded, her expression going slightly pale under a thick layer of makeup.

“Well…no…”

“But it’s still pretty weird that he was in disguise,” the male ghost from before grumbles.

“Half of the city wears mask,” the most powerful of the three responds flatly. “Did he give a reason?”

“…He said it was…just because he looked cute…”

Xie Lian has finished the debate between laughing and crying—deciding on the latter, if only his tear ducts would obey him.

“And did he?”

Xie Lian goes still, and Lan Chang sputters. “Hah?!”

“Did he look cute?”

“I-I guess! Why does it—?!”

“Then leave him alone.”

“But—!”

“I’m sorry,” Xie Lian listens to the young man closely, and despite the different aura, something about him seems…familiar, “did I stutter, or have you gone collectively deaf?”

Definitely—very familiar.

“We—!”

“Get lost, before I get annoyed.” The young man hisses.

The other two ghosts give each other wounded looks before scrambling off, and Xie Lian is left standing in the alleyway, pulling his hood a little lower before offering an awkward bow of thanks.

“Thank you, young man, it was kind of you to intercede on my behalf...”

The young ghost glances him over with a raised eyebrow, crossing his arms. “It’s fine. What’s your name, mister?”

He really does sound very young, barely a young adult. And he was able to intimidate those other two ghosts that easily?

Then again, in the ghost realm—looks are often deceiving.

Unfortunately, the most recent alias Xie Lian was using is the one that falls from his lips—force of habit.

“Oh—it’s Hua Lian,” he starts with a friendly smile, then stops, realizing how...given whose territory he’s in...

The immediate response he receives is a surprised giggle, and his shoulders slump slightly, realizing how it must sound. “Ah...I—”

“Don’t worry about it,” the young man snickers, offering a polite bow in response. “It’s a pleasure to meet you, Mr. Hua.”

Xie Lian’s ears are burning so much, he half expects steam to start coming out of them.

“Are you looking for something? You seem pretty out of it...” Then, the ghost examines him a little more closely, making Xie Lian shrink away instinctively, fidgeting with the hem of his hood—

“...Mr. Hua,” the young man repeats, this time his voice much more gentle, “can you not see very well?”

It’s a delicate way of asking—far more polite than what Xie Lian is used to—and he forces a shallow nod, offering a self deprecating smile.

"…I'm afraid I can't, no."

The air becomes slightly tense—but not in the way that Xie Lian is used to. It doesn't feel like the young man is bracing to attack him, or angry with him…

He seems a little anxious.

But before Xie Lian can ask what's wrong—

"Tell me what you're looking for, I'll show you."

There's no hint of malice in his tone at all—and while that does set Xie Lian at ease, he…

Doesn't exactly know how to explain what he's looking for without completely blowing his cover. He was the one who asked for this mission, after all—he can't mess it up so soon.

"…I'm looking for a friend of mine," Xie Lian explains. "They might be hurt, and they might have come here to hide until help could come, so…"

"…And would that person be your husband?"

Oh heavens, he heard that?

"…No…" Xie Lian croaks, wishing the hood covered his cheeks. "No, just a friend…"

"I see," the young man muses. "Well, I haven't heard about anyone injured showing up here. But I know the best place to look for people who have."

"…You do?"

"Yep," the young man spins on his heel, pinching Xie Lian's sleeve. "I'll show you."

He isn't overfamiliar, grabbing Xie Lian by the arm or anything like that, the way most people do when they figure out he can't see. His grip on Xie Lian's sleeve is surprisingly delicate, just deftly tugging the god in the direction he wants him to go.

Finally, he stops in front of a set of steps, tugging Xie Lian's sleeve until the god places his hand on a railing before letting go. "It's thirteen steps, the doors are already open."

Xie Lian nods gratefully, grasping the railing a little more firmly before he asks—

"...I'm sorry, but what sort of establishment is this?"

It sounds rather loud inside after all—full of shouting and laughter. Some sort of pub, perhaps?

"..." The young man glances up at the sign above the door, and when he speaks—it's bittersweet.

"...Money over life, and gains over shame," he mutters under his breath, his throat suddenly tight.

"..." Xie Lian tilts his head to the side, confused—to which the ghost just smiles, shaking his head.

"It's a gambler's den, Mr. Hua. Everyone important in the city is in there."

He steps down, turning around, shoving his hands in his pockets—and Xie Lian can't help but be curious. After all, he's the most powerful ghost that the god has come across in the city so far—

"But not you?"

The younger man stops, scratching his head sheepishly.

"Well..."

Of all the answers Xie Lian may have expected—
"I'm...technically...kinda...grounded right now."

—that...was not it.

"You—?" Before Xie Lian can ask more, he hears the sound of something clicking—

Clack!

Clack!

And then that aura is gone, and the boy with it.

"..." Xie Lian stares off in the direction he disappeared from, curious.

Just what sort of child was that? So powerful, but apparently…grounded? Can ghosts even be grounded? Is that an option?

Before he can contemplate the matter further, there's more boisterous laughter.

All echoing from inside the gambler's den, filled with more echoing shouts, screams, and brouhahas than Xie Lian can keep count of and…

There doesn't seem to be a better place to investigate, it's true.

He climbs the steps, carefully counting thirteen—then walks inside.

A large chamber looms before him, filled with countless different tables, each one packed with gamblers rolling sets of dice, pushing their luck over and over again, screaming with elation or meaning with defeat as they fall.

"Welcome, sir," an attendant smiles from beside him. "Would you like to be placed at a table?"

Is that how gambling works? Xie Lian's never tried it. The closest he ever came was betting with Feng Xin on how many books he could balance on his head, but—

"I'm afraid I don't have any money," the prince smiles apologetically. "Could I just watch instead?"

Normally, that's the sort of thing that would get a person laughed out the door—but the attendant seems easy going enough, laughing softly.

"Oh, we rarely bet with money, sir," she smiles. "But you can watch as much as you like."

…What kind of gambler's den doesn't bet with money? What on earth could they be using instead—?

It isn't long, however, before Xie Lian hears the answer to his question.

"Ah—I bet my arm!" A man at the front table declares, slamming his fists down for emphasis.

No one else nearby seems particularly thrilled by his presence — though a few seem to find his persistent wailing amusing.

"You're better off paying out…"

“No!” The man exclaims. “Just give me another roll!”

“You think anyone wants your worthless arm?” A voice drawls.

Xie Lian stops, his eyes widening—because he knows that voice.

It’s a couple of octaves deeper than it was before—and it’s tone is warmer, all the more alluring for it, but—

...San Lang?

“But you’ve been letting other people bet their limbs all night!” The merchant protests.

“Those were athletes and master swordsmen,” another gambler snorts derisively. “You think that arm of yours is good enough to bet on?”

The man pauses, eyes bulging with frustration under his mask.

“FINE!” He rasps, “that’s FINE! What about ten years of my daughter’s life?!”

Xie Lian’s expression twists with disgust. What kind of father could offer such a thing? But—

“As you wish,” Hua Cheng’s voice drawls once again—and from the sound of it, he’s further from the rest of the crowd, elevated on a dais.

“You’re lucky, sir,” the attendant by Xie Lian’s side smiles, “our lord is playing tonight.”

Their lord...?

“Odds or evens?”

“O-Odds!”

But as Xie Lian recalls, Hua Cheng’s luck is powerful—doesn’t that mean he’ll automatically win? And if so, the man’s daughter will be —?

“HA!” The merchant screeches when he flips over his cup, holding up the dice for all to see. “I’ve won!! I’ve WON!”

Xie Lian let’s out a shallow breath of relief without meaning to, placing one hand over his chest. At least that’s over—

“I want to play another round!”

“You’ve already done enough to turn your business around,” one of the ghosts at the table grumbles. “What more do you want?”

“I want...all of my competitors to drop dead!” The man declares, slamming his palms on the table again. “Give me another roll!”

“That’ll cost you more than ten years...” another man grumbles. “And why make a bet like that? There are other—!”

“I know what I want!” The human snaps. “How about twenty years, then?! And her fate in marriage!”

Xie Lian feels horrified—but the ghosts laugh and jeer.

“The human’s desperate—did you hear him?”

“Betting his own daughter’s future! HA! What a sight!”

“Alright,” one of the attendants agrees, gesturing for the man to continue. “Have at it, then.”

Xie Lian bites his lip, hands balling into fists. Should he say something? He—

That’s when a voice speaks up beside him, this time familiar; “Best not to interfere.”

Xie Lian sighs with relief, fumbling blindly for Shi Qingxuan’s arm, grasping him by the elbow. It’s not something he would normally do—but the Wind Master has a way of setting him at ease.

“You changed back?”

“As soon as I got away from those women,” he groans. “I had to make something up as I went along—and when it didn’t do anything, they kept on asking, ‘Why didn’t it work meimei?’ And ‘were you lying to us, meimei?’ Meimei, meimei, meimei!”

Shi Qingxuan huffs, stamping his foot quietly with irritation. “So...I sort of lost my temper and said it wasn’t my fault, they were just ugly...” He admits with a sheepish pout, and Xie Lian can’t help but snort, covering his mouth politely. “Don’t laugh, your highness!”

“I’m not, I’m not...” Xie Lian clears his throat, keeping one hand on his friend’s elbow. “How did you know to find me here, anyway?”

Had he run into that interesting young ghost as well?

"Oh," the Wind Master blinks, his eyes wide. "No—this is just the most popular landmark in Ghost City. It's where I told Lang Qianqiu to meet us."

Xie Lian's eyes widen sharply under his hood, and he grips the windmaster's elbow just a little tighter. "...Pardon?"

"Lang Qianqiu?" Shi Qingxuan repeats, raising an eyebrow.

"Oh—I guess you probably haven't heard of him either!"

Xie Lian, once again, doesn't know whether to laugh or cry.

"He's General Tai Hua, Warden of the East. Since this falls within his territory, I had him meet us here so he could assist. He's usually pretty helpful."

But in this situation?

"Does he...?" Xie Lian starts to speak, but then—

BOOM!

Oh—oh dear.

A fist comes down on the gambling table—crushing not only the cup of dice, but the hand of the merchant holding it.

"What kind of bastard are you?!"

Xie Lian cringes.

A young man stands over the gambling table, sharp eyebrows pinched into a severe glare, "What father would bet his own daughter's life?!"

The prince can't manage to lift his face from his hands. "Did you...warn him about keeping a low profile?"

"I..." Shi Qingxuan goes pale. "I mean, I did, but..."

When it comes to Tai Hua, certain things go in one ear, and out the other. Xie Lian knows that perfectly well.

And now, he's already caused a scene. But before Xie Lian or Shi Qingxuan can hurry forward to stop him—

There's a familiar chuckle from above—one that makes Xie Lian's stomach flip, in spite of the situation.

"You must have nerves of steel, causing trouble in my territory."

'My territory.'

That's when Xie Lian remembers what Hua Cheng told him the night before—

That ghosts are at their most powerful inside their own lairs. Which, in Hua Cheng's case, would be ghost city. He could probably obliterate a martial god in a weakened state—but here?

It wouldn't even be a fight.

"...Are you the owner of this place?"

Hisses echo all around.

"He comes here and insults us, and he doesn't even even know our master?"

"Stupid asshole!" Another ghost sneers. "The entire city is his!"

Shi Qingxuan goes pale. "Please don't tell me that's..."

Xie Lian isn't frightened, but his expression is grim. "It is."

"Y-you're sure?"

"Positive." Even if it's slightly different, he'd know that voice anywhere—and when he looks in that direction—

He can see that silver core there, warm and bright. In spite of everything, his gaze softens.

"We're dead," Shi Qingxuan mutters. "We're so, so dead..."

"No," Xie Lian shakes his head, reaching over to squeeze his arm reassuringly. "It'll be alright, as long as he doesn't—"

"What kind of establishment is this?!" Lang Qianqiu glares around the room, hands on his hips. "It's like none of you have any human decency!"

"Well of course we don't!" One of the ghosts snaps as the entire crowd starts to boo at the heavenly official. “We ain’t human!”

“Who does he think he is?! I oughta—!”

“You have the option to go to Heaven,” Hua Cheng’s voice is soft, but it carries throughout the entire room.

“But instead you’re in hell, with me.”

‘Oh dear,’ Xie Lian thinks to himself fretfully. ‘He knows exactly what Lang Qianqiu is, doesn’t he?’

“And if you want to walk away alive—you’ll play by my rules, boy.”

Shi Qingxuan winces this time, clutching his fan tightly between his fingers as he watches the look on Lang Qianqiu’s face.

He’s always been rash, righteous by nature, and...

“Who are you calling a boy?!” He snarls, slamming his fist onto the table once more.

He doesn’t like being spoken down to.

(Though, to be fair—as someone five centuries older, Hua Cheng has every right to call him a child.)

This time, when he smashes his hand down on the long, heavy gambling table—it sends the entire thing flying in the Ghost King’s path.

It never lands.

Without breaking his relaxed posture—legs crossed, one elbow leaned against the arm of his throne-like chair—Hua Cheng raises one palm, making the table freeze in midair.

Then, with a flick of his fingers, it hurls itself back at Lang Qianqiu.

The Martial God tries to stop it with one hand, several veins popping in his forehead as he does so.

Behind the curtain, the Wind Master catches Hua Cheng cracking a small smirk as General Tai Hua is forced to use two, his feet sliding back across the wood as he’s forced back.

Then, those long, menacing fingers curl into a fist, and the table shatters into countless splinters, leaving his opponent staggering, spitting out sawdust.

“You—!”

Before he can say another word, Hua Cheng’s finger’s come together again, this time in a—

Snap!

And with just one crisp click of his fingers, there’s a metallic rattle as silver chains— seemingly coming out of thin air—descend from the sealing, each one catching the young god by the wrists and ankles, hoisting him up into the air, leaving him splayed helplessly.

Still, the god thrashes with all of his might, his form sparking with spiritual power, “P-Put me DOWN!” He snarls, limbs flailing.

Xie Lian watches those sparks of spiritual energy fretfully, worrying that he might do something stupid and reveal his true form, but—

“HA! The cultivator thinks he can use his magic!” One of the ghosts sneers, giggling at the sight. “Those chains are hellforged by our master himself! Nothing can escape once it’s locked in!”

Hellforged...?

Hua Cheng made them himself?

And just as the ghosts claimed—Lang Qianqiu’s spiritual powers are tightly sealed. Almost reminiscent to the cursed iron shackles Xie Lian came across in Gusu, but this...this seems far more refined.

Back then, when Xie Lian had been trapped under the grip of the cursed iron—it had been an agonizing experience. But Lang Qianqiu doesn’t seem to be in pain at the moment—not counting his wounded pride, at any rate.

“PUT—PUT ME DOWN!” “My, my...” Hua Cheng muses.

“What an interesting thing I’ve caught...”

Clack, clack, clack, clack!

The chains rattle as they flip Lang Qianqiu around, like a puppet on a set of strings, hovering him over the crowd as they cackle and jeer.

“What should we do with you, hmm?”

The ghosts below are gleeful as they throw out suggestions.

“Skin him!”

“Take his head!”

“Drink his blood!”

Heavens, what kind of suggestions are those?

Hua Cheng, however, seems rather amused. “How about this—whoever wins the next round can take it home and eat it.”

“It?!” The god rages, “I’m not an it—!” He’s cut off when the chains twist him again, this time dangling him upside down. “S...STOP DOING THAT!”

“...This is going to be a problem,” Xie Lian mutters, leaning close to Shi Qingxuan, keeping his voice low. “How is your luck?”

“Ah...” The Wind Master shrugs helplessly, “Like anyone else’s? Sometimes good, sometimes bad...and what about yours?”

“Terrible.” Xie Lian replies morosely, leading to the younger god laughing nervously. “Hahaha...I’m sure it can’t be that bad, your highness!”

“The highest I’ve ever rolled is snake eyes...” Xie Lian tries not to be self pitying, but— that’s hard not to do when the truth actually is rather pitiful.

“Oh...well...we could work that to our advantage, actually!” Shi Qingxuan offers, eyes widening hopefully.

“...We could?”

“Consistency is always useful!” His companion beams, hands on his hips. “Just bet on rolling the lowest number!”

Well...

“...That’s not a bad idea,” Xie Lian mumbles, rubbing his chin. “Alright—I’ll try it.”

“Oh!” Before he can walk away, the Wind Master catches him by the arm. “When you place your bet—put something really serious up as collateral, alright?”

“Oh…” Xie Lian tilts his head, thinking. “Why?”

“Just trust me!”

He supposes Shi Qingxuan has earned that much, so he agrees with little protest, approaching one of the gambling tables.

“Excuse me?” He leans over to one of the croupiers with a polite smile, “Could I play a round?”

“…Of course, sir,” the employee smiles, bowing deeply. To everyone else, their manner seems rather callous and rude—but to the prince, the workers are exceptionally courteous.

“Please, take a seat.”

The croupier pulls out a stool for him, and as Xie Lian sits, he asks—“Could I bet on the lowest numbers, or does it have to be odds and evens?”

“You can bet however you wish, sir,” the ghost replies. “What’s your stake?”

“Ah…” Xie Lian thinks on it.

Something serious? He doesn’t have any wealth to bet, nor would betting years of his life do any good. He’s immortal, after all. And he certainly isn’t willing to risk someone else…And if he offered a limb, that wouldn’t work either…

In his experience (unfortunately, he has quite a bit of it) when one cuts off the limb of a heavenly official, it’ll just disintegrate over time, and regrow on the original owner’s body.

But, in order to win a substantial prize, he has to bet something useful…

Finally, he comes to a conclusion, and in his defense—

“…My body,” Xie Lian replies quickly, not seeing the way that the croupier, undead, somehow grows even more pale. “Is that enough?”

—he means it in the most innocent way possible. Like physical labor. He’s good at that!

There's a slight, nearly imperceptible shift in the atmosphere, and from the crowd behind him—Shi Qingxuan chokes, using his fan to cover his face, flicking it back and forth nervously.

"...Of course!" The croupier replies with a nervous laugh. "B-by all means, sir, go ahead..."

Xie Lian nods, taking the smooth, polished black dice cup in his hands, and really—he knows he shouldn't be nervous, he's never rolled higher than snake eyes in all his—

Clack!

Clack!

"What'd I get?"

The croupier swallows dryly, leaning over. "...Two sixes, sir."

"..." Xie Lian sits there, staring down at the dice blindly, muttering, "That figures." From behind him, Shi Qingxuan drops his face into his hands miserably.

"...Can I roll agai—?"

"Ah, I'm sorry to interrupt sir—but our master has offered to play a round with you himself!"

Xie Lian's eyes flicker up in Hua Cheng's direction underneath his hood, somewhat wary, but...

It was foolish, to think the Ghost King wouldn't notice his presence. Is he going to be angry that Xie Lian created such a disruption? Even if it wasn't technically his fault...

"...Alright," he agrees, starting to shake the cup again, but before he can actually roll, the attendant stops him.

"Our master says that you're shaking the dice improperly," the ghost explains, "he's offered to teach you."

Xie Lian stops, raising an eyebrow.

It's not like he has a lot of gambling experience—or, well, any gambling experience, but—

"...Oh, really?"

"Yes, he says you can go on up."

To where he's seated, in a curtained lounge above the rest of the players—always watching, but none dare to approach.

Even if he wanted to—Xie Lian is hardly in a position to refuse.

"Alright," he murmurs, keeping his cup in hand as he moves over to where he assumes the steps are, and...

Just as he starts to feel for them with his feet, the staircase starts to glow with silver spiritual power.

"..." The god can't help but smile, making his way up. San Lang really is always so considerate, isn't he?

When he reaches the top step, the figure that has been watching since he arrived steps to the edge of the curtains, reaching out and parting them with one hand.

One slips underneath Xie Lian's where it's holding the dice cup—larger than it was before, and he can't help but be reminded of the first time they met, in the bridal sedan, realizing...

That red thread is still wrapped around Hua Cheng's third finger, tied into an affinity knot.

His skin is far colder to the touch now than it was before—but not unpleasantly so— and when his other hand comes to rest around Xie Lian's where it grasps the cup, it completely envelops his fingers.

'Next time, I'll meet you in my true form.'

Xie Lian's ears burn.

Is this...?

"Would you like to bet on the highest number, or the lowest?" Hua Cheng asks, his tone low and gentle—as it always is, with him—but it seems to startle the ghosts below.

"...Have we been rolling the dice wrong this entire time?"

"Is there really a right way to do it?!"

Xie Lian clears his throat, swallowing hard.

"Ah...the highest," he mutters, considering that was what he rolled last.

"Alright," Hua Cheng agrees easily, his lips turning up into a soft smile. "I'll go first, then."

Xie Lian nods wordlessly as the ghost king shakes the dice.

Once, twice—and when the cup is lifted and the dice land against his palm, Xie Lian can feel from the carved grooves which numbers came up—a five and a six.

"...What on EARTH kind of luck is that?!" Lang Qianqiu glares, slowly revolving over head like a demented ceiling ornament.

Xie Lian doesn't pay him any mind, taking the cup on his own, trying to mimic Hua Cheng's movements as best as he can, but—

"No," the Ghost King shakes his head, covering Xie Lian's hands with his own, "not like that—let me show you."

"Ah..." Xie Lian's tongue feels almost like it's gotten stuck to the roof of his mouth from the nerves—even though he has no idea why. It's—

It's just San Lang, it's fine.

"Okay..." he mumbles, dipping his chin down as the Ghost King shakes the cup between his hands, unhurried.

Of course—he's utterly focused on what he's doing, focused on the way Hua Cheng's hands move, the rattling of the dice inside the cup.

But the calamity—he's just watching Xie Lian's face with soft eyes, his smile warm. "See? Just like that."

Xie Lian lifts the cup, and really, he should be disappointed, but...rolling two threes in this situation is far better than what he could have hoped for.

Still—he looks up at Hua Cheng, slightly sheepish, "I'm sorry, I lost..." His cheeks tingle when the ghost king leans close—

"Don't be sorry—that was just practice." He murmurs, fangs flashing between his lips as he speaks. "I'm teaching you right now."

Well—that's very patient of him. Xie Lian doesn't think he'd mind if Hua Cheng wanted to teach him other things—

"Are practice rounds an option?!"

The ghosts below seem baffled—annoyed, even—by the exceptions being made for the prince, but Xie Lian doesn't pay any mind to that.

"The master must be in a real good mood today..."

Hadn't those women before said something about Hua Cheng being in an awful mood? What changed?

One eye flickers up, staring down at the crowd sharply.

"Quiet," he murmurs—and to Xie Lian, he sounds calm, but—

The prince can't see the gleam of the Ghost King's fangs, intimidating the entire room into silence.

"Now," he looks back down at Xie Lian, gentle as ever— "Would you like to try again?"

"..." He nods—a little more quickly than he means to in his nervousness, and the ghost king's smile widens as he guides him to shake the cup once more.

This time, it's lifted to reveal two fours. "See? You did even better this time."

Xie Lian nods slowly, watching his increasing luck with growing surprise. Is he actually learning the trick? Honestly, he's just letting Hua Cheng move his hands however he wants, but...

There are some knowing giggles in the crowd, and Xie Lian can't help but wonder if he's being teased.

"San Lang..." he murmurs, his cheeks slightly flushed, and the ghost king shushes him softly, giving his hands a gentle squeeze.

"Don't worry about them—roll again."

Of course, he doesn't dare refuse him—and when he does, two fives appear in his hand.

Lang Qianqiu, who just so happens to have been slowly revolving into the angle to be able to see, huffs. "Don't fall for it! He's clearly cheating somehow!"

That draws offended shouts from the crowd.

“Shut up, our lord would never cheat!”

“He’s being generous, showing the newcomer a secret technique!”

“It’s been working, aren’t you paying attention?!”

Xie Lian can’t help but smile. The ghost king really is beloved, isn’t he?

Ignoring all of the chatter, Hua Cheng continues, “I think you’re ready to play for real —but gege, I have a question for you.”

Xie Lian doesn’t see the way Shi Qingxuan and Lang Qianqiu start at the familiarity in The Ghost King’s time. He just looks up, raising an eyebrow. “What is it?”

“When you mentioned your stake earlier…”

The god blinks innocently underneath his hood, “You mean my body?”

He can hear the smile in the calamity’s voice when he replies. “Yes—do you mind explaining what you meant by that?”

“Oh…” Xie Lian frowns, his brow creasing with thought. “Well—if you need any chores done, or something like that, I’m pretty good with my hands…”

There’s another round of giggling from below, and Hua Cheng sounds like he’s biting back a chuckle himself. “That’s what I thought you meant.”

Xie Lian frowns. What’s so funny…? Before he can wonder too much, the ghost king continues.

“But I’m afraid I don’t have much of a need for manual labor…”

Xie Lian grimaces. Of course—that’s obvious. He probably has countless servants for that sort of thing. “I’m sorry to say that I really don’t have anything else to offer…”

Hua Cheng thinks it over.

“Oh, I don’t know…” His eye gleams softly in the light. “I can think of a thing or two.”

He sounds almost devious, and Xie Lian can’t help but feel a prick of curiosity. “Oh? Like what?”

The answer he receives nearly blows the god’s mind completely out of the water.

“A kiss would be plenty.”

The prince starts, his eyes widening. A…really—?

From overhead, Lang Qianqiu manages to overhear that much, and he scowls. “What kind of SCOUNDREL—!”

Hua Cheng snaps his fingers, eyes never leaving Xie Lian’s face, and General Tai Hua falls silent, suddenly gagged.

“I…” Xie Lian clears his throat, his cheeks burning up. “That’s…ah…”

As he struggles through his answer, Hua Cheng’s tone turns gentle, lowering to the point where others cannot overhear. “Don’t worry, dianxia—you can change the stake if you’d like.”

“T-that’s allowed?”

“Not usually,” the Ghost King admits. “But I’m aware of his highness’s cultivation method. I wouldn’t ask anything of him that he was uncomfortable with.”

Oh. He—

He’s presuming that, because of Xie Lian’s cultivation method, he’s mortified by intimacy.

Which he is. But he doesn’t particularly enjoy the fact that everyone he encounters either presumes the opposite based on unsavory rumors, or treats him like a child. He’s eight centuries old, after all.

And, to Hua Cheng’s surprise—the crown prince of Xianle looks slightly…

…Offended.

“I’ll have you know,” he whispers, his cheeks turning a shade of bright pink, “I’m not completely inexperienced, San Lang.”

The Ghost King’s eyebrows shoot up sharply, “Forgive me, dianxia,” he murmurs, “I had no idea.”

“Yes, well…I-I’ve kissed someone before.”

Hua Cheng’s tone turns to that of amused surprise, “Really?”

Xie Lian takes that amusement for thinking that the Ghost King doesn’t believe him—

(Just the opposite, in fact—Hua Cheng believes him wholeheartedly.)

—and he can admit, coming from him, it doesn’t sound particularly believable.

“Really,” he mumbles, speaking very quietly, but intently. “…With a man,” he adds emphatically. A detail he would normally be too uncomfortable to add, but, well—

Hua Cheng is the one asking for a kiss, so he’s obviously, as one of Xie Lian’s former students would phrase it, ‘open minded.’

“Heavens, dianxia, you’re making me blush…”

He’s saying that, but Xie Lian is the one turning so red, he feels like he might faint. “Stop teasing me, San Lang, I’m being serious…” he grumbles.

“I’m not teasing,” the ghost king promises—but the barely restrained laughter in his tone makes Xie Lian prickle slightly. “But his highness doesn’t have to push himself —”

Between Hua Cheng and Jun Wu, honestly.

“I’m not some sheltered princess that’s never left home before,” the god mutters, lips turning down into a frown, or, well—

No, honestly—with the way his lower lip is jutting out—it’s a pout. (Xie Lian hasn’t pouted since he was 16.)

“I’ve already told you, I’ve done it before—and it was very i…intimate, so…” he tries to tack on that last part with confidence, but his voice wobbles slightly, sheepish, and he’s left even more embarrassed and off kilter than he was before.

If Hua Cheng was smiling any wider, his face might break. “Intimate? Goodness…”

“San Lang…”

“If dianxia really wants to keep the original stakes, I won’t deny him.”

Xie Lian feels a little lightheaded.

Was that what his protests sounded like?!

“I just...don’t want San Lang changing the rules on my account,” the prince mumbles, dipping his chin—even though they weren’t making eye contact to begin with. “That isn’t fair to everyone else.”

“Hmmm...” The ghost king thinks it over. “I suppose you have a point. Can I ask one dianxia one more question?”

Xie Lian nods, stiffening slightly when Crimson Rain Sought Flower leans in rather close, to the point where his lips are beside the god’s ear—

“You’ve only ever kissed one person?”

Well. Only one of them was willing, and it’s the only one that Xie Lian is willing to count.

“...Yes,” he mumbles, unsure as to why Hua Cheng would ask, other than to tease him —

Then he hears a low, distinctly pleased chuckle, and he can’t explain why, but... He shivers.

“He sounds like a lucky man.”

Thud.

Xie Lian’s heart jumps unsteadily, and his head starts to spin, and—

Hua Cheng must be teasing him, right?

“San—?”

“Well,” the ghost king returns to normal speaking volume, “now that we’ve settled the stakes—go ahead and roll, dianxia.”

Lang Qianqiu struggles valiantly under his bonds—likely because he doesn’t want Xie Lian ‘sullying his honor’ for the martial god’s freedom, but...well...it’s already settled.

The prince nods, swallowing hard as he shakes the cup, Hua Cheng’s hands still covering his own.

The cup rattles three times—and instead of trying to mimic the ghost king's movements, Xie Lian simply allows Hua Cheng's hands to guide him completely.

Clack!

Clack!

Clack!

He doesn't dare lift the cup himself to check, but Hua Cheng does—Revealing two sixes.

Xie Lian's jaw drops in shocked confusion. He...won?

Conversely, Hua Cheng clicks his tongue in dismay—but it's very clearly for show.

"Well, would you look at that..." He muses, raising his eyebrows. "I lost..."

Now, it seems a little painfully clear that he had every intention of just calling them 'practice rounds' until Xie Lian won—and the prince can't help but wonder—

If that was really what Hua Cheng intended, why tease Xie Lian so much over the stakes?

Still—a deal is a deal.

With a flick of the ghost king's wrist, Lang Qianqiu is sent crashing to the ground, swearing upon landing.

(To Xie Lian's embarrassment, he honestly forgot that's what he was originally betting over.)

Giving Hua Cheng a grateful nod, he walks back down the steps to check on the younger god, kneeling down beside him, "Are you alright?"

"...Thanks to you," Lang Qianqiu grumbles, rubbing his head. "Good thing you won! That man clearly had nefarious intentions..."

If he actually had such intentions, Xie Lian couldn't have won Lang Qianqiu back, no matter how hard he tried...

Clink!

The familiar tinkling of bells cuts through Xie Lian's train of thought—and as Hua Cheng steps out of the curtains, he hears an array of gasps.

"That skin is mighty fine!"

"It's killing me! Did he have to pick something so delectable?"

"So tall!"

The ghosts crow among themselves, and Xie Lian—he can't help but feel more and more curious, because...after the promise Hua Cheng made to him the last time they spoke...

He's the only one in the room who knows that this is Crimson Rain Sought Flower's true form.

And, ironically enough, he's also the only one in the room that can't actually see it. But for the first time in a while—Xie Lian is slightly frustrated by that fact.

All the while, Lang Qianqiu is grumbling about his treatment, likely to say something more to offend the ghosts around him—and Xie Lian sighs, helping the prince to his feet. "Best not to say anything more, your highness—let's go..."

They make their way back to Shi Qingxuan, but before they can leave the gambling hall entirely, a voice calls after them—

"Hold it."

The three stop immediately. Shi Qingxuan and Lang Qianqiu out of wariness—and Xie Lian out of curiosity.

All around them, ghosts are calling out that it's best if Hua Cheng doesn't let them leave. After all, who knows what secrets these newcomers are hiding? What if they're spies?

But, in spite of Xie Lian's growing anxiety—the ghost king sounds fairly laid back.

"Aren't you going to pay out as well?" When Xie Lian only stares in blank confusion, the ghost king reminds him, "You lost a round gege, remember?"

The god frowns, his brow furrowed. "I thought you said those were practice?"

“They were,” Hua Cheng agrees easily. “But you lost a bet before that at the long table, remember?”

Oh.

Xie Lian had completely forgotten, but…he supposes he did. Does that mean he really intends to—?

“He’s clearly changing the rules to suit his needs…” Lang Qianqiu grumbles, crossing his arms.

“You don’t have to listen to him, your highness! We can fight our way out of this! I won’t get captured again…”

Even if Hua Cheng has changed the rules—it’s only been to Xie Lian's own benefit.

“No…” The god shakes his head, placing a hand on the younger prince’s shoulder. “I already made an agreement, I won’t go back on my word.”

Lang Qianqiu can’t argue with his reasoning—offering it begrudging respect as the ghost king walks towards them, the bells on his boots tinkling gently with every step.

Clink!

Clink!

Clink!

With each sound of the bells, Xie Lian feels his own heart speeding up in response, listening as the ghost king draws closer and closer. And as he does, he finds himself wondering if Hua Cheng might do the gentlemanly thing and kiss him on the hand, or the cheek, but…

Then there are long, cool fingers delicately grasping his chin, and all thoughts of the ghost king demurring for Xie Lian’s sake disappear.

And even though Hua Cheng’s touch is distinctly cold—Xie Lian finds himself burning up, struggling to get enough air into his lungs.

A thumb slides over his lower lip, and the prince can’t help but part them, his face flushed, eyes wide as they can be underneath his hood, filled with nervousness, and… anticipation, if he’s being honest, as the ghost king leans in.

But those lips don't land on his. No, they remain barely more of a hair's-width away from his own, whispering—

"But I think I'd rather save my prize for when we don't have an audience," he murmurs—and for a moment, Xie Lian is too dazed to understand what he's saying.

"Is that alright with you, dianxia?"

Xie Lian takes a moment to respond, his knees wobbling—and to his embarrassment, Hua Cheng actually has to grasp his elbow with his other hand to steady him.

When the prince finally does answer—his voice is rather hoarse. "T...that's fine..."

Hua Cheng smiles, his fingertips lingering on the god's chin for a moment, and while he doesn't need to take in air, Xie Lian still feels the ghost king's cool breath against his lips before he leans back, letting him go.

And while Xie Lian and Shi Qingxuan both seem stunned to the point of speechlessness—Lang Qianqiu is no such thing, crossing his arms and glaring.

"If he was going to let us go, did he really have to make a scene? What's the point?"

The prince fights the urge to smack his forehead in exasperation, wishing that the ghost king had left the prince of Yong'an gagged when he released him from the chains...

A few ghosts around them hiss defensively, ready to defend the lord of their city—but there's no need.

Hua Cheng glances back over his shoulder, eye flashing dangerously as he raises one hand, making the surrounding ghosts fall silent in an easy show of obedience.

"I think you'll find that I'm fair," the ghost king murmurs, hands clasped behind his back, his shoulders squared, "but when someone encroaches on what's mine..." His fangs peek through again, glinting under the lantern light.

"I become a rather unreasonable man."

And considering what they had done—coming into the ghost king's territory—his place of business, no less—and causing a scene…Xie Lian doesn't think Hua Cheng's reaction was unfair at all.

Of course—any subtext in that statement is lost on him.

It's only when they leave the gambler's den that he finds himself able to think clearly, taking in deep breaths of the open air as they make their way down the street, and once they're a few dozen meters away, Xie Lian hears the Wind Master mutter—

"…What the fuck?"

Xie Lian turns his head, his eyebrows raising, wondering what could have the younger god sounding so…scandalized isn't the right word, but certainly shocked. "What do you—?"

He can't finish the question before there's a commotion coming from down the street —

Screaming.

Which is a somewhat common sound in ghost city, but…

"HELP ME!" A small child cries, "GET IT AWAY!"

"T-that can't be what I think it is—!"

Xie Lian listens closer, curious, and then—

"LOOK AT ITS FACE!"

The god pales, his knees going weak for an entirely different reason.

"…Oh no," he mutters, hurrying in that direction, pushing through the crowd.

"Your highness?" Shi Qingxuan attempts to follow after him. "What is it?"

"A—!"

"HE REALLY DOESN'T WANT US TAKING OFF THOSE BANDAGES, DOES HE?"

It has to be him, doesn't it?

“A personal matter!”

Xie Lian mutters, pushing through the ghosts even more desperately. “You two keep investigating! I’ll meet up with you later!”

“But—! Your highness!” Lang Qianqiu frowns. “Won’t you have a hard time, separated? Let—let us go with you!”

The prince’s heart squeezes.

Even after all this time, he really is a kind boy, isn’t he?

“I’ll be fine!”

After all, this is Hua Cheng’s territory, and the Ghost King knows that he’s here. Xie Lian doubts any serious harm will come to him.

“Just stay with the Wind Master!”

Hopefully, Shi Qingxuan can stop him from getting into any more trouble.

And just like that—the god disappears into the crowd, leaving Lang Qianqiu and Shi Qingxuan standing there, baffled.

“...well,” the Wind Master sighs. “He’ll be fine—we need to figure out our next move.”

They move to the side, the streets around them bustling loudly. Ghost City is an objectively beautiful place—filled with brightly colored stalls and lanterns, a full moon hanging overhead.

But it’s also chaotic—and for someone who can’t see— Lang Qianqiu worries.

“...What next move?” He mutters, crossing his arms as he surveys the ghosts around them, “Shouldn’t we just wait for him to finish his business and meet up again?”

“That would be a waste of time, we don’t want to be idle in a place like this for long,” Shi Qingxuan frowns.

Ming-Xiong has spoken to him about ghost city in the past. Apparently he visited once or twice when he was still alive—and he never seemed particularly interested in visiting when Shi Qingxuan suggested it, but —

He did warn the Wind Master that this place could be dangerous. Especially for someone with something to hide.

As a matter of fact—he's probably going to be furious when he finds out that Shi Qingxuan was here.

He tries to pretend that he doesn't care, but honestly—he's just as bad as gege. Overprotective, treating Shi Qingxuan like a child

And if that was true, would the Heavenly Emperor be sending him on an important mission like this?

No, he doesn't think so.

Though Shi Qingxuan suspects he must know something, because he didn't respond when the Wind Master said good morning in their private array.

To be fair—he never used to answer at first. But now, the Wind Master has become accustomed to receiving at least a noncommittal grunt.

But even if he is mad—forget him! That's totally unfair, Shi Qingxuan is four centuries old! He can—!

"...Lord Wind Master?"

Right. The plan.

"Well," he rubs his forehead. "Thanks to you, our identities have already been exposed—and given the seriousness of the situation, and the fact that Crimson Rain already knows we're with his highness..."

(Not to mention the fact that he's already seen Shi Qingxuan as a woman.)

"There's not much of a point in leaving and trying to re-enter with different disguises." The Wind Master mutters. "We're better off figuring out where Crimson Rain is, then having his highness go there and try to mine him for information directly when we reunite—"

"We can't!"

Shi Qingxuan pauses, sending him an annoyed glance. "And why is that?"

"Well—regardless of how you or I feel about it, those two are clearly friends," Lang Qianqiu explains, eyes wide.

… 'Friends' is one way to put it…

"We can't ask his highness to be insincere to a friend!"

Well.

Lang Qianqiu might be sincere to a fault, but at least he doesn't pick and choose who those morals apply to.

Shi Qingxuan pinches the bridge of his nose with a sigh, and, in spite of the situation —he wishes Ming-Xiong was here.

He's always been better at making plans.

Xie Lian stumbles, glancing around, disoriented again by the maze of lights and colors, all of them blending together, but—

No matter how hard he listens, he can't hear anyone screaming about the child anymore.

Now, it's just a crowd of ghosts shouting at him. "What do you think you're doing?!"

"He just tore through the entire street!"

"MY SOUP STAND!" An oversized ghost with the head and torso of a chicken squawks, grabbing the prince by the collar. "HOW AM I SUPPOSED TO MAKE A LIVING NOW?!"

"I…ah…"

Xie Lian smiles apologetically, feet dangling. "I'm sorry, I forgot my own strength—!"

He's dislodged when a larger ghost, this one nine feet tall, half man, half pig, gives the chicken ghost a shove.

"GET IN LINE! HE DESTROYED MY MERCHANDISE FIRST!"

"WELL, I'm THE ONE WHO CAUGHT HIM!"

"And no one wants your disgusting bathwater ANYWAY!" The pig sneers, earning an irritated cry from his avian counterpart.

“I OUGHTA MAKE YOU INTO A ROAST!”

“ExCUSE ME?!”

Xie Lian finds himself being yanked back and forth between the two ghosts like an oversized chew toy, just as a voice cuts through the din;

“Settle down—let him go.”

Immediately, all of the ghosts around fall silent in a hush, and Xie Lian finds himself glum.

Probably just another, even more powerful ghost whose property he’s destroyed accidentally in his Wild goose chase. Like a tiger. Or a bear. Poor San Lang, he really has caused such a mess—

“It’s the Waning Moon Officer, careful now...”

...The what?

Both ghosts set Xie Lian down, and when he finally musters the nerve to peek out between his eyelids, he catches sight of a deep, purple aura standing before him— distinctly different from the rest of the crowd—

Because it isn’t that of a ghost, or a human. No—it’s that of a...

...Heavenly Official?

But it’s constrained, with a tight, burning black band around the middle—one that Xie Lian is painfully familiar with. It’s one of the only parts of himself that he can see, whenever he looks down at his own ankle.

A cursed shackle.

But...what is an exiled heavenly official doing here?

Before Xie Lian can wonder much more, the officer bows his head politely, “Excuse me, sir—the lord of the city has requested your presence in Paradise Manor.”

...He means San Lang?

“...Paradise Manor?” The god questions.

“Hua Chengzhu’s private residence,” the officer explains. He’s entirely in black, hair pulled into a neat, simple ponytail, wearing a horned, crying mask that obscures his face. “Please, follow me.”

And in this case—Xie Lian doesn’t have a reason not to.

After all—his attempts at looking for the boy were clearly futile, and if he stays out here, he has a better chance of ending up in a brawl...

As such, he makes his way after this ‘half moon officer,’ sticking close in his shadow as they make their way through ghost city.

And even if Xie Lian can’t see Paradise Manor…

It’s Beautiful.

ARTWORK INSPIRED BY THIS STORY

Included with permission from the artist, do not reproduce or reuse for any reason.

Xie Lian Jiejie + Shi Qingxuan Memei

[image]

CREDIT: ENVY

CREDIT: REN

Paradise Manor

Chapter Summary

> Xie Lian would be lying if he said that he wasn't glad to see him.
>
> "...You have a lovely home," he offers, meaning that sincerely until Hua Cheng replies:
>
> "It's a residence, not a home."
>
> The prince arches an eyebrow. "Is there a difference?"
>
> "A home is a place you share with family." Hua Cheng replies with a shrug, hands clasped behind his back. "Anywhere else is simply a place to rest one's head."

Chapter Notes

> You can find me on twitter and keep up with current updates of the story HERE

See the end of the chapter for more notes

There must be gardens, because the pleasant, floral aroma is already wafting in his direction, a contrast from the city, which smells of soot, alcohol, and cooking meat.

Now, Xie Lian smells lotus, roses, and Zhi Zhi shrubs—and he can't help but smile, remembering the meaning behind Hua Cheng's name —

City of flowers.

And for the first time in so many centuries, Xie Lian remembers... Back in Xianle—the Royal Gardens smelled the same way.

The gardens where he used to run and play with his friends as a child. Chasing butterflies. Laying back and looking up at the stars, promising not to let go of the grass.

He showed them to Hong'er, once. When the boy was still injured from being dragged behind Qi Rong's carriage

He wasn't there for very long, but Xie Lian still remembers how awestruck the boy seemed, staring at the beauty all around him. Like he'd never seen anything like it before.

When they step through the gates, the rest of the noise from the city seems to fall away.

There's only a gentle breeze, soft chimes echoing through the air—like the bells on Hua Cheng's boots, but slightly deeper in tone.

Long reflection pools bracket the courtyard, ghost fires floating gently overheat, illuminating the lotus blossoms underneath in a soft glow.

Xie Lian smiles at the sight of the little flames, his heart aching as he remembers...

The prince swallows hard, reaching up to push his hair behind his ears, remembering the flower Wu Ming tucked there, all those years ago.

Xie Lian kept it until it turned to dust, but...

It hurts, sometimes, that he doesn't have anything to remember Wu Ming by. Not even Fangxin, he lost that when...

"...The ghost fires...is Hua Cheng keeping them here, or—?"

"No, sir." The ghost officer replies calmly. "They're waiting."

"Oh," the prince frowns, confused. "...Waiting for what?"

"Safe passage," the mysterious official has a pleasant voice, Xie Lian decides. Soft, patient—unimposing. He'd probably make a rather good tutor, or maybe a librarian. "Given and taken."

Xie Lian waits for him to explain more—but he doesn't.

When they reach the steps to the manor, Xie Lian has to stop himself and remember that this isn't a meeting hall or some grand palace, even if it feels like one—this is someone's home.

As such, he kneels down, trying to do the polite thing by taking off his boots, but pauses.

When he was walking here with Yin Yu, many of the ghosts were marveling over the fact that Hua Cheng was inviting a guest inside. Apparently—he never has any visitors. Would he have something for guests—?

"If his highness would like to leave his boots on, my lord wouldn't mind."

"No, no…" Xie Lian shakes his head. "I would never want to be rude, I just wasn't sure if…"

Well, he supposes he could just go barefoot, couldn't he?

"There are slippers for guests if his highness would like them," the officer murmurs, reaching out to offer them.

…Oh.

Well, that solves that. "Thank you," he murmurs.

He slips out of his own boots carefully, setting them by the door, and while the officer told Xie Lian that the slippers were for 'guests' somehow—

They seem to fit the prince like a glove. It really is an odd coincidence!

When he makes his way through the hallways of paradise manor, following Yin Yu's lead, he can't help but marvel over how smooth the floors are—not so much so that one has to worry about slipping, but polished to perfection.

Even the acoustics are elegant, his footsteps echoing.

Xie Lian has never been to such a place where every element seems designed to appeal to every sense—not just sight alone, and the thought makes him smile.

He likes it here. If Hua Cheng wouldn't think it too much of a bother—Xie Lian thinks he might visit him again soon.

Finally, he's led into what certainly feels like a throne room. It must be, after all—it's meant for a king.

And after the hustle and bustle of dozens of servants passes through, Xie Lian hears a soft clap—and they all fall silent.

"Gege," there's that voice again—pleased.

"Welcome." He smiles, rising up from a black jade divan that could likely seat a dozen people, rather than just him. He sounds pleasantly surprised—though Xie Lian isn't quite sure how he could be. "We didn't get the chance to speak openly, before."

Not because Xie Lian didn't want to.

"Yes, well..." He shifts slightly with awkwardness, trying not to focus on...everything else that happened in the gambler's den, particularly towards the end, "you were acting like you didn't know who I was..."

"I hope I didn't offend you,"

In that sense, he sounds completely sincere. "Tai Hua was with his highness, and I thought revealing our prior connection might cause trouble for him."

Xie Lian doesn't know which to focus on—the words 'prior connection,' or the fact that Hua Cheng did a terrible job hiding it.

"And you had this," Xie Lian doesn't realize how close the ghost king has gotten until his fingertips toy with the hem of the God's hood, still covering half of his face. "So, I thought you might be trying to be discreet."

"Well..." Xie Lian bites his lip. "I was, but not from San Lang."

Of course, it doesn't even take him a minute to realize how that sounds.

"Because—well—you would recognize me anyway—" He stumbles, hearing a soft chuckle in response.

"His highness is right—I would know his likeness anywhere."

Xie Lian pauses, lips parting slightly, because—

He's certainly heard that before, but...

The prince squeezes his eyes shut, clearing his throat. "I wanted to thank you for…leaving this for me," he mumbles, reaching up to touch the hairpiece carefully.

Hua Cheng's gaze softens

"Though I wasn't sure what I had done to deserve such a gift—"

"I simply thought dianxia would look lovely wearing it," the ghost king replies, casually stopping Xie Lian's heart in the process. "Of course, I was correct."

Normally, Xie Lian isn’t particularly impacted by compliments to his appearance. Really, there’s only one time that someone called him beautiful that he looks back on fondly, and that was a long time ago.

That being said—Hua Cheng… Coming from him, it feels so…

“And what brings gege to Ghost City?”

It takes the prince a moment to answer—no, it takes him a moment to understand what Hua Cheng actually said, and when he does, it takes him even longer to answer.

He doesn’t want to lie to him—but can Xie Lian really just come out and say that he’s here on the emperor’s business? Even if his intentions were to protect Hua Cheng from suspicion, it still sounds…

“…Even if it wasn't just to see me,” the ghost king adds, “I’m glad.”

Well—even if it wasn’t…

Xie Lian would be lying if he said that he wasn’t glad to see him.

“…You have a lovely home,” he offers, meaning that sincerely until Hua Cheng replies:

“It’s a residence, not a home.”

The prince arches an eyebrow. “Is there a difference?”

“A home is a place you share with family.” Hua Cheng replies with a shrug, hands clasped behind his back. “Anywhere else is simply a place to rest one’s head.”

By that standard, Xie Lian really hasn’t had much of a home since Hong’er lived with him in Puqi shrine.

Technically, he was with his parents for a few months after that, but…Xie Lian was so grief stricken, he hardly took the chances to enjoy their company.

“Do you live here alone, San Lang?”

He certainly does seem like the lone wolf type, but…

“Not…exactly.”

When Xie Lian sends the ghost king a curious look, he simply shrugs.

“There used to be others who lived here, but…more often than not, it’s just me.”

Well—the prince can understand that predicament, but he certainly wouldn’t wish it upon Hua Cheng.

“Well then…”

The offer must seem a little ridiculous, and Xie Lian knows that—but he makes it anyway. “It definitely isn’t as elegant as this, but if you ever want to visit, the doors of Puqi shrine are always open to you.”

He doesn’t see the way Hua Cheng’s face utterly lights up.

“You’ll need to be careful, making offers like that—it won’t take me long to make a nuisance of myself.”

Xie Lian can’t help but smile, shaking his head. “San Lang could never be a nuisance…” Then he stops, remembering. “…San Lang?”

The ghost king hums contently in reply, “Hmm?”

Taking one cautious step forward, he asks, “This is your true form, correct?”

However briefly, the ghost king stiffens—almost as if he’s waiting for a reaction, and Xie Lian simply states;

“Do you mind if I…see? In my own way.”

Xie Lian doesn’t know why he feels so nervous about asking—it’s not as though Hua Cheng has ever denied him before. Then again—the prince has never asked him for much, so maybe he simply hasn’t seen the need to.

Surely, there must be a limit to how far he’s willing to go to indulge him—no one is that generous.

Still, even now, he grants Xie Lian’s request without a single word of protest—though not by illuminating himself with spiritual power as he did the last time they met.

He seems to glean exactly what Xie Lian meant by ‘my own way,’ simply leaning forward slightly, hands clasped behind his back, replying—

“His highness is welcome to examine anything he likes, there’s no need to ask for my permission."

"..." Xie Lian's lips curve up into a small smile as he reaches up, surprised to find it's further than he thought, rocking up onto the balls of his toes until Hua Cheng leans further down.

The ghosts in the gambler's den weren't exaggerating—he is rather tall, isn't he?

"...Thank you," he murmurs, sliding his palms over Hua Cheng's cheeks, finding that his skin isn't quite as cool as it was before—but Xie Lian has the sneaking suspicion that change is purely for his own benefit.

The calamity simply hums softly in response, a soft rumble under Xie Lian's touch that leaves him momentarily distracted before he moves on, and...

In truth, the difference isn't drastic. His jaw is sharper, slightly more squared. His nose is perfectly straight, slightly pointed.

His mouth—one that Xie Lian knows to be capable of being rather wicked, depending on the audience—is soft under his touch. And when the ghost king's lips turn up—

Xie Lian can feel that dimple is still there, cutting into his right cheek—and the prince can't help but smile back.

There's also a slightly sharp point at the corner of his mouth, one that retreats the moment the god's thumb brushes over it—and he raises an eyebrow.

"...San Lang, did you change your form a little bit just now?"

Hua Cheng shakes his head underneath Xie Lian's hands.

"No, your highness—this is my true form, unaltered."

"...I see," Xie Lian murmurs, his eyebrows knitting together. "I just thought I felt..."

"They're retractable."

He— Oh.

After a dazed moment of contemplation, Xie Lian realizes that Hua Cheng must be referring to...

"...I didn't know ghosts had those," he mumbles, feeling a little silly. "Well—human ones, I mean."

Naturally the ghost of a bear or a wolf would half them, or snakes and the like—Wen Jiao probably had them as well, but he was a demon—

Then again, isn't Hua Cheng also demonic—?

"Weaker ones don't," the calamity murmurs in response—and Xie Lian supposes that makes sense. After all, it's not like ghosts often use spiritual tools in the way that gods do. More often than not, their physical forms are the actual weapons.

(Like Xuan Ji's claws, for example.)

The thought of that makes him reach down to grasp one of Hua Cheng's hands thoughtlessly, just to check his fingertips—finding them smooth, just like any normal man's—

(Though his hands are noticeably larger than before, callouses more noticeable.)

And when Xie Lian feels the ghost king smirking under his other palm, his ears grow warm.

"Those are retractable as well, dianxia," he murmurs, clearly reading the god's intentions.

"...If San Lang is worried about making me uncomfortable, please don't," Xie Lian mumbles.

"Of course," San Lang agrees. "But this is what they're like, normally."

"Really?"

"Well," there's a hint of amusement in his voice. "Most people don't walk around with their tongues sticking out, do they?"

Well—Xie Lian supposes not.

"But if you'd like to see them—?"

"It's fine," the god mumbles, releasing Hua Cheng's hand when he realizes how long he's been holding it, turning his attention back to the ghost's face, "I don't want San Lang to be uncomfortable just to sate my curiosity..."

There's immediate assurance—

"It isn't uncomfortable, and his highness's curiosity is a more than worthy cause."

Xie Lian has already come to terms with the fact that Hua Cheng is somewhat of a shameless flirt—he's dealt with those before.

He wishes the ghost wouldn't do that while Xie Lian's hands are all over his face. It makes it harder and harder to think straight, from what the prince can only assume must be embarrassment.

In any case, his hands roam slightly higher.

There, he finds the delicate shape of a closed eyelid, framed by dark, thick lashes— sharp brows—

And the shape of a leather eyepatch. Well maintained under his touch, though slightly worn from the passage of time.

"...San Lang?"

"Hmm?"

"Before..." Xie Lian bites his lip, wondering if this is the best time—or the best way— to bring up the subject, but... "When you first introduced yourself to me, and you were talking about how Crimson Rain Sought Flower lost his eye..."

'Doing something stupid, probably.'

After a pause, Hua Cheng replies—

"If gege wants to know the story, I don't mind telling it—though now probably isn't the best time."

Xie Lian doesn't mind that answer—after all, Hua Cheng said the same thing when Xie Lian asked him about his true form.

And, just as he promised, he showed it to the prince shortly after.

Finally, his fingers draw far up enough to reach Hua Cheng's hairline, finding dark, silky locks forming into a widow's peak. Not only that—it's almost completely loose around his shoulders.

The only exception being a single braid with something smooth near the bottom, a bead of some sort—one that Xie Lian has often heard the ghost rolling between his fingertips.

His other hand is still pressed to Hua Cheng's cheek, feeling the movement when he speaks—

"Well?"

It's only then that Xie Lian seems to notice the fact that the ghost king's hands landed on his waist at some point during his examination—lightly, but still present—

And now he's waiting, somewhat expectantly. But also, even if he sounds confident…

There's an underlying note of anxiety there. As if—underneath all of the shameless flirting—he's actually worried that Xie Lian might think…

The prince's heart squeezes a little, his thumb unconsciously stroking over Hua Cheng's cheek.

The word falls out of him effortlessly.

"Hand—"

And then he stops, catching himself before the second syllable can come out, his expression contorting slightly as he looks away.

What was he…?

He's only known Hua Cheng for the span of two weeks, and he almost called him…

"…Dianxia?"

He's only ever called one person that before. And he still remembers that face so well. The curve of his mouth. Every scar. The slightly crooked angle of his nose.

"…San Lang had nothing to be nervous about," Xie Lian mumbles.

Hong'er feels so heavy against his chest now.

"I like his true form—very much."

Actually—the prince feels guilty for the goosebumps on the back of his neck. Each skip of his heartbeat—it feels like a betrayal, somehow.

“...Like?” the ghost king replies—and he’s quiet. Quiet enough for Xie Lian to worry.

Because even if he’s someone who has always taken his own beauty for granted—Xie Lian has long since known what it was like to feel a sort of hideousness.

Maybe not in his skin, but certainly in his bones. He’s felt grotesque. Tainted. Unworthy.

Xie Lian doesn’t want anyone to think he sees them that way—and certainly not someone that he—

Not someone that he respects.

“It’s perfect,” he mumbles, his palm still resting against Hua Cheng’s cheek, “I wouldn’t want San Lang to change a thing. So—you don’t have to wear a mask around me, not unless you want to.”

There’s a silence that lasts for several moments, and—

Xie Lian can’t see the look on the Ghost King’s face. How full his expression is— brimming with an open sort of adoration, struck with awe.

And honestly, what else could Hua Cheng be but awestruck, when the only thing in this world that he’s ever found to be truly beautiful deigns to call him perfect with such sincerity?

He’s quiet for so long, Xie Lian almost asks if he’s said something wrong, but—

“...Even the retractable features?”

He’s teasing, but with little sharpness—and Xie Lian cracks a breathless smile in response, a shaky laugh slipping from his throat as he nods.

“Of course!”

Still, they don’t part—and it’s only now that Xie Lian starts to notice something else

The position they’re in—with Hua Cheng’s hands on his waist, and Xie Lian’s on his face, standing so close like this....it’s...

It reminds him of what was said before, in the Gambler’s den. About the Ghost King's 'prize.'

And...of the fact that they're quite alone at the moment.

Hua Cheng raises an eyebrow, still holding himself perfectly still for Xie Lian's benefit, bent over to meet him halfway—but there's a small, amused smile on his face. "Your highness, is something on your mind?"

"...Um..." Xie Lian swallows dryly, his eyes wide. "...There's something I need San Lang's help with," he blurts out, clawing for anything less embarrassing than what he was actually thinking of. "If it's not too much trouble—"

"On the contrary, this one is delighted that gege would ask." He sounds pointedly sincere about that.

"...There's a boy," the prince mumbles, "one I suspect might be from my own kingdom, long ago. He has scars from Human Face Disease."

He can't see the way the ghost king's eyes narrow, but he can feel the way those hands tighten slightly on his waist. "How peculiar."

Xie Lian nods, because it is—he hasn't encountered any of the citizens from Xianle, ghost or otherwise, since he was rather young. "I'm afraid I didn't handle it particularly well when I first came across him, so he ran from me—but I have reason to think he's here in Ghost City."

There's a pause, and Xie Lian finds himself wondering if it was rude of him to ask— after all, even Ling Wen has struggled with tracking the boy down—

"But really, if it's too much trouble—"

"Not at all," Hua Cheng replies. "He shouldn't be difficult to find—there are ghosts here old enough to remember the plague."

That strikes Xie Lian's curiosity.

"Are you? Old enough to remember what it looks like, I mean." He mumbles.

"...I am," The ghost king agrees.

His tone sounds slightly...off.

Before Xie Lian can express any worry about that, however, the ghost king has a question of his own.

"Lang Qianqiu—was he left alone in the city?"

The prince shakes his head—even though the reminder of the trouble his former student caused makes him wince.

"No," Xie Lian assures him quickly, "Lord Wind Master is with him—we got separated while I was looking for the boy...I'm sorry that he caused such a scene back there—"

"Dianxia had nothing to do with that," Hua Cheng shakes his head. "There's no need for an apology."

Still, he can't help but feel somewhat responsible...

"I'll go ahead and clear his debt," the calamity carries on with a shrug. "So long as he stays out of my sight, we won't have any more problems."

That...is easier said than done, but— "My lord?"

The two men start—with Xie Lian taking a step back when he realizes how close they're still standing to one another, Hua Cheng's hands dropping from his waist.

"What is it?"

"The boy, we've found him." Xie Lian's eyebrows arch sharply.

Well—that was rather quick.

Given what a struggle it's been to track the child down—Xie Lian wasn't expecting the task to be completed so soon.

The man from before—the Waning Moon Officer, the ghosts in the market called him —leads the boy in by the arm. Not unkind, but firm in his grip.

"Well, there we are," Hua Cheng smiles, clasping his hands behind his back. "What would dianxia like us to do with him, then?"

It seems to shock the servants in the hall, listening to Crimson Rain treating anyone with such deference—but Xie Lian doesn't notice.

"Oh, don't worry San Lang," he murmurs, walking closer to the boy. "I can handle the rest from here, you've done more than enough."

That draws a frown, but the ghost king says little more, watching as Xie Lian kneels beside the young man, tilting his head back with a warm smile.

"Hello," he murmurs, not reaching out, hoping not to startle him. "Do you remember me? I'm sorry we didn't get off to a good start, before."

The boy trembles in the Ghost Officer's grip, his head hanging low—but he nods. Not that Xie Lian can see—but he senses the movement.

The prince turns his head in the officer's direction. "I think you can let him go now, he won't run. Is he hurt at all?"

"...No, sir," the dark clothed man replies softly, "His bandages are a bit dirty, but otherwise he's alright."

"Well," Xie Lian offers the child a wry smile, reaching into the pockets of his robes. "I always happen to have extras."

Given that his throat and wrists are covered in the wrappings—that makes the boy let out a cautious little laugh.

"Your highness..." Hua Cheng frowns.

"There's no need to trouble yourself, I can—"

"It's alright, San Lang." Xie Lian assures him firmly. "I'd rather do it myself." After all—he did promise to look after him, when Xiao Ying passed.

He's quick about it—after all, he has quite a bit of experience with such things.

The child is still, not trying so hard to get away from him, now—and when it's finished, Hua Cheng intercedes again, "He's probably tired, after all of that commotion. Let us take him to one of the guest rooms so he can rest."

This time, Xie Lian sees no reason to protest.

When he's taken away, he expects to speak to Hua Cheng more, maybe to try and ask him outright if he's seen any injured officials in the area, but...

"Apologies, gege," the ghost king murmurs. "Something has been brought to my attention that needs to be dealt with.”

“Oh,” Xie Lian frowns, his expression tinged with concern. “Is everything alright?”

“It’s nothing that gege needs to concern himself with.” Hua Cheng steps forward, taking the prince’s hand so that he can lead him to the divan where the ghost king was resting when he arrived.

“Feel free to wait here until I return, the servants will fetch you anything you’d like, if you call.”

“San Lang, that’s really too much—”

“It’s nothing, gege—really.”

He strides from the room, leaving Xie Lian sitting there, contemplative.

The divan is surprisingly plush—and huge. Even when Xie Lian leans his back against the cushions as it’s intended, his feet dangle above the floor. It seems like it must be a rather ridiculous sight in his mind’s eye, so he pulls them back up, curling his legs underneath him.

Something about this is oddly familiar—yet alien at the same time.

No one waits on him anymore, and hasn’t in centuries. But still, the old habit is still there.

Xie Lian finds himself raising one hand—not with a request in mind, but just remembering how a simple gesture like that could send an entire flurry of servants rushing his way, asking about anything and everything he could possibly need.

It’s been a long time since he thought about that. In part because it’s been decades since he missed it.

Xie Lian misses his loved ones now, not the wealth, the privilege, or the titles. Those things matter very little, when one stares nearly a millennia in the face.

But it’s also been centuries since he was inside a palace—or even something close to it. The last time he was in a palace, he...

Xie Lian’s fingertips rise up to his face, lightly brushing over the bridge of his nose— remembering the golden mask that once sat there.

Something stirs him from his thoughts, then—the sound of a laugh. No, that's not the right word—it's more like a giggle, that of a child.

"..." The prince raises an eyebrow, shackles gleaming as he peers around, looking for signs of a ghost nearby. "...Hello? Is someone there?"

No one answers—and Xie Lian supposes none of the servants Hua Cheng left behind would, not unless he made a specific request. Most of them seemed petrified by the idea of being a nuisance.

But then he hears the sound of feet on marble, like someone is hurrying down the corridor.

"..." Xie Lian braces his palms against the divan, pushing until his feet finally return to the floor, listening closely.

He doubts it could be the child he was looking for—he might have been slightly more relaxed this time around, but he certainly wasn't the playful type either.

Paradise Manor is a beautiful place. Mysterious, enticing. Not so different from the man who built it.

But, just the same, it leaves the Prince of Xianle full of questions.

Why does it feel familiar? And what were the ghost fires out in the front courtyard waiting for?

'Safe passage, given and taken.'

That was what the Ghost Officer said—but what on earth does that mean? And why does Hua Cheng have an exiled official working under him to begin with? And—

There's another giggle, echoing down the hall, drawing him forward.

...Hua Cheng was the one who said that more often than not, he was the only one who lived in this place. But why does Xie Lian get the distinct feeling that statement may not have been entirely true?

He opens his mouth to call out again when he rounds the corner—but then he stops

There's an aura at the end of the hallway—familiar to him now. Not only for the deep purple shade—but for the fact that it doesn't seem to belong.

It’s that of the half moon officer.

Xie Lian assumes that the man must not have seen him, as he doesn’t acknowledge him.

And instead of calling over to him, Xie Lian finds himself shrinking back, effectively hiding himself around the corner. After all—he doesn’t want to seem like he was snooping, he wasn’t, but—

Isn’t hiding more suspicious in that case?

Before he can come down on a particular answer, Xie Lian hears the now familiar rattling of dice.

Clack!

Clack!

When they land—it’s with a metallic thud, like they’re landing in some sort of dish.

Ding!

...Who throws dice in the middle of a corridor?

But then—something strange happens.

In the span of less than a second—the Ghost Officer’s aura disappears in tandem with the sound of a slamming door.

That hasn’t happened before, not since Xie Lian’s shackle was damaged.

If that was something as simple as the officer disappearing behind a closed door, Xie Lian would still be able to see him—spiritual power has to be much further away before it disappears from his sight, so...

Where did he go?

The prince makes his way down the hall, curious.

When he reaches the point where the officer disappeared, he reaches out cautiously with his fingertips—finding what seems to be an ordinary door at first. Not even locked, because when Xie Lian pulls it open, there’s only an empty room on the other side.

What on earth...?

But when he feels around the door frame, his palm sliding against the wall—Xie Lian finds something else.

A statue of a woman, hewn from marble—finely dressed, and from the feel of it, she must have been a historical figure or a former goddess, though not one that he recognizes.

Her robes are detailed, and he can feel a headpiece that certainly seems to be that of royalty—but there are two details that catch his attention.

First—the butterflies carved into her sleeves, so similar in feel to Hua Cheng's. And second—there's a sword at her waist.

Which makes it hard to discern who this statue could be depicting.

It's rare for a monarch to be portrayed holding a sword. Figures like Xie Lian are somewhat different. He was never crowned, and his training in martial arts and cultivation was a rarity for royalty.

It seems unlikely that she would be a queen, then—and this does feel somewhat reminiscent of a divine statue. Rather similar in style to the one San Lang carved in his shrine, actually, but...

Only martial gods are depicted with weaponry or armor of any sort. And in all of Xie Lian's time—he's never heard of a martial goddess.

But before he can wonder any more about that—he finds what she's holding between her palms: a tray. Not like a serving tray, but thick and rounded steel.

That's when he realizes—it must have been where the dice landed before. There's nothing on the tray when the prince checks for it now —and it would seem that the dice disappeared at the same time as the Ghost Officer.

Which really only leaves one possibility:

That there's some sort of travel array set up, and the dice are the key to using it. Which means it's utterly useless to Xie Lian—because no matter what he rolled, it probably wouldn't be the proper number combination to begin with.

Then, a voice rings out, making him jump.

"Gege!"

It's a familiar name—but it's not coming from Hua Cheng, and—

A child rushes past him now, so quickly that the breeze stirs Xie Lian's robes.

—the call wasn't directed at him.

"Gege, you're too fast!"

His curiosity is only spurned further when another voice answers.

"Sorry, sorry…"

The ghost that ran past Xie Lian first was rather weak, her aura barely more than that of a ghost fire, but the slightly older child that reappears around the corner—

Xie Lian saw that aura before, in town.

Vividly green, with a burning, flickering core.

When he appeared before, he was in the form of a young teenager—but now, he seems to be barely more than nine years old, judging by the sound of his voice.

He drifts back down the hallway now, meeting the little girl halfway and taking her by the hand.

"What were you wandering off for?" The words sound slightly scolding, but he's gentle, leading her off to a room on the other side of the corridor. "You'll get lost that way."

"…I got lonely," she admits. "Is it going to be much longer?"

"No," the older boy promises. "Just waiting for a few others. Go ahead and sleep, okay?"

There's the sound of a door shutting, and while the little girl may have gone—Xie Lian knows that he isn't alone.

"…I didn't get your name before." He comments quietly, folding his arms inside his sleeves.

There's nervous silence on the other side of the hall, and the prince smiles awkwardly, trying not to be too 'intimidating,' though he doubts many would see him that way anymore as it is.

He tries asking another question, ever so gently, “Do you live here?”

It remains quiet.

It takes so long—Xie Lian isn’t exactly sure if he should try again, or just leave the child to his business, but—

“Shuo.” The reply is soft, near incoherent, until he repeats himself. “My name is Shuo, and I live here sometimes.”

He doesn’t sound so sure about the last part.

There’s a cautious hesitance to him, like a kitten that’s just a little too nervous to approach a friendly human, an air that makes Xie Lian’s heart ache in a way that he can’t initially explain.

“And the little one who was with you?”

“...She’s just passing through,” he mumbles.

When Xie Lian raises an eyebrow, he grips one wrist behind his back, shuffling his feet. “...Some ghosts can’t move on by themselves,” he mutters, “especially the little ones.”

The prince has never heard of such things before—but he supposes it makes sense.

“And they stay here?” Xie Lian questions, turning his head in the direction where Shuo led the little girl off, and the boy shakes his head.

“Not for long. Hua Chengzhu guides them along. The ghost fires that get stuck around here too.”

Ah—Xie Lian blinks slowly, understanding.

That’s what the officer meant before, referring to ‘safe passage,’ and now—

Now he remembers a story that he heard a long, long time ago. One that he had forgotten over the centuries.

About a new ghost king, one who would guide wayward children if they waited in the night, a red lantern in hand.

Now, Xie Lian realizes—that must have been Hua Cheng. It’s no wonder then, that he would have remembered the outbreak of Human Face Disease.

After all—the prince was beginning to hear stories about him less than forty years into his second banishment.

And that makes him wonder—if they had waited that night, when he was with Kuo's little brother and his friends in the woods—would Xie Lian have met Hua Cheng back then?

How different would things have been if he had? Then again, Xie Lian was...

Back then? In perfect honesty, he was immature, spoiled, and recovering. He doubts Hua Cheng would have wanted his friendship back then, so maybe the fact that they didn't meet was for the best.

"And you...help him?" He questions, trying to understand where the young ghost factors into the situation. After all—he seems to hold some authority in the city, and to take on some responsibility here.

Still, Shuo remains quiet—and Xie Lian tries another question.

"...You were older before," he comments quietly. It isn't exactly a question, but he allows it to hang in the air—and after a moment, Shuo replies—

"Adults frighten them, sometimes. It's easier if you're closer to their age."

Xie Lian suspected as much.

"...Are you—?" He starts, wondering how much he could ask the young man. After all, he seems to know quite a bit more than he's saying, but whether or not he'll answer is a different matter all together—

"Dianxia, there you are."

It would seem that the Ghost King has returned.

Xie Lian glances back in his direction, lips turning up nearly unconsciously at the sound of his voice. "Oh, I'm sorry—I went to look for the child while you were gone, and I'm afraid...I got a bit lost."

He nods towards Shuo, adding—

"This young man was helping me find my way."

Hua Cheng’s gaze flickers over to Shuo—and when he arches one eyebrow, curious, the boy simply shrugs, mumbling—

“Mr. Hua and I were just about to head back to the throne room,” he agrees—and Xie Lian finds the tips of his ears growing hot.

That name was obviously an alias.

Did he really have to mention it in front of—?

Now, Hua Cheng’s other eyebrow rises to join it’s counterpart, and his lips spread into a slow smile. “Mr. Hua?” He murmurs, sounding utterly amused.

“We—” Xie Lian starts, then bites his tongue, stopping himself.

At first, he was going to say that he hadn’t realized that Shuo was an associate of Hua Cheng’s when he introduced himself before, but then he remembers what Shuo said, standing outside the gambler’s den—

That he was ‘grounded,’ technically speaking.

So, he can’t explain that.

Not without potentially getting the boy in trouble.

Shuo, however, seems to have no such reservations. And when Hua Cheng is around, he’s suddenly far less quiet.

“...It’s Mr. Hua Lian, isn’t it?” He repeats, his eyes wide. “I apologize if I misheard.”

“...”

He definitely knows he didn’t mishear, Xie Lian can tell as much from the ever so subtle undertone to his voice—that of mischievousness.

“Did his highness tell you that when you snuck out, before?”

Ah.

Xie Lian sags, feeling like the living equivalent of a deflated balloon.

So, Hua Cheng already figured that out. Xie Lian didn’t necessarily have to fall on that sword. That’s—

That’s fine. His face feels like it’s burning up, but that’s fine.

Shuo seems properly chagrined now, suddenly focused on examining his shoes. “Who told you about that?”

“Your favorite person decided to send a few beasts to stir up trouble,” the mere mention of that makes the younger ghost hiss, lips pulling back to bare his teeth.

Xie Lian can’t help but wonder whether or not he has fangs too—and if so, whether they’re retractable.

“While I was in the city, a few people mentioned seeing you.” Well, at least he knows Xie Lian wasn’t the one who—

Shuo crosses his arms, still staring at his shoes, “I only went because there was a commotion,” he mumbles.

Hua Cheng glances in the prince’s direction. “...A commotion?” He repeats.

Suddenly, like he’s watching a crash in slow motion, Xie Lian realizes where the conversation is going, and his heart stutters.

“I—!”

“One of the stall owners was bothering a young woman who said she was looking for her husband.” Shuo mumbles. “Lan Chang stepped in to help her, but...”

That’s when he trails off, seeming to realize that the story doesn’t sound...particularly flattering to the god in question.

“...This altercation somehow led to you two running into one another?” The ghost king arches an eyebrow—and Xie Lian feels almost lightheaded with embarrassment, but—

“It was me,” he mumbles, wishing it was possible for him to just sink into the floor and disappear.

There’s a long beat of silence—and Xie Lian comes to the conclusion that he’s already in the metaphorical hole, if you will—so he might as well keep on digging.

“I was in disguise,” he croaks, regretting a multitude of decisions over the last twenty four hours.

“And I got caught turning back, which caused a bit of a scene...Shuo helped me, and showed me the way to the Gambler’s Den.”

“Disguise,” Hua Cheng repeats, uncharacteristically quiet—and Xie Lian can’t help but wonder if the Ghost King is offended by his sneaking around.

“…Yes,” he mumbles, nodding his head miserably. “Before Lang Qianqiu’s outburst, we were trying to keep a low profile. But I ended up attracting too much attention anyway, so…”

“Disguised as a woman,” the calamity murmurs—not upset, but Xie Lian buries his face in his hands.

“It was the Wind Master’s idea, not mine…” He mumbles, his voice rising an octave.

“A woman looking for her husband.”

Honestly, Xie Lian feels even more sorry about that. Obviously, a female cultivator could be in Ghost City for other reasons than looking for a spouse.

But he had been panicking, and it was just the first thing that came to mind—

“Going by the name Hua.”

Oh.

Finally, XIe Lian starts to understand what the Ghost King has been getting at—and so does Shuo, covering his mouth with both hands to stop himself from laughing.

Oh no.

“…I…” Xie Lian starts to lift his head, his mouth hanging open. “I didn’t mean—oh, you don’t think—?”

It may have, to some outside observers, seemed like Xie Lian was trying to pose as… …Crimson Rain Sought Flower’s wife.

The prince doesn’t know whether to laugh, or cry.

And the worst part is—Xie Lian is slowly beginning to realize that some people are in fact going to connect that incident to his interaction with Hua Cheng in the gambler’s hall.

Meaning they’ll have seen the prince—theoretically—posing as Hua Cheng’s bride, and then…

He went on to wager a kiss with the Ghost King, whether or not it was his idea, in front of an entire crowd of ghosts.

Which might make it seem less like Xie Lian is posing as Hua Cheng's wife, and more like he actually is his, well…

…Oh, heavens, what has he done?

"I…" He whispers between his fingers, "I didn't mean—!"

"Of course," Hua Cheng is quick to agree. "It's alright."

"…Hua Lian was the name I was using in Gusu, before we met," Xie Lian croaks, "It was just the first thing I thought of."

"Understandable," he's nodding with every word Xie Lian says, but it's hard to tell whether or not Hua Cheng is simply trying to make him feel better.

"…I just used the surname Hua a lot because…Flower Crowned…Martial God and everything…" Xie Lian mumbles, wishing he could make himself stop talking.

"That makes perfect sense, dianxia, it's alright."

How could it be alright, when Xie Lian has made such a fuss?

He couldn't have made more of a scene without setting the entire place on fire, to be honest.

Shuo glances back and forth between the two, his eyes wide—in part, trying to hold back laughter, but also…

He's never seen Hua Cheng look quite so off kilter up until now.

Hua Cheng seems similarly aware of that fact, murmuring, "You've had a long day, you should rest."

Of course—he isn't wrong, it's been a rather eventful twenty four hours for the younger ghost.

But he's also asking to spare himself from the audience during this conversation.

"…" Shuo glances back and forth between the two of them once more, and he shrugs— making his way back down the hallway. "If you say so."

Xie Lian rubs his cheeks, struggling with his embarrassment, and the best distraction seems to be changing the subject.

“...That child seems fairly familiar with you,” Xie Lian mutters, his voice slightly hoarse.

“Well,” by comparison, Hua Cheng seems relatively unaffected, and Xie Lian finds himself envying his stoicism. “We’ve known each other for quite some time.”

Yes—but there was an ease between the two that Hua Cheng didn’t seem to share with the other ghosts in the city.

Shuo seemed respectful of Hua Cheng, but not quite so reverential as everyone else. “Is he one of your subordinates?”

Hua Cheng thinks on that, offering the prince his arm. Xie Lian reaches out and takes it without thinking, walking alongside him as the ghost king makes his way back down the hall.

“He does perform tasks for me,” he murmurs, “But I wouldn’t call him an employee.”

The prince grows quiet for a moment, thinking on that, eventually asking—

“...Are you his father, San Lang?”

That actually seems to punch through the ghost king’s composure, drawing a surprised snort.

“Pardon, dianxia?”

“I just mean...well...”

Stories like that were rather common, when Xie Lian was a child.

Hua Cheng never mentioned anything about having been married at any point in time—and he certainly doesn’t act like he is now—but it’s not unheard of for illegitimate children to be raised as apprentices.

It even happens in the heavens, with some martial gods appointing their own unclaimed children as deputies.

Xie Lian wouldn’t judge Hua Cheng for that at all—it seems rather human to him. “...You two just seemed almost like family,” he explains, “that’s why I asked.”

“...I’m not offended,” Hua Cheng clarifies, making him sigh with relief, “but I haven’t fathered any children as of yet, your highness.”

That’s a shame—from the way Xie Lian saw him handle Banyue, and later Shuo— Hua Cheng seems like he would make a rather good father.

And now that he’s dead—or undead, as it were—Xie Lian supposes he never will.

“But I did take Shuo in when he was very young, along with his older brother,” the ghost king explains, “and he’s been somewhat like...a ward of mine ever since. So, you weren’t entirely wrong.”

The prince understands what Hua Cheng means then, when he implies that Shuo is somewhat neither here nor there. Wards are complicated in that sense, after all.

“Is his brother still here as well?”

There’s a moment’s hesitation.

“...He was dispersed a century ago, dianxia.”

Xie Lian’s eyes widen with sympathy.

“...Oh, San Lang...” he murmurs, squeezing the ghost king’s arm. “I’m so sorry.”

For a moment—Hua Cheng isn’t sure of how to react. Many comforted Shuo in the time after—as they should have, the child was a shell of himself for years.

But no one ever said such a thing to Hua Cheng—and he never expected them to.

After all—he wasn’t Bao’s father, nor his brother. He was a guardian—and one who failed to protect him at that.

However, hearing it from his god now—the ghost king can’t say that he isn’t comforted.

“...It’s quite alright, your highness,” he replies quietly. “It’s been many years now.”

But that doesn’t always mean that the pain has gotten easier—Xie Lian knows that better than anyone.

They come to a halt now, in front of a different door.

“There was actually a place I had been meaning to show you,” Hua Cheng murmurs. “I thought his highness might enjoy it.”

Xie Lian’s eyebrows arch curiously, and he smiles. “Then by all means...” he murmurs.

Two steel tigers stand before the door, locked in makeshift battle.

With a flick of Hua Cheng’s wrist, however, they part in a quiet screech of metal—and when the door opens, the first thing Xie Lian recognizes is the distinctive smell of metal and leather.

He reaches out carefully—at Hua Cheng’s encouragement—and he finds rows upon rows of weaponry.

The prince’s eyes widen slightly when they find the hilt of a sword—then an ax, a polearm, and a shield—every type of blade he can imagine, and it seems to be here.

Hua Cheng watches him closely, trying to discern whether or not the prince is pleased from the look on his face—

And after a moment, Xie Lian smiles so widely that it’s near painful. “San Lang! Are all of these really yours?”

“They are,” the ghost king smiles in return, watching as the prince takes in the weapons one by one, “are any of them to dianxia’s liking?”

Xie Lian almost snorts, finding the idea that any of them could be considered ‘sub- par’ near laughable. “All of them! They’re amazing!”

The quality and durability of each blade alone is outstanding...and there's something else about them that catches the god's attention;

They're the same quality of what he would expect of a Heavenly weapon. Better in some cases, really.

"...Can I ask how you came to have them?"

"Of course," Hua Cheng smiles, not seeming particularly secretive about the matter. "I made them myself."

Xie Lian's eyebrows couldn't raise any higher at this point as he carefully takes a rapier into his hands, light, perfectly balanced, but incredibly strong.

"...You did?"

Hua Cheng nods, looking over Xie Lian's shoulder, examining the particular blade that he's holding. "Every single one."

The prince finds himself remembering what Hua Cheng said during their journey to the crescent moon kingdom.

"...Was your mother really a bladesmith, then?"

After a moment, the ghost king replies--but his tone is somewhat distant, "...She didn't give birth to me," he admits. "She was more of a Guoshi, but I have long considered her a mother."

Even curiouser–Xie Lian has rarely heard of female Guoshis, particularly in the past.

"And your birth mother?" He questions, knowing the question might bring painful memories with it--but Hua Cheng doesn't seem particularly bothered when he answers.

"I lost her when I was very young, dianxia. I don't remember much. But she was a good woman, I know that."

Xie Lian supposes he can somewhat understand what Hua Cheng is surprising. He had a difficult relationship with his own father. Not because they didn't love one another, but because they rarely saw eye to eye on most matters.

Still--Mei Nianqing was a father to him as well.

To some extent, he could even say the same thing about Jun Wu. Both taught him so much about what it meant to become a god, and a man...

So, all three were like fathers to him–though not all for the same reasons, or to the same degree of success.

“And your mother...she taught you how to make all of this?” He murmurs, not even bothering to disguise the awe in his voice.

“I’m not quite to her skill level,” Hua Cheng admits with a shrug. “But she did.” Xie Lian can’t imagine that.

Any one of the weapons here surpasses most of the arms in the heavens, but still—he lets the matter rest.

Instead, he inquires about each and every one of them—the method behind making them, their use. Hua Cheng is patient, answering each question in detail.

There are blades of white jade—some that turn elastic and change shapes under Xie Lian's touch—

One object catches his eye, surprising him—because it doesn't seem like a weapon at all, but rather a ring, sitting on a velvet cushion.

"...San Lang," he arches an eyebrow. "Is this a weapon as well?"

The ghost king leans over his shoulder, somewhat amused. "Why doesn't his highness put it on and see?"

It's a silver ring, from the feel of the metal—with a gem set into the face—and when Xie Lian slips it onto his finger, it's the perfect size.

Xie Lian is starting to think that Hua Cheng must design objects that automatically adjust to the size of the person wearing them—otherwise, it wouldn't make much sense that both the slippers—and now the ring—fit him so perfectly.

But he doesn't have much time to focus on that question

The moment the ring has settled around his finger, it begins to change—stretching and coiling around his hand like a snake—but Xie Lian doesn't panic, simply watching until he feels a handle form against his palm.

And when he gives his wrist a cautious flick—

CRACK!

A...whip?

But even the crack of it doesn't sound like that of a normal weapon—it sparks and crackles with power, purple sparks of spiritual energy flying before his eyes.

"...I've never seen a weapon like this," he murmurs, curious. "I didn't know San Lang fought with a whip."

"I don't fight with one," the ghost king disagrees, admiring the way the weapon looks in Xie Lian's grip—then again, just about anything looks elegant under his hands.

The prince notices something odd about the phrasing, but can't put his finger on why.

"This was actually built as part of a deal with a cultivation clan in Yunmeng fifty years ago," he murmurs, watching the way the whip crackles in the air. "But they failed to keep their end of the bargain with me, so I took Zidian back."

Xie Lian can't fault him—that's fair.

"It's called Zidian?" Hua Cheng hums in agreement, and Xie Lian smiles.

'Purple lightning.'

It's fitting—and a rather lovely name.

"I've never seen a weapon quite like it," he admits. "Really—it's been ages since I saw a blade as fine as anything here, San Lang."

The ghost king seems genuinely pleased by that, going so far as to offer— "If you see anything you like here, it's yours dianxia."

"Oh..." Xie Lian laughs softly, a little awkward as he loosens his grip on the whip, causing it to retract back into a simple ring.

"I like everything here, San Lang, really..." he mumbles, slipping the ring off of his finger and settling it back onto it's cushion. "It's kind of you to—"

"Then it's all yours."

The prince pauses, his eyebrows knitting together. He isn't actually serious, is he?

"...I couldn't..." He mumbles, opting to politely decline. "I haven't used a weapon in years, and even so...I wouldn't have anywhere to store all of this. San Lang is very kind, but—"

"That's easy enough then," Hua Cheng shrugs. "You can store them here—consider the armory yours."

Xie Lian pauses, waiting for the moment the ghost king will burst out laughing and say that it's a joke. He's often just a little too quick to believe what people say, so he's cautious now, but...

Hua Cheng seems completely serious. “I…well…” he swallows hard.

“…I wouldn’t have a way of maintaining them,” he mumbles, after all—back when he had such weapons, servants handled that. And with his current condition, it would be difficult—

“Then I suppose I’ll do maintenance from time to time,” Hua Cheng shrugs. “It’s no problem.”

Xie Lian stares at him blankly, starting to realize…

…Just how many weapons must this man have, to be willing to give the prince an entire room of them on a whim? It’s generous either way, but now it seems like Hua Cheng might have enough to arm an entire military.

“…San Lang has already done so much,” Xie Lian mumbles. “I couldn’t ask him to do chores for me as well…”

“You aren’t asking,” Hua Cheng smiles softly. “I’m offering. Are you hungry, dianxia?”

Of course, he tries valiantly to deny it—but his growling stomach gives him away.

“We can discuss the details later—come.”

Ah yes, the details of Xie Lian owning his priceless armory while Hua Cheng stores and maintains it for him, it’s all rather casual—

But Xie Lian remembers something else as they make their way back, something Jun Wu said before.

“…San Lang—all of those weapons back there—were any of them E’Ming?”

The ruthless scimitar everyone described—the weapon that made Pei Xiu’s clone into a mere child’s toy—Xie Lian can’t recall having felt anything resembling that inside the armory.

“Oh, no,” Hua Cheng replies. “E’Ming is always on my person—or somewhere nearby.”

As he says this, Xie Lian hears an odd metallic rumbling—to which the ghost king places a hand over the hilt at his hip, murmuring—

“No.”

“...I’m sorry?”

“Not you, dianxia—it wants your attention, and I’m telling it no.”

“My attention?” Xie Lian murmurs, taking a step closer. Normally he wouldn’t be so presumptuous about someone’s personal space—but Hua Cheng seems rather comfortable with being close to one another.

He reaches for the scabbard, placing his palm over it. “This is E’Ming, then?”

The sword rattles excitedly under his palm—and Xie Lian can’t see it, but a red eye spins quickly in it’s pommel, widening sharply.

“...Is it always like that?” He questions, raising an eyebrow.

“No,” Hua Cheng admits, biting back a smile. “It just likes you.”

Xie Lian tilts his head, surprised.

E’Ming, the supposedly menacing blade of a ghost king, feared by the heavens—and it shakes like an excited puppy under his touch.

“Well, I’m flattered,” he muses, stroking his thumb over the handle.

“Did you build E’Ming yourself as well, San Lang?”

“...I did,” he agrees evenly. “He was the first weapon I ever crafted, actually.”

And he was able to make something so powerful on his first try? That leaves Xie Lian curious. Not only about that—there seems to be more to it.

Just from the way Hua Cheng speaks of it, there seems to be something held back in his tone. And while Xie Lian finds himself rather curious, he can’t ask much more about it before they return to...

...What seems very much like a feast.

“...San Lang...” Xie Lian mumbles.

“Hmm?”

“You really didn’t need to go to all of this trouble on my account...” he mumbles, feeling somewhat remorseful.

After all, he doubts Hua Cheng would be so generous if he knew why Xie Lian was actually here.

To be fair...Xie Lian himself has forgotten his actual purpose for being here several times over the course of the night–but that doesn't mean that he didn't show up with an ulterior motive.

And even if his intentions are good, he's still investigating Hua Cheng's home.

"Who says I don't just throw feasts like this every night?" The Ghost King counters with a sly grin.

And while Xie Lian's own issues with self-worth can make him explain quite a bit of the Ghost King's odd behavior–that one doesn't pull off quite as well.

"...How often do you have people in Paradise Manor that actually need to eat?" Xie Lian counters dryly.

After all, ghosts won't starve.

Hua Cheng actually pauses, his lips forming into a perfect 'o' of surprise. In part, because he's not often contradicted. And also...

It's not that he forgot that Xie Lian was clever–it's that he isn't used to hearing the prince speak...

The way that Hong'er used to.

The moments are rare, but every now and again, he sees the clear influence of his younger self in the god that he so admires.

It aches as much as it soothes.

"...I'm sure you must have heard from the other ghosts before you arrived," Hua Cheng murmurs, carefully holding Xie Lian's elbow as he leads him to a seat at the head of the table, "but I don't have guests very often."

That's true--it was really all that anyone could talk about, when they saw that Hua Cheng had ordered the Ghost Officer to bring someone to the manor.

"Which means I don't get the chance to show hospitality often," the ghost king shrugs. "Please, do me the honor?"

Xie Lian can’t argue with that, not when Hua Cheng says it so hopefully, practically pleading.

Somehow, he makes Xie Lian allowing him to throw the god a feast sound like he’s doing Hua Cheng a favor.

“Alright…” He murmurs, sitting in the chair the ghost king pulls out for him

The only ones seated at the table are Xie Lian, Hua Cheng, Shuo—who sits on the other end of the table, examining his food with faint, passing interest—and the young boy, sitting at Xie Lian’s side.

He’s a little too cautious to eat anything until Xie Lian pushes it his way.

But when he does begin to eat, he does so ravenously, cramming every bit of food he can get his hands on down his throat.

Hua Cheng and Shuo both watch the boy rather closely—and neither one seems particularly friendly.

And Xie Lian can’t recall the last time he had such a meal.

Every bite is divine—to the point where he struggles with forgetting his own manners, fighting back the urge to shovel down every piece of pork on his plate.

Instead, he forces himself to chew slowly, commenting—

“I suppose I assumed but…are there ghosts who need to eat?”

After all—the boy beside him is practically inhaling his meal, and Hua Cheng shrugs.

“It really depends. Weaker spirits tend to mimic human processes out of habit. More often than not, they struggle with remembering that they’re dead.”

He explains, still watching the child.

“But stronger spirits don’t necessarily need to eat. Sometimes they will in order to fortify their forms before a fight—or they’ll simply have a meal for the experience itself. But they don’t need it, no.”

Shuo listens, taking a bite of a steamed bun, chewing thoughtfully.

Clearly, he and Hua Cheng fall into the latter category, but as for the child...That doesn't seem quite as black and white to Xie Lian, who has been bent on trying to get at least some answers out of him, however minor they might be.

He's only given one answer so far:

That he was born in the Kingdom of Yong'an. But—in order to be suffering from the Human Face Disease, he must have been alive very early on in the country's history.

"You don't even remember your name?"

The child shakes his head, wide eyed.

"In that case..."

Xie Lian thinks on it. "The official surname of the Kingdom of Yong'an was Lang..." he recalls. "Can you think of anything you would prefer as a given name?"

After a pause, the child replies—

"Ying."

Xie Lian doesn't react—but Hua Cheng and Shuo noticeably stiffen.

Lang Ying.

Of course, that makes sense—he's likely trying to honor Xiao Ying in some way, the girl was such an important figure in his life—

But even Xie Lian can admit, while there's no way the child could know—it's an unfortunate coincidence.

It's hard to hear that name without remembering...a very different time in his life. Even harder for Hua Cheng and Shuo for that matter.

Lang Ying glances in Shuo's direction, seemingly drawn to someone else near his age. The savage ghost bares his teeth at him in response.

Lang Ying flinches away, hiding his face against Xie Lian's arm. The prince frowns, having not seen the little exchange between the two, but he strokes the child's hair nonetheless.

"It's alright, nothing will harm you while you're with me, understand?" Shuo looks at Hua Cheng.

The Ghost King takes a long sip from his glass of whine, not looking away from the scene for a moment, clearly thinking something over rather intently. When he finally meets Shuo's gaze, the younger ghost mouths the words;

'Can I eat him, gege?'

The Ghost King actually takes a moment to think about it, leaving the boy hopeful, but–

'No.'

That answer comes through the private array, and Shuo sits back with a huff, pushing his half eaten bun around his plate sulkily.

'Why not? Something's wrong with him.'

Hua Cheng doesn't disagree with him there, watching the child with a distrustful eye. ' Maybe so. But until we know what that is, dianxia is attached to him.'

And while Shuo is still adjusting to the prince's newfound presence in their lives, he does understand one thing:

Xie Lian's word may as well be law, as far as Hua Cheng is concerned.

'I don't like it.'

'Keep an eye on him, then.'

Xie Lian might have noticed the long bout of silence from the other two--but he has his own private conversation to be distracted by.

'Your highness?'

Xie Lian jumps at the sound of Shi Qingxuan's voice–that of her female form, to boot–echoing in his mind.

'...Lady Wind Master?'

He hears a gasp of relief in response.

'Oh , thank god! We should have exchanged passwords beforehand. I had to ask Ling Wen to set up a new private array just for us so I could get in contact with you. It's not like I could visually signal...'

'Visually?' Xie Lian blinks, sitting a little straighter 'Are you here? '

'I was hoping you might see my aura–but your highness has been pretty distracted,' Xie Lian's cheeks burn at that, but she isn't wrong. 'I'm the one who poured your wine just now.'

As he's currently in the middle of a sip, Xie Lian chokes. "Is the wine not to your liking?"

Hua Cheng's tone is that of concern, and Xie Lian is quick in his attempt to reassure him.

"Oh, no, it's wonderful..." He smiles, setting the glass down carefully. Now that he's paying attention–he can in fact see the Wind Master's aura, flickering in the corner of his eye.

"I just forgot that my cultivation method forbids heavy drinking," he mutters, setting the glass down and pushing it away. "Pure of mind and body, and all that..."

Hua Cheng frowns. "Apologies, your highness, I didn't realize."

"Don't be sorry!" Xie Lian shakes his head. "I was the one who never mentioned it, it's my fault, really!"

Shuo makes a face, trying not to seem to grossed out by the fact that Hua Cheng seems genuinely annoyed by the latter part of the requirements of Xie Lian's cultivation method, but—

Neither are particularly subtle.

Still—he's too distracted by the boy across the table to pay too close attention to the way the god and the ghost king keep glancing at one another, quietly making conversation.

And he certainly doesn't notice that one of the waitresses is entirely unfamiliar.

He watches Lan Ying closely, listening for the tell tale signs of some sort of clone. But the food and drink doesn't ring hollow when it lands in his stomach. There's no flaw in his disguise, if that's what it is.

It's bothersome, and it sets his teeth on edge.

And when the dinner is over, and both guests in paradise manor are settled into their rooms for the evening, he raises his concerns, falling into step beside Hua Cheng, "If he's wearing a disguise, and we can't see through it..."

Shuo trails off, his tone wary.

“If it was a disguise, then he would be a calamity,” Hua Cheng replies calmly, “and all of those have been accounted for.”

One long dead, another chained in the dungeon, and the other is standing before him.

In which case, it can’t be a disguise, but…

Something is off.

That much they both know. Still, the child hasn’t done anything to pose himself as an immediate thread, and—

He’s under the Prince of Xianle’s protection, meaning—until there’s proof of their suspicions—their hands are tied.

ARTWORK INSPIRED BY THIS STORY

Included with permission from the artist, do not reproduce or reuse for any reason.

The 'mysterious statue' of the martial goddess Xie Lian comes across

[image]

CREDIT: BANANA SCOUTS

[image]

CREDIT: BANANA SCOUTS

FOR THOSE WHO WOULD LIKE TO CONTINUE READING ON TWITTER, YOU CAN DO SO HERE .

Chapter End Notes

Thank you so much to banana scouts for their beautiful artwork, and allowing me to share it!

xoxo, Evie

Up in Flames

Chapter Summary

> "Here goes nothing..." He mutters, rolling the dice in his palm—and trying to mimic Hua Cheng's posture from before, just in case—
>
> Clack, clack!
>
> There's a beat of nervous silence afterwards.
>
> "...What'd I get?" Xie Lian mumbles, resting the urge to bite his nails.
>
> "Two Sixes," the Wind Master mutters, watching the tile beneath them. "It doesn't seem to be anything that bad this time."
>
> "Does iIIIIIIIIT—!"
>
> And, of course, they're falling again.

Chapter Notes

> You can find me on twitter and keep up with current updates of the story HERE
>
> this chapter contains: cute animal pics

See the end of the chapter for more notes

Said prince, at that very moment, is laying back on the bed in the room Hua Cheng was kind enough to give him for the night, trying to decide what to do.

After all—he's no closer to answers than he was this morning. In part because he keeps getting distracted, but still.

It isn't long before there's a knock at his door—and before he can answer, Shi Qingxuan flings herself inside, shutting it behind her before dropping down onto the floor with a groan, shifting once again.

"God, I can't breathe..." he moans, tugging at his dress. "Too tight!"

“Can’t you just change back into what you were wearing before?” Xie Lian questions, sitting up and glancing in his direction.

“I’d stick out more if I did that…” the Wind Master replies, one sleeve slipping off of his shoulder as he rolls over with a huff. “Learn anything?”

“…Nothing particularly helpful to our case,” Xie Lian admits, rubbing the side of his neck. “I’m sorry about that. Where’s Lang Qianqiu?”

“There’s no need to worry about him,” Shi Qingxuan pulls himself up to plop down on the bed beside the prince.

“I pulled rank and ordered him to stay put,” he explains, kicking off one heeled shoe and flexing his toes. “He’s somewhat of a moron, but he’s pretty respectful of the chain of authority.”

Xie Lian isn’t surprised to find that much about him hasn’t changed.

Once, when Lang Qianqiu was just a twelve year old boy, his Guoshi had ordered him to practice meditation in the courtyard until he felt his mind become clear.

Of course, Xie Lian hadn’t been expecting the child to sit outside for a full twelve hours as a result.

When he eventually came to find him, Lang Qianqiu was apologetic, admitting that he hadn’t been able to clear his mind, as Xie Lian had commanded.

At the time, Xie Lian found it vexing—but adorable. In this situation, he finds that obedience to be a relief.

“You certainly got off luckier than we did, though,” Shi Qingxuan points out. “He’s out there trying not to get hung upside down by any more ghosts, I’m serving drinks, and you—you’re wining and dining with Crimson Rain himself.”

Xie Lian winces, because, well—it’s true.

To be fair—it wasn’t like Shi Qingxuan didn’t know about his friendship with Hua Cheng beforehand, but Xie Lian is still sorry that he’s had such a difficult time of it since arriving in the city.

“So…you haven’t found anything strange? No clues?” The Wind Master grumbles.

Xie Lian gives the matter some thought—and after a moment, replies.

“There was one thing…it seemed a little odd.”

“Oh?” Shi Qingxuan sits up quickly, hair bouncing around his shoulders. “What?”

“I’m fairly sure they have something like a distance shortening array.”

“That’s not inherently strange,” he curls his legs up underneath him, rubbing his sore feet, and Xie Lian nods.

“I know, but…this one felt different.”

He explains the story about the dice, as well as the statue he came across—and the Wind Master listens carefully.

“…That sounds like it could be one of two things,” he muses, tapping his thumb against his chin. “A lock, or an interchange.”

Xie Lian casts him a surprised look, and the Wind Master holds his hands up with a snort.

“I’m no expert—but Ming-Xiong is, and I listen to him. Sometimes. Enough to put bits and pieces of it together when I need to, anyway.” He shrugs. “Either way, it sounds promising. What did the statue look like?”

Xie Lian gives the description, brow furrowing as he recalls—

“…It might sound a little odd, but it looked like…a martial goddess of some sort,” he murmurs with a frown, expecting Shi Qingxuan to have no idea what he’s talking about, but—

“Actually, I saw a statue like that on my way in—maybe there’s more than one? Let’s take a look!”

He leaps to his feet, grabbing Xie Lian’s hand, pulling the prince along with him. Of course, it’s a slightly more stealthy affair than the way they went charging out of the heavens before, walking lightly down hallways, speaking in a private array rather than out loud.

‘Where did you see the second statue, exactly?’ Xie Lian questions, nearly slipping past a corner, only to be pulled back by Shi Qingxuan’s arm around his waist, keeping silent as a pair of servants walk past.

‘Outside, in the gardens. They’re rather lovely, you know.’

Xie Lian did know that—even if he couldn't see them, the sound and smell alone was enough to remind him of their gardens back in Xianle. And while their childhoods are separated by miles and centuries, Shi Qingxuan seems to feel the same sentiment.

'You know, we always had a garden growing up, no matter what,' he comments, letting Xie Lian lean against his arm as they walk down the steps leaning outside . 'Even when it wasn't the most practical.'

Xie Lian almost asks if that was his parents preference—but then he remembers what Shi Qingxuan said the last time the prince asked about his family, that it's only ever been him and his brother.

'Was that your brother's doing?' The younger god nods amiably.

'When I was a kid—there was a time when I couldn't really go outside as much as everyone else my age. Big, elaborate courtyards and gardens were a way of getting to have…a semblance of normalcy, I guess.'

Xie Lian finds himself wondering at what could have placed him in that sort of position—but before he can think of a polite way to ask, the Wind Master pulls him to a stop.

"Ah, here it is!" He exclaims, "The statue I saw earlier," he stands before it, holding Xie Lian's hand.

"Now, how do you think we work it…"

"Well," Xie Lian tilts his head to the side, deep in thought. "Throwing the dice was clearly part of the process…"

"That probably means that different combinations lead to different locations," Shi Qingxuan muses.

"Do you think it has to be a particular set of dice, or would any work?"

"There's only one way to find out," the Wind Master shrugs, rummaging around, looking for pockets, then realizing he doesn't have any—

Xie Lian stands aside awkwardly as Shi Qingxuan shoves his hands into the front of his dress, feeling around, then shifts into her female form, feeling again—but this time underneath her cleavage—

"A-HA!" He beams, holding a set up in his hands. Xie Lian scratches his head.

“…Why…keep dice stored there?”

“I swiped them from the gambler’s hall—and these dresses don’t have any pockets, you know,” he shrugs, as though that explains everything. “Do you think you still have enough luck from earlier, or should I give it a shot?”

“…Luck?”

Xie Lian frowns. “I already explained, I don’t have any—”

“Oh, I know,” Shi Qingxuan leans over the statue, examining the tray. “But that’s what Hua Cheng was doing earlier—lending you luck.”

Xie Lian’s eyes widen slightly.

“Did you really think it was a secret technique?”

The god falls silent, his ears warming up.

He figured that San Lang was probably teasing him, but that doesn’t make Shi Qingxuan referencing the fact openly any easier to deal with.

He had no idea that luck was something that could be shared like currency—but that’s helpful.

“…There’s a decent chance that whatever luck he gave me has already run out then,” Xie Lian mutters, clearing his throat—opting not to address the elephant in the room. “Better to use yours.”

Shi Qingxuan nods, rattling the dice in his hands.

“There’s a symbol on the ground under our feet—that must be the activator for the array…” he mutters, throwing the dice down on the tray. “Here goes nothing.”

Clack! Clack!

Xie Lian waits, listening. “…Is something happening?”

“Well…” The Wind Master glances at their feet

“Oh! The symbol changed!” He exclaims, resting one hand on his hip. “Before, it was just something like a lantern, and now…”

Xie Lian raises an eyebrow. “Now…what?”

“Well,” Shi Qingxuan bends over slightly to get a better look. “It’s some sort of bug, I think…”

Xie Lian goes from being flushed by the earlier comment about Hua Cheng’s ‘secret dice rolling techniques,’ to suddenly going a little pale. “How many legs?”

“What?” Shi Qingxuan glances up. “Oh—eight, I suppose. Think it’s a spider?”

“I…Is it an actual…or—?”

“Just the symbol,” Shi Qingxuan explains, noticing the way the prince visibly shrinks with relief. “Is your highness scared of—?”

Before he can finish asking his question, the square of glass underneath them begins to glow brightly—then drops out, making them plummet.

“AHHHH!”

Xie Lian doesn’t know how far they fall—but it’s a full three seconds before they hit the ground again, Xie Lian face down, with Shi Qingxuan landing on top of his back.

THUD!

“Ow…” The Wind Master groans, clutching his ribs as he rolls off. “What kind of array…?!”

“I don’t know…” Xie Lian mumbles, brushing the dust off of his robes as he sits up. “What can you see?”

“It’s some sort of tunnel…” Shi Qingxuan stands, reaching over to help the prince to his feet. “Think we should follow it?”

“I suppose it couldn’t hurt…”

They start making their way down the path—and here, the only light Xie Lian has is Shi Qingxuan’s spiritual aura, so he sticks close to it, blinking and squinting awkwardly against the darkness.

“Still think it could be a lock?”

“No…” the Wind Master shakes his head. “If it was, I don’t think regular dice would have worked."

That makes sense—after all, a lock is no good if everyone has the key.

"Which means it's probably an interchange. And with two dice that have six possible outcomes…that's 36 available combinations, or destinations."

And with Xie Lian's luck, even if Shi Qingxuan is the one rolling—those aren't fantastic odds.

"And with 1 in 36…The probability of getting the right roll…" The Wind Master scrunches his nose up thoughtfully. "…Is around 2.75 percent…still, even with average luck…"

He stops when he notices the way Xie Lian is staring at him, quietly surprised—and for once, Shi Qingxuan rubs the side of his neck, seeming rather sheepish.

"I'm not really much of a books person, but I'm good at math," the Wind Master explains. "Always have been."

Xie Lian offers a small, encouraging smile, "I can't say the same for myself. That's rather impressive."

The younger god smiles back, but before either can say more, they both hear something.

Rustling, like something is moving in the far end of the tunnel, or—no. It would be better described as…

Scuttling.

All of the blood begins to drain from the martial god's face.

"…Lord Wind Master?"

Shi Qingxuan is slowly backing up, and Xie Lian is beginning to learn that he's prone to laughing when nervous.

"Haha…hahahaha…y-yes?"

"I…" Xie Lian swallows hard, fighting the urge to begin hyperventilating. "Is that…?"

"A-A giant spider?" Shi Qingxuan swallows hard, still stumbling backwards. "I…it would seem so, hahaha…w-wh…haha…what an adventure! R...hahahaha..right?!"

As a fairly eccentric person himself, it takes a lot to catch the Wind Master by surprise.

But...nothing could have prepared him for the prince's reaction. He's always so calm, even toned. Never shaken.

The rustling gets just a little bit closer, and—

"...eeeAAAAAAAAAK!"

The blood curdling shriek that breaks through the air is so sharp, so startling, he almost thinks it's the monster, but—

Then the crown prince throws his hands over his head, turns around, and goes charging back down the tunnel at top speeds, leaving Shi Qingxuan frozen in shock

"D...DON'T LEAVE ME?!" He cries, turning on heel and chasing after him, but when he reaches the dead end of the tunnel where they started, that just ends with Xie Lian leaping into his arms, wrapping his limbs around Shi Qingxuan's torso, using one trembling finger to point—

"KILL IT!"

"I..." Shi Qingxuan doesn't struggle under Xie Lian's weight—he's a god, after all—but he's not exactly used to carrying a grown man like a toddler either, so he staggers. "I'M NOT EXACTLY A WARRIOR, YOUR HIGHNESS! YOU KILL IT!"

Xie Lian, normally polite to a fault, screams, "DOES IT LOOK LIKE I'M ARMED TO YOU?!"

"I—!" The spider rounds the curve, screeching towards them, pinchers gleaming in the dim light. "JUST PUNCH IT OR SOMETHING! YOU'RE A MARTIAL GOD!"

"ABSOLUTELY NOT!"

Shi Qingxuan reaches into the collar of his dress, pulling out a fan, then—

"But—haha, your highness, if I use my powers, I could end up bringing the whole tunnel down, hahaha!"

Xie Lian is clinging to his back now, legs hitched around Shi Qingxuan's ribs. "...I can live with that."

The Wind Master's smile is frozen in place as the clicking grows closer.

"H-HAH?!"

"I'VE BEEN THROUGH IT BEFORE!" Xie Lian trembles as it closes in "I CAN DO IT AGAIN!"

"BEEN THROUGH WHAT?! YOUR HIGHNESS...HAHA! STOP—COVERING MY FACE, HAHAHAHA!"

In his desperation, Xie Lian's hands have taken to gripping the Wind Master's head, leaving Shi Qingxuan fumbling blindly.

"WE DON'T HAVE ANY MORE TIME, JUST DO IT!"

"IN WHAT UNIVERSE IS BEING BURIED ALIVE WORSE THAN PUNCHING A SPIDER?!" The younger god wails.

"I DON'T SEE YOU PUNCHING IT!"

Shi Qingxuan stumbles back another step with Xie Lian in his grip, and this time, his back against an earthen wall—he feels a stone tile under his feet, his eyes widening.

"...OH!"

"I SWEAR IF THAT THING GETS ME BEFORE YOU KILL IT, I'LL—!"

Clack, clack!

The tile underneath them glows again—and then, they go tumbling.

"AHHHHHHHHHHHHHHHHHHH!"

CRASH!

THUD!

Xie Lian pokes his head up, hair flipping around him as he spits some of it out of his mouth.

"Lord Wind Master?" He questions, looking for his aura.

He doesn't see anything around him, just hears the rustling of wind through leaves, and birds cawing in what sounds like...

A jungle?

"I'm not sure, your highness..." The Wind Master replies, his voice slightly muffled— coming from underneath him.

That's when Xie Lian realizes...

they seem to have fallen into a hollow tree, with Xie Lian's arms and head sticking out of the top, and Shi Qingxuan beneath him, having fallen head first, his feet poking precariously against the prince's backside.

"Working with you is...a little too exciting, sometimes..."

"..." Xie Lian can't help but let out a small snort, pulling himself up and out of the trunk, landing on the ground a little hard before turning around and punching a hole in the side, using that to pull the Wind Master out.

"Better?"

The Wind Master nods, coughing up a mouthful of dirty and dust, looking somewhat disgusted. "Somehow, yes..."

Xie Lian clears his throat, feeling more than a little awkward—and certainly very apologetic. "I'm...sorry for how I handled that..." he mutters.

"I...It's...fine...hahaha..."

Shi Qingxuan coughs again, this time seeming to expel the rest of it. He reaches for a flask in his pocket, using it to wet his throat before offering it to the prince.

He takes it gratefully, wincing a little at the burn of the wine, but grateful for something to drink.

He hands it back over, mumbling, "I haven't really talked to anyone about it..."

(Not since Xianle, anyway.)

"But I...have a bit of a phobia, when it comes to spiders."

Shi Qingxuan takes another sip from his flask.

“...Oh, don’t worry your highness—I’m sure no one’s noticed.”

It takes Xie Lian a moment to recognize the sarcasm in his tone, and for a moment, the two simply stare at one another, expressions frozen, each of them rumpled, covered in dust—

And then Shi Qingxuan explodes into roaring laughter, doubling over, and Xie Lian...

...He can’t help but join in, because—

It’s ridiculous. It really, really is ridiculous.

To the point where both gods are cackling, tears running down the Wind Master’s face, Xie Lian clutching his ribs as they roll on the ground.

“I-I CAN’T BELIEVE YOU T-TOLD ME TO—AHAHAHA!” “I-I just...” Xie Lian snorts, shoulders shaking, “I panicked!”

“You...TOLD ME TO BURY US ALIVE!” Shi Qingxuan rolls backwards, kicking his feet.

“I’m—I’m sorry about that!”

“D-Don’t be! Hahaha...it was so...SO FUCKING...F...FUNNY!”

He wheezes, wiping at his cheeks. “Ah, well...as l-long as we don’t get trapped in any more spider infested tunnels...we—we should be fine! After all—that was just an impractical space for my magic.”

Xie Lian’s chuckles start to ease as he nods in agreement, rubbing his side.

“We would have been better off with the earth or fire masters, in that situation...”

“Hmmm, Ming-Xiong would have come in handy,” Shi Qingxuan agrees. “But the Heavens doesn’t have a fire master. Hasn’t for as long as anyone can remember.”

“...Really?” Xie Lian frowns.

He can remember that there was a fire master before his own first ascension—but that the official was rather old, and chose to retire...

But it's been nearly a thousand years since then. Have they really not replaced him yet?

Before Xie Lian can question more, There's noise.

Rustling in the bushes and the trees nearby, and then...

His expression falls, leaving Shi Qingxuan to look around in a mild panic. "Don't worry, your highness—I don't see any more spiders around!"

"No, no..." Xie Lian frowns. "It's not that..."

"Then what?!"

Now, when he quiets down—he can hear it.

Speaking in the trees—in a language he himself doesn't understand.

"...I'm not particularly familiar with the area," Xie Lian mutters, rising to his feet. "But it doesn't seem like they're used to strangers around here."

The cries grow louder, and when a few of the locals appear from the brush, Shi Qingxuan's own expression finally falls, matching his.

"...Oh dear," he whispers.

"What?"

"...It looks like we might have interrupted a wedding."

Not only that–they just saw two strange men—one blind, the other scantily dressed in women's clothes—fall from the sky and start speaking in a strange language.

"Well," Xie Lian's expression turns even more grim. "That's not good."

"...So?"

A rock hits the side of Xie Lian's head—sharp enough to draw blood—before thunking off and landing on the ground. He doesn't wince, doesn't even flinch, actually—but his expression turns rather grim.

"They'll throw rocks first, ask questions later."

"Oh," Shi Qingxuan frowns.

"That's—"

Then, it's showering down rocks, and it's all either one of them can do to manage not to get hit, scrambling back.

"Should we try to go—? Ah!" The Wind Master stops in mid sentence, reaching up to touch his cheek.

There's a small cut there, blood running down his chin.

Xie Lian stops, clutching his hands to his chest, eyes widening as he listens to the Wind Master's voice drop three octaves, his eyes glowing green, all the way from iris to the edge of his cornea.

"Who got my face?"

See, that's his 'god voice,' and Xie Lian is all too familiar with that—when a Heavenly Official becomes so irritated, their power starts to poke through their human form.

For obvious reasons, Xie Lian hasn't had a 'god voice' to use in about...eight centuries.

"L-Lord Wind Master—"

"THAT'S RIGHT!" He stands up, hands balled into fists, "I AM THE LORD SHI QINGXUAN, GOD OF THE THREE REALMS, MASTER OF THE WIND!"

It all sounds rather impressive, coming from a man wearing a dress that hugs his hips somewhat salaciously.

"Hold on—!"

"WHICH ONE OF YOU DARED TO CUT MY BEAUTIFUL, PERFECT FACE?!" "They're still mortals—!"

And they also aren't underground anymore, so Shi Qingxuan has no qualms about taking his fan out, sweeping it around to form powerful gusts of wind, flinging the humans up into the trees.

"...They'll be fine," he mutters, turning around and smoothing his hair. "No one could blame me for that anyway—it was completely provoked."

Xie Lian isn't sure that the response was proportional, but... "...Right, sure..."

“Either way, you’re doing the next dice roll.”

“...Me?”

Xie Lian shakes his head quickly, “No, no, I don’t think that’s a good idea...my luck is terrible—”

“And my luck got us thrown in a spider cave, and then we were nearly stoned to death,” Shi Qingxuan replies dryly.

Xie Lian thinks ‘stoned to death’ is a dramatic description...

“You might have some left over luck from the Gambler’s Den—and even if you don’t, something tells me that your lo—your friend’s demented traveling array is going to be friendlier to you than it is to me.”

“...” Xie Lian rubs his chin. “...I suppose that makes sense,” he mutters.

The prince takes the dice when Shi Qingxuan hands them over, moving—with the Wind Master’s guidance—to stand on another stone tile. “But remember— considering my luck, it might be something worse.”

“Worse than a giant spider?” The younger man questions wryly.

Well. Xie Lian supposes it really can’t get worse than that, so he has a point.

“Here goes nothing...” He mutters, rolling the dice in his palm—and trying to mimic Hua Cheng’s posture from before, just in case—

Clack, clack!

There’s a beat of nervous silence afterwards.

“...What’d I get?” Xie Lian mumbles, resting the urge to bite his nails.

“Two Sixes,” the Wind Master mutters, watching the tile beneath them. “It doesn’t seem to be anything that bad this time.”

“Does iIIIIIIIIT—!”

And, of course, they’re falling again.

CRASH!

This time, Xie Lian gets somewhat of a cushy landing, coming down on top of a couch set just beside the exit, a little wind swept, but otherwise fine.

Shi Qingxuan, however, ends up landing face down against the flagstones once again with a groan.

“I HATE this thing!”

“Are you alright?” Xie Lian frowns, concerned as he brushes off his robes. “Nothing’s broken?”

There’s a little more blood on his chin now when he sits up—but for the most part, he’s only battered and bruised.

“Right...well,” he looks around. “This seems promising.”

After all—there’s no sound of menacing approaching arachnids. No terrified locals throwing rocks at them, but...

When Xie Lian breathes in, he smells something that makes him go still.

“What is it now?!” Shi Qingxuan groans, seeing the look on his face.

“...Blood.” Xie Lian mutters, leaping from the couch, peering down the hall, shackle glowing in the dark. “Someone’s hurt.”

And while ghosts are capable of bleeding—it doesn’t smell like that.

Shi Qingxuan pales, turning and heading in that direction. “Then we should hurry!”

Xie Lian doesn’t disagree—the possibility of someone being injured is a time crunch in itself—

And there are others who can access this place: with far more accuracy than them.

He follows the wind master down the passageway, leading to an open, stone chamber.

Shi Qingxuan goes still for a moment, eyeing the room.

“...What is this place?” He whispers, shivering, rubbing bare his arms to soothe them from the cold.

Xie Lian's expression turns grim.

"It's a cell," he mutters, taking in the cursed energy around them.

There's a soft clink in the corner—but not that of wraith butterflies or silver bells. No, Xie Lian is familiar with the sound of chains by now.

Shi Qingxuan's eyes follow the sound, finding a figure chained to the wall, hands shackled over his head.

Dark hair hides his face, but when he tilts his chin, some of it falls aside, revealing one eye, burning like dark sea ice under the dim lighting of the torches.

Xie Lian isn't expecting the sound that rips from Shi Qingxuan's throat.

A worried, frightened cry.

"...Ming-Xiong!"

He rushes over, pushing the man's hair from his face, carefully tucking it behind his ears.

He's got blood on his face, bruises—and clear signs of injuries to his abdomen, but nothing that seems to be fatal.

"I had no idea you had been captured!"

The wind master cries, pressing his hands against the prisoner's cheeks, looking him in the eye, "Why didn't you call for help?!"

The god doesn't answer, looking him over with a tired, confused expression.

"...What the fuck are you wearing?" He rasps, blood staining his teeth.

"Well—"

"Lord Wind Master?" Xie Lian questions, glancing between them. "You two know each other?"

"We sure do!"

"Never seen him before in my life."

They both answer at the tame time, and Shi Qingxuan gasps, offended.

"Ming-Xiong! I'm your best friend!"

"I wouldn't be best friends with someone who dresses like that…" he mutters, and when Xie Lian squints at that aura—

There's something familiar about it. "…Have we met before?"

"Yes!"

"No."

Shi Qingxuan gives him an annoyed look, even as he's hugging him fiercely. "This is Earth Master Ming Yi, I've already told you about him."

Xie Lian's lips form into a perfect 'O,' eyes widening. "…Ah."

The woman who beat Feng Xin senseless, then.

Well, not a woman at the moment, but—

While he's lost in thought, Ming Yi's nose bumps against Shi Qingxuan's cheek. "What happened here?"

The annoyed expression in the Wind Master's eyes quickly fades. "You never let anything cut your face."

"…I went through a lot, trying to rescue you," he pouts. "I was chased by a giant spider—"

"That part was awful," Xie Lian agrees morosely, and Shi Qingxuan nods vehemently, happy to be vindicated.

"And then we ended up in some jungle, and the locals threw rocks at us, and they cut my face! Plus I fell at least a dozen times—!"

More like three times, but Xie Lian doesn't correct him.

Ming Yi, however, snorts, bumping his nose against the Wind Master's cheek once more. "You didn't even know I was the one you were rescuing, crybaby."

Xie Lian can't see the way that name, which should be an insult, makes Shi Qingxuan smile widely, leaning his cheek into Ming Yi's touch until he's practically nuzzling him.

"Ungrateful…" He huffs, sneaking a chaste, quiet kiss, taking advantage of the fact that no one can see.

When he pulls back, Ming Yi's eyes are somewhat annoyed—but he smiles, sharpened canines flashing in the dark.

"...Are you badly hurt?" Xie Lian questions from behind them, stepping closer.

"I'll recover," the earth master replies calmly.

"Was it you who used the dragon spell?"

There's a brief pause, but when he agrees, he sounds emphatic.

"Yes, it was me."

That explains the seriousness of his injuries, at least.

Xie Lian draws close to his side, reaching up to examine the chains locking him in place. "Lord Wind Master, could you lend me some power?"

The elemental god nods, leaning over to take Xie Lian's hand. Once he feels the power flowing through him, he grasps the chains over Ming Yi's head, squeezing until they fracture into rubble under his touch.

"There," he mutters. "Can you stand?" "I can manage, your highness."

Shi Qingxuan is quick to help, pulling the earth master's arm around his shoulders— that way Ming Yi can lean against him as they make their way back down the hall.

Xie Lian walks ahead, thinking.

"...Lord Earth Master," he mumbles, "what quarrel do you have with Hua Cheng?"

Ming Yi doesn't respond, which doesn't seem to be an odd move for him, considering Shi Qingxuan's constant complaints about the god's antisocial tendencies.

Either way, Xie Lian supposes it's a matter he can discuss with the emperor once they get back.

"Should I roll again?"

"Obviously!" Shi Qingxuan grumbles, hugging one arm around Ming

Yi’s waist. “I’m not touching those things again until we’re back where we’re supposed to be!”

Xie Lian supposes that’s fair, he just hopes he has enough luck left.

He gives his hands a shake—

Clack, clack!

The prince has no way of knowing what he rolled this time—but instead of a trap door opening under him, he hears a passage creaking open ahead.

Ah, much better.

He takes a step forward, turning his head to tell the other two to hang on a moment while he gets his bearings—

But his foot goes straight into a void, and Xie Lian’s expression cracks for a moment, becoming a look of pure, resigned annoyance.

Ah, so it was another trap door after all. It was just slightly to the left, instead.

And this time, all the more tragically—

It opens directly over the armory.

Where Hua Cheng happens to be sitting—on a throne of sorts, thoughtfully polishing E’Ming.

Well, until he hears someone plummeting towards him with a surprised yelp.

Xie Lian is familiar enough with these arms by now, when he lands—he knows exactly where he is. Though it is a little more embarrassing, given that this time—

He’s being cradled in the Ghost King’s lap, E’Ming quickly set aside.

“My,” his voice rumbles in his chest, against Xie Lian’s cheek—one palm resting against his back, the other curled around the dip of the prince’s knee. Xie Lian would have expected him to be irritated, having someone drop out of the sky like that, but—

To the contrary.

He sounds absolutely delighted.

His hands tighten ever so slightly where they rest on his body, gripping the prince more firmly, and it's almost like Xie Lian can't breathe.

"Hello, your highness," he muses, surveying that mortified, delicately flushed face. "Dropping in?"

And Xie Lian, he—

The prince can only manage a wooden nod, both hands flying up to cover his mouth, struggling to reply.

"...Hello, San Lang..." He croaks.

Part of him desperately hopes that the situation won't get even more difficult to explain, but...

CRASH!

Clearly, the other two didn't see where the trap door was either—but they don't land in such a pleasant place as Xie Lian did.

No, instead—they wind up on the floor in a heap.

Xie Lian can't help but wince in sympathy for both of them.

One has already fallen several times in the last hour, the other gravely injured.

Hua Cheng tilts his head, his thumb stroking the side of his knee with his thumb—a casual touch that leaves the prince feeling like he could crawl out of his own skin to escape the heat it brings.

"...Dianxia," he murmurs, turning to look Xie Lian in the face once more. "Would you mind explaining the situation?"

Xie Lian stares up at him blindly, his face becoming more and more flushed with blood by the second, one hand clutched over his mouth, the other over his chest.

And at first, his mind is running through a dozen different lies—but the prince already knows they're no good.

Xie Lian isn't much of a liar, and it's even worse when it's someone he respects. "...I'm sorry!"

Hua Cheng raises an eyebrow as the prince leaps from his lap.

“Your highness?”

“I’m sorry! I’m so, so sorry, San Lang,” he rambles, stumbling back towards his fellow gods. “I should have explained sooner, I—I really didn’t mean to cause you any trouble!”

Shi Qingxuan sits up, blowing his hair out of his face irritably.

“Why are you apologizing to him?!” He cries, holding Ming Yi against his side, glaring in Hua Cheng’s direction. “Look what he did to Ming-Xiong! He should be the one apologizing, wining and dining you, all while he had your fellow official locked in his DEMENTED MAGICAL ATTIC!”

“Actually,” Hua Cheng speaks up, holding up a single finger. “The word you are looking for would be dungeon.”

Shi Qingxuan stops, his eyebrows knitting together as Ming Yi sends the calamity a glare. “...Oh...” He mumbles. “Sorry, your—WHY WAS MING-XIONG IN YOUR DUNGEON?!”

Hua Cheng’s eyes slowly rake over the Wind Master before he answers, taking in his form—which was scantily clad to begin with, but now, in his male body, it’s even tighter—and ripped in many places. “Do you work for me? That uniform is familiar.”

“I—not exactly...”

“Were you at dinner before?” Hua Cheng muses, tapping his chin. “I almost recognize you...”

Xie Lian opens his mouth to tell Shi Qingxuan to, for once, stay still—but the god needs little provocation to shift at any point in time.

“Oh, that’s because I looked like this!”

She shifts quite easily, which leads to problems of its own.

The dress is less suffocating than it was before, but...due to the newfound rips, it...

Leaves the chest heavily exposed. Not something Shi Qingxuan minds, after all, she goes shirtless in her male form, but—

Hua Cheng, who has never been one to look at any woman, stares at her breasts rather pointedly now, a slow smirk spreading across his face as Ming Yi's eyes narrow sharply.

"Ah, Lady Wind Master," his eyes slowly rise to her face, "it's good to see you again— and a surprise."

Shi Qingxuan flushes. Not because of her indecent exposure, she hasn't noticed or cared about that fact at all—but more so because now, Crimson Rain Sought Flower is familiar with both of her forms.

Ming Yi, however, seems highly irritated for a rather obvious reason.

"You idiot," he snarls, ripping at his outer robes before throwing the garment around her shoulders, effectively covering her up, "if you're going to stay in that form, shift into your actual robes!"

"What?!"

"What kind of lady leaves everything hanging out like that?!"

"Wha—? Oh..." Shi Qingxuan's eyes widen as she pulls the outer robe a little closer around her shoulders, glancing over to Hua Cheng, realizing what he was doing.

The reasoning seems rather baffling, as he obviously isn't attracted to her, but—

(Ming Yi knows exactly why.)

"Wait," Xie Lian speaks up, sounding even more mortified, "Lady Wind Master, were you exposed just now...?"

"Well," Shi Qingxuan scratches the side of her head. "Kinda...not...entirely..."

"Don't worry, gege," Hua Cheng assures him, "The Earth Master is a gentleman. He helped."

Ming Yi is so infuriated, he opens his mouth, pulling his lips back over his teeth—

And then he stops, glaring at Hua Cheng wrathfully.

"Would you shut up?!"

Xie Lian glances around, overwhelmed—but that certainly doesn't sound like a wounded prisoner speaking to their captor.

Hua Cheng’s eye flashes slightly in warning.

“Careful, earth master,” he murmurs—and he says that title with a sneer. “You forget where you’re standing.”

Right.

In Hua Cheng’s territory.

Shi Qingxuan’s eyes flash as she pulls Ming Yi behind her.

“Crimson Rain,” she glares—and Hua Cheng will give the Wind Master one thing—

“You might be the friend of a friend, but If you want to hurt Earth Master Ming Yi, you’ll go through me first!”

She looks fearless, protecting a loved one.

Hua Cheng stares back at her coldly.

Finally, his gaze drifts to He Xuan, who refuses to look him in the eye.

So—he is capable of feeling some amount of shame, then.

Good.

“Ming Yi?” Hua Cheng muses, watching the creature tense in Shi Qingxuan’s hold. “Is that what you call the traitor?”

...Traitor?

The earth master tenses, remaining quiet as Xie Lian looks to Hua Cheng, curious.

“I know this creature as a subordinate of mine, he’s served me for the last ten years.” The ghost king explains flatly. “I realized the truth when I saw him in the Crescent Moon Kingdom.”

Which would make Ming Yi...

A spy from the Heavens, sent to watch Hua Cheng.

Which also means that Jun Wu likely knew exactly which official was missing, and why—and he sent Xie Lian, a known friend of Hua Cheng’s, under the assumption he could get close safely.

It makes sense, and Xie Lian doesn't blame Jun Wu for using him in such a way, particularly when it was to save another god's life—

He just wishes that Jun Wu would have told him first, before the prince ended up in an awkward situation like this.

"San Lang..."

Xie Lian starts, slowly shifting himself between the ghost king and his fellow Heavenly Officials—it isn't until he notices a quiet, frightened cry that he realizes that Lang Ying is in the room as well, hiding behind him with the others.

"I...can explain all of this..."

Hua Cheng crosses his arms, raising both eyebrows. "Alright, I'm waiting." Xie Lian opens his mouth to continue, but, well—

There's really no good explanation. Not one that doesn't make him look like a terrible, ungrateful friend.

"...The emperor assigned us to find an official he thought might be injured in the area," Xie Lian explains, biting his lip. "So, I'll be expected to return him to the heavens. I hope...you can let us go?"

The Ghost King is quiet, looking from Xie Lian to the Earth Master.

"...Your highness, you must know I have no ill intentions towards you," he murmurs, and Xie Lian's chest warms, swelling with hope.

"Of course I do, San Lang."

"...But I must warn you, it's better not to over-involve yourself in matters like this," the calamity sighs. "There's no good end to them."

Xie Lian doesn't understand what he means—nor could he.

The show—one that Hua Cheng would very much like to keep him away from—hasn't begun. Not yet.

"San Lang—"

Before he can finish, Shi Qingxuan interrupts them both.

"WIIIIINNND! COME TO ME!"

The moment he says it, strong gales begin whipping throughout the room, stirring the air around them.

“Lord Wind Master!” Xie Lian cries, reaching back to steady Lang Ying, his other hand clutching at the chain around his neck, “We were still talking it out!”

“Neither of you were going to make a move against one another, so it was just going to go on forever!” Shi Qingxuan cries, pulling her fan out of her dress, sweeping it around her until the winds reach a brutal force.

Ming Yi holds on, by wrapping his arms around her from behind—and in doing so, keeps her shredded dress and haphazardly tied outer robe from flying away.

And his eyes remain on Hua Cheng, watching long, raven tresses and blood red robes whip around in the hurricane force gales.

At first, Xie Lian can’t understand what the Wind Master is trying to do, until he realizes—there’s no exit that Hua Cheng couldn’t block them from, so, she’s simply decided on the simplest route:

Creating a new exit through the roof.

Hua Cheng seems to have deduced the plan as well, but he isn’t particularly bothered.

“Ah, that’s an interesting little fan you have,” he raises the volume of his voice to be heard over the howling of the wind. “Coincidentally, so do I.”

Saying this, he lifts a fan from the shelf beside him. This one is made from what looks like solid gold in the spine and webbing, bound by red and black silk.

And while the gusts of wind from Shi Qingxuan are strong, when Hua Cheng waves his fan—

There’s no comparison.

The blast nearly knocks Shi Qingxuan off her feet—actually, it would have, if not for Ming Yi’s broad frame brazing her from behind.

She grits her teeth, hooking one ankle around his leg to brace herself as she sweeps her fan again—

But it doesn’t stop with the wind.

With each sweep of Hua Cheng's fan—which he moves easily, like an extension of his arm—several gold foils rip forth, like the kind that Xie Lian used to play with as a boy, building golden palaces, but...

These cut flesh, and leave cracks in the walls when they land.

Of course, absolutely none of them get even close to Xie Lian—and in turn, none of them threaten Lang Ying, who is still cowering behind him.

The brunt of it, at the moment, is aimed at the Earth and Wind Masters. The latter of whom is dealing with it as best as can be expected.

Still—forget defeating Hua Cheng or escaping, right now, it's all she can do to make sure they don't get blown away or sliced to bits.

'You've done well,' Ming Yi speaks into their private array, 'but you can't overpower him. Not here.'

Not anywhere, really.

But especially not in Hua Cheng's territory.

Shi Qingxuan grits her teeth, lobbing another barrage of wind gusts his way.

'I know that!' She replies sharply. 'I'm not trying to beat him!'

That draws the Earth Master's curiosity.

'...Then what are you doing?'

While they're having this conversation, Xie Lian finds himself in a small pocket of the room that isn't disturbed by the wind, somehow—like he's caught in the eye of the storm—

And he feels Hua Cheng's fingers brush against the side of his head, probing.

"Who did this?"

Xie Lian is startled and confused for a moment, not knowing what he means—then—

Then he realizes that, in the middle of all of this chaos, the Ghost King is worried about a small cut on the side of Xie Lian's head.

"...I'm not sure," he replies honestly, "I don't remember."

Just as he says this, in their private array, Shi Qingxuan explains—'I'm stalling.'

Stalling.

Ming Yi raises an eyebrow, glancing over at the other two, who seem completely lost in their own world, Hua Cheng pushing a lock of hair behind the prince's ear with a frown.

"You should be more careful with yourself, dianxia."

A rare admonition, coming from him—and while he might seem distracted, he's still controlling a wild force of wind within the room, sending countless projectiles flying.

'Stalling for...?'

THUD!

Hua Cheng looks up.

THUD!

The floor rumbles under their feet, and in spite of the raging wind storm, even more dust is somehow loosened from the ceiling, falling down around them.

THUD!

THUD!

THUD! THUD! THUD! THUDTHUDTHUD—!

"What on EARTH is THAT—?!"

"LORD WIND MASTER!"

The door to the armory bursts open—no, actually—it shatters, the wood splintering into pieces as a figure comes tumbling through it, rolling head over heels until it comes to a halt at Shi Qingxuan's feet.

Lang Qianqiu sits up, hair sticking up in every direction.

Honestly—he looks like he's already been through quite a trial. Covered in dust, scratches on his face, clothes ripped—and once he takes in Shi Qingxuan’s appearance, he adjusts his language.

“I mean—LADY WIND MASTER—!”

“Oh, Lang Qianqiu—for once, you have great timing—!”

However, before she can explain the plan fully, Lang Qianqiu interrupts her.

“I’M SORRY, I SAW THE COMMOTION AND THOUGHT YOU NEEDED A HAND —!”

“No, you were right about that part—!”

The next sentence out of his mouth makes her gawk.

“DID YOU KNOW THEY HAVE A BEAR?!”

Even Xie Lian starts with surprise, and Shi Qingxuan frowns.

“WHAT DO YOU MEAN?!”

“IT…”

(There’s distant roaring, somewhere down the hallway—likely from said animal.)

“IT LOOKS LIKE IT WOULD BE FRIENDLY…” The Prince screams over the wind, “BUT…IT IS NOT!”

“Oh,” Hua Cheng muses, that golden death trap of a fan still dangling between his fingers, “he must be speaking about Dian Dian.”

Xie Lian sends him a curious look, because that’s a surprisingly adorable name for a supposedly menacing beast, and the ghost king shrugs.

“It’s not my bear.”

The way he says it implies that it certainly does belong to someone—and is that something ghosts do? Keep dangerous beasts as pets?

Is it a live bear? Or is it a ghost bear?

Are there ghost bears—?

“WHY WERE YOU PLAYING WITH THE BEAR?!” Shi Qingxuan cries.

“I WASN’T PLAYING WITH IT!” Lang Qianqiu shakes his head vehemently, lifting one leg to show that his pants have been halfway shredded. “IT NEARLY TOOK MY LEG OFF!”

Hua Cheng smiles, muttering under his breath, “Good bear.”

Xie Lian’s tone is somewhat scolding, “San Lang…”

The roaring and the rumbling gets closer, and The Ghost King reaches up to rub his temples—and even he’s irritated by all of the noise.

Poor Xie Lian feels the beginnings of a migraine. “WHO HAS A BEAR IN A PALACE ANYWAY?!”

“Manor, not a palace,” Hua Cheng mutters. “And technically speaking, Dian Dian is a Panda.”

Lang Qianqiu stops, the naturally severe shape of his eyebrows becoming even more exaggerated when they crease with confusion. “Oh…” He mutters, “Sorry…”

“Why are you apologizing?!” Ming Yi snaps, his eye twitching. “Pandas are bears, you dumbass!”

Right. RIGHT.

“WHO HAS A PANDA IN THEIR MANOR?!”

Hua Cheng gives him the most bizarre look, as though the Crown Prince of Yong’an asked him the rudest question possible, replying

“He lives here.”

Xie Lian doesn’t know whether to laugh or cry.

“JUST—!” Shi Qingxuan flails with her fan, barely managing to avoid getting smacked in the face with another golden foil. “COULD YOU HELP US BEFORE DIAN DIAN THE PANDA GETS HERE?!”

“OH!” Lang Qianqiu nods, leaping to his feet, drawing his sword, “GOT IT!”

And this is where things become slightly problematic for Hua Cheng—because this spiritual weapon—

He frowns when the blade comes into sight, his eyes narrowing. “Oh,” he mutters, “that’s actually a good one.”

If Xie Lian wasn't so entirely distracted by the chaos going on around him, he might have wondered how Hua Cheng recognized a Heavenly weapon immediately, just from glancing at it—

But really, he's more focused on the rapidly unfolding situation.

Like most high level weapons, Lang Qianqiu's sword has it's own set of abilities—and in this case, one of them is magnetism.

Powerful enough to draw in the golden foils from around the room, fusing them against the blade itself, making it stronger with each piece added.

Meaning now, Hua Cheng using the Golden Fan is to his own detriment.

Which doesn't seem to particularly bother the calamity. He simply shrugs, tossing the priceless weapon back on the shelf without a care—and the moment his hand is empty, E'Ming returns to his side.

"Alright, hold on..." Xie Lian tries to speak up, but the two are already moving towards one another, all while Shi Qingxuan is still trying to find a way out, and there's still the distant roaring. "We—We can still talk this out—!"

But the die is already cast.

Each has already launched their attack on the other—and while Xie Lian has very little worry for Hua Cheng...

It can't possibly end well for Lang Qianqiu. Which really only leaves him with one choice.

CLANG!

There's a flash of white light, filling the expanse of the room.

Lang Qianqiu's blade is blown back, nearly flying out of his grip—E'Ming by contrast is merely flicked somewhat to the right—but still, the overall effect of separating the two is achieved.

And while everyone else is blinded, Xie Lian cries out once again—"I'M REALLY SORRY!"

This time, he gathers up the remaining spiritual power he has left from Shi Qingxuan in his right palm, sending a moderately sized flame out and into the air, striking the roof, punching open a sizable hole.

With a low whistle, Ruoye finally slithers to life—almost sulking, now, that Xie Lian took so long to call for it's help—but it still binds the five of them together, and he cries out—

"LADY WIND MASTER! LIFT US OUT OF HERE!"

Which seems like a good idea, initially, and Shi Qingxuan obeys, swooping her fan around her until they're yanked up and through the hole in the ceiling, up into the sky above.

There's just one thing Xie Lian didn't consider: What wind does to a fire, in certain scenarios.

"Lord Wind Master!" He cries, trying to be heard over the howling, "Could you ease off on the fanning now?! You're going to burn the entire place to the ground!"

"Fine, fine!" Shi Qingxuan grumbles, and he does stop the fan, allowing it to grow still.

But Xie Lian can already feel the heat coming from the surface, followed by the shocked cries of may ghosts in the city—and he isn't optimistic.

Still that doesn't stop Shi Qingxuan from glancing down alongside him commenting —"Well, what do you know—there really is a panda."

The prince has one hand over his face, groaning. "Is the panda OKAY?!"

"Well," the Wind Master frowns as they rise further and further in the air, "it's hard to tell from up here—"

"The panda will be FINE!" Ming Yi grumbles. "Just get us back!"

And Shi Qingxuan does, sweeping his fan out, spinning it through the air until they're swooped back up towards the heavens.

The entire time, Xie Lian finds himself staring back down at Paradise Manor blindly, his stomach churning with guilt.

Whether or not Hua Cheng truly considered it a home, it was still his —and after all of his hospitality…Xie Lian turned around and destroyed it. Unintentionally, but…

What about the child spirits he saw before? And the ghost fires? Would they be alright?

What has he done?

From the ground below, Hua Cheng watches the group disappear into the stars, his expression dark, unreadable.

Frightened and confused screams echo from the ghosts all around him, no doubt due to the flames.

Crack!

With a simple snap of his fingers, the raging fires are reduced to smoldering embers in an instant—and what remains is doused by the crimson rain pouring down.

“Ah! Hua Chengzhu, thank goodness!”

“Look! He saved us from those Heavenly Officials!”

He snaps open his umbrella, lifting it over his head as the citizens of Ghost City shield themselves from the blood rain, hiding under outcroppings of stalls.

“Who do they think they are?! We mind our own business here, why come and start trouble?!”

“Arrogant bastards!”

Hua Cheng does not speak. Has not found the composure to do so.

At his side, E’Ming trembles with regret.

“Ah! Thank god, Ren Song is here!”

Behind him, wearing his true form, Shuo presses his palm to one of the charred pillars of the Manor.

It groans and creaks, shifting.

With the smoke and flames sparking out, the holes in the walls and ceilings of the structure begin to knit back together, new growths of wood stretching over the foundation, patching the manor until it’s largely back to it’s original condition.

In need of a fresh coat of paint—but that’s Yin Yu’s job.

A large beast rumbles across the front courtyard, coming to a stop by the Ghost King’s side. It huffs out a breath, letting out a soft bark.

It sounds almost apologetic.

“...It’s alright, Dian Dian.” Hua Cheng mutters.

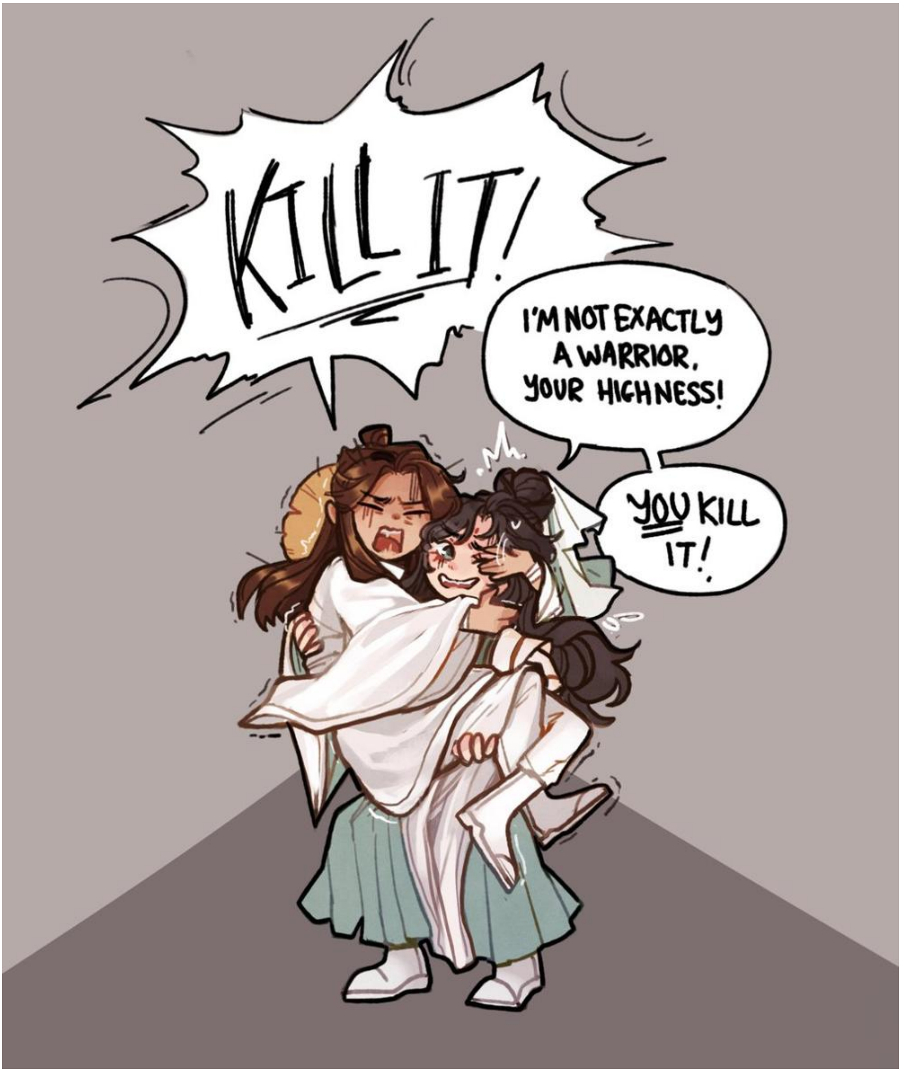
He reaches out, fingers landing in the Giant Panda’s fur, stroking—removing any damage from the fire and the tussle with the martial god beforehand.

“You’re the only one who did your job today.”

The Crimson Rain pours down even harder, painting Ghost City red against the night.

ARTWORK INSPIRED BY THIS STORY

Included with permission from the artist, do not reproduce or reuse for any reason.

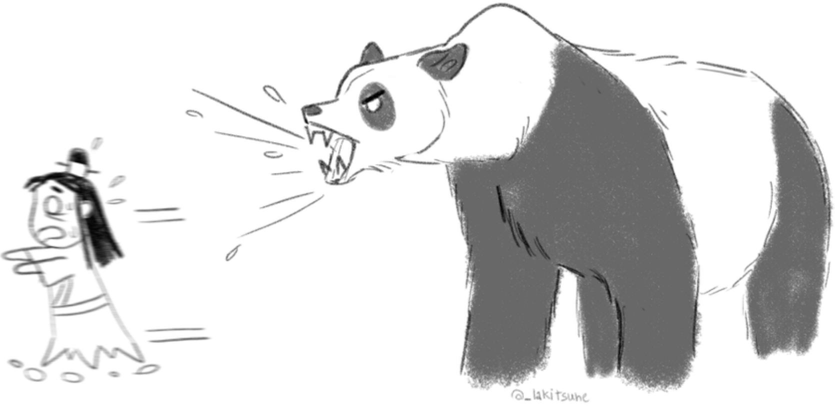


KILL IT!
I'M NOT EXACTLY A WARRIOR, YOUR HIGHNESS!
YOU KILL IT!

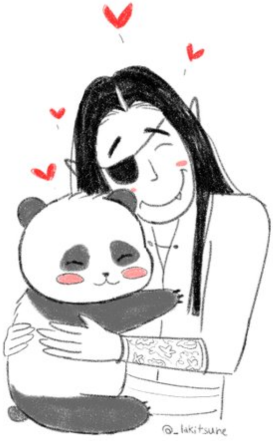
CREDIT: REN

Hua Cheng + Dian Dian

Dian Dian
and
Lang Qianqiu:

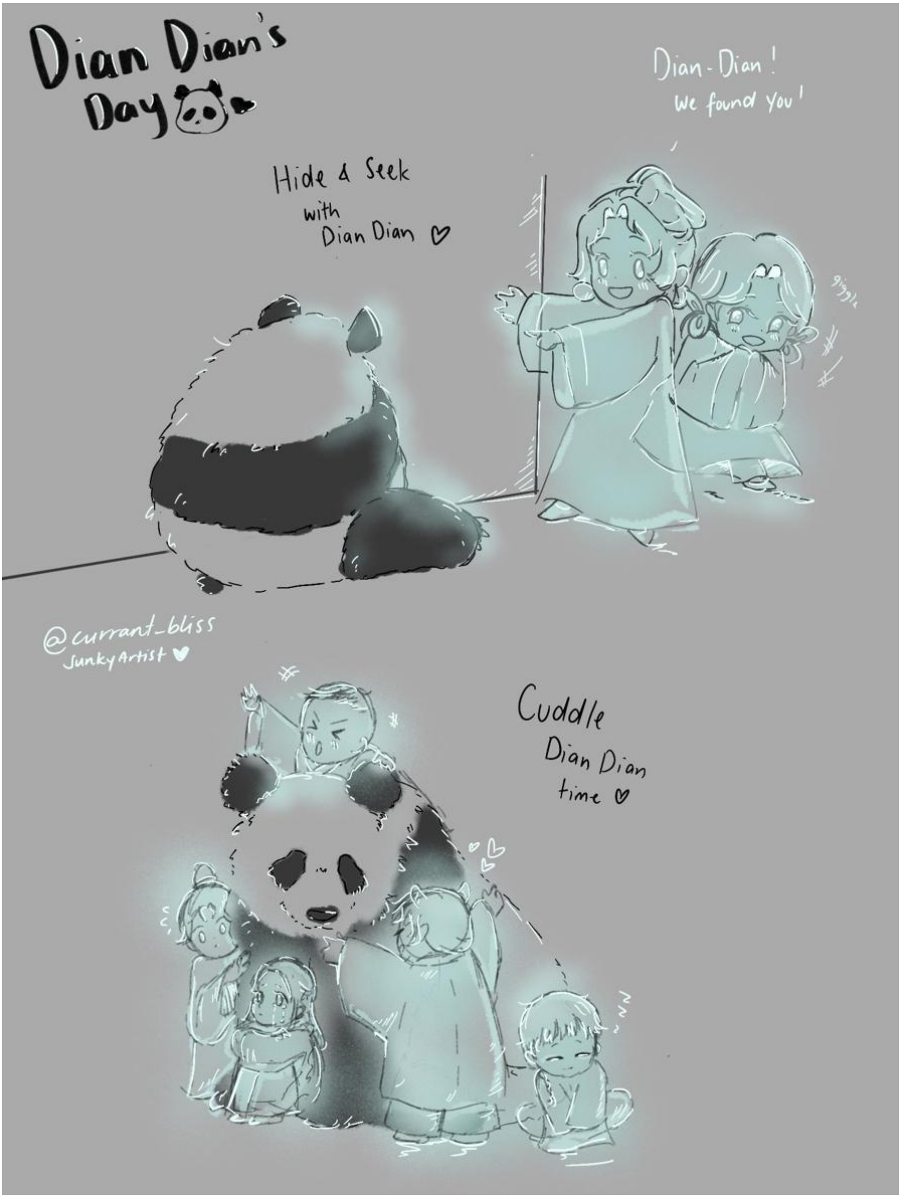


Dian Dian
and
Hua Cheng:



CREDIT: LAKI

Dian Dian playing with the children in Ghost City



Dian Dian's Day
Hide & Seek with Dian Dian ♡
Dian-Dian! We found you!
giggle
@currant_bliss JunkyArtist ♥
Cuddle Dian Dian time ♡

CREDIT: JUNKY

Chapter End Notes

thank you to Ren, Laki, and Junky for allowing me to share your work, and for making such amazing art based on my story! i'm so grateful!

xoxo, Evie

The Return of Guoshi Fangxin

Chapter Summary

> "I…" Xie Lian whispers, heart in his throat. "I don't…"
>
> Even still, while the prince's grip is like iron, it isn't harsh.
>
> He isn't trying to hurt him, even as he glares at the crown prince, fingers reaching out to delicately brush under his chin, making him look up—all while the crowd watches in confusion.
>
> "So," Lang Qianqiu sounds younger now.
>
> To most people, he sounds thoughtless and naive. But Xie Lian could tell from the moment they met again that he had matured.
>
> Now; however—his voice is wavering, filled with childhood pains, loss…
>
> And lingering, warped affection.
>
> "…This is what you actually look like."

Chapter Notes

> You can find me on twitter and keep up with current updates of the story HERE
>
> content warning: this chapter contains disturbing imagery relating to violence, gore, and suicide. proceed with caution!

See the end of the chapter for more notes

In the Heavenly Capitol above, the group of officials (and the ghost child in tow) collapse onto the street as Ruoye unravels from around them.

"Ah, Ming-Xiong, hold onto me," Shi Qingxuan mutters, sitting up, readying himself to call for help.

But the sight of Xie Lian makes him pause. "…Your highness!" He cries, horrified. "What happened?!"

The prince blinks owlishly, patting his right hand around to try and see if something is amiss. “What is it?”

“Y-YOUR ARM!”

Oh.

His left arm dangles uselessly by his side.

“...It’s alright,” Xie Lian shrugs, attempting to wave off any concern. “It doesn’t hurt.”

In truth, the only reason he notices the injury is because he can’t move the limb at all.

“How did that happen?!”

“Well...”

“He blocked Hua Cheng and Lang Qianqiu’s blows.”

Ming Yi explains it, exhausted and irritated. “He absorbed the force of both.”

Lang Qianqiu’s wasn’t an issue—that would have left him bruised, but his sword was far more damaged than Xie Lian would have been.

The severity of the wound was due to E’Ming.

The force was so extreme, every bone in the limb was shattered, nearly ripping Xie Lian’s limb from his body in the process.

And of course, it is a hindrance, and he’s sorry that the Wind Master had to be disturbed by the sight of the gore, but—

The prince is rather impressed. What an incredible blow...

Shi Qingxuan can see as much, from the way Xie Lian doesn’t seem pained, simply intrigued. “...That was truly incredible, your highness—but how—?”

Xie Lian shrugs, hugging his arm against his side as he stands. “I’m a swordsman by trade, remember?”

The Wind Master nods, finally seeming to remember his original purpose as he ushers them into the grand martial hall, calling out—

“We need medical assistance! We have two injured officials here! Hurry!”

“I’m alright,” Xie Lian shakes his head, “have them focus on the Earth Master, please...”

It isn’t long before other officials arrive—the foremost among them Mu Qing, ordering two of his deputies to load Ming Yi onto a stretcher. “What’s going on here?”

“Well...”

Shi Qingxuan starts, pulling Ming Yi’s robes tighter around himself, “We...got into a little trouble in Ghost City, but! We completed our mission, thanks to the Crown Prince of Xianle!”

“...” Mu Qing crosses his arms, raising an eyebrow. “You—?”

“What on EARTH are you wearing?!”

Shi Qingxuan flinches, his smile becoming somewhat nervous, “Gege! Hahaha...I thought...you were busy?”

Shi Wudu bodily shoves a deputy god out of his way, sending him flying as he reaches his brother’s side, carefully examining his bruises, “Did Crimson Rain do this?”

“Uh...” The Wind Master blinks, shaking his head. “Not exactly...how...was Gusu? I thought you were going there for a few —?”

“I obviously came back when I heard you showed up injured!” His brother snaps. “Just what have you gotten into? And don’t make me ask about that dress again!”

Honestly, Shi Qingxuan is the furthest from hurt of them all, but he accepts the fussing, allowing his brother to heal his cuts and bruises with spiritual energy. “I had to sneak into Paradise Manor, so I pretended to be a waitress.” He admits, a little sheepish.

“I was in a pretty exposed state before, so Ming-Xiong gave me his outer robes, at least...”

The Water Master glances over at his brother’s counterpart, distracted. “...I see, that’s good. At least one of you has common sense.” He mutters.

Ming Yi doesn't reply, watching closely.

Mu Qing stands over him, forming a few hand seals, palms glowing with spiritual energy as he begins to work on the wounds covering the earth master's abdomen. "One of you tend to his highness until I can finish up here," he mutters. "The injury to his arm seems somewhat serious."

Xie Lian shrugs, amiable. "I'm alright, there's no need to worry about that. It'll heal on its own soon enough."

He's more familiar with how quickly this body heals than most gods would be—after all, few have had the opportunity to learn.

Shi Qingxuan frowns in his direction for a moment, visibly concerned, but... Then, he notices something else. Something rather odd.

"Lang Qianqiu," he mutters, looking over at the Martial God, "Are you alright? I've never seen you so quiet."

Xie Lian doesn't see the stormy expression on the younger god's face—only hears further silence, and his own heart squeezes with worry.

"Did I hurt you, before?" He questions, reaching for the younger man's face with his good hand. "I'm sorry, I was trying to stop the—"

Xie Lian stops when a hand grasps his wrist rather tightly—stopping him before it ever reaches his face, holding it there.

"...Your highness?" He questions softly, his expression pinched with confusion, until —

"You could never hurt me."

Xie Lian feels his blood run cold.

Lang Qianqiu's voice is quiet, but it trembles with emotion.

"That was what you told me, back then."

Xie Lian's own lips quiver as he hangs his head, everyone else looking on in confusion.

"Xie Lian?" Feng Xin's voice rings out, signaling his arrival in the grand martial hall. "What's going on? Why is he hurt?!"

Xie Lian doesn't answer. Doesn't lift his hand. Doesn't try to pull his wrist from Lang Qianqiu's grasp.

Now more gods are arriving, but as far as they are concerned, it's just the two of them.

"I…" Xie Lian whispers, heart in his throat. "I don't…"

Even still, while the prince's grip is like iron, it isn't harsh.

He isn't trying to hurt him, even as he glares at the crown prince, fingers reaching out to delicately brush under his chin, making him look up—all while the crowd watches in confusion.

"So," Lang Qianqiu sounds younger now.

To most people, he sounds thoughtless and naive. But Xie Lian could tell from the moment they met again that he had matured.

Now; however—his voice is wavering, filled with childhood pains, loss…

And lingering, warped affection.

"…This is what you actually look like."

Lang Qianqiu has spent so many years trying to convince himself that a monster had lain beneath that mask.

That the one who shattered his world was just as hideous as the damage he left behind.

But he isn't.

He's incomparable, a kind of beautiful that strains against one's heart until it aches. He's beautiful, and he's tired—

And he's in pain.

Lang Qianqiu loathes himself for feeling concern.

"…I suppose that explains why you wore the mask," he mutters.

He means the shackle, of course, gleaming against Xie Lian's eye lashes. The mark of his shame. Of what he truly was.

The hideousness that he always told his pupil lurked beneath, but the prince never believed it.

Even now, hard as he tries, he can’t seem to find it ugly.

Silence fills the room, and Xie Lian’s fingers dangle loosely from where Lang Qianqiu grips him, trembling.

“Your highness,” he whispers again, not knowing what he wants to say—what he can say—and he only bites his lip, falling silent again.

“...Is someone going to explain what’s going on?!” Mu Qing grumbles, looking up from where he’s been treating Ming Yi.

Shi Wudu glares at the scene before him, holding his brother against his side—

But he sees the one thing that the others in the Grand Martial hall do not.

Jun Wu has arrived, standing beside his throne, one hand resting on the arm.

And unlike the others in the room, he doesn’t seem confused. Hell, he doesn’t even seem surprised.

But when Shi Wudu sees the gleam in his eye, he knows—pulling Shi Qingxuan even closer behind him.

Whatever is happening, the Emperor knows the nature behind it.

And he’s pleased.

“...Yes,” Lang Qianqiu mutters, “I think it’s time you explained.”

Xie Lian grimaces, and the prince continues to speak through clenched teeth— “Isn’t that right, Guoshi?”

Silence falls over the room like a heavy blanket, confusion twisting many expressions —but slowly, it cracks, whispers echoing throughout.

‘What is he talking about?’

‘The laughingstock of the three realms? Someone’s Guoshi? Don’t make me laugh!’ ‘But they do seem familiar...’

Xie Lian doesn’t lift his head, doesn’t reply to Lang Qianqiu’s question — Can’t seem to bring himself to.

Feng Xin, however, has no such qualms—and unlike the others—

“Lang Qianqiu, don’t be rash.”

Xie Lian whips his head around to stare in his former guard’s direction. He…

Xie Lian’s jaw goes slack, remembering his conversation with Nan Feng on Mount Yu Jun—what seems like a lifetime ago, even if it’s only been a matter of weeks—

Feng Xin knows.

And Lang Qianqiu seems to have come to the same conclusion.

“You knew the entire time, didn’t you?” He mutters—not letting go of Xie Lian, but glaring in Feng Xin’s direction. “You knew he was the Crown Prince of Xianle, and you didn’t say a word when he ascended!”

Xie Lian’s heart sinks, and the pain is bittersweet.

Of course he didn’t, because Feng Xin was doing what he’s always done:

Protecting Xie Lian.

Jun Wu’s voice rings out now, and the entire room falls silent.

“What’s the meaning of this?”

It takes a moment for Lang Qianqiu to respond, his voice trembling.

“…The man who stands before the lot of you is my former Guoshi, Fangxin.”

Startled gasps echo throughout the room at such an accusation.

After all, the crimes of the Gilded Banquet are so cruel, so wicked, that name has been cursed for the last three centuries.

Xie Lian doesn’t respond, doesn’t defend himself—but there is one voice that cries out with indignation.

“Lang Qianqiu!” Shi Qingxuan cries, “How could you say such a thing, after he saved your life from Crimson Rain Sought Flower! Twice, no less!”

The Water Master glances between the two, his expression grim. “Quiet.”

“And if it WAS him, why are you only recognizing him now?! It makes no sense! You —!”

His elder brother’s grip tightens on his shoulders to the point where Shi Qingxuan winces.

Shi Wudu has never once raised a hand to his younger brother—and while he’s always been stern, he’s never been cruel or unfair.

But now, he holds him in a vice grip, snarling in his ear—

“Be quiet, or I’ll make you.”

The younger falls silent, startled.

His brother has never spoken to him like that before. Not once. And he’s certainly never gripped him like this, to the point where it became painful.

Does he have some sort of grudge against Xie Lian? Why would he stop Shi Qingxuan from speaking out on the prince’s behalf?

In the corner, just behind Mu Qing, Ming Yi sits up slightly in his stretcher, one arm thrown across his torso as he surveys the scene.

Watches the way the Water Tyrant snatches his brother out of the confrontation, dark eyes briefly flashing before going still once more.

But he isn’t the only one watching.

Shi Wudu’s eyes flicker to the emperor, only to find the man already staring at them both—and they quickly lower to the floor as he pulls his younger brother behind him.

Still, Lang Qianqiu answers the Wind Master’s question.

“He was the one who trained me in sword fighting. You think I don’t know him the moment he strikes?”

He would be mad if he didn’t—for five years, day in and day out, they trained together. His personality is certainly different now, but his abilities betray him completely.

Now, a new voice speaks up for him—one that Xie Lian couldn’t have expected.

“...But you didn’t recognize him by his face? Or even his voice?” Mu Qing questions softly. “His highness and I trained under the same masters, as did several others. Our styles are similar.”

Xie Lian doesn’t look in Mu Qing’s direction—but his shoulders are stiff with shock.

“He wore a mask the entire time I knew him,” Lang Qianqiu mutters. “He was absolutely insistent on never showing his face—now, it seems he did that in order to hide his cursed shackle.”

It’s an admittedly logical conclusion.

The prince’s hand tightens slightly around Xie Lian’s wrist before he continues;

“His voice was familiar from the beginning,” Lang Qianqiu admits, shaking his head. “But that wasn’t enough to convince me. Not until...”

Until he saw the Prince use a technique only his Guoshi knew.

How to deflect two blades in one strike, absorbing the force of both. Lang Qianqiu begged his master to teach him, but Fangxin always refused.

It was a dangerous technique, he would insist.

Not suited to a prince.

“Still, that’s not enough evidence to presume he’s guilty of such a heinous crime,” Feng Xin steps forward, his hands balled into fists. “The prince and I have known each other since we were children, he would never do such a thing.”

Xie Lian hangs his head even lower. “...But you didn’t.”

Up until he spoke, Xie Lian had no way of knowing that General Ming Guang was even present—and his words seem to draw irritation from Xie Lian’s former companions.

“General Pei, what are you trying to say?”

“You haven’t known him all that time.”

Mu Qing casts him an irritated look, “I met the prince when we were nearly thirteen years old. I’ve known him practically his entire life.”

“And when I met him, we were seven.” Feng Xin adds. “Are you trying to say our word when it comes to his character doesn’t hold any water?”

“But from my understanding, you didn’t have any contact with him during his second banishment,” Pei counters with a frown, crossing his arms. He doesn’t seem cross or hostile in saying this—

And his point is fair.

“A banishment that was over eight centuries long, as I recall.”

Feng Xin and Mu Qing pale slightly at the reminder of that fact, something the two of them were obviously aware of, but—

“And if we were to put the time you knew him in the perspective of human years...it would be like...”

General Ming Guang glances in Shi Qingxuan’s direction.

The Wind Master grimaces, not wanting to say anything that could worsen Xie Lian’s defense, but—

He can’t resist answering the question, not when it’s been put to him.

“It would be as though General Nan Yang knew him for four months and five days... when he was six months old.”

Shi Qingxuan grimaces slightly, adding—

“Two months, one week, and six days in General Xuan Zhen’s case.”

Pei Ming shrugs, having made his point rather clearly. “Few gods are as old as the three of you. Even fewer are as old as me. How much have you changed, since you were that age?”

Not very much, if Xie Lian is being honest. Well—not exactly.

Mu Qing does seem to have changed—certainly matured—since the last time they spoke. Even if he prefers to hide that maturity behind a condescending, combative veneer.

Feng Xin, though? He hasn’t changed at all.

But Xie Lian doesn't completely agree with Pei Ming's point.

After all, in those terms—Xie Lian's time with Hong'er was absolutely minuscule by comparison. As though he was snatched from Xie Lian's life barely more than a couple of chapters into his story.

But it doesn't feel that way. Not for him.

He loves Hong'er just as much today as he did eighty decades ago. There are some things that don't change.

He grips the chain around his neck with his free hand, lips trembling. "...Still," Feng Xin mumbles, grasping at straws.

"You can't condemn the man before he's been given a chance to deny it—"

"I don't deny it."

For the first time since Lang Qianqiu called him his Guoshi, Xie Lian speaks out—and his voice sounds very different.

Cold. Detached.

The Crown Prince of Yong'an grits his teeth.

"...You admit it then, that you're Guoshi Fangxin?"

Xie Lian still doesn't lift his head, feeling countless eyes on him as he replies—

"I am."

Surprised gasps echo, and Jun Wu frowns.

"Then I would like to hear your account of what happened the night of the Gilded Banquet."

"..." Lang Qianqiu's fingertips have been pressed underneath his chin this entire time— and finally, Xie Lian shrinks away from them. "It's exactly as the prince said. No need to dig up old wounds any further."

His former student trembles.

"Guoshi, you—!"

Xie Lian pulls out of his grip entirely, turning away from him.

Even with one arm dangling limply at his side, he seems graceful, approaching the throne, his head held high.

"Your majesty," he murmurs. "I know it's presumptuous of me, but I would like to ask a favor."

Jun Wu raises an eyebrow—after all, it is a bit gutsy, given the situation—but he doesn't seem offended. "What is it?"

Standing at the foot of his throne—Xie Lian drops heavily to his knees, bowing his head low.

"...Xianle prays that his lord will banish him once more."

Every eye in the room is locked on the prince—so no one sees the way Mu Qing suddenly turns away, one hand over his mouth, head bent forward. He isn't touching Feng Xin, but he's practically hiding his face in the man's shoulder from that angle.

"...And that he will give Xianle another cursed shackle for his crimes." Horrified whispers fill the room.

Feng Xin doesn't protest Mu Qing's closeness—only grits his teeth, glaring at the floor, his hands balled into fists.

'...Can a god even survive four cursed shackles?'

'Wouldn't execution be a more human solution, at that point?'

'It's the same thing as a slow death sentence...'

"...That would be an extreme response," Jun Wu replies quietly. "I've already sealed your powers, your luck, and your sight, Xianle. What is left to take?"

"..." Xie Lian takes a deep breath, "You could seal my voice."

Lang Qianqiu can't look at him—and his friends can't bring themselves to do so either.

But one gaze lingers on him, from the back of the room. Sapphire eyes wide, filled with a slow, nauseating realization.

No one else seems to understand it. Unable to grasp what would cause a man to volunteer to be banished—powerless, blind, and mute, without even an ounce of luck to spare him from misfortune.

Even Jun Wu seems unable to fathom it. “Why would Xianle ask me for such a thing?”

The prince’s lips tremble, and he lowers his head.

“The last time we spoke, I didn’t understand why I still had these shackles,” he whispers.

There were many things Xie Lian didn’t understand, the last time they spoke.

He couldn’t figure out why he felt so alone, here in the heavens. Why he felt so miserable, standing before the rebuilt palace of Xianle. He knew that he wasn’t used to them anymore, that he felt out of place, but—

“I have them, because I destroyed countless lives, and caused so much pain,” the prince lifts his chin, blindly staring up at Jun Wu’s face.

Xie Lian doesn’t deserve to be here.

“I don’t know why I ascended a third time,” he whispers, “but I know that I deserve to be punished.”

The emperor is silent, his face tilted down so he can look at Xie Lian more clearly, his hair slipping over his shoulders, shrouding his expression.

As such, no one can see something rather strange—

That Jun Wu is smiling.

“...Even if he was banished again, he could still ascend once more,” Lang Qianqiu shakes his head. “I don’t want him banished, I just want a proper explanation, or a duel—”

“I agree.” Jun Wu replies, rising to his feet. “Xianle, your request is denied.”

Those words feel like a kick in the gut, leaving him quietly shaken, his shoulders trembling. Jun Wu’s voice is close, but somehow, it feels rather far away.

“There are details that you aren’t sharing. I can’t administer justice without all of the facts.”

“...But...I—”

“Ming Guang,” Jun Wu speaks over him, “escort the prince to the Palace of Xianle and have him imprisoned there.” He rises to his feet, leaving Xie Lian kneeling and deflated on the floor. “I’ll interrogate him myself, later. We’ll get to the bottom of the matter.”

He turns, whispering something in Ling Wen’s ear—then exits the Grand Martial Hall.

General Pei doesn’t question the order, but when he steps forward, he doesn’t drag Xie Lian from the room roughly, like a prisoner.

He kneels beside the prince, offering a hand to help him up.

Once Xie Lian is on his feet, the general lowers his voice to speak next to his ear.

“I get the feeling that you would tell me you could walk under any circumstances—but you seem seriously injured.”

Xie Lian shrugs, not seeming to care about that in the least. “My legs are fine, general. I can walk.”

Pei doesn’t protest that point, keeping one hand on his elbow as they exit the Grand Martial Hall—but once they’re out of view of the other gods, he snaps his fingers, causing a stretcher to appear.

“General Pei, it isn’t necessary—”

Before Xie Lian can protest any further, the stretcher sweeps underneath him, taking him off his feet and forcing the prince to lay down.

“You know, in spite of being a shit liar,” Pei comments, walking beside the stretcher, “your poker face isn’t terrible.”

Xie Lian stares up at the sky blindly, his bad arm pressed against his side. “I’m not sure what you mean, general.”

“Even if your pain tolerance is that high—and I believe it might be—you aren’t a fool.” Pei shrugs, his cloak streaming in the breeze. “Which means you must know walking around like that will only make your body take longer to heal. It’s impractical.”

Xie Lian does know that, and the reminder is enough to make him grimace. “I’m not sure what that has to do with having a poker face.”

“…Because you have everyone convinced that you aren’t proud,” the martial god of the north replies softly, watching as the Crown Prince of Xianle stiffens with surprise. “Maybe you’ve even convinced yourself.”

After a day like this—Xie Lian finds the idea of that laughable.

“...I really don’t know what I would have to be proud of, General.” He mutters, shaking his head.

He was proud, once. When he was young. Cripplingly so.

“Humans are complicated creatures, your highness.” Pei’s boots crunch softly against the stones underfoot. “We are constantly trying to justify our own existence. That’s what pride is for.”

Xie Lian rolls onto his uninjured side, biting his lip.

And what if he just doesn’t deserve to exist? What then?

“In most cases, it’s more like bargaining with our own flaws.”

Of which Xie Lian has many.

“People will tell themselves all sorts of things. They commit crimes, but then point at the good they did. Or they’ll be cruel to the world, but treasure their families. Win wars, and claim that the result of peace justified the violence.”

Xie Lian’s mouth tightens at the corners, his good hand balling into a fist beside his head.

“...Then what am I bargaining for?” He croaks, curling in on himself. “What good could pride do me?”

Pei is quiet for a moment, watching as they draw close to the Palace of Xianle.

“...I think you take pride in your ability to endure suffering.” He replies, his voice quiet. “That’s the only way someone could come to terms with a lifetime of being punished.”

What a strange pair they make.

Pei Ming, who has stood at the Emperor’s side longer than any other. Heaven’s strongest soldier.

Xie Lian, who has fallen further than any—Heaven’s greatest disappointment. And yet, in this moment—

It feels like Pei might be oddly close to understanding him. Seeing Xie Lian in a way that he is no longer accustomed to.

Without a veil of judgment, or pity.

Xie Lian doesn't reply to his assertions. Not out of anger, or denial—but simply because he has no idea how to respond to them.

Pei Ming seems to understand as much. After all, he's got quite a bit of experience when it comes to pride.

His own pride is subversive. He's proud of his strength. Of his ability to make people fall for the carefree, exuberant personality that he presents to the world. And no one can damage that pride, because they believe that Pei doesn't care.

But he certainly does.

And he has experience with the overbearing, more obvious types of pride. The kind that puts people at a distance. The kind that becomes self destructive.

Pei Ming has loved many things, many people.

But he's rarely ever been in love—and both times, it was with someone prideful.

Viciously so.

In the end, it was that pride that made him lose the first.

And while he has no way of knowing it—it's the same pride that will make him lose the last.

Xie Lian protests no further as he's delivered to the palace of Xianle, left to rest, and await Jun Wu.

The layout of the place is exactly as it was when he first ascended. Polished floors and marble walls.

Xie Lian drops onto the bed, his head heavy as he lays down, closing his eyes.

"...Hong'er," he mumbles, reaching up to grasp at the ring beneath his robes, holding on tight.

"…I don't think I know what to do anymore," he rolls onto his side, curling his legs up until he's in a tiny little ball on top of the bedsheets.

It's been such a long day—his eyes feel heavy, but his chest is tight with misery. "I can't stop breaking things," he whispers.

His friends. Paradise Manor. Lang Qianqiu.

No matter what he does, things always end up like…

Sleep comes for him—but it's fitful.

'Guoshi! Did you see me?'

His face should be smooth with slumber, but it contorts.

'Gege, did you see?'

He squirms, mumbling soundlessly.

'I won't let anyone hurt you—not ever again.'

'I'm not like you, your highness—I'm not beautiful.'

'…What if I'm ugly on the inside?'

The darkness of sleep feels suffocating. Enclosing.

'I didn't want to do that…'

Xie Lian chokes, desperately gasping for air.

'Why did you make me do that?!'

He can't move. Why—why can't he move?!

'GUOSHI!'

'Your highness, come back…'

He tries to lift his shoulders, but they won't move—and the air feels stale.

'Believe me, your highness.'

I do.

He wants to say that.

I believe you.

'I'm forever your most devoted believer.'

Xie Lian can't ever seem to cry when he's awake, but in his sleep, he weeps.

And the words he wants to say never fall out of his mouth.

"I don't—" He chokes, pressing his palms up, desperate to get away, "I don't believe you!"

But his hands don't push free.

They find hard, unforgiving wood.

'Dianxia…'

The roof of a coffin.

'What do we do, when faced with the wicked?'

"No…" He moans, kicking out with his feet. "No, no no—"

There's a trembling voice, whispering in the dark—

'You aren't wicked.'

Tears pour down his cheeks, and he fights.

He kicks, and he punches, and he writhes—until suddenly, the coffin shatters, leaving him plunging down into the darkness.

When Xie Lian lands, he hits the ground hard, struggling to push himself up. And when he does—

He can see.

The cobblestones under his hands. The houses in the city around him.

The sun sinking low over Lang-er Bay. This was the last thing he ever saw.

'…Your highness…'

The voice echoes in his mind like a whisper, and Xie Lian swallows thickly, whipping his head around.

Standing alone in the street, black saber in hand, is a young soldier. Tall and slender, dressed in black.

A white mask on his face.

Not the mask that Xie Lian learned to fear, no—

This one is only smiling.

"...Wu Ming?" The prince whispers, trembling like a leaf.

'Handsome .'

That was what he thought back then, with such finality. Even if he never saw the face underneath that mask.

Xie Lian knew—he must have been handsome. And it hurts so much more now...

Because he knows what comes next.

"...Don't," Xie Lian whimpers.

He lurches to his feet, running across the pavement.

"DON'T!"

In the memory, he never got close. Was forced to watch as that mask disappeared beneath the shrouds of screams and darkness.

In his dream, they collide, with Xie Lian throwing his arms around the young man— desperate.

"Don't leave me," he gasps, pressing his face into Wu Ming's shoulder, holding on as tightly as he can.

Those arms wrap around him in return, hugging him close—holding him so tight, it makes Xie Lian cry even harder.

Because he doesn't want it to end.

"It...It was so hard, after I lost you..." He chokes, weeping as the cold, black scales of the ghost's armor press against his cheek. "Don't leave me!"

Then, a frantic thought occurs to him.

The kiss.

Xie Lian—

He never paid Wu Ming back for the kiss, that day.

“I…I still have to pay you back,” he leans back, looking up at that mask, his lips trembling. “Wu Ming—you have to stay, I have to pay you back—!”

The mask tilts forward until it’s pressed against his skin, cool to the touch. Almost like the ghost is kissing his forehead.

“Don’t worry, your highness.” Xie Lian’s eyes well with tears as he tries to hold on tighter. “You can pay me back next time.”

A choked sob rips from his throat.

“There isn’t a next time, Wu Ming,” he whispers. “You never came back.”

His reply brings Xie Lian’s world to a halt

“Don’t be afraid, your highness.”

Xie Lian’s tears begin to slow as he stares into that mask, eyes widening.

“I’ll always come back.”

The prince’s lips tremble as he reaches up, pressing his palms against that mask. That voice…is so familiar.

“…It’s you?” He whispers.

His fingers curl underneath the edges of the white, clay surface of Wu Ming’s mask, and for just a moment—

He feels one of his fingertips brush over something like leather.

An eyepatch.

Xie Lian’s hard beats in his throat.

“San—?”

CRASH!

Then, everything shatters.

There’s black smoke all around them—and then, there’s no them.

No Wu Ming.

Just Xie Lian—and he’s falling.

Far and fast, clawing and flailing for something to hold onto—but eventually, something does.

Creak…

His feet dangle, twitching underneath him.

Creak…

There’s something around his neck in a vice grip, blocking his airway—but he doesn’t suffocate.

He won’t, he already knows that.

Xie Lian’s hands reach up, clawing uselessly at his throat. “…Ruoye,” he croaks, listening to that awful, wooden sound. Creak…

Creak…

“H…hel—”

“Go.”

Xie Lian didn’t say that.

But the bandage around his neck coils tighter, hoisting him higher, and higher—

“NO!”

His voice doesn’t sound like his own.

“Not like this—” he cries, building into a scream, “NOT LIKE THIS!”

When he opens his eyes, looking down—

Xie Lian sees himself.

Wearing long sleeved mourning robes, cursed shackles burning up at him in the dark.

“No one will even mourn you,” he sneers hatefully, blood dripping from the sword in his hand.

He knows.

Xie Lian knows that.

He turns his head, finding Wu Ming sitting there, in the corner—holding a lantern with a ghost fire against his chest, watching the scene.

A broken man, avenging a murderer. But…

Creak…

His lungs burn.

Xie Lian is the murderer now, dangling over his own crime scene.

And when he stares down at his younger self now, his heart twists with shame. He doesn’t—

Xie Lian’s fingers claw at Ruoye a little more desperately, trying to break free. He doesn’t want to be that person anymore.

The prince squeezes his eyes shut.

He doesn’t—

CRACK!

There’s a snap, followed by a thud, then—

CRACK!

Then, another.

Xie Lian opens his eyes, and when he does—

His parents are there, dangling in front of him. Eyes wide and unseeing.

Xie Lian never actually saw them, before.

H-how is he…?

“...No,” he moans, writhing. “NO!”

CRACK!

This time, Ruoye snaps from around his neck—and he’s falling again.

Plummeting through the dark.

But this time, when he’s caught—it isn’t by his throat, but by his wrists—arms yanked up and over his head.

Clink...

Clink...

Not the sound of wraith butterflies.

Clink...

Not silver bells, either.

Clink...

Xie Lian is all too familiar with the sound of chains.

And when he opens his eyes this time, he finds himself on an altar.

There’s no noose around his neck now, but the god still can’t breathe.

All around him, it’s a temple.

It’s a cold unlike anything else he’s ever known. Rushing through his lungs, piercing him to the bone.

“...Let me go,” he whispers, his wrists straining against his bonds. “WHY WON’T YOU LET ME GO?!”

Finally, that voice answers.

The one he never wanted to hear again.

“I’ve already told you so many times, my prince.” His voice echoes against the walls without a form, but Xie Lian can hear it.

Heavy footsteps, and a metallic scrape across the floor.

That of a sword being dragged against the marble.

“Have you forgotten so easily?”

Now, that voice whispers next to his ear, and Xie Lian tries to cringe away, only for a hand to lock around his hip, holding him in place.

“I will never leave you,” he croons, breath fanning over the prince’s neck as he struggles, terrified whimpers ripping from his throat.

“I’m the only one who will never leave you.”

Xie Lian feels lips press against his hair, nausea building in his throat—along with this overwhelming sense of helplessness and despair.

Because it’s true.

He hollowed something out inside of Xie Lian, long ago.

Stole something.

As hard as he tries, Xie Lian has never been able to take that back.

And in that empty space inside of him, something dark lurks there. Something he would slice himself to pieces to remove, if it wouldn’t always come back.

Like a parasite refusing to leave its host.

He doesn’t flinch when the sword slides into him. Doesn’t scream, when he feels it go all the way through.

It hurts, but it always does.

Blood drips from his chin, and fingers reach out to brush it away, delicately patting over his lip.

“You know…”

Xie Lian goes still.

Slowly, he lifts his chin, and standing between his legs—

He’s there.

Holding Xie Lian by the chin, raven and silver streaked hair blowing gently in the breeze from the ruined temple.

A mask stares back at him. Half smiling, half crying.

"...You have always had the most beautiful eyes."

Finally, Xie Lian screams.

Blood curdling, ripping from him over and over again, rattling against the walls.

And he can't stop.

Fighting to get away, blood pouring down, listening—

Listening to that horrible laugh.

"H-Help—!" He chokes, "HELP ME! S-SOMEONE, HELP ME—!"

There's another stab, this time in his left arm, sinking in, twisting until he can't take it, screaming over and over.

"HELP, GOD—PLEASE, JUST—LET ME DIE! SOMEONE—IT HURTS!" He sobs, "IT HURTS, IT—!"

He sits up.

"IT HURTS!"

Now—it's dark.

No temple, no screaming, no laughing—

And no masks.

Xie Lian struggles to catch his breath, trembling—and he hears a shocked voice from beside him say—

"I would have helped before, but you told me to look after Ming Yi first."

The god blinks, breathing hard.

"...Mu Qing?" He whispers, his voice trembling and unsure. "Is that you?"

The Martial God nods, watching the prince with a frown. He's gone completely pale, trembling like a leaf. "...Yeah," he mutters. "Are you alright? Has the pain gotten worse?"

After all, he just sat up shrieking, 'IT HURTS' at the top of his lungs, so Mu Qing would assume that it has.

“…No,” Xie Lian mutters, struggling to regain control over his breathing. “It’s…I…” He falls silent, taking long, slow breaths, eyes squeezed shut.

Mu Qing stares at him, his expression pinched with concern as he watches all of the anxiety and terror fade from the prince’s face, returning to a calm mask.

There’s also faint rumbling in the distance, but he’s too distracted to focus on that now—

“I’m sorry about that.” Xie Lian’s voice is completely even—back to it’s usual, tranquil tone. “I was having a bit of a nightmare. I hope I didn’t scare you.”

Mu Qing stares, trying not to look at him like he has a second head, though he supposes it doesn’t really matter if he does or not.

“No,” he mutters. “You didn’t. Do you…have dreams like that often?”

“…Yes,” Xie Lian agrees quietly. “But I’ve already forgotten it—so it’s no harm, no foul.”

Mu Qing finds himself struggling to agree, but still—he goes back to attending the prince’s arm.

“…Did Crimson Rain really do this to you?” He questions, his hands glowing with spiritual energy as he works on mending bone and sinew.

“It wasn’t his fault, he wouldn’t have harmed me intentionally,” Xie Lian mutters, quick to defend him—and then, he notices they aren’t alone.

Feng Xin is leaning against the wall, his arms crossed—his eyes fixed on the prince.

There’s a lot on his mind, leaving him strained—the same could be said for both of Xie Lian’s friends.

A cloud hangs over them both.

At first, Xie Lian assumes it’s because of what Pei said.

After all, it clearly seemed to bother the two of them, but—

“Lang Qianqiu told me everything that happened, when you sent him to me.” Feng Xin mutters, his voice tense.

Xie Lian’s chest sinks.

“...I’m sorry for placing such a burden on you, Feng Xin.” He hangs his head. “When I told him that, I had no idea what was going to happen.”

“...” Mu Qing snorts, sending the prince an annoyed look.

But there’s fondness underneath it.

“Fool,” he sighs, shaking his head. “You realize when you say it like that, it’s obvious that it wasn’t your doing?”

Xie Lian doesn’t respond to that, biting his lip. He never thought he could attempt to lie about what happened, not to his old friends.

Regardless of Pei’s point from before—they never would have believed it.

But that point was never up for debate, and Feng Xin doesn’t care.

“How long were you in there?”

Mu Qing tenses, his hand sign faltering, making his spiritual energy flicker—and Xie Lian frowns.

“I don’t—?”

“Lang Qianqiu told me everything, when he came to me. About what happened, and what he did.” Feng Xin repeats firmly.

Xie Lian’s stomach sinks.

“How long were you in there?”

Now, there’s no avoiding it. He knows exactly what Feng Xin is asking about. The Coffin.

He hangs his head, and his voice goes quiet. “...Not too long,” he mutters. “I don’t like talking about it.”

Feng Xin crosses his arms, waiting—and when Xie Lian shrinks under the weight of his gaze, Mu Qing frowns.

"He just said that he doesn't want to talk about it—"

"And I'm sure you'd be happy if you didn't," Feng Xin hisses, "since you refused to help me look for him."

It was the worst fight they ever had. They didn't speak for nearly a hundred years, afterwards.

"...Because it sounded fucking CRAZY!" Mu Qing snaps, lowering his hands from Xie Lian's arm. "And you never found him, so why does it matter that I didn't agree?!"

He sounds defensive, his lips pulling back into a sneer—but Xie Lian can hear what Feng Xin can't.

Just how fast Mu Qing's heart is beating.

"Well, let's check and see how crazy it is now, alright?" Feng Xin snarls. "Your highness, did Lang Qianqiu lock you in a coffin?"

"Uh..." Xie Lian tries to twiddle his thumbs, but his right arm is still limp—so he's left scratching the side of his head, somewhat awkward. "Well...I don't know if he locked it, per-say...More like...gravity did most of the work...keeping the lid down..."

"Ah."

Feng Xin sounds so deeply frustrated, like this has been building up inside of him for so long with Mu Qing belittling his concerns, Xie Lian can't find it in himself to blame him for this outburst—

...But he really wishes it had come up at a better time.

"So, he buried him in the coffin." He mutters flatly, glaring at Mu Qing. "I'm two for two."

"..." Mu Qing crosses his arms, and when he speaks up, he does so in the driest tone Xie Lian has ever heard.

"Would you be less pissed at me if it had been a Mausoleum situation?"

Xie Lian actually lets out a small snort, clapping his hands over his mouth, and Feng Xin glances over at him, appalled.

"How could you LAUGH about that?!"

"Maybe he's coping!" Mu Qing snaps. "Either way, he doesn't want to talk about it, so MOVE ON!"

"He probably doesn't want to talk about it because it makes YOU look like a piece of shit!" Feng Xin pushes off of the wall.

"Once AGAIN!" Mu Qing throws his hands up. "You didn't find him either! So, why does it MATTER if I helped or not?!"

"Because you're SMARTER than me!" Feng Xin's hands are trembling at his sides, balled up into fists. "If you had helped me look—maybe we would have—!"

"Well, it couldn't have been THAT long!" Mu Qing stands up, his chair screeching across the floor. "He would have prayed for help if it was!"

The look on Feng Xin's face turns absolutely venomous. "You're so fucking determined that nothing is ever your fault, you'll just try to deny the situation?!"

Mu Qing barks out a laugh, shaking his head.

"And YOU are so hellbent proving that I'm a piece of shit, you'll actually ADMIT that you're a DUMBASS!"

"I—both of you—"

"HOW LONG WAS IT?!" Feng Xin sounds like he might be on the verge of having a stroke, and Xie Lian is startled enough to reply.

"...A...little while..."

He mumbles in a small voice, and it becomes clear to both of the men listening—

'A little while' means a length of time. It doesn't sound brief.

"W-Well..." Mu Qing swallows hard, and Xie Lian hears his heart pounding even faster. "He still would have prayed if he needed help!"

"Maybe he didn't think he COULD because of the circumstances!"

"Oh, of COURSE he could have prayed to you," Mu Qing sneers, "his most loyal, self righteous, JUDGMENTAL—" He pauses, eyes widening with fake shock as he taps his chin. "Oh, you know what? I'm seeing your point."

"YOU—!"

"Oh, but don't worry!" The martial god shakes his head, "I NEVER was under any impression that he would EVER ask for my help, or pray to me. AND YOU'RE WONDERING WHY I DIDN'T HELP YOU LOOK?!"

Xie Lian and Feng Xin stop, staring.

Mu Qing's voice is shaking.

"I DIDN'T THINK HE WOULD WANT ME TO FIND HIM!"

"..." Feng Xin presses his hands to his temples, wracked with regret.

The argument was so long ago, and Feng Xin was so young back then. So hurt, and lost, and desperate for someone to blame—

But Mu Qing doesn't forget anything.

And it doesn't matter, if Feng Xin wishes he could take it back.

Xie Lian swallows hard, trying to think of something, anything to make him feel better, and unwittingly—

"...I did pray to you, Mu Qing."

—it's the worst thing he could have possibly said.

Feng Xin and Mu Qing are frozen in place, their eyes blown eye—one accusatory, infuriated—

(Briefly assuming that Mu Qing had heard Xie Lian's prayers all that time and said nothing.)

—and the other confused, horrified.

"...What?" Mu Qing croaks, and he—

He sounds undone.

"I—I didn't—"

"It was before all of that," Xie Lian explains quickly—and all he wants is to make Mu Qing see that he wasn't despised. "Early in my first banishment, I went to one of your temples, and I started to pray, but..."

The prince bites his lip.

"...I didn't think you would want to hear from me," he whispers, wrapping one arm around himself.

He isn't used to being around other people like this, after waking up from a nightmare.

The only one who ever used to deal with that was Hong'er—and he—

He would just hold him.

Even when he was still smaller than Xie Lian, he would hold the prince tightly in his arms, whispering—

'It was just a dream, dianxia. You're alright now.'

And it made him feel safe.

Now, surrounded by tension, chaos, and yelling—

He just feels raw, shaken, and exposed.

There's a long beat of silence, and now—Feng Xin sounds like he's calmed down, more focused on Xie Lian's visible distress.

"...Your highness, of course we—"

SMACK!

The sound is so resounding, even Xie Lian winces, and Feng Xin—

He's been kicked before. Punched. Bitten. Scratched. That's part of being in combat, and that's where he's been all his life.

But he's never been backhanded so hard, that he feels his eyes rattling around inside their sockets. So hard, that it makes him stumble backwards.

"...What..." He winces, spitting out blood as he rubs his jaw, feeling somewhat concussed. "...What the fuck?!"

"You..." Mu Qing snarls, and Xie Lian—

He's heard his friend angry before, but Mu Qing typically has a cold, antagonistic anger.

Not like this.

“You fucking ASSHOLE!”

Mu Qing sounds utterly incensed, leaping on the man, punching him so hard, Feng Xin’s head leaves a dent in the wall.

“WHAT THE—?!”

“YOU HAD ME CONVINCED…FOR CENTURIES…THAT HE WOULD NEVER WANT TO TALK TO ME!”

“Feng Xin, Mu Qing, don’t—”

“I’M SORRY!” Feng Xin glares, struggling to wrestle him off as they roll around on the floor. “IT WAS A SHITTY THING TO SAY, AND I’M SORRY! WHEN HAVE YOU EVER SAID THAT?!”

“WHY SHOULD I APOLOGIZE TO SOMEONE WHO DOESN’T RESPECT ME?!” Mu Qing thrashes, fighting to get a punch in.

“WHEN DID I EVER SAY I DIDN’T RESPECT YOU?!”

Xie Lian curls up against the wall, pressing his knees to his chest. He can cover his ear with one hand—the other he presses against the inside of his knee. “Please, just—”

“YOU DON’T!” Mu Qing snarls, abandoning every bit of training he’s ever received. Normally, they’re equal in combat skills—but right now, he’s too upset to think, just blindly clawing at him. “YOU WOULDN’T TREAT ME LIKE THAT IF YOU RESPECTED ME!”

“WHAT ARE YOU TALKING ABOUT?!”

Xie Lian would honestly like to know the same thing, because it feels like he’s missing a lot. Still, it’s so loud, and his teeth are chattering—

“IN CASE YOU DIDN’T NOTICE, YOU’RE NO SAINT YOURSELF—!”

“BUT YOU’RE PATIENT WITH EVERYONE ELSE!” Mu Qing cries. “AND YOU LISTEN! AND YOU WORRY ABOUT THEM—AND YOU GIVE THEM THE BENEFIT OF THE DOUBT!”

Well, not everyone else, but—

The prince is starting to understand.

Xie Lian.

Feng Xin is all of those things—when it comes to him.

They must be fighting pretty hard—because it feels like the ground is rattling from the force of it.

But all Xie Lian can focus on is the fact that...

“YOU GIVE EVERYONE ELSE YOUR BEST!”

...Mu Qing sounds genuinely hurt.

“But...But never ME!”

His following punch doesn’t have as much energy as it did before—but Feng Xin doesn’t even try to stop it, letting it land on his cheek.

The two stare at one another, breathing hard, a little lost, and—

Clink!

Xie Lian jumps, turning his head, and—

There’s a butterfly.

Sitting on his shoulder, it’s body tilted back to look up at him, wings flapping gently. And there’s another, hovering in the air just a few inches from his face.

Eyes wide, he instinctively reaches out, and, well—

He can’t see that the butterfly is hovering inside a portal.

But the moment the butterfly lands on his finger, he hears both of his friends launch themselves to their feet, struggling to get to him.

“YOUR HIGHNESS—DON’T TOUCH THAT—!”

Xie Lian frowns, wanting to tell them that there’s nothing to worry about, but—

Something has already grasped his wrist, pulling him in—and with that, he sees countless wraith butterflies flooding past him, firing into the Palace of Xianle, knocking his friends back before they can get to him.

ARTWORK INSPIRED BY THIS STORY

Included with permission from the artist, do not reproduce or reuse for any reason

CREDIT: YUE LING

Chapter End Notes

> thank you to Yue Ling for your beautiful work, and allowing me to share it!

xoxo, Evie

Broken Things

Chapter Summary

> “I—really, I’m okay, I promise—”
>
> “Dianxia?” The ghost king interrupts him.
>
> “…Yes?”
>
> “Come here, please.”

Chapter Notes

> You can find me on twitter and keep up with current updates of the story HERE

See the end of the chapter for more notes

“…CRIMSON RAIN!” Feng Xin cries. “YOU HAVE A LOT OF NERVE, BREAKING INTO THE HEAVENS LIKE THIS!”

“…Funny,” Hua Cheng’s voice rings out from beside him, and—

Xie Lian would be lying if he said his heart didn’t swell.

“That was exactly what I was telling a few Heavenly Officials last night—in my territory.”

He has a fair point there, but Mu Qing still struggles, batting away butterflies as he fumbles for his saber. “THE EMPEROR IS IN THE CITY!” He shouts over the shrieking of the butterflies. “YOU WON’T GET AWAY WITH THIS!”

It’s no small threat, but… Hua Cheng laughs.

“You people really are unbelievable…” He mutters, shaking his head. “If his majesty has a problem—he knows where to find me.”

When Hua Cheng says, ‘your highness’ or ‘dianxia’ in reference to Xie Lian—it’s always with the highest level of respect.

(And, if Xie Lian was honest enough with himself to admit it—something else.)

But when he says ‘your majesty?’

The title drops from his lips like an insult.

And just like that, the portal snaps shut—leaving the Heavens, and everything with it behind.

It takes Xie Lian a moment to realize that they're in a tunnel—much like the ones that he and Shi Qingxuan were stumbling through the night before, but...

Admittedly, probably more stable—since Hua Cheng is the intended user of the array. It...even reaches inside the Heavens?

"Dianxia," the sound of Hua Cheng's voice startles him out of his thoughts. And he sounds...bothered. "Are you alright?"

Is that...really what he's asking right now? Xie Lian's stomach twists with remorse. After everything he...

"..." The prince shakes his head.

Hua Cheng's expression darkens, but before he can say more— "I'm so, so sorry San Lang..." Xie Lian croaks, hanging his head.

The Ghost King takes a step back, staring down at him with disbelief. "...What should you be sorry for?"

"Your—Paradise Manor, I...I never meant to..."

"...Of course you didn't," Hua Cheng agrees quietly. "I know that."

Xie Lian lets out a shuddering breath that he never realized he was holding, and...

He can't remember the last time someone just...believed that he had good intentions.

"I'm the one who should be apologizing."

The god pauses, startled by just how...bitter Hua Cheng sounds.

How self loathing.

"...What?" He blinks, "I, uh...I don't think that's how these situations work."

What's he supposed to say?

'Dianxia, I am SO sorry that you lied to me, spied on me, and burned down my house!'

'I'll do better next time! I'll let you mount my panda's head on the wall too!'

Speaking of—

"Is Dian Dian okay?" He blurts out, his lips trembling with worry, and —

Hua Cheng lets out a tired chuckle shaking his head—and the way he looks at Xie Lian...

They might be in the middle of a dark tunnel, but judging by the look on Hua Cheng's face alone—it's like he has the entire world set within his gaze.

"Dian Dian is fine," he mutters. "Paradise Manor is fine. No harm done."

"...Really?" Xie Lian's voice is small, unsteady.

"Really," Hua Cheng assures him, only faltering when his eye reaches Xie Lian's shoulder, his expression falling back into open self loathing. "...I wish I could say the same for you."

"Oh—this?" Xie Lian shrugs, waving it off. "I'm the one who jumped in the middle."

And chose to use a technique that would hurt himself, rather than the two involved. Really, it's entirely his own fault.

"Besides, this really isn't that bad," he smiles, using his good arm to lift up the bad one, trying to wave it off like normal. "I get worse all the time!"

Somehow, that doesn't seem to make Hua Cheng feel better.

"I—really, I'm okay, I promise—"

"Dianxia?" The ghost king interrupts him.

"...Yes?"

"Come here, please."

“...” Xie Lian isn’t sure why he wants him to do that, but he steps closer, all the same.

Hua Cheng reaches out, taking his good hand—and, much to Xie Lian’s confusion, he feels himself being guided to sit down on the tunnel floor, with the Ghost King kneeling before him.

“Do you trust me?”

“I do.” Xie Lian replies immediately, blinking up at him. “But why...?”

Hua Cheng takes his other hand, the injured one, grasping it so carefully—even if Xie Lian were sensitive to pain—he doubts it would hurt anyway.

“We don’t have much time,” he explains softly. “It’s the fastest method.”

Method for what—?

Then, Xie Lian feels lips against his knuckles—and his face rapidly begins to heat up.

...Oh.

There’s a tingling that shoots into his skin—different from the kind he’s felt the other times that Hua Cheng has touched him—this time it feels...warm.

Powerful.

And with it, he can feel the bones in his hand—which Mu Qing didn’t get very far into healing before Feng Xin’s interruption—begin knitting back together, cracking into place.

At first, he’s still confused.

It was considerate of Hua Cheng to ask if Xie Lian was comfortable—but he’s kissed the prince’s hand before, and he didn’t ask back then. So, why now—?

Then, he feels the sleeve of his robe being pushed up, ever so gently, and—

Hua Cheng’s mouth is on the inside of his wrist.

And with that, Xie Lian feels the bones and sinew there moving back into place.

T-that would be why, then.

“You…” His voice cracks slightly, and he stops, embarrassed, clearing his throat before trying again, “You really don’t have to—”

“Is this making dianxia uncomfortable?”

“Um…” Xie Lian swallows hard, shaking his head. “No, I trust you, it’s just…you don’t have to go through the…”

Hua Cheng’s lips brush his forearm, and he shudders, biting his lip so hard, it throbs under his teeth.

“S-San Lang, I—”

‘YOUR HIGHNESS!’

Xie Lian nearly jumps out of his skin when Feng Xin’s voice roars through the general communication array.

‘ WHERE ARE YOU?!’

‘What’s going on?’

‘The prince has escaped!’

‘Escaped?! HE HASN’T ESCAPED, YOU IDIOTS! CRIMSON RAIN SOUGHT FLOWER KIDNAPPED HIM!’

Well. Xie Lian thinks that’s a rather ungenerous way of describing it. Yanked into a magical portal or not, if Hua Cheng had asked him, he would have gone willingly.

“Is everything alright, your highness?”

“…Yes,” Xie Lian mumbles, a little strained. “There’s just a bit of a commotion in the communication arr—oh—”

He gasps softly when he’s pulled forward, until he’s—well—

Sitting astride the ghost king’s lap on the tunnel floor, his heart pounding in his throat.

“W-What are you—?”

Cool fingertips press against his temple. Then, speaking through Xie Lian—

'Long time, no see,' Hua Cheng's voice comes through the general array in a low, arrogant drawl, not louder than the overwhelming din of voices, but still— ' How is everyone doing?'

Everyone stops to listen in outraged silence.

The ghost king strokes the inside of Xie Lian's wrist with a slight smile, his fingers brushing against the God's ear as he continues;

'I don't know if you guys missed me—but I haven't thought about any of you at all. '

It's not a very subtle threat.

Talking to the Heavenly Court like they're mere ants to him. And in all honesty—most of them are.

Come and catch me, if you dare.

That's the message.

And if they do, Hua Cheng will devour them.

In retrospect, Xie Lian probably should feel concerned about that.

In theory.

But he meant what he said before—he trusts Hua Cheng. Whatever his reasons for snatching Xie Lian up from the heavens were...he's certain that the Ghost King means him no harm.

While all of the other officials have gone quiet in the array, Feng Xin and Mu Qing are still trying.

'There has to be a way to follow them, right? ' Feng Xin huffs. 'It's just a traveling array, right? Can't Ming Yi find us a way in?!'

'He's sleeping off his injuries,' Mu Qing replies. The two are stiff, but with the prince in danger, they're begrudgingly working together. 'He'd be no good to us right now anyway.'

Now, Shi Qingxuan's voice cuts in eagerly.

' Oh, oh, I know! Me! Me!'

‘ ...What is it, Lord Wind Master?’ Mu Qing questions flatly.

‘You have to roll the dice and get the right combination! ...Here! You two try it!’

...Oh boy.

Xie Lian has half a mind to warn them, but...

Clack!

Clack!

Before he gets the chance, they’re already in action.

‘What’d you get?’ Mu Qing mutters, and Feng Xin replies—

‘Two fours.’

Xie Lian’s stomach sinks as he looks to HUa Cheng.

“Isn’t that the spider room?”

The Ghost King raises an eyebrow. “...The what?”

“Two fours,” Xie Lian explains quickly, trying to keep up with what’s happening in the array at the same time. “Doesn’t that take you to the hallway with the spiders?”

“Oh,” Hua Cheng shakes his head. “It’ll just show whatever one person in the group of travelers fears the most.”

Well.

Xie Lian grimaces.

That certainly explains a lot.

And Just as he thinks that, Mu Qing’s voice breaks the silence, and he sounds...

Somewhere between amusement and utter irritation.

‘You have GOT to be kidding!’

‘Xuan Zhen?!’ Shi Qingxuan calls out into the array, clearly concerned, ‘ Are the two of you alright?!’

'We're IN A WOMAN'S BATH HOUSE!'

Feng Xin's voice echoes throughout, panicked, 'I-I APOLOGIZE MA'AM —COULD YOU PLEASE—PUT THAT AWAY—!'

'GIVE ME THE DICE!' Mu Qing screams, and there's a brief bout of wrestling, until—

Clack, Clack!

Xie Lian waits, hoping they lucked out and just ended up back in Paradise Manor, or something like that, but—

'OH, GREAT, NOW THERE'S CROCODILES!'

'AT LEAST IT ISN'T INDECENT!'

Hua Cheng's fingertips brush over his temple again, and the communication array goes quiet. The prince pauses, looking up—and he explains—

"I'll bring it back later. It was too loud." The Ghost King murmurs.

Xie Lian lets out a shaky sigh, nodding with relief.

It's a short lived easing of tension, because as soon as the prince relaxes, there's lips at the bend of his elbow, pressing against sensitive skin, making his breath hitch.

"San Lang...I'm...I'm okay," he mumbles, finding the close contact even more embarrassing when they're...

Well—sitting like this, with Xie Lian straddling the Ghost King's lap.

"You're not," the calamity replies, his voice burning with regret. "But if dianxia tells me to stop, I will."

"..."

Xie Lian has the feeling that if he stops Hua Cheng before he's completely healed, the ghost king will be miserable. So...

"...I guess you might as well finish, since you started..." He mumbles, breathing in through his nose, out through his mouth, trying to steady his heartbeat.

Hua Cheng smiles against his elbow, and Xie Lian struggles to distract himself from the intimacy of it all. After all, that isn't Hua Cheng's intention, he's just trying to be helpful.

"So, um..." He bites his lip, shivering. "Is...rolling snake eyes the way to get to you?"

"Hmm?" Hua Cheng questions, his mouth still pressed against the bones of the prince's elbow, and Xie Lian explains—

"Before, when I fell into the armory...I'm pretty sure I rolled snake eyes," he explains. "Is that what I would have to roll again to make you appear?"

"No."

Hua Cheng's eye flashes as he looks up at him through his lashes, and Xie Lian can see his spiritual power twinkling in the dark.

"...I see. I thought—"

"It doesn't matter what you roll," he explains, lifting his mouth from Xie Lian's arm. "If you call for me, I will come."

Oh.

Xie Lian clears his throat, his heart stuttering. "I...but back in the Heavenly Capitol, I didn't...call..."

As a matter of fact, he didn't even roll the dice.

Hua Cheng lifts his head, sitting back up until they're eye level.

For once, it's a relief to him that Xie Lian can't see the look on his face. The pain in his eyes.

Because even if he asked, Hua Cheng wouldn't be able to explain it to him.

"...Yes, you did." He whispers.

Xie Lian stares, blinking with confusion, his shackle gleaming.

"But—?"

Before he can ask what Hua Cheng means, he feels his robes being shifted to the side —ever so carefully—until his left bicep and shoulder are exposed to the open air, making him shiver.

"Are you—? Oh!"

The ghost's mouth presses against his upper arm in a featherlight kiss.

Now, Xie Lian feels his face growing completely red, burning so hot that he has to fight the urge to fan himself.

He—

The bones and muscle in his upper arm begin to reassemble, pulling back together, and the prince's nostrils flare.

Hua Cheng is helping.

This. Is. Medical.

He tries to remind himself of that, over and over again as Hua Cheng's mouth creeps higher over his muscle, and when it reaches the top of his arm—

A small noise slips out of Xie Lian's mouth, his good hand coming up to clutch at Hua Cheng's shoulder.

"Dianxia?"

Xie Lian swallows hard, his eyelashes fluttering.

"Are you alright?" The ghost king whispers against his skin, drawing another shiver, and if Xie Lian didn't know any better—

He would say that Hua Cheng was smiling.

"...I'm fine," he croaks, biting his lip. "Just...um..."

Xie Lian knows that Hua Cheng must be aware that he's...unsettled. After all, his heart is pounding, and he can barely breathe—

"I—uh, I was numb before," Xie Lian fumbles through an explanation, praying that he doesn't sound insane. "But, uh...now I'm, um..."

"...It hurts?" Hua Cheng inquires, his voice impossibly gentle, and Xie Lian shivers, his fingers clutching the ghost king's shoulder a little tighter.

"Uh..." he swallows hard, bobbing his head quickly. "A...A little..."

(It's a really bad attempt at a lie—his voice cracks.)

And that crack turns into a mortifying squeak when Hua Cheng's arm wraps around his waist, pulling him in even closer, until Xie Lian is completely sitting on top of him, and—

That kiss isn't exactly featherlight anymore, it's— It's heavy, and Xie Lian's breath leaves him.

"I'll be quick then, your highness," the Ghost King whispers against his skin. "Just hold on a little longer."

True to his word, Xie Lian feels power surging into his skin—a daunting amount—and with it, his shoulder cracking into place, left arm no longer limp.

Xie Lian tilts his head to the side, his breaths coming faster, fingers trembling and digging into Hua Cheng's shoulder slightly, struggling to string his thoughts together.

He...this...

There's a warm pit in his stomach, nearly unfamiliar. But where has he felt that before?

It's not unpleasant, not exactly—just this weird...stirring sensation, like his muscles are tensing, but not because he told them to—and when he thinks back on it, he must have been a teenager—

Oh.

Oh no.

A high pitched noise escapes Xie Lian's throat, his eyes wide.

Ethics sutra. Ethics sutra. He needs the—

"Does it still hurt?" Where Hua Cheng's mouth sits on his shoulder—it makes his breath hit the side of Xie Lian's neck in a way that makes him shiver.

"It—It's much better—!" Xie Lian mutters, fighting to keep his voice composed.

He's chanting in his head quickly, anxiety building in his chest. It's— It's not like anyone could tell at the moment, but if he doesn't get those feelings under control, it would be...visible, and he—

Hua Cheng is just trying to help, what's wrong with him?

Why is he reacting like this? If the ghost knew what Xie Lian was thinking, he would probably be horrified—

There's one frantic moment where, probably due to how much time he's spent with Shi Qingxuan in the last couple of days, he considers changing into a female form.

After all, if he did that, no one would be able to tell, right?

But how would he explain that? He isn't worshiped in male or female forms, as Shi Qingxuan so kindly pointed out before, he doesn't have an excuse to change! What would Hua Cheng even think?!

And he feels some of Hua Cheng's power pulsing through him from the healing process, but most of that is going towards putting Xie Lian's arm back together. Would he even have enough—?

"Does dianxia need me to—?"

Of course, there's a hazard of speaking against someone's skin, particularly when you're Hua Cheng, and it's something that they both seem to learn about at the same time, when his canine, ever so slightly, brushes against Xie Lian's skin.

"Oh..."

Xie Lian's mouth drops open, and the way he says that—it's not like he was talking. Or whispering, really. It was—kind of like—

Possibly a moan. But it definitely didn't hurt, so—

Is the tunnel spinning, or is he just...?

"...Did I hurt you?"

Unlike before, which, if Xie Lian was being completely honest, he'd have to admit that Hua Cheng was being a little playful—

Now, he sounds genuinely concerned.

"No!" Xie Lian shakes his head, "Not at all, I was just—s-surprised!"

The ghost lets out a soft sigh of relief, and since it's still right up against his skin, Xie Lian can't resist another shiver, knees unconsciously tightening around Hua Cheng's hips, still holding onto his shoulder, and he feels the Ghost King start to stiffen against him.

"Your—?"

Hua Cheng is interrupted, but not by Xie Lian. "...GUOSHI?!"

Xie Lian's skin can't seem to decide whether or not it wants to be flushed with embarrassment, or pale from the stress. It settles for splotchy.

Oh.

Oh— no .

It would seem that Lang Qianqiu rolled the dice himself.

Stumbling into the tunnel, to find his Guoshi in Crimson Rain Sought Flower's lap, flushed, his robes pulled aside so the Ghost King can kiss his bare shoulder, the two of them intertwined in...

What can only be taken for an embrace.

"I—I can explain!"

Xie Lian stammers, leaning back to look at him—but Hua Cheng's arm is still firm around his waist, stopping him from retreating that far.

...Which doesn't particularly help Xie Lian's case.

"He was healing my arm!" The prince explains, lifting it up as evidence. "See?"

Lang Qianqiu glances as he's indicated, finding that his Guoshi's arm does, in fact, look good as new. Even the robes, which were bloodied and ripped before, have been completely repaired.

"...I don't think that's standard medical procedure," the martial god mutters, glaring.

"Well..." Xie Lian clears his throat, pulling his robes back up over his shoulder—and Hua Cheng, ever so helpful, assists, even going so far as to adjust Xie Lian's belt, which had been slightly loosened by the...chaos. "I don't think it is either, but it was definitely faster!"

After all, it would probably have taken Xie Lian's body a couple of days or so to heal on its own, or Mu Qing a couple of hours—and Hua Cheng was able to leave him as good as new in a matter of minutes.

"...Guoshi, I don't think that man is a trained physician..."

"I…" Xie Lian clears his throat, "I mean—no, he isn't, but clearly he knows a thing or two, and…ghost medicinal techniques…could be different from ours, we…don't know!"

Lang Qianqiu's eyebrows knit together, struggling with that explanation.

"…Well, he's healed now," the martial god mutters, lifting his sword. "Let him go!"

Hua Cheng raises an eyebrow, his eye flashing in the dark.

Instead of replying to Lang Qianqiu's request, his arm suddenly tightens, making Xie Lian fall against his chest with surprise.

"San Lang—?"

He stops when Hua Cheng presses a kiss against the side of his head, never breaking eye contact with General Tai Hua as he does so, his gaze narrowed.

That's when Xie Lian remembers the cut on the side of his head, the one Hua Cheng noticed in Paradise Manor.

'Who did this?'

The wound had already scabbed over—but now, it's completely gone.

Finally, Hua Cheng leans back, and his grip on Xie Lian loosens.

"Now he's healed." The Ghost King agrees. "Dianxia, would you like me to deal with this brat for you?"

"Deal with me?!" Lang Qianqiu glares. "You're the one in the middle of kidnapping him, and you get the nerve—? This has nothing to do with you!"

Hua Cheng's lips start to pull back over his teeth with a hiss—but Xie Lian gently placed a hand over his shoulder.

"Don't," the god murmurs. "He deserves the chance to speak with me, if that's what he wants."

After all, Lang Qianqiu isn't a stranger, Xie Lian…he's keenly aware of his place in the young God's life. How much he mattered to him.

He rises to his feet, and Hua Cheng follows with a glare.

"You owe him nothing, your highness."

"Actually," Lang Qianqiu cuts him off with a heated glare, "he does. You clearly aren't aware, but we were involved."

Xie Lian grimaces, pressing his palm to forehead.

"Your highness..." he groans, "Don't go assuming things on your own..."

"...Don't talk to me like that," Lang Qianqiu mutters, shaking his head.

Xie Lian glances up, startled. "I don't—"

"You were so distant," The prince of Yong'an shakes his head. "I was always honest with you, but you were lying the entire time. Treating me like a child."

Xie Lian falls silent, biting the inside of his cheek. He can't deny that he did treat Lang Qianqiu like he was younger than he was, but that was only because he wanted to...

"I deserved..." The martial god grits his teeth, his hands clenched into fists. "I deserved the truth."

He did. But—

Sometimes, lies are better. Xie Lian learned that the hard way.

Glancing back and forth between the two of them, uncaring for Lang Qianqiu's visible distress, Hua Cheng speaks up, his voice flat—

"You're the only one who seems to think you were involved."

Xie Lian winces, rubbing the side of his neck. "I mean..." He trails off, "Things were a little...muddled, towards the end..."

"Muddled?" Lang Qianqiu questions, raising an eyebrow sharply. "Well–then let me 'un-meddle' it for you," the younger prince shakes his head. "I was in love with you."

Xie Lian sighs heavily, rubbing his temples. He had been in denial back then. Had assumed it was a childish infatuation, one that would fade with time. That he would become a bad memory, and nothing more.

But three centuries later, it doesn't sound that way.

"I proposed, and you disappeared without answering." He continues, his hand trembling where it grips his sword.

"...So, you really were..." Xie Lian mumbles, grimacing. He tried to convince himself it was something a little less serious, but...

Hua Cheng doesn't seem amused.

"And then, the next time I see you, you're pulling a sword out of my father's chest," He turns to look at Hua Cheng, and the Ghost King will give him one thing—

Lang Qianqiu isn't frightened, and he isn't going to back down. Guoshi Fangxin's disciple is strong.

"So, yes," he glares, "he does owe me an explanation. And if you want to stop me, you're going to have to kill me."

"That can be easily arranged," Hua Cheng replies coldly, but—

Xie Lian's palm presses against his chest, pushing him back.

"Don't," the prince repeats quietly. "I don't want him harmed."

The ghost king's teeth come together with a click, but he says little more—stepping back and crossing his arms over his chest.

"...Okay, Lang Qianqiu," Xie Lian sighs. "I'm listening. I'll probably be banished soon, if that's what you want—"

"It isn't," the prince shakes his head. "And you know that."

Xie Lian falls silent once more, and then—he hangs his head with a sigh, feeling somewhat hopeless.

"Then what do you need from me, your highness?"

"...I need to know whether or not I'm the villain in this story."

There's an ache, an underlying horror in his tone, one that makes his Guoshi's eyes widen.

"...How could you be?" He whispers. "You didn't do anything wrong —"

"When I put you in that coffin," Lan Qianqiu spits out the words, looking vaguely nauseous, "I didn't know you were..."

The mere mention of it makes Xie Lian grimace. “Of course, you didn’t—”

“…And I know you were in there for a long time,” Lang Qianqiu mutters, his voice hoarse, “because I visited. For years.”

“…” Xie Lian wraps his arms around himself.

He knows.

He heard.

He kept quiet. No matter how miserable and afraid he was, Xie Lian forced himself to remain silent.

Because if Lang Qianqiu knew what he had done, he would have hated himself. And because Xie Lian deserved to be there,

He deserved to be alone.

But…

…Lang Qianqiu found out anyway. He’s hurting anyway.

“And…” The prince of Yong’an takes a deep breath. “If you actually did those things, then I’m not sorry.” He says the words evenly.

Xie Lian isn’t surprised.

Yong’an was a country born from war and strife. Pei Xiu tried to claim differently in the Sinner’s Pit, but…

It was an empire. All great nations are baptized in blood.

Yong’an was a warrior culture, one with a very black and white, brutal sense of Justice.

Xianle was no different.

Xie Lian was no different, when he sought his own vengeance.

‘What do we do, when we are faced with the wicked?’

He isn’t better than Lang Qianqiu, he only enjoys the benefits of past failures and hindsight.

“But if you didn’t…” His student trembles.

He closes his eyes, breathing deeply, and Xie Lian can feel the pain radiating off of him in waves, making his own heart ache.

"...Then I will be making it up to you for the rest of my life," the martial god mutters, and Xie Lian—

He places a hand over his mouth, silent.

Because—

In all honesty, the god forgot how good Lang Qianqiu could be. Honorable to a fault.

And he forgot the way that he felt about the boy, all those years ago.

"...You say that as though you've already decided I didn't do it," Xie Lian mutters. "But I've never denied it."

"..." Lang Qianqiu shakes his head, taking a deep breath. "You get a little lost in your own head sometimes, Guoshi. Remember what you used to tell me?"

Xie Lian's eyes widen. "...To pay closer attention," he murmurs.

The prince of Yong'an shrugs.

"I paid attention to you." He takes a step closer. "I know that you thought of me as an oblivious, carefree kid— but when it came to you, I was serious."

On some level, Xie Lian knew that.

"And I obviously didn't know your secrets..." Lang Qianqiu mutters. "But that doesn't mean I knew nothing about you."

Xie Lian forgets that, sometimes.

That while there are parts of him that people can never reach, it doesn't mean that he's impossible to get to know.

"I know how much you think about things," the prince stares into his face, taking it in. "I know that it might take you a long time to make a decision, but when you do, it's final."

That's just stubbornness, but it's kind of Lang Qianqiu to make him sound so decisive.

"You avoid things that you don't know how to deal with," he points out.

Less generous, but still true.

"...And I know that you knew me, Guoshi," Xie Lian's heart twists once more. "You knew me inside out."

Of course he did.

Understanding Lang Qianqiu was the easiest thing in the world. Like looking at his own life in reverse.

"...You knew how I felt," the prince stops in front of him, only a foot or so from his Guoshi, "probably for a very long time."

Hua Cheng watches Xie Lian closely, and the god doesn't reply. Because he hasn't told a lie so far.

Xie Lian is a master of denial, and he isn't always the most honest narrator of his own thoughts.

He knew, but he didn't acknowledge it, because—

"And you know—I never would have forced my feelings on you," Lang Qianqiu mutters hoarsely. "If they became a burden, I would have—"

"I know," Xie Lian whispers, one hand still covering his mouth. Slowly, he lowers it. "I knew that."

Lang Qianqiu nods woodenly. He figured as much.

"...And I also know you never would have led me on," he looks his Guoshi in the eyes, taking in the sight of the shackle inside. "Or allowed me to make a fool of myself."

Xie Lian swallows hard.

Still, his student hadn't been wrong.

"You just avoided the subject all together, which means..." Xie Lian looks away, clutching the chain around his neck. "...you hadn't decided what your answer was."

The prince of Xianle squeezes his eyes shut.

Because it's true.

Back then, when he was so lonely, and so…

There was someone offering themselves so earnestly. A kind, open hearted boy.

One who gave him flowers.

Xie Lian grips Hong’er a little tighter, his lips trembling.

“…Why are you doing this?” He mutters, feeling the irritation from Hua Cheng behind him, rolling off of the Ghost King in waves.

And Xie Lian understands, it must be rather awkward, being forced to witness a personal situation like this one.

“…Because I’m not seventeen anymore, Guoshi,” Lang Qianqiu sighs. “I know—even if you did feel something for me, you were mourning your husband. You were lonely.”

Behind him, Hua Cheng arches an eyebrow, and Xie Lian’s heart leaps into his throat.

“I…”

“I understand, you didn’t feel the way as I did.” The prince shakes his head. “I might be a fool, and I might rush into things—but I’ve had three centuries,” he watches the conflict in Xie Lian’s expression. “And I’ve spent all of them thinking about you.”

Hua Cheng’s nostrils flare as he leans back, twisting his braid as he glares at the ceiling.

“…Or, there’s a scenario where none of that is true, and you’re the best actor I’ve ever met,” Lang Qianqiu mutters. “And you—you lost everything, and you wanted me to feel the same.”

“…And if that was true?” Xie Lian questions softly. “What would you do?”

“…” Lang Qianqiu reaches behind him, pulling something from his back, holding it out to him.

Xie Lian hesitates before finally reaching out to take it, hands trembling when they feel the hilt.

Fangxin.

Xie Lian stops, shaking his head when he realizes what Lang Qianqiu means. "No," he mutters, taking a step back. "I won't do that. I swore long ago—I wouldn't kill with a sword again."

Of course, Wen Jiao was an exception—but he was also a demon. Not a person.

"...If you aren't willing to say that it wasn't you," Lang Qianqiu shakes his head, resolved. "Then you're going to have to duel me."

"No." Xie Lian shakes his head. "I won't." His hand shoots out to stop Hua Cheng from approaching once again from behind. "And you won't either!"

"I'm only accepting one of two outcomes," his student locks his jaw stubbornly. "Either you fight me, or you tell me the truth. It's your choice, but you have to make it."

Hua Cheng actually growls with annoyance that anyone would dare dictate to Xie Lian, but...

There's another matter at hand, and for that, he quietly reaches into a private communication array.

"...Lang Qianqi, if I fight you with a sword..." Xie Lian sighs, gripping Fangxin tighter. "You'll definitely die."

"And if you weren't a liar, then you wouldn't care!"

Xie Lian drops his chin, gritting his teeth.

"...There is no explanation I could give that would make you feel better," he mutters, shaking his head. "So, you want to fight? Fine. We can fight."

Before Lang Qianqiu says a word, he's knocked to the ground, bound, unable to move.

"And there," Xie Lian mutters, turning around, Fangxin gripped tightly in his hand. "You lost. You can tell everyone else that I fled like a coward."

"That's—!" Lang Qianqiu thrashes under Ruoye's grip, "NOT WHAT I WANTED!"

"I know."

“Typical—just AVOIDING the problem!”

Xie Lian grits his teeth, beginning to walk away. “If that’s what you want to think.”

“You aren’t PROTECTING me from anything!” The prince glares, struggling, trying to get to his feet. “I don’t have to TELL anyone that you fled like a coward! That’s WHAT YOU’RE DOING!”

His Guoshi doesn’t respond, reaching for Hua Cheng’s hand, pulling. “San Lang, let’s go.”

But when he tries to tug the Ghost King along, he remains in place—and Lang Qianqiu is still working with all his might to escape.

“THAT’S why you hid who you were for all that time!” His student cries. “Because the MINUTE anyone gets close, the minute anyone sees who you are, they CARE! So you just RUN AWAY!”

When Xie Lian speaks again, his voice is low, thin.

“Choosing to walk away isn’t the same.”

It isn’t running away if you don’t actually want to go.

Lang Qianqiu glares at his back, “You never TALKED to me, you just make decisions that impact me without EVER thinking about what I would want—!”

“YOU DON’T ALWAYS GET WHAT YOU WANT!”

The tunnel falls into shocked silence

Xie Lian’s shoulders tremble, and his head hurts, and he—

He isn’t alright.

“The beautiful, talented, illustrious crown prince,” he sneers, hands trembling by his sides. “They give you the entire world, and tell you that it’s yours. That you can do anything.”

He turns his head, his shackles like two twin flames in the darkness of the tunnel, flickering dimly.

“But the one thing you want the most—” he looks down on Lang Qianqiu, nails biting into his palms, “—that is the one thing you cannot have.”

He wishes tears would come.

“I could explain so many things to you,” the prince shakes his head. “But it wouldn’t make your family come back. Yong’an will still be gone. And you don’t know what else you might lose.”

“You—”

“I don’t let anyone close,” Xie Lian continues, “because I break things.”

Never on purpose. But he always does.

“I don’t let anyone close, because they never actually see me.” He gestures vaguely with fangxin, remembering the things the blade has done.

The things Xie Lian used it to do.

“They see a beautiful, talented, intelligent prince.” He shakes his head, a broken laugh slipping from his lips. “And he doesn’t exist.”

“...Don’t say that,” Lang Qianqiu mumbles, trying desperately to hold onto the last glimmer of childhood. The hope he had, when he saw that Xie Lian might not be the monster that he pretended to be.

“And I would rather be the laughingstock of the three realms,” Xie Lian glares. “Or the Blackhearted Guoshi Fangxin. Or—”

A White Clothed Calamity.

He clenches his teeth even tighter, “Or anyone else, anyone but the Crown Prince of Xianle.”

That very prince hangs his head.

“Because he destroyed everything I loved,” he mutters, his voice breaking.

Still, tears won’t come.

“...Take that last lesson from your Guoshi,” he mutters. “Never put people on pedestals. You both end up broken and disappointed in the end.”

He tries to keep walking, but...

Hua Cheng's hand locks around his, holding him in place.

"...Let me go, San Lang." He mutters, his shoulders sagging.

The Ghost King is quiet for a moment, surveying the two.

"...No."

Xie Lian looks back, raising an eyebrow, and he—

Crack!

There's a snap of Hua Cheng's fingers, and he doesn't hear Lang Qianqiu struggling anymore.

Ruoye quickly returns to him, wrapping around his throat with a nervous wiggle. "...Wh—?"

Something small and wooden is pressed into his hands, a—

A Daruma Doll.

"...What is this?"

"He was upsetting you," Hua Cheng replies calmly. "Now he's a fun Knick knack. Show him off at parties if you like."

"San Lang..." Xie Lian frowns, and now, instead of holding him still, Hua Cheng is pulling him down the tunnel. "Turn him back."

"No."

The Ghost King has hardly ever denied him anything, and now, he's told Xie Lian no twice in a row.

For some reason, he isn't as bothered by it as he thought he might be. "...Why not?"

"Because gege said I couldn't harm him," Hua Cheng replies calmly. "So, he needs to be quiet."

"...He wasn't doing anything wrong," Xie Lian mutters, using Ruoye to make a makeshift scabbard for Fangxin, strapping the sword to his back.

"...I actually agree," Hua Cheng sighs, even if it sounds like he would rather eat glass than admit it. "But my patience is finite."

Funny, because up until now, he's been so tolerant, Xie Lian was actually starting to wonder if the man had any limits at all, but…

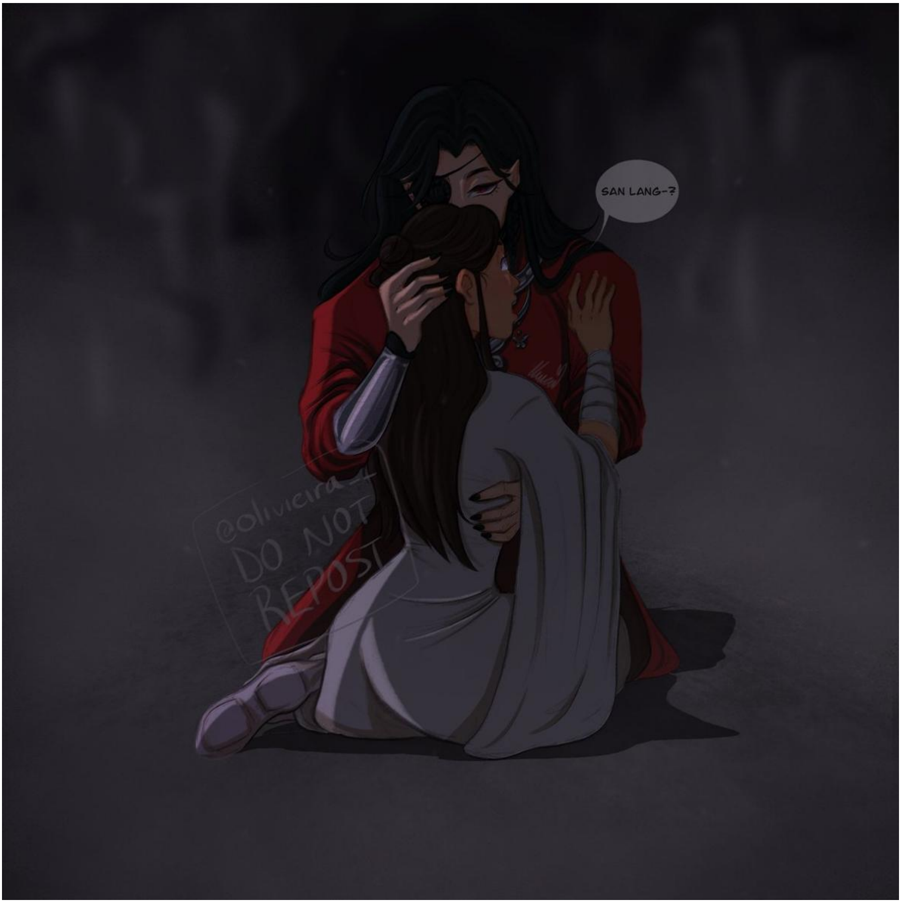
Clearly, he does.

“San Lang, where are we going?” Xie Lian questions cautiously, tucking the Daruma doll into his sleeve.

“There's someone the two of you need to speak to.” Hua Cheng's grip slides up from Xie Lian's hand to his elbow, leading him down the tunnel. “I suspect it might be an educational experience.”

ARTWORK INSPIRED BY THIS STORY

Included with permission from the artist, do not reproduce or reuse for any reason



SAN LANG-?
@olivieira_
DO NOT REPOST

CREDIT: OLIVIEIRA

Chapter End Notes

> thank you so much to olivieira for your hard work, and for allowing me to share it!
>
> xoxo, Evie

Paved with Good Intentions

Chapter Summary

Hua Cheng wasn't wrong, before.

The Night Touring Green Lantern...

"Say..." he groans, kicking at his footrest, "I'm HUNGRY!"

...is truly vile.

Chapter Notes

You can find me on twitter and keep up with current updates of the story HERE

See the end of the chapter for more notes

Xie Lian blinks owlishly.

...What?

"...Are they in Ghost City?"

"No."

Hua Cheng's footsteps are light, but sure—leading him just as he did on Mount Yu Jun, with a sureness to him that Xie Lian can't help but...

Trust, to some extent.

"Then where?"

"Our guide is about to show us the way," he murmurs. Xie Lian is confused, until...

Something rounds the corner of the corner. Small, low to the ground, trotting towards him.

And unlike most spirits or animals—Xie Lian can see this one very clearly.

"...Is it yours?" He whispers, tilting his head to the side with wonder.

"No," Hua Cheng shakes his head.

His butterflies are made from pure spiritual energy, stemming from his own reserves. This isn't quite the same.

"He's a guardian spirit."

Ah, Xie Lian has heard of those before, but…not usually described that way, and…

A red panda blinks up at him from his feet, chirping.

…They're never described as 'cute,' either.

But this little creature is certainly adorable, pressing it's paws against Xie Lian's boot as it sniffs his robes, tails held aloft.

"Aye, Aye…" Hua Cheng clicks his tongue, scolding. "Back to work."

It lifts its head, sending Hua Cheng a glare and an offended squeak—and that's when Xie Lian notices—

It's wearing a little hat. Green, with a red tassel on top.

Then, it turns it's back to them, scurrying back down the tunnel, and Hua Cheng guides the prince to follow.

"…A guardian spirit," Xie Lian repeats slowly, watching its tail flick in the air as it trots ahead. "I was always told that animal spirits were the result of Taoist magic."

Hua Cheng shakes his head. "Sometimes—but they form naturally in mountains and forests."

Xie Lian falls silent, watching the creature move about.

For him to be able to see it, it must be an actual spiritual creature, not the ghost of something that was once living.

There's something that he's been thinking about, during his time with the Ghost King.

There are so many things he's seen with Hua Cheng—in the Crescent Moon Kingdom, and then Ghost City—things that are traditionally considered evil, but…

Xie Lian is starting to wonder if 'evil' might just be a term for something that the Heavens don't control.

"...And he doesn't work for you?" Xie Lian questions slowly.

"His name is Qi Qi," Hua Cheng hums, "and I suppose he does in an indirect way, but he would never obey a direct request from me. He's someone else's subordinate."

"...And that person is the one who sent him?"

"Yes."

Xie Lian examines the creature just a little more closely. It's aura isn't particularly large—but it's strong. Probably placing it on the level that most cultivators (within the mortal realm) would struggle to deal with.

Whoever sent it must be an impressive ghost.

The tunnel seems to shift and stretch around them as they move through it—and Xie Lian would be lying if he said he wasn't interested in how the passage worked, but... well...

He's already pushed his luck when it comes to Hua Cheng's traveling arrays, and it seems better to wait.

Eventually they reach the end of the tunnel—and it turns out, it's far more functional with Hua Cheng at the helm, because they don't end up dumped out through a trapdoor.

Instead, Hua Cheng leads them through a doorway, and when they step through... It's a forest.

He can smell as much, and hear the wind creaking through the leaves. And from the lack of warmth against his skin—it must be nighttime, with no sunlight coming down.

Ahead of them, Qi Qi chirps excitedly, charging forward until he reaches his master, jumping into his arms.

"Well done," a voice murmurs—familiar to Xie Lian by now, though slightly different from before. Slightly deeper, older—like a young man between seventeen and twenty years old.

And the aura before him is familiar as well.

Emerald, like the forest itself—but with a burning core.

But when he steps forward, there's a difference in his gate. Each step lands on the ground with a bit more weight than it did before, when Xie Lian heard the youth approaching in the streets of Ghost City, or running down the halls of Paradise Manor.

And now, he remembers.

Back in the Heavenly Capital, when they were explaining to him the tales of the four great calamities, the god he now knows as Ming Yi explained their names and titles—

The Night Touring Green Lantern, also known as the Green Ghost, Qi Rong. Known for his vile tastes.

Also the weakest of the four, having never ascended as a Calamity—and simply included to pad out their numbers, making them an even four like the great tales.

Then, there was Black Water Sinking Ships, a reclusive Water Demon—one who Hua Cheng seems somewhat amicable towards.

...And the most powerful, though he's been long since dead, the White Clothed Calamity, Bai Wuxiang.

Which left the last, the most powerful living—the man standing beside him right now.

Crimson Rain Sought Flower, the Lord of Ghost City—Hua Cheng.

But there was another.

A powerful savage ghost, a subordinate of Hua Cheng's—but strong enough to be able to replace Qi Rong as one of the Four Calamities, given time.

Autumn Twilight Shrouding Forests, the demon...

"...You must be Ren Song," Xie Lian murmurs, bowing his head politely.

The savage ghost smirks, revealing a fanged grin as he bends into a sweeping bow, one that's more for Hua Cheng's benefit, since Xie Lian can't see the gesture. "The pleasure is all mine, your highness."

Earrings jingle softly at his ears as he moves, clinking in the night.

"The lair is two hundred yards ahead, built into a pre-existing cave system," he explains, walking ahead of the ghost king and his god, Qi Qi perched on his shoulder, tail flicking slightly with each step. "There are between two and three dozen human prisoners."

Xie Lian stiffens at the mention of prisoners, glancing at Hua Cheng with concern, but the Ghost king doesn't seem to share it.

"Does he know that you've tracked him here?"

"No," Ren Song replies quietly. "I was concerned he might flee if I revealed myself before you arrived."

Xie Lian frowns, trying to piece together who they're seeing, and why Hua Cheng thought it would be 'educational' for Xie Lian, as well as Lang Qianqiu...

"But I've identified all of the exits, so he shouldn't be able to escape once you're inside."

Unforeseen factors notwithstanding.

(And in this case, there was one factor that the forest demon had not been warned about, and therefore could not have prepared for.)

"...San Lang," Xie Lian questions as they approach the cave entrance. "Who did you bring me to see?"

The Daruma Doll rattles slightly in his sleeve, almost like it's agreeing with him, and...

Hua Cheng simply slips an arm around Xie Lian's waist, pulling him close against his side.

The prince glances up at him in confusion, and he explains—"Invisibility spell."

Now, the rattling of the Daruma doll seems slightly more aggressive, but Hua Cheng doesn't seem to mind. If anything, he seems pleased by it.

As he leads Xie Lian over the threshold, the god catches sight of the first clue to their location.

Tiny little green spirits running up and down the cave system. Not quite ghost fires, but not strong enough to be fully fledged ghosts either. Milling about like ants, talking quietly among themselves.

Finally, Hua Cheng murmurs—

“We’re here to see that waste of space—Qi Rong.”

Xie Lian stiffens slightly at the mention of him. The Night Touring Green Lantern, wasn’t it?

“…The green spirits,” Xie Lian whispers, walking beside him silently, “is that how he got the name?”

“In part, but that’s not how it started,” Hua Cheng replies.

There’s something different about him.

Xie Lian notices it now—even more so than he did before, in the tunnel.

Turning Lang Qianqiu into a Daruma doll and refusing Xie Lian’s request to turn him back—that was already unusually aggressive, but…

There’s tension under his tone.

“He’s been reduced back to a ghost fire several times, though never dispersed. He finds the history somewhat humiliating, so he takes on the green spirits and flames to distract from the truth.” The calamity explains, helping Xie Lian step up and over a ledge.

“…I see.”

Xie Lian allows himself to be led along, but eventually, he has to ask…

“San Lang?”

He receives a quiet hum of acknowledgement, and he fights back the urge to clear his throat, remembering that they have to be quiet for now.

“…Is something bothering you?”

For a moment, he doesn’t answer. He stands alone, his back facing away from the crown prince, even as he grips his hand to guide him, and the question he asks—

“How long was it?”

It wasn’t the one Xie Lian was expecting.

"...I'm sorry?" He mumbles, tilting his head. "I don't—"

"Dianxia," there's something in his tone that gives Xie Lian pause, his heart leaping into his throat. "I will never force you to speak about it, but I need you to tell me how long it was."

"..." Pretending he doesn't know what San Lang is talking about would be childish.

And maybe...

Lang Qianqiu had a point, when he said Xie Lian had a tendency to avoid things.

The prince falls silent for a moment. It's not that he wants to protect anyone else from that knowledge, not exactly. He knows the truth is horrific.

On some distant level. One that feels far removed from him. The reason he doesn't like to speak about it is because...

If he had told Feng Xin or Mu Qing, it would have been about their guilt. Their worry. Xie Lian doesn't have the time, nor the energy to shoulder that burden.

All of his energy goes into pretending those years don't belong to him. That they happened to someone else. Keeping them on the other side of this thick barrier in his mind, and cramming them into a small box.

Xie Lian doesn't want to talk about how he felt.

Doesn't want Lang Qianqiu to apologize, or try to make it up to him. He doesn't want to think about how many years Feng Xin spent looking, or how guilty Mu Qing must feel for refusing.

Finally, he whispers—

"Does it matter?"

Fingertips brush over his brow, cool to the touch.

"Yes." Hua Cheng replies quietly. "It matters."

"..." Xie Lian leans up on the balls of his feet, whispering in the Ghost King's ear for a moment.

The Ghost King's eyes widen substantially, and Xie Lian waits apprehensively. Waiting for the questions.

The pity.

But Hua Cheng doesn't say a word.

Instead, Xie Lian feels him lean down, and...

His forehead presses against the crown prince's, skin soothingly cool when Xie Lian's body temperature flares in response to the closeness.

"S...San L—?"

"There," the Ghost King pulls back.

Xie Lian hears that his voice sounds slightly different now, younger—and when he reaches up to touch his own face, he realizes...

Hua Cheng placed them both in new skins, likely because the invisibility spell won't keep the deeper they go into Qi Rong's lair.

Xie Lian reaches up to touch his own cheek, curious, and a playful voice echoes by his ear, teasing—

"Don't worry, gege looks as charming as ever."

The prince's lips quirk up into a smile, and he almost scolds San Lang for taking this moment to tease him, but...

There's no mirth to it. If anything, he seems...

Distracted.

Xie Lian wants to ask him what's the matter, but then, he supposes...

A century in a coffin is a lot to digest, even if they haven't known each other for very long...

He might not know what to say. Xie Lian doesn't.

But the further they move into the cave, that silence begins to break.

Pierced with laughing, jaunting singing, the faint sounds of bones clacking together.

Xie Lian's grip on Hua Cheng's hand tightens imperceptibly—and the Ghost King's mouth sets into a grim line.

Because that laughter—it's pulling at the edge of his memory.

Drawing Xie Lian back in time, so far back, towards things he's tried so hard to forget —making him strain.

And he tries, now, tries so hard to tell himself that it's a coincidence. Denial is better than the truth.

But now, as they approach the final chamber—Xie Lian hears a voice he was so sure he would never encounter again.

Sneering, rasping—like a voice that might have been high pitched or childish, but has been roughened with centuries of screaming—

"Report?"

One of the green ghosts pipes up, "We've been desecrating Ming Guang's temples, and it's just like you said, my lord! No one in the Heavens has even noticed!"

There's a shrieking giggle as another spirit pipes up—

"We even blamed it on Quan Yizhen's followers!"

Targeting Pei Ming again?

Between the actions of Xuan Ji, the events in Gusu—even Pei Xiu's banishment following the incident in the Crescent Moon Pass...

Xie Lian can't help but pity the general.

The tunnel system of the caves opens to a wide cavern.

Filled from wall to wall with little green spirits, huddling mortal prisoners into small cages. Bones piled high all around—

Most of them from humans.

In the center of the room is a cauldron, large enough to be mistaken for a bath, if not for the water's boiling temperature.

And sitting in the very center of it, with his feet kicked up luxuriously, is a green robed figure, fanning himself lazily with a slightly ripped paper fan, bouncing his toes in time with the sound his little ghouls squeal out in the background.

Hua Cheng wasn't wrong, before.

The Night Touring Green Lantern…

“Say…” he groans, kicking at his footrest, “I’m HUNGRY!”

…is truly vile.

In the corner, he can hear a human man, likely in his twenties, rocking back and forth on the floor, quietly trying to reassure his child.

“Don’t be scared…”

It doesn’t take much time or intelligence to deduce what the prisoners are for.

“Don’t be scared, we—we’ll be alright…”

Qi Rong makes a face, eyes snapping in the direction of the father and his little boy.

For a moment, his expression is unreadable as he uses a human rib bone to pick his teeth, gaze narrowed.

“…say…” he glares, arching one eyebrow. “I think I’ll start with an appetizer.”

The ghouls at his feet shriek with acknowledgement, and the natural candidate?

The boy.

He’s the only one small enough among the prisoners to be considered an appetizer, anyway—

But before the ghouls can reach him, whimpering and trembling as he hides in his father’s arms, Hua Cheng steps forward, walking lazily through the crowd—kicking ghouls aside as he goes.

“…” The green ghost’s gaze flickers to the source of movement, and his eyes narrow sharply. “Who the fuck are you?!” He snaps, crunching the rib bone between his jaws. “Who told you that you could approach?!”

Hua Cheng smiles, hands clasped behind his back.

“Is the green ghost so ignorant, he doesn’t realize when he has an esteemed guest?”

The ghost king's tone is perfectly pleasant—almost cheerful—but Xie Lian knows better by now.

There's ice underneath.

"...Esteemed guest?" Qi Rong sneers.

"Royalty of Xianle, to be specific."

That manages to draw out a laugh.

A snide, cackling sound.

"Royalty from Xianle?" He snorts, "You think that's fucking funny, do you?"

Xie Lian remains still, not saying a word.

"Tell me—how are you related to the Royal House of Xie?"

Hua Cheng's smile turns sly.

"...Through Prince An Le."

Xie Lian can't keep the grimace off of his face.

Just thinking about that name makes his chest tighten with anger—and inside his sleeve, Xie Lian can feel Lang Qianqiu rattle with recognition.

"An Le?!" Qi Rong barks, looking him over.

"You? You look nothing like the guy! Besides, he died without having any children. He was the last of the Royal bloodline! You have a lot of nerve, lying to this ancestor in his territory!"

Xie Lian bites back the urge to roll his eyes.

San Lang said something along those lines himself, before—but from his lips, the words sounded genuinely menacing.

From Qi Rong, it sounds like a joke. A weak attempt at seeming more frightening than he is.

"How did he die, then?" Hua Cheng muses, tilting his head.

Xie Lian has always been a skilled fighter. That, in part, is why he can detect the minute changes in Hua Cheng's stance, just from sensing the slight movement in the air.

Like a beast cooking before it pounces.

But even more so, that tension is still building.

That same feeling he's had since they arrived in this cave, finally reaching the point where it seems ready to snap.

“The fuck? What makes you think you have the right to ask questions? Someone—get rid of this piece of shit!”

His little green ghosts leap to attention, but…

Before any of them can make a move, Hua Cheng has disappeared.

Now, he stands directly behind the green ghost, fingers knotted in his hair, yanking his chin back.

“That's an interesting skin you're wearing,” the calamity hisses. “Take it off.” Xie Lian blinks, listening close.

Skin? What sort of skin could the ghost be wearing that would offend Hua Cheng so much?

“Who the fuck do you think you are, putting your hands on me?!” Qi Rong glares, trying to reach back and free himself. “I'll wear whatever I—!”

BANG!

Xie Lian jumps at the sound, startled as he listens to the floor crack, pebbles flying in every direction.

Hua Cheng has slammed the Ghost's head into the floor so violently, it's completely disappeared into the rock, forming a small crater with his neck and body sticking out.

It's not like Xie Lian has never seen the ghost king resort to violence before—he did that easily enough in the Sinner's Pit. Threatened to do so with Lang Qianqiu.

But those instances were highly controlled. Purposeful, even.

BANG!

BANG!

BANG!

"…San Lang?"

…There is nothing about this that resembles control.

Hua Cheng yanks him up by the hair, smashing his head down, over and over again, until the ghost is choking up blood.

"SOMEONE—SOMEONE STOP HIM?! WHY ARE YOU IDIOTS JUST STANDING AROUND?!"

Hua Cheng yanks his head back up, holding Qi Rong's neck in a forced arch, tendons straining, glaring down into that face.

A face he adores, twisted into a demented parody of the original. Twisted with hate, eyes burning an acidic shade of green.

"Who is going to stop me?"

Hua Cheng's voice is calm—arrogant. But his expression tells a different story. Lips pulled back into a snarl, eye burning brightly with rage.

"Who on earth can stop me from doing whatever I like with you, Qi Rong?" His hand twists more viciously into the green ghost's hair.

He's shifted back into his true form now—one that the Night Touring Green Lantern is unfamiliar with, but…

That gaze, and the red robes—they're clues enough.

"You?!" Qi Rong coughs, blood dripping down his chin. "Why are you here?! Finally going to make a meal of me?!"

That earns him a condescending laugh.

"A meal of you?" The ghost king questions coldly. "You aren't even worth eating."

Qi Rong struggled more violently, only for Crimson Rain to bare his fangs before his throat with a hiss of warning.

"I wouldn't even give you to the rats…"

Hua Cheng snarls. “They got indigestion, last time.”

Implying that he has, in fact, fed Qi Rong to a pack of rodents before. Xie Lian can’t say he disapproves, but still...

“Now, where were we?”

BAM!

“Take.”

BAM!

“That.”

BAM!

“Skin.”

BAM!

“Off.”

“...San Lang,”

All of the little green spirits that were milling about the room before have retreated to the far corners, practically jointing their human hostages in their cages, reeking with terror, but...

Xie Lian isn’t afraid.

Instead, he rushes to the ghost king’s side.

The moment Hua Cheng feels the god’s hand against his back, he goes quite still, Qi Rong’s limp and bleeding form dangling from his fingertips.

Xie Lian doesn’t glance his way. Doesn’t even want to know what the hideous, resentful energy inside that soul must look like.

“...Are you alright?“ Xie Lian murmurs, his lips tipping into a slight frown.

He doesn’t understand why they’re here, or what this has to do with Qi Rong.

He has no idea how he feels now, learning the Green Ghost’s true identity.

And he has no clue what upset San Lang so badly.

When the ghost king doesn't reply, Xie Lian's hands come to rest on his shoulders, rubbing gently.

He's never exactly had to deal with someone foul tempered before. Lang Qianqiu was an obedient student. Banyue was a sweet tempered girl.

The closest comparison he can think of is Hong'er—who was never once cross with Xie Lian. He would have swallowed hot coals before speaking harshly to him.

But he would fly into a rage when the god was insulted, and Xie Lian often had to talk him down from it.

"Don't be angry…" He murmurs, shaking his head, stroking the ghost king's shoulder with one hand while the other rubs up and down his back. "Everything's alright…just calm down, please? For me?"

Given how quick Hua Cheng has been to refuse him today, he isn't optimistic, but…

Slowly, he feels the calamity relax under his touch, and while Xie Lian can't see—he knows his expression is far more calm now than it was only moments before.

"…Apologies," he mutters, hanging his head. "Did I frighten dianxia?"

"No, no…"

"Have I offended him?"

"No," Xie Lian reassures him again, his hands still rubbing over the ghost king's shoulders. "I was only worried…"

Xie Lian can respect decisions made out of anger. There is such a thing as wrathful justice, and he is very familiar.

But he also knows what it's like to make a decision out of pain and impulse, only to regret it later.

Hua Cheng's mouth tilts up at the corners. "…His highness doesn't need to waste his energy worrying about me," the ghost king mutters, "I'm alright."

Xie Lian frowns.

Normally, Hua Cheng's attitude is cocky, bordering on outright arrogance. But this...

This is the first time that Xie Lian has heard him be outright self deprecating.

"It's not a waste," he replies, squeezing the ghost's shoulders gently.

"..." Hua Cheng smiles faintly, reaching up to place his hand over the prince's, squeezing for just a moment, and...

To Xie Lian's shock, he can't move—or speak, for that matter.

The spell is relatively simple, and without spiritual powers, he doesn't have the means to fight it.

He doesn't panic. If Hua Cheng wanted to do him harm, he's had many chances to do that already, but...

Xie Lian is wary now, staring blankly in Qi Rong's direction, and...

Hua Cheng repeats his question, "How did Prince An Le die?"

...He's starting to guess at why they're here.

He struggles, mouth straining, wanting to talk over the two, to tell them the conversation is pointless, but...it's no use.

"Why the fuck do you care about that?!" Qi Rong grumbles, spitting out blood once again. A tooth comes out with it, clacking against the stone floor.

Hua Cheng smacks his head down on the floor once more—

BAM!

And he repeats the same question, calmer now, but there isn't an ounce of mercy in that tone—

"How did Prince An Le die?"

"What makes you assume I know?!"

BAM!

"You know something?" Hua Cheng muses.

And the threat he opts for next—it surprises him.

"Your friend is waiting outside."

Hua Cheng is objectively far more powerful, and yet...Qi Rong pales at the mention of the forest demon Ren Song.

"Should I call him in to play with you?"

Physical violence only works on Qi Rong to a certain extent. Xie Lian knows that much. He was incredibly tough skinned, even in his mortal life. He only broke under Xie Lian's hands because the torture was, well...extreme.

Xie Lian expects his tolerance is even higher as a ghost.

His instinct is to assume that Ren Song couldn't do worse than Hua Cheng, but...

Then, he remembers what Ming Yi said.

That Ren Song's magic was known for causing madness.

It's hard to know what impact that would have on Qi Rong, who is already insane—

Now, he seems afraid.

"...Lang Qianqiu," the green ghost mutters, feet thrashing as he tries to get his hair out of Hua Cheng's grip.

The Daruma doll rattles inside Xie Lian's sleeve, and the prince winces.

"IT WAS LANG QIANQIU, ALRIGHT?! LET ME GO!" Qi Rong howls. "THAT'S ALL THIS ANCESTOR KNOWS!"

Now, the doll shakes so violently that it falls out of Xie Lian's pocket, rolling across the floor, wobbling back and forth with protest.

Instead of seeming irritated, Hua Cheng seems to decide that it's time for his god's little 'Knick knack' to speak.

With a snap of his fingers, Lang Qianqiu appears once again in a cloud of smoke, coughing for a moment as he rises to his feet, his expression twisted with anger.

“Me?! Prince An Le was my best friend!” He snaps, shaking his head vehemently. “It’s known—he died from an illness!”

“An illness? An Le?” Qi Rong snickers, hanging from Hua Cheng’s grip from the hair —and now, Lang Qianqiu can see what the calamity meant, ordering him to ‘take that skin off.’

The face before him...

Is identical to that of his Guoshi. Other than the eyes, gleaming bright green.

“That boy was as strong as an ox, and you mean to say he just died out of the blue? What illness does that?” Qi Rong looks him over, “I would have expected the blackhearted Guoshi Fangxin to have a student that wasn’t so...”

“Me too,” Hua Cheng sighs.

“You—?!”

“But Qi Rong...” The ghost king raises an eyebrow, using his grip on the green ghost’s hair to pull him up just a little higher. “Did I hear you admit to knowing Prince An Le personally?”

Qi Rong’s face scrunches up with irritation. “And so what?! Is that a crime?!”

Lan Qianqiu seems to find the idea preposterous. “And what would an honorable prince like An Le have to do with the likes of you?!”

“...” Qi Rong stares at him, then a wide grin spreads across his face. Unlike the true owner, his teeth are razor sharp.

“And why do you think he was friends with you, huh?!” The green ghost snickers. “God, you really are a dumbass!”

Lang Qianqiu’s brow furrows, and Xie Lian’s stomach twists. Don’t, he thinks—there’s no point to this.

But Qi Rong doesn’t stop.

“HAHA, An Le couldn’t STAND you!

His grin is wild, more and more satisfied as he watches the distress in the Prince of Yong'an's eyes. "You think people were grateful, when your dumbass parents gave them shitty land and shitty titles?!"

"My..." Lang Qianqiu's hands ball up, trembling. "My parents were HONORABLE! They ended centuries of discrimination against the people of Xianle! Gave them land and titles—An Le had no reason to resent me!"

The things Lang Qianqiu is saying are true, but... Qi Rong cackles even harder.

"You think that makes a difference?!"

Xie Lian grits his teeth, listening as the ghost jeers.

"Stolen land! Stolen titles! You give back the ancestral wealth your people stole, and you call it generosity?! BAH!" He grins, "Stupid PIGS! You all DESERVED to die! And then you killed An Le in revenge!"

Hua Cheng raises an eyebrow, lifting Qi Rong a little more violently, forcing his chin back so he can make eye contact with the ghost king once more. "What makes you so sure it wasn't a disease, hmm?"

The green ghost glares up at him defiantly, then lets out a huff.

It's hard for Lang Qianqiu to look at that face, one that he now connects with...the most complicated relationship of his life, twisted into such a hideous expression.

"Because it was clearly retaliation for what happened at the Gilded Banquet."

Xie Lian can see it starting to dawn there.

That slow, horrible realization of the truth.

Xie Lian has felt that pain before, albeit on a smaller scale.

Thinking someone was his friend, never realizing how far apart they stood. How little he understood them.

But Xie Lian was lucky.

"You mean..." The prince of Yong'an swallows hard, his eyes widening. "...You and Prince An Le were the ones who...?"

"Well, I helped move things along a little bit," Qi Rong shrugs. "He did all the leg work."

Then, he makes Xie Lian's teeth clench.

"We would have been able to finish the job, if it wasn't for that damn Guoshi..."

And finally, there it is.

"...We?" Lang Qianqiu questions softly.

If Xie Lian could, he would be hanging his head.

"Us of Xianle," Qi Rong grins, relishing in his distress.

"We decided to show your piece of shit father our fucking gratitude, condescending ass...we would have killed you too, wiping out the entire bloodline, imagine!" His cackles echo off the walls with satisfaction, "But Guoshi Fangxin...he saved your life again. Fucking BASTARD!"

He groans, like, if Hua Cheng would let him go long enough, he'd be bashing his head into the ground himself with frustration.

"...Again?"

Xie Lian silently curses the fact that he and Hua Cheng don't have a communication array set up. He has no way of asking for release.

"You really think a random group of bandits managed to kill that many imperial guards?!" Qi Rong groans, feet flailing in the air once more. "God fucking damn it, I'm tired of you good for nothing shit for brains!"

And of course, he's remembering now. Xie Lian knows he is.

The day they met.

How many of his guards died. How young he was. How frightened.

That every single one of those men died for him. The weight he had to carry. Xie Lian knows that feeling.

(It hurts.)

"...That was An Le?" Lang Qianqiu whispers, his voice suddenly small.

This, in the end, is where their stories diverge.

Xie Lian had a friend that he didn't understand. One who was different from him. And even though they both tried, they never quite saw one another clearly.

But underneath it all…

There wasn't hatred between them. There never was.

But there's an inherent disconnect, when you are born without peers. When you're too naive to realize that wealth and privilege place you so far away from everyone else.

And when you realize what people really thought of you…

It hurts.

Not only that—it's so viciously lonely.

Xie Lian was a happy child. He didn't know how else to be.

But there was a quietness, one that he was always seeking to fill. A lonesome kind of silence.

Lang Qianqiu was the same. But he got to keep the illusion of omnipotence.

Xie Lian felt so safe, when he thought he could do anything.

He was never afraid, when he thought that he was strong.

But when you realize just how much you didn't see, just how much you didn't know, the world becomes frightening.

And then you start questioning yourself.

Looking back at the things you said and did when you thought you knew everything.

"…Oh, I get it," Qi Rong grins, eyes gleaming. "You buried that Guoshi of yours, right? Put a stake through his heart and everything—YEOWWW!"

He squeals with annoyance when Hua Cheng's fingers tighten viciously in his hair, yanking him a couple of inches higher from the floor.

(Xie Lian never told him about the stake.)

But now, finally—he feels his mouth fall free.

Qi Rong has already said what he needed to.

And the first word out of his mouth actually startles Lang Qianqiu. Hua Cheng as well, but marginally less. His eye only widens slightly when Xie Lian mutters—

“Bullshit.”

“...Excuse you?” Qi Rong glares, slowly revolving from where he’s dangling by his hair in Hua Cheng’s grip.

“You come into a man’s house—while HE’S EATING DINNER, mind you—and YOU CALL HIM A LIAR?” Qi Rong crosses his arms. “GET THE FUCK OUT!”

Xie Lian ignores him completely, staring blindly in Lang Qianqiu’s direction.

“Your father—you saw me,” he reminds the prince, pleading. “I killed him. An Le—it’s as you said, he had no reason to harm you. This creature— he’s insane, and a liar. You shouldn’t trust a word he says—”

“Wait a minute, so you’re the Guoshi Fangxin?” Qi Rong muses, glancing over the skin Hua Cheng has him in.

“You’re way more boring looking than I thought you’d be. Rumors said you were a looker. Ah, well. Probably just bullshit anyways! The king was already wounded, reports show that much. Why so eager to take the blame, old man?” He snickers. “Irritated you didn’t get there first?”

“I—” Xie Lian’s hands are trembling, where he clenches them at his sides. “I didn’t—it was—”

“Guoshi,” Lang Qianqiu croaks, his voice trembling—and Xie Lian hangs his head in response. “Stop.”

But what’s left if he does?

He’s starting to understand what Pei meant, before.

‘I think you take pride in your ability to endure suffering.’

Xie Lian's lips quiver, and his throat tightens.

'That's the only way someone can endure a lifetime of being punished.'

Lang Qianqiu found out anyway. He's hurting, anyway.

And if that's true, then...

It might not seem like much, when stacked next to so many lifetimes of failure, but...

Xie Lian spent more time alone, in that coffin, than he did for any stretch among humans in his eight hundred years. With only the dreams of the ones he lost to keep him company.

By the end, he thought he would simply lay there until he faded. For however many centuries it took.

Every day, Xie Lian still wakes up in the dark. Sometimes, he'll throw his hands up and stretch as far as he can—just to make sure he won't find the coffin lid above him.

If it all came to this, to Lang Qianqiu learning the truth from Qi Rong's lips—it's more than just another failure.

It means that Xie Lian endured that without purpose. Or, more accurately—

Xie Lian endured all of that because of Qi Rong.

"...Pathetic."

His voice is low, cold—and at first, the green ghost doesn't seem to recognize that it's directed at him, still snorting and giggling in Lang Qianqiu's direction, but...

Once he does realize, he frowns.

"After all that, you're calling ME pathetic?! HA! What a fucking JOKE!"

"No," Xie Lian replies flatly, slowly lifting his head. He speaks evenly. Doesn't have the uncontrolled wrath that he did when he was young. "You're the one everyone is laughing at."

That makes the ghost stop his howling and cawing, his eyes narrowing as he stares him down.

“You’ve always been the butt of the joke, Qi Rong. Even when you’re the one trying to tell it.”

Now that he doesn’t seem particularly bothered with hiding his identity, Hua Cheng allows the disguise to fall away.

Finally, green eyes widen sharply with recognition. “…Cousin?”

Qi Rong blinks, staring at him in shock, then smirking when he sees the shackle in his eyes. “Hah, I heard you ascended again. Stupid fucking heavenly officials, not seeing what a sick bastard you are! You were Guoshi Fangxin? All this time? HA! HA! THAT’S FUCKING PRICELESS!”

Hua Cheng’s gaze darkens as the ghoul prattles on, practically wiggling in his grip from deranged excitement. “I guess that Heavenly Emperor of yours left you shackled this time? How’d you even get another chance?! Probably had to get down on your knees and suck his—!”

BAM!

This time, he’s slammed into the floor so violently, his head actually gets stuck. Hua Cheng lets him go, watching as Qi Rong writhes and pushes at the ground with his hand, struggling to push himself free.

When he does, he’s wearing his own face, rather than Xie Lian’s.

But before he can sit up, there’s a boot on top of his head, pushing it back down into the crumbled rock, grinding it down until his face starts to crack and bleed against the shards—

“San Lang,” Xie Lian calls out, his tone even. “Stop.”

Hua Cheng is silent, his gaze wild.

Still, he obeys, lifting his boot from the ghost’s head, trembling with anger as he takes a step back.

Lang Qianqiu is shaking as well—but not from rage. Rage will come for him later.

Now, he only has guilt and regret.

Xie Lian closes his eyes with a sigh.

All these years later, and he’s still dealing with Qi Rong’s messes.

“Going through all of that trouble…” Xie Lian sighs, taking a step towards him. “All to avenge a clan that you aren’t even a part of.”

Qi Rong pushes himself up onto his hands and knees, glaring. “I—!”

“My parents took you in out of obligation,” the elder of the two murmurs, watching his aura now with faint distaste.

It’s twisted and warped, sparks flying off the edges, the inner layers twisting like thorns.

Green, like an infected wound, flesh that needs to be cut free.

“And then I banished you.”

Qi Rong’s teeth click together anxiously at the memory, and there’s satisfaction in it for Hua Cheng, seeing the green ghost’s bravado flicker.

“…Just before you murdered me,” He hisses, his fingers scrabbling at the gravel with bitterness. “Does your precious emperor know about that?!” He sneers. “Or do you think he’d banish you again, if he knew? HA! Always such a liar—”

“He probably does know,” Xie Lian replies. “Either way, it doesn’t bother me.”

“What?” Qi Rong finally manages to sit up properly. “Has this ancestor’s esteemed cousin finally stopped pretending that he’s some saint?!”

That actually makes him smile, somehow. In spite of it all.

“I never thought of myself as a saint, Qi Rong.” He murmurs. “It’s been centuries since I thought of myself generously at all.”

He can’t see the way Hua Cheng grimaces in response to that.

“But,” Xie Lian blinks owlishly, “what I did to you—that’s never haunted me at all,” he admits.

Qi Rong’s eyes flare, infuriated. “Actually, I feel pretty good about it.”
“Wh—?!”

“It’s a good memory for me.” Xie Lian explains. “Sometimes I might be having a bad day, and I’ll remember. It cheers me up,” he crosses his arms, tilting his head to the side. “But now, I have to admit—it’s become even more amusing.”

Qi Rong can handle many things. Endure most forms of suffering. What he can’t stand, in the end, is being looked down on.

That’s why his cousin has always been one of the few that could truly get to him— straight to the core.

“You were so terrified of human face disease, you allied yourself with the creature that destroyed Xianle...”

Xie Lian won’t utter Bai Wuxiang’s name, not even now—but he recalls his alliance with Qi Rong with utter contempt.

“Then, centuries later, you’re still murdering people in their name,” Xie Lian concludes, shaking his head. “It’s pitiful, really.”

The green ghost glares up at him venomously, blood streaked down his chin.

Even in his own skin, they look alike. Similar facial structures. Family resemblances, and all that. Qi Rong’s hair is slightly darker, a little curlier. His nose and chin are sharper, and...

There’s this hatefulness to his expression that his cousin lacks. A harshness to the curve of his mouth, a constant sneer.

But that hatred is never quite so pronounced as when he looks up at Xie Lian, hands trembling with the desire to throttle him.

“You sure are comfortable, having a Ghost King around to protect you, huh?” Qi Rong sneers, turning his glare on Hua Cheng, who stares back at him with impassivity. “It’s easy to show up here, insult me in my own house, pretend you’re above me—!”

“I am,” Xie Lian replies. “And San Lang doesn’t need to protect me from you,” he kneels down, crossing his arms over his knees as he stares at Qi Rong, displaying an eerie ability to make eye contact, even when he can’t see what he’s looking at. “If you disagree, try to hit me. I won’t let him stop you.”

Of course, Qi Rong knows better than to try—but still, he has no impulse control.

Xie Lian catches his fist with ease, squeezing, holding it in place as Qi Rong’s arm trembles from the strain.

“Wow,” the god murmurs, his tone bitingly sarcastic. “Qi Rong has gotten so strong.”

Of course, Xie Lian’s cousin has always been weak.

Even the worst things he’s achieved in his life—he always had help.

In the case of the Gilded Banquet, it was An Le who did most of the work.

And in Hong-er’s case…

Qi Rong was only able to hurt him because of Bai Wuxiang.

Xie Lian knows—Hong’er would have kept silent as a choice. And he also chose not to fight back.

If he had, it would have awoken Xie Lian—and the White Clothed Calamity would have gone after him.

But in a one on one fight, even at seventeen—Hong’er could have handled Qi Rong.

After all, Qi Rong led a life of privilege and wealth from a young age, and Xie Lian’s…

His Hong’er was a soldier.

“It’s no surprise you’re listed as one of the four calamities,” Xie Lian murmurs, his tone light. “I’m trembling with fear.”

His hands have never been so steady.

It’s hard now, to remember that day, and not resort to the anger he once felt. To resist the urge to rip the green ghost apart.

But Xie Lian is no longer the only one with a grudge against Qi Rong. His life isn’t solely for the prince to take.

And in any case…

Xie Lian has had eight centuries to think about his old life.

He knows now, beating Qi Rong will never get the reaction that you want.

“But it’s not because you’re weak,” the prince murmurs, still holding

Qi Rong's fist between his fingers. "That isn't why you're beneath me."

He lets go of the green ghost's fist, rising to his feet.

"I'm not a good person," Xie Lian admits calmly.

Hua Cheng looks on, his expression...complicated.

"I've done horrible things, but—" He tilts his chin down, looking down on Qi Rong. Just as the prince always has.

No matter how many statues Qi Rong toppled down, smashing them to the ground, trying to change their positions—somehow, it always ends up the same.

"You are your father's son," Xie Lian murmurs.

He doesn't need to see to know that Qi Rong has flinched.

"And I don't think I could ever sink that low."

Qi Rong's father was quickly forgotten after he died. Only living in the memories of those who knew him.

His horrors, his cruelties, are only remembered by the likes of Xie Lian and Qi Rong. A comparison so vile, so insulting, that even Xie Lian's cousin recoiled from it.

"...Shut up," he mutters, wrenching away, pounding his fists against the ground. "Shut up! ...SHUT THE FUCK UP! I'VE HEARD ENOUGH FROM YOU! YOU LAME, PATHETIC FAILURE!"

Xie Lian has heard it all.

"YOU COCKSUCKING MOTHERFUCKER!"

Now THAT is colorful.

Maybe he hasn't heard it all.

Hua Cheng's eye flashes dangerously, and the only thing that's holding him back from dismembering Qi Rong is Xie Lian's implied order to hold back, but—

"YOU SON OF A—!"

THUMP!

"...AHHH!"

It would seem that Lang Qianqiu, who had been frozen with horror up until now, was finally stirred into action.

Leaping forward and, with one sweep of his sword—cutting Qi Rong in two at his middle.

"Lang Qianqiu!" Xie Lian cries, startled. "Don't be so rash!"

"What?!" His student sends him a sharp look, as though Xie Lian has lost his mind. "Did you not hear what he said?! HE PLOTTED THE MURDER OF MY ENTIRE CLAN! WHY SHOULDN'T I TAKE HIS ROTTEN LIFE?! LOOK WHAT HAPPENED TO YOU!"

Xie Lian flinches.

See, this is why he doesn't share.

You give away one little peep about an admittedly not-so-great time in your life, and boom!

It's part of Lang Qianqiu's backstory now, not just his own. And in part, that's fair.

But in another way, it isn't.

"It's not as easy as chopping him up," Hua Cheng rolls his eyes. "You would have to know the location of his ashes, then destroy them."

"Fine!" The prince snarls, his shoulders trembling with rage. "Then I'll find them! I don't care how long it takes!"

Xie Lian opens his mouth to protest, then he hears this... Weird pattering on the floor.

Like an animal, almost...but not exactly. It's four distinct points of contact against the floor, but there's something odd about it.

From behind him, Hua Cheng grimaces. "I could have lived without the sight of that." Xie Lian glances toward him, confused, and he explains:

"He's...fleeing." Then, to clarify, he tacks on— "In pieces."

Oh.

Xie Lian grimaces at the thought—but he's spared the sight of Qi Rong's detached legs and hips running across the room, smacking to the opposite wall, while his torso and head flee by walking on his hands.

"THIS ISN'T OVER, ASSHOLES! HEY! HEY! OVER—DAMMIT—" He hand-walks himself over to his legs, tries to grab his ankle with one hand, but that sends him tumbling over in a heap. "THIS ANCESTOR WILL BE THE ONE TO COME OUT ON TOP IN THE END!"

Xie Lian rubs his temples with a groan.

Honestly, it's humiliating to think that the two of them are even related.

He half expects Lang Qianqiu to go charging after him, but the martial god seems to gauge that, given Qi Rong's limited mobility, he's allowed to have a head start.

Instead, he looks to Xie Lian.

"Are you done?" The prince doesn't immediately respond, but that doesn't deter him. "Now that I know, can you just tell me one thing?"

Xie Lian lets out a tired sigh, dropping his hands from his face. "What is it?"

"My father." Lang Qianqiu mutters. "What happened between the two of you?"

Xie Lian falls silent, the memory pricking uncomfortably at the edges of his mind.

"...It won't make you feel better, Lang Qianqiu," he whispers.

The truth is so much worse than living with the lie.

"Guoshi...that isn't up to you."

No, he supposes not.

"Was he already hurt, when you found him?"

"...Yes," Xie Lian admits, wrapping his arms around himself.

"Badly?"

He bites his lip, trying not to remember the trusting look in the king's eyes.

"Yes," Xie Lian mutters. "He wouldn't have survived."

He could try to play it off, say that he wasn't sure, but...

Xie Lian remembers it well. The agony the man was in. The slow, inevitable death that laid before him.

"...Then why?"

He wants to argue, to say what he's been saying—that knowing doesn't fix anything, but...

Ignorance didn't help either. They still ended up here.

If Xie Lian was the person he used to be, he would have been angry with Hua Cheng for doing this. Would have blamed him, for the pain and regret that he's feeling right now.

But he doesn't. Xie Lian did this.

"...He ordered me to have the guards go out and kill the people of Xianle in retaliation," Xie Lian mutters, holding himself a little tighter.

After all, he knows what it's like—to love one's father, but to learn to feel disappointed in him.

"If he had lived any longer than he did, he would have given the orders to the guards who were remaining," Xie Lian concludes, feeling hollowed out. "That's why I..."

Why he helped the king along, allowing him to die quickly. Relatively painlessly.

"...I wouldn't have let them," Lang Qianqiu stares at Xie Lian, his expression impossible to read. Caught between so many different emotions—

So much pain.

"You know I wouldn't have."

"...I did," his Guoshi agrees. "But I didn't want that to be your last memory of your father."

The prince falls silent, his posture telling a story of tension. Xie Lian couldn't have predicted what he was going to say.

"...Instead, you chose to take away the last loved one I had left. The closest thing I would have had to family," Lang Qianqiu points out quietly. "You."

Xie Lian couldn't have known how much it would hurt to hear it.

"...You didn't need me," he mutters, holding himself tightly, his shoulders hunching inward.

"Yes, I did," Lang Qianqiu whispers.

He needed his Guoshi so much, his voice still aches from the memory of it.

"I was seventeen years old, and I was alone." He mumbles, his voice wavering. "How easy was that for you?"

Hua Cheng stiffens, clearly riled by the comparison—but Xie Lian simply hangs his head.

"It wasn't."

Lang Qianqiu closes his eyes, breathing in slowly through his nose. Xie Lian can feel it now, how hard he's trying to think about his words, to put thought behind his actions.

Beyond the hurt, the anger, and the guilt—he cares for his Guoshi, and doesn't want to be impulsive.

But that doesn't mean that his words don't cause pain—even if they both needed to hear them.

"...I know you thought you were doing the right thing," Lang Qianqiu mutters. Maybe he didn't before, but he does now. "But this was never about me."

Xie Lian's stomach sinks.

"You..." The prince of Yong'an shakes his head, "I don't know if you were in that much pain, or if—if you hated yourself that much, but—"

Hua Cheng's eye narrows sharply, "Watch it, boy."

"San Lang—" Xie Lian's voice is small, but his plea is sincere. "Let him speak."

"…You used me to hurt yourself," Lang Qianqiu concludes, and each word hits like a weight in Xie Lian's chest.

The same weight that his student now bears, forced to live with the knowledge of what he put his Guoshi through.

"I have to live with that, but so do you."

Xie Lian's body physically reacts to the words, shrinking, curling in on itself, as though that could somehow shield him from the pain that's churning inside.

Because Lang Qianqiu is right.

'I-I didn't want to do that!'

It hurts.

Remembering how much pain Xie Lian caused.

'Why did you make me do that?!'

Being cradled in Lang Qianqiu's arms as the boy wept, frightened and alone.

And—

'I-I still need you!'

He said that.

Xie Lian's throat tightens.

He had forgotten that Lang Qianqiu said that, back then.

'I'm so sorry, Guoshi…'

It hurts.

Because—

'What do we do, when faced with the wicked?'

Lang Qianqiu is right.

Xie Lian wanted to be punished for failing. Not just in that instance, but in so many others.

He wanted to throw himself on the sword, before it could land on someone else.

But forcing Lang Qianqiu to hurt him—that wasn't protecting him.

The truth is—Xie Lian hurt him deeply.

The Crown Prince of Yong'an turns away, leaving the cavern without a word, clearly going after Qi Rong.

Hua Cheng's lips curve into a snarl as he goes to follow, but—

"Don't," Xie Lian warns him, and when the Ghost king seems reluctant to obey, he mumble—

"If you go, I'll be angry."

And that draws Hua Cheng to a dead halt.

Not because Xie Lian sounds cross with him—just the opposite.

The prince of Xianle sounds...

Profoundly sad.

"...He had no right to speak to you that way," the Ghost King mutters darkly, turning back to Xie Lian. "Someone should teach him sense—"

"He had every right." His god interrupts him—and even as his voice aches, it's firm. "I hurt him. Why bring him here, give him the chance to see things clearly and then forbid him from having emotions about it?"

"He needed to know what you actually did—and why," Hua Cheng comes to a stop in front of Xie Lian, watching the way his god nearly slumps from the guilt

"...You don't even seem to realize what I actually did," Xie Lian mutters bitterly, shaking his head.

"Dianxia—"

"I manipulated him," the prince turns away, his voice slightly raw, his ribs hurting from how tightly he's holding himself. "I patronized him. I lied to him."

“Your intentions were to protect him,” Hua Cheng follows behind him, not allowing Xie Lian to shrink too far away with self loathing.

“No,” Xie Lian croaks, swallowing thickly. “I thought that’s what they were, but…I was just…It was my fault, and I wanted to be punished.”

“That was Qi Rong, and An Le.” Hua Cheng corrects him firmly, “Not you.”

“No…” Xie Lian feels frustration building in his chest, struggling to explain what, to him, has long since been an accepted part of his reality. “I was too comfortable.”

Hua Cheng pauses, eyebrows raised.

“What?”

The prince groans, pressing his palms against his temples.

“I stayed too long, and I…I was too happy,” he mutters, fingers knowing in his hair. “I’m a god of misfortune, Hua Cheng. When I stay in one place for too long, I…”

He doesn’t cry. Not really, but…

His voice still cracks.

“I break things.”

There’s a pause, and then Xie Lian feels a warm, heavy weight upon his shoulder— Hua Cheng’s hand.

“…Oh, Dianxia,” the Ghost King sighs, his tone…rather loaded. “That isn’t true.”

Xie Lian bites his lip, trying to find some evidence that Hua Cheng might be right. To find a time when something he loved didn’t suffer or break as a result of his failure.

He can find none.

And yet…

Hua Cheng seems so sure of it. Of himself.

“…San Lang?” He whispers.

Another hand comes to rest on his shoulder, the shadow of an embrace.

There's been something bothering him, ever since Hua Cheng came and plucked him from the heavens. Something subliminal, maybe.

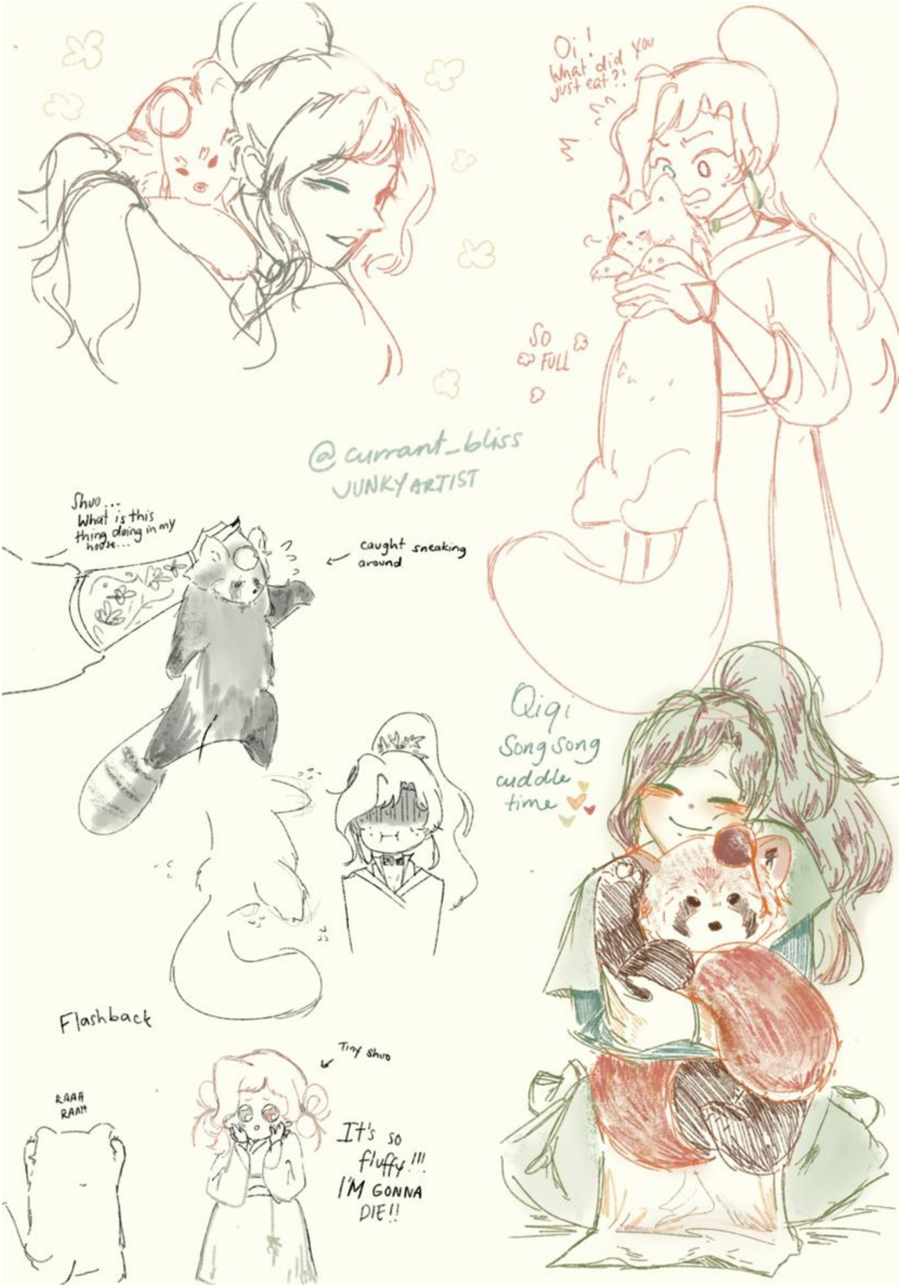
Still, Xie Lian looks back over his shoulder, "...Have we met before?"

ARTWORK INSPIRED BY THIS STORY

Included with permission from the artist, do not reproduce or reuse for any reason

ENDURASHROOM

CREDIT: ASH



Oi! What did you just eat?!
So FULL
@currant_bliss
JUNKYARTIST
Shuo... What is this thing doing in my house... caught sneaking around
Qiqi Songsong cuddle time
Flashback
Tiny Shuo
RAAH RAAH
It's so fluffy!!! I'M GONNA DIE!!

CREDIT: JUNKY

[image]

CREDIT: SEONG

Chapter End Notes

thank you to ash, junky, and seong for their amazing artwork, and allowing me to share it!

xoxo, Evie

Seeking Perfection

Chapter Summary

> It was a simple question.
>
> ‘Have we met before?’
>
> But it’s been so long, the silence feels like it’s own kind of anger. Something between a yes and a no.
>
> Hua Cheng’s hands feel heavy on his shoulders. Not holding Xie Lian down, but still—
>
> The weight of them feels enormous.

Chapter Notes

> You can find me on twitter and keep up with current updates of the story HERE

See the end of the chapter for more notes

A few hundred meters away, Qi Rong staggers through the exit of the cavern, hands tugging at the hem of his robes as he tries to pull himself back together.

“Stupid...incompetent...BASTARDS!” He snarls, pawing at his legs miserably. “STAY —STAY STILL, DAMMIT! GOD FUCKING—!”

Suddenly, he finds himself lifted up by his hair once again—a far easier task, given his recent loss of half of his bodyweight—

Only to find himself face to face with the Crown Prince of Yong’an once more.

“...the FUCK?!” Qi Rong glares, his detached lower half kicking around. “HOW DID YOU CATCH UP ALREADY?!”

“...You weren’t exactly moving fast,” Lang Qianqiu glares, turning around to make his way back into the cave.

“You could’ve given me a HEAD START!” The green ghost glares, “You already CUT ME IN HALF, ASSHOLE—WHY ARE WE GOING BACK IN?!”

Lang Qianqiu did technically give him a head start—if only to confront his Guoshi— but now, he has other things in mind.

"I'm going to throw your head into that cauldron of yours, and feed you to your little minions," the martial god growls, his eyes burning scarlet with anger.

"…HAHA!" THe green ghost cackles, eyes widening with surprised delight. "Well, would you look at that?! Cousin crown prince's student is a little TORTURER! HA! THAT'S SO FUCKING HILARIOUS!"

BAM!

His laughter is muffled when his skull is slammed into the mountainside.

"Does it count as torture when it's someone lower than a beast?!" The crown prince of Yong'an hisses, slamming him into the stone formation once more, drawing more muffled laughter from the creature.

"HAHAHA! I'm SURE YOU—YOU'D LIKE TO THINK SO!"

Lang Qianqiu yanks the head back, finding Qi Rong's face streaked with blood as he cackles and chortles with satisfaction, teeth gleaming in the moonlight.

"Do whatever you like! THIS ANCESTOR WILL JUST COME BACK TEN TIMES WORSE, HE'S PRACTICALLY A CALAMITY ALREADY!"

"You—!"

Lan Qianqiu snarls, dragging him into the cave entrance, prepared to make good on his threats—until something very odd happens.

He trips.

The martial god has never been clumsy, particularly not when he's so focused, but…

Here he is, sprawled in the dirt.

He could've sworn…

…It was almost as though a root jumped up from the ground, wrapping itself around his ankle.

"How the—?" He questions, pushing himself up onto his elbows, looking back—and finding nothing there.

Qi Rong cackles, running forward on his hands, "CATCH ME IF YOU CAN, FUCKER! HA—!"

The little monster stops laughing all of the sudden, falling silent, and before Lang Qianqiu can turn around to see what it is, he hears an unfamiliar voice ringing through the forest.

Soft, taunting—with an almost melodic smoothness to it's tone.

"Hello, Qi Rong."

There's a soft jingling ringing through the air as Lang Qianqiu rolls over onto his back, still sprawled out on the ground as he pulls himself to sit up.

Through the darkness, he sees a set of eyes, and nothing else. One the color of the leaves above.

The other, a flame.

"Did you make a new friend?" The voice purrs.

Unlike before, facing the threats of a ghost king and two martial gods—now, Qi Rong grows pale, pulling himself back in Lang Qianqiu's direction.

(As though he might prefer going into the boiling cauldron.)

"You seem a little…torn."

"R…REAL fuckin' funny, Ren Song!" The Green Ghost glares, "I'LL RIP YOU IN HALF, NEXT TIME!"

The only response he receives is tinkling laughter, and Lang Qianqiu has had enough. "What, do you think your ally can save you?!"

"Ally?" Ren Song questions coldly, stepping into the moonlight.

Hands clasped behind his back, black and emerald robes stirring slightly with the breeze.

"You're rather ignorant, aren't you?" His expression turns imperious, and Lang Qianqiu's cheeks grow hot.

Partly from sheepishness. But also—

Because that smug, arrogant air about him is similar to that of Crimson Rain Sought Flower.

For obvious reasons, the prince isn't fond of the similarity.

"Were you the one who cut him in half?"

"I..." Lang Qianqiu opens his mouth to answer, then stops.

...What is he doing, complying with a ghost?!

"..." The prince rises to his feet, clearing his throat. He stands substantially taller than the forest demon—and still, he feels the need to square his shoulders and puff his chest out. "I'll be the one asking the questions, demon!"

Ren Song tilts his head back, slowly arching an eyebrow. "Is that so, brat?"

"...Excuse me?" The god glares, eyes burning slightly brighter, and the ghost doesn't seem intimidated, tossing his hair back over his shoulders, earrings jingling as he does so.

"Did I misunderstand?" Ren Song muses, taking a step closer. "I thought we were going back and forth calling each other things that were obvious." He stops in front of him, eyes widening innocently. "I could have called you an imbecile," he adds, tilting his head.

He rolls on the balls of his feet to get further into the god's space, hands still clasped behind his back.

"Or obnoxious," he hisses, eyes glinting with a playful form of condescending. "Which one of those do you prefer?"

"..." Lang Qianqiu huffs out a breath, leaning back.

"You may refer to me as General Tai Hua," he clears his throat, squaring himself once more. "Or your highness. Clearly you aren't aware—but I'm the Martial God of the East. We're in my territory."

Ren Song's eyes widen with mocking surprise, "Is that so? Oh, dear..."

He even goes so far as to allow his lower lip to wobble fretfully.

"You aren't going to disperse me, are you, General Tai Hua?"

"...Not if you stay out of my way," the prince shakes his head, going for Qi Rong again. Ren Song watches, dumbfounded.

...Is he really stupid?

"...And you're the one who cut him in half?" The forest demon repeats dryly, watching his movements.

"I'm about to do worse than that." Lang Qianqiu mutters darkly. "And you shouldn't be calling people older than you brats."

Now, the demon's eyes flash with irritation.

Visually speaking, Lang Qianqiu is in his early twenties. Ironically enough, he actually looks older than the prince of Xianle.

And Ren Song, despite possessing skins that make him look older...his natural form leaves him looking somewhere near eighteen or nineteen years old.

Permanently a teenager. Thankfully he's no longer visually a child, or a pre-teen, but—

He doesn't enjoy the reminder of his unnaturally prolonged youth.

"And what do you mean by worse, General Tai Hua?"

"I'm going to destroy this body of his," the god mutters.

"Then, I'm going to find his ashes and destroy them."

That makes Ren Song's eyes widen sharply.

"...Destroy?" He questions softly. "You mean to disperse the creature?"

Lang Qianqiu nods, distracted, having assumed that much was already obvious from his own words.

"He destroyed my clan," the prince replies, reaching down to yank Qi Rong up by the back of his collar.

"It's my right."

Ren Song's lips press into a firm line. "You should be warned," he murmurs, his tone low and flat, "there are others who have already laid claim to his life."

That hadn't exactly occurred to the martial god, but he shrugs. "Well, it would appear that I've gotten him first. I'm sure that any of them would understand—!"

THUD!

Something grabs the back of his robes, yanking until he's swept from his feet and slammed against the ground.

Qi Rong flies from his hands tumbling and rolling against the ground until his face slams into a tree—and when Lang Qianqiu tries to sit up again, there's a foot on his chest, keeping him down.

"Your Guoshi should have taught you more about ghosts, it seems."

Ren Song leans over him, lips pulled back to reveal sharpened canines, gleaming menacingly in the moonlight. And when he speaks, his eyes flash brighter.

"You don't get between a ghost and it's prey."

He might be smaller than Lang Qianqiu—but the power behind his leg is enough to keep the god pinned to the ground, struggling to throw him off.

"Your prey?!" The prince glares, gripping the ghost by the ankle as he tries to yank him off, to no avail. "What gives you the right?!"

"You're not the only one whose life got ruined by that piece of shit," Ren Song's foot presses down harder, the heel digging into Lang Qianqiu's skin through his robes. "I got him first. His life is mine. Understand? Or should I speak slower?" He sneers.

"...Alright," Lang Qianqiu closes his eyes, breathing in through his nose. "You might be small, but you aren't weak. My mistake."

Somehow, Ren Song seems more irritated than he was before. "Small?"

"But," the prince of Yong'an's grip tightens around the ghost's ankle. "I'm not stupid."

That's when the demon hears it.

Something whistling through the air—and while his strength aided by gravity was enough to keep the god down—

He can't pull his foot free.

BAM!

The flat of the sword slams into the small of the forest demon's back, and of course— that's when Lang Qianqiu let's go of his ankle, sending him flying.

"Oof!"

The blow would be strong enough to knock out a weaker opponent, but Ren Song only ends up slightly winded, coughing.

Lang Qianqiu leaps to his feet, turning back on Qi Rong, who has started attempting to log roll into the shrubbery.

(Which is hard, it turns out, when your hips are detached.) But before he gets close, he hears the words—

"Gege, can I eat this one?"

Then, a pause.

A long pause.

Then, Ren Song lets out an irritated snarl, charging after the martial god.

"Who are you talking to?!"

"I'm not talking to anyone," the ghost glares, "he didn't answer, so I'll just take a few bites WHILE I'M WAITING!"

At first, Lang Qianqiu assumes he must have been speaking about Qi Rong, since he claimed to have his own vendetta, but—

The martial god is the one who ends up getting tackled. "WAIT— ME?!"

"WHO ELSE?!"

"MAYBE THE GHOST YOU SAID RUINED YOUR LIFE?!"

The individuals in question have over millennia of battle experience between the two of them. Each feared and respected within their own spheres for their might. Disciples of two of the most powerful beings to walk the earth.

And right now, they're wrestling like children.

"I DON'T WANT HIM DEAD AT THE MOMENT!"

"HOW DO I RANK HIGHER ON YOUR PRIORITIES?!"

They roll over until Ren Song is straddling his hips, one hand wrapped around the prince's throat while the other pulls back, claws extended —

"I'M A COMPLICATED PERSON!" He snarls. "AND I'M NOT SMALL!"

His hand plunges downward, nails scraping against the martial god's cheek before Lang Qianqiu catches him by the wrist.

"Okay! OKAY!" He wheezes as Ren Song's grip on his throat tightens. "I COULD HAVE PHRASED THAT DIFFERENTLY—!"

"HOW?!"

"...Undersized?"

Now, the ghost squeezes until Lang Qianqiu's eyes bulge from his skull. "O-OKAY..." He wheezes, "SPRITE-LIKE?!"

"I DON'T KNOW WHAT THAT MEANS!"

"This—THIS IS STUPID!" The prince glares, coughing, "GET OFF!"

"BACK OFF OF MY KILL, AND I WILL!"

"Why should he even be YOUR KILL?!" Lang Qianqiu shouts, gripping Ren Song's wrist with one hand, using the other to attempt and pull the ghost's hand from his throat, "I already said—HE SLAUGHTERED MY CLAN!"

"AND?! HE KILLED MY BROTHER!"

"WELL, I'M SORRY FOR YOUR LOSS!" Lang Qianqiu shouts, still looking infuriated, and Ren Song pauses, his brow furrowing with confusion, but he still maintains a wrathful tone.

"...THANKS!"

"BUT ONE BROTHER VERSUS AN ENTIRE CLAN?! YOU CAN'T COMPARE THE TWO!"

"HAH?!" The ghost sputters, his eyes widening with annoyance, "it's not MY FAULT that I didn't come from some BIG FANCY CLAN or that my siblings were ALREADY DEAD!"

"No, but IT DOES MEAN THAT I LOST MORE THAN YOU DID!"

"HE WAS THE ONLY FAMILY I HAD LEFT?! IT'S THE SAME THING!"

This time, when Ren Song hears that familiar whirring in the air, he's prepared for it, releasing Lang Qianqiu's throat as he ducks, dodging the incoming sword—but the martial god uses that as an opportunity to flip them over, pinning the ghost down by the wrists.

"Look!" He glares, slamming Ren Song back down when he attempts to kick free, "I'm not unreasonable, alright?! We can take him down together, if that's what you want! Fair?!"

"NO!" The demon huffs, blowing his bangs out of his face. "I just said I DON'T WANT HIM DEAD RIGHT NOW!"

"That makes NO sense, and if you want to get revenge, YOU'RE GONNA HAVE TO COMPROMISE!" Lang Qianqiu huffs. "When did he kill your brother, anyway?!"

"A century ago!" Ren Song hisses, "Why does that matter?!"

"Well, he killed my clan THREE centuries ago, so he got me FIRST!"

"OH?! THEN WHY HAVEN'T I BUMPED INTO YOU UNTIL NOW?!" Ren Song tugs at his wrists until the skin bruises from it, but with Lang Qianqiu on top of him, his size provides a natural advantage.

"WELL—I DIDN'T KNOW IT WAS HIM UNTIL HALF AN HOUR AGO!"

"THEN HE GOT ME FIRST!"

"NO! THAT'S NOT HOW THAT WORKS! YOU JUST KNEW ABOUT IT FIRST!"

Ren Song opens his mouth to argue more, then seems to become utterly exasperated by the situation, ramming his leg up until it slams into, well—

A very sensitive area, leaving Lang Qianqiu wheezing and rolling off.

The forest demon sits up, his ponytail knocked askew by the wrestling, loose pieces of hair falling into his face as he whips his head around, looking for the—

“...Fuck,” he mutters, pinching the bridge of his nose.

Lang Qianqiu is rolling around, hunched and wheezing.

“That...wasn’t...honorable!”

“Yeah, yeah, whatever,” Ren Song hisses, whipping his head around to pin a glare on the martial god. “Now look at what you did!”

Lang Qianqiu sits up—with no small amount of trouble—and sees that Qi Rong’s torso has gone limp, eyes wide and unseeing.

“...Is he dead?” the prince mutters, eyes widening slightly. His own hair is a tousled mess from the exchange, finger shaped bruises forming around his throat. “That feels kind of anticlimactic—”

“He was already dead, dipshit,” Ren Song sneers. “The word you’re thinking of is dispersed, and no, he just...”

The ghost groans, his face sinking into his hands.

“He’s probably possessed one of those human prisoners and run off.”

Meaning...

He got away.

Lang Qianqiu sits there, stewing in his frustration.

“...I had him!” He snaps. “Don’t talk to me like it’s my fault when YOU’RE the one who got in the way!”

“HA!” Ren Song laughs, but with no mirth. “Isn’t that hypocritical.”

Before Lang Qianqiu can ask what he means, the ghost rises to his feet, brushing himself off.

“...Where are you going?”

“Where do you think?” He mutters, pushing his hair behind his ears. “To go find him. Which wasn’t fucking easy the first time, you irritating, entitled little—”

He stops when Lang Qianqiu rises to his feet, following after him. “...What are you doing?”

The god blinks back at him, arching an eyebrow. “What does it look like? We’re both looking for the same ghost.”

“...No,” Ren Song glares, hands balling into fists. “You’re not coming with me.”

“I wouldn’t say I’m going WITH you, we’re just both going to the same destination.”

“...I swear to hell, I’ll kick you in the balls again,” Ren Song glares at him sharply, which only results in Lang Qianqiu moving out of kicking distance.

“That’s not going to stop me!” He mutters as they walk deeper into the forest. “Oh really?”

Thud.

The prince blinks.

Thud.

“What was it you said before?” Ren Song taps his chin with his finger, “See here, I’m a martial god and we’re in MY territory! Look how big my dick is!’”

He even deepens his voice for proper mocking effect.

Lang Qianqiu looks properly scandalized. “I never said that—!”

Thud.

“Any forest is my territory,” Ren Song cuts him off coldly. “So, do you really think you’re in a position to be pestering me?”

“...”

Thud.

Lang Qianqiu’s expression turns somewhat grim. “...You brought the panda, didn’t you?”

Ren Song’s smile reeks of quiet smugness.

A roar rumbles through the trees as the bear lunges from the darkness, and Lang Qianqiu barely manages to dodge it, smacking into a tree that wasn’t there before, but —

"Oh, I always bring Dian Dian."

...This is going to be troublesome.

While chaos is unfolding outside, inside the cave, it remains quiet.

All of the little green ghosts and humans having fled to the outer chambers, looking to make their escape.

Only two remain: a god and a devil.

And the devil is taking quite some time to answer.

It was a simple question.

'Have we met before?'

But it's been so long, the silence feels like it's own kind of anger. Something between a yes and a no.

Hua Cheng's hands feel heavy on his shoulders. Not holding Xie Lian down, but still—

The weight of them feels enormous.

Xie Lian waits so long, his mind has room to wander. To find beasts in the dark to be frightened of, but—

Eventually, there's a sound.

A low, strained noise, somewhere between a grunt and a whimper.

Like...

Like Hua Cheng is in pain.

"...San Lang?"

Xie Lian turns his head, meaning to turn around and make sure he's alright, but...

Those hands grip him slightly tighter now, keeping him in place.

"Is something wrong?"

“...Just an old wound acting up, your highness.” The Ghost King replies, his voice clearly strained. “It’s nothing you should worry yourself with.”

Xie Lian frowns, because of course—he does worry.

“I didn’t know ghosts struggled with such things,” he admits, his brow creasing.

“Any wounds after death will heal, of course.” Hua Cheng murmurs, biting back the taste of blood. “It’s the ones that killed you that linger.”

The mere sound of that makes Xie Lian’s stomach sink. “...Is it still bleeding? Do you need me to—?”

Then again, he has no idea what sort of injury killed Hua Cheng, and it seems disrespectful to ask.

“No, no...” he shakes his head. “It's just...”

It hurts sometimes.

(Though what Xie Lian could not possibly know is that it hurts all the time. Every moment. An ever lasting kind of ache, the bittersweet kind of longing that is only soothed by the prince’s presence.)

Hua Cheng’s eye closes for a moment. “...What made you ask that?”

Xie Lian glances up, horribly distracted by the prospect of the Ghost King being injured. “What?”

“...If we had met before,” Hua Cheng explains, watching the look on the crown prince’s face. “I’m curious.”

And it isn’t exactly a denial, either.

“...You knew Qi Rong was involved, just from hearing the circumstances from me and Lang Qianqiu.” Xie Lian murmurs. “Which means you knew that he had a motive that connected him to An Le and the rebels from Xianle...”

Meaning—he likely knew exactly who Qi Rong was as a mortal. His connections to Xianle—and by extension, Xie Lian.

There are very few people left these days who know anything about Xianle. Most of those stories have been lost to time.

And he knows that Hua Cheng is close to his own age, having recognized Lang Ying's illness immediately.

Which means there is a decent chance that Xie Lian met him during his mortal life. Or, during his first ascension as a god.

It would certainly explain why he feels so at ease with Hua Cheng. Why they get on so well.

But Xie Lian can't think of who he would have been.

The prince can't imagine he would have forgotten meeting someone like Hua Cheng— yet, at the same time, he can't recall having met someone who would fit his description that could still be wandering the earth.

There are mitigating factors, of course.

Hua Cheng could have been younger—it would be difficult for Xie Lian to find resemblance between a youth and a grown man through touch alone, and he's never seen Hua Cheng clearly.

And, he lost his eye after he died, so that can't be taken as a clue either...

"As usual," Hua Cheng murmurs, his eye remaining closed. "His highness is clever. The plan seemed his style—and I was already aware of his connections to Xianle. Was that the only reason you asked?"

Honestly?

No.

Xie Lian asked, because...

It feels like Hua Cheng knows him.

He perceives Xie Lian's discomfort when others don't. Often guesses what he's thinking, or answers questions before the prince even needs to ask.

It's rare that anyone pays attention to him—and when they do, they're always... disappointed by what they find.

"...But you won't say whether or not we've met," Xie Lian mutters. "Which makes it sound like we have."

Hua Cheng's hands tighten on his shoulders, almost imperceptibly. "If the answer was yes, why do you think I wouldn't say so?"

Xie Lian falls silent, thinking.

"Either because you were hiding something, or because you couldn't say so," he concludes. "Those are the only options, really."

"And do you?" Hua Cheng questions, raising an eyebrow. "Think I'm hiding something, I mean."

"...I don't," Xie Lian admits.

Which really only means one of two things.

Either they really haven't met before, which makes Hua Cheng's silence baffling, or...

He really can't say.

But what would stop him from saying so?

None of it makes any sense—and the harder Xie Lian thinks about it, the more he...

"..." Hua Cheng watches him, expression strained, lingering somewhere between hope, and remorse. "Would it change very much, either way?"

He's trying to soothe Xie Lian for the fact that he's struggling to puzzle together an answer.

And it works—in part.

"...If you had met me back then, you might know..."Xie Lian starts, then stops, biting his lip.

"Know what?" Hua Cheng prompts gently.

The god turns his head away, clutching something hanging from his neck.

"...I'm not who you think I am, San Lang," he whispers.

There's a brief pause, then the Ghost King questions, "What do you mean?"

"I just..." Xie Lian swallows thickly.

It's terrifying, sometimes—to think that someone could see all of him. Every ugly, warped piece of himself that he's tried to hide away.

But it's also lonely, sometimes. To be so isolated, that no one actually sees...

"...You just...you shouldn't think of anyone as perfect, San Lang," the prince mumbles, wrapping his arms around himself. "You'll be disappointed."

He does that often. Hugging himself.

It wasn't something he used to do when he was young.

He never needed to, back then.

Hua Cheng is starting to notice it more and more often now.

And maybe he can't answer Xie Lian's questions. But he can do one thing.

"Dianxia..."

Hua Cheng's hands lift from his shoulders—and for a moment, Xie Lian fears that the ghost king is going to take a step back, but...

Just the opposite.

Arms wrap around his waist, pulling him in.

It's a gentle embrace, a cautious one, something that Xie Lian could have stopped.

He doesn't.

(He doesn't want to.)

It's a kindness, one that is likely being extended because the prince has been visibly upset throughout all of this, but...

"When did I ever say that you had to be perfect?"

It's a simple question, and yet—Xie Lian's heart is in his throat.

His lips press together tightly, and for a moment...he leans back into the embrace, even going so far as to turn his head, pressing his face into the ghost king's shoulder.

There's been so much happening lately, and he... Xie Lian feels hollowed out by it.

Since his ascension...those few days he spent with San Lang at Puqi shrine were the only moments he felt like he actually had a chance to take a break.

Since then, he was in the Crescent Moon Kingdom, then Ghost City, and now, this...

Almost like he can read Xie Lian's mind, Hua Cheng gives his waist a gentle squeeze, murmuring—

"Dianxia should get some rest, after all of that." Xie Lian nods, taking a deep breath.

He knows that he needs a break.

"...Thank you," he mutters.

Hua Cheng raises an eyebrow.

"...After all of that, I assumed his highness would be angry with me."

"No," Xie Lian mumbles, shaking his head, his cheek rubbing against the front of Hua Cheng's robes. "I didn't really like that spell you put on me—but the rest of it..."

The prince sighs heavily.

"You were right, and so was he." Xie Lian doesn't lift his head. "I needed to tell him. I was just...running away from it."

"I wouldn't call it that, your highness," Hua Cheng's tone is gentle, even though Xie Lian doesn't feel like he deserves it.

"...You wouldn't?"

"You were strategically retreating while contemplating your options."

"...For three centuries?"

"You were weighing your options very carefully," Hua Cheng replies breezily. Xie Lian's mouth twists, biting back a smile, and...

Laughter is muffled by the ghost king's robes.

"San Lang, you're—!"

There are people out there with laughter that slips underneath your skin, tugging at the edges of your heart until it aches sweetly.

Xie Lian has always been one of them, but his laughs have become such a rare thing. "—you're too generous with me..."

"Impossible," Hua Cheng replies easily, and Xie Lian...

He finally lifts his head, glancing up in the direction of Hua Cheng's face. "...Though—that wasn't what I was thanking you for."

"Oh?" The calamity raises an eyebrow. "Then what is it?"

"I..."

Xie Lian trails off, taking a breath. "What you said."

'When did I say that you had to be perfect?'

Hua Cheng arches an eyebrow, shaking his head. "That was nothing, dianxia—"

"No." Xie Lian cuts him off firmly. "I..."

He swallows hard.

"No one has ever told me that before."

And that makes him wonder how they could have possibly met before.

Because if Xie Lian had known someone like Hua Cheng, when he was a child— someone who would have told him something like that...

Fingers brush over his chin gently, guiding him to look up. Xie Lian would have been so much happier, if he'd had that.

Their faces are tilted toward one another, and Hua Cheng's expression is conflicted, as though he might want to say more, to do something more, but—

"I TOLD YOU!" A voice rings out. "I'm stronger in this form!"

Xie Lian jumps at the sound of Shi Qingxuan's voice, and Hua Cheng's eye twitches with annoyance. “HA! My luck was better too, you should have let me try this sooner!”

But who is with her—?

The two gods enter the cavern, and Xie Lian hears an all too familiar voice: “Your highness—”

Hua Cheng doesn’t move, but Xie Lian immediately steps away, only too familiar after the arrival of Lang Qianqiu before that it’s easy for those just arriving to… misinterpret what they see.

“Get away from him.” Feng Xin’s voice is low, firm, his bow drawn. Hua Cheng glances over at the weapon, slightly weary.

That one is dangerous, and the bolt of spiritual energy crackling against the thread could cause damage, if fired.

Of course, he would win. But it would get ugly.

Xie Lian seems to sense the same thing, staying between Hua Cheng and the others, holding his arms out, “Look,” he calls over, “this has all just been a huge misunderstanding!”

“We can discuss it when you’re safe,” Feng Xin mutters. “Come here.”

Xie Lian’s jaw squares with stubbornness. “I am absolutely safe, Feng Xin. I haven’t been in danger for a single moment.”

Hua Cheng’s expression momentarily softens.

“Now, put aside your weapons, we can talk this out—!”

But before Xie Lian can finish making his plea, he feels hands gripping him by the shoulders—and Hua Cheng pulls the god behind him. Gently, but firmly, standing before him with his arms crossed.

E’Ming, who has done nothing but tremble with guilt all night, goes deathly still.

Feng Xin’s eyes narrow as he begins to brace himself for a fight—but that’s when Shi Qingxuan speaks up, waving her whisk nervously.

“C-Crimson Rain! There’s no need for this! What happened to Paradise Manor was an accident, his highness had nothing to do with it!”

“Wh—?” Xie Lian blinks quickly, throwing his hands up, “I set the fire!”

“Yes, but I’m the one who blew it out of control!” Shi Qingxuan cries, throwing an arm over her face, “If you’re going to punish anyone, let it BE ME! Or my brother! He can pay you double the cost!”

“But San Lang already told me that—!”

“I haven’t even counted your emperor sending someone to spy on me,” Hua Cheng glares, easily shifting to block Xie Lian when he attempts to interfere. “So, there’s nothing to discuss.”

Xie Lian glances in the direction of their voices, and slowly, he begins to put it together.

They’re putting on a show for the people listening—but if Xie Lian allows them to do that, won’t everyone blame San Lang?

“...Stop pretending,” he frowns, trying to lean around him.

When Hua Cheng shifts in front of him once more, he frowns, leaning up on his toes to try and speak over his shoulder, and when that’s not enough, the god has to make a rather undignified hop, “You know San Lang was just trying to save me! Why pretend he did something wrong?”

“...Well,” the wind master tosses her hair, “everyone in the communication array already heard what they needed to, so now we don’t have to keep on.”

“I wasn’t pretending,” Feng Xin glares. He still hasn’t lowered his bow, his gaze fixed on the ghost king.

Shi Qingxuan ignores him for the time being, opting to explain things to the prince—

“Your highness, everyone was going to make a poor judgment regardless. Why not let it be of Hua Cheng, whom they had a bad impression of from the start? That way, there’s no harm done.”

Despite being the one blamed, Hua Cheng sounds pleased when he replies— “You get it.”

“Of course,” Shi Qingxuan grins, hands on her hips. “How would I, Lady Wind Master, be the most popular goddess and god in the heavens if I didn’t know how to work a group?”

Finally, she turns back to Feng Xin, who is still standing at the ready. "Are you going to put that thing down before someone gets hurt? Those two are clearly on good terms. Don't be stubborn, now."

Feng Xin doesn't look at her and he certainly doesn't respond. "...Come on now, don't be stubborn," Shi Qingxuan frowns.

That's when the idea seems to occur to her—and if Xie Lian could have seen the look in her eye, he would have warned her, but—

Instead, she lunges forward, pressing her chest against Feng Xin's arm, batting her eyelashes.

"Come on," She pouts, hugging his arm as she rubs her ample assets against his bicep, "I know you're a big strong man, but can't you put that down and talk it out?"

It's effective. But not in the most flattering way.

Feng Xin stares, the color promptly draining from his face.

Shi Qingxuan stares, trying to process that reaction, because she was sort of expecting his complexion to go in the OPPOSITE direction, but —

Feng Xin screams.

More accurately, he jumps three feet in the air, his cry blood curdling as his arrows disappear in a puff of smoke.

"THE FUCK?!"

When he lands, he doesn't do so gracefully, falling on his ass, scrambling away from Shi Qingxuan in a blind panic.

"D-DON'T YOU EVER DO THAT AGAIN! DON'T YOU DARE!!" He shouts, pointing a trembling finger in her direction.

The Wind Master stares.

"...Good god..." She frowns, tossing her hair in offense, but her gaze is somewhat distraught.

After all, Shi Qingxuan takes pride in being one of the most beautiful women in the continent, no—the world.

She looks to Xie Lian, vexed.

"...Did his mother get smothered to death by a pair of breasts before his very eyes when he was a child?!"

Hua Cheng lets out a snort that is poorly disguised as a cough, and Xie Lian sighs. "No, no—but he's always been like that, ever since we were kids..."

"I HAVE PERSONAL SPACE!" Feng Xin cries, now a solid five meters away from the Wind Master. "IT'S PERFECTLY NORMAL!"

"...He's like you with spiders," Shi Qingxuan mutters, crossing her arms. Hua Cheng arches an eyebrow, looking down at him.

"Spiders?"

Xie Lian becomes flushed.

"...That has nothing to do with this," he smiles awkwardly, "it's nothing—!"

Shi Qingxuan's voice cuts in, dry. "There's one on your boot."

"...eeEEAAAK!"

To which the crown prince promptly shrieks, leaping into the Ghost King's arms.

"AND YOU'RE TELLING ME NOW?!"

He shouts, kicking his feet while he clings around Hua Cheng's neck —

(The Ghost King caught him easily and without complaint.)

"...I lied," the Wind Master mumbles, staring at her feet. "Nan Yang hurt my feelings..."

Xie Lian pauses, dangling in Hua Cheng's grip.

"...Then why did you have to punish me for it?" He mutters, feeling somewhat betrayed.

Shi Qingxuan waves that off, not seeming particularly guilty. "Are you really suffering, your highness?"

He gawks in her direction for a moment before scrambling back out of Hua Cheng's arms.

Hua Cheng doesn't seem nearly as happy to let him go as he was to catch him—but he allows the prince to slip free without protest.

If Mu Qing were here, this is where he would likely make some sort of dry comment about how Hua Cheng didn't seem to be suffering either.

But he was only willing to help on the premise that he wouldn't have to deal with Feng Xin, because if he did—he would strangle him.

So, it was deemed better for Feng Xin to come, and Mu Qing to continue tending to Ming Yi in the heavens.

Point being: he isn't here.

For some reason, in spite of his swelling jaw, Feng Xin wishes that he was.

But—now that their weapons are set aside, Xie Lina chooses to address something more pressing.

"Feng Xin, listen—you know the Night Touring Green Lantern, Qi Rong?"

His former guard frowns. "...Yeah? What about him?"

Xie Lian grimaces, "...It's THAT Qi Rong."

It takes a moment for him to put it together, and when he does, Feng Xin's eyes widen. "...You can't be serious."

"I am."

"What kind of dumbass uses his actual name for that sort of thing?!"

But neither of them really has to continue on that vein, because they both know:

Qi Rong is exactly the sort of person that would do that. Nothing surprising there.

"...This place was his lair." Xie Lian sighs. "He ran off not long ago, with Lang Qianqiu going after him..."

"He is?" Shi Qingxuan perks up. He's shifted back into his male form now, clearly not wanting to trigger Feng Xin's phobia any further—or to take another blow to his ego. "I thought the prince was chasing after you, your highness. What happened?"

From behind Xie Lian, Hua Cheng shrugs. “He found out who the real culprit behind the gilded banquet was, and he took up pursuit.”

When Xie Lian doesn’t debate the claim, the other two Heavenly Officials practically sag with relief.

“Why didn’t you say so to begin with?!”

“...I didn’t know it was him,” Xie Lian admits. “San Lang was the one who figured it all out. That was why he brought us here.”

Feng Xin rubs his chin, processing that information, but Sh Qingxuan focuses on another matter.

“...Do the two of you know Qi Rong? You seem familiar.”

Both men grimace at the same time, and Xie Lian, with no small amount of shame, replies...

“...He’s my cousin,” the prince explains. “We both knew him well in our mortal lives.”

Shi Qingxuan’s eyes widen. “Really? Your actual cousin?”

When Xie Lian nods, the Wind Master hums, tapping his whisk against his chin.

“Your highness—you are such an interesting person,” Shi Qingxuan muses. “The martial gods of the south are your old pales, the martial god of the east is your former student...”

He glances around the cave, examining Qi Rong’s lair in earnest. “Night Touring Green Lantern is your cousin, and Crimson Rain Sought Flower is your...” He glances over his shoulder, looking from Feng Xin to Hua Cheng before settling on— “...sworn brother.”

That’s what he says, anyway—but there’s a suggestive undertone that makes it clear that isn’t what he means.

Hua Cheng raises an eyebrow while Xie Lian turns slightly pink, and Feng Xin, well—

He seems offended that a calamity would be his prince’s sworn brother.

“And you have me, the great Lord Wind Master, as your friend!” Shi Qingxuan concludes, doing a dramatic little twirl for effect. “What an amazing number of connections you have!”

Feng Xin, however, doesn’t seem to find that matter particularly important.

“If that’s true, your highness—you should report back to the Heavens and tell everyone. Not just to keep the emperor abreast of the matter, but to protect your reputation.”

Shi Qingxuan crosses his arms, sulking. “I’m surprised you can say the word ‘abreast’ without crying.”

Feng Xin gives him a sharp look. “Say another word about it, and I can have a talk with your older brother about what happened at the summer solstice celebration.”

Whatever that was, it must have been embarrassing—Xie Lian can feel Shi Qingxuan blushing from several feet away.

Hua Cheng interrupts their bickering, nonetheless.

“There’s no need for a facade, General Nan Yang. His highness isn’t a fool.”

(That’s debatable, but Xie Lian appreciates it anyway.)

“Why not just admit you’re rushing him back because you don’t want him in my company?”

Xie Lian frowns, looking in Feng Xin’s direction, shaking his head. “Oh, I...I’m sure that’s not what he means—”

“Because he doesn’t want you associating with the likes of me,” Hua Cheng concludes. “Isn’t that right, Nan Yang?”

Feng Xin’s reply is absolutely frigid.

“As long as you’re aware that he shouldn’t be socializing with ghosts and demons.”

Hua Cheng smiles, though he doesn’t immediately respond—and Xie Lian frowns, placing a hand on the ghost king’s arm.

“Well, I happen to like this ghost, Feng Xin. He’s my friend.” He points a scolding finger in the general’s direction.

“And even if he wasn’t—you should never judge a man by what he is, but who he is. You know better.”

The martial god freezes, somewhat crestfallen, and Xie Lian turns, making his way toward the cavern entrance.

Hua Cheng smiles, clearly pleased as he follows after him, and Feng Xin seems trapped somewhere between shock and sheepishness.

“Is your highness returning—?”

“No,” Xie Lian shakes his head. “There were a number of Qi Rong’s minions left behind. Someone has to deal with them.”

“Oh, your highness,” Shi Qingxuan walks by his side, his tone bright and friendly, “Nan Yang can deal with them. They’re flat chested.”

Hua Cheng doesn’t try to mask his laughter this time, and Feng Xin glares. “No, this is my cousin, I should deal with his mess…”

They step through the cave mouth, and Xie Lian feels a familiar hand on his arm. “There’s no need to bother with it, dianxia.”

Xie Lian frowns, about to argue, but— “Did you just open your umbrella?” He’s familiar with the sound by now. “Mmm,” Hua Cheng agrees.

Xie Lian allows himself to be pulled underneath, listening to the latter of a sudden downpour.

And with it, he smells iron—blood.

Shi Qingxuan flicks his fan open, shielding his face as he watches the storm of gore.

“You Ghost Kings really are amazing…” He muses. “I always thought the Crimson Rain would be a hideous sight, but there’s something about it…”

“Are you actually admiring it?” Feng Xin hisses.

He was caught in the open during the downpour, now finding himself drenched in blood.

“You can’t deny—it’s rather impressive.”

Suddenly, Hua Cheng is beginning to find that the company the Wind Master keeps makes more and more sense.

"There," he murmurs, snapping the umbrella shut. "It's been dealt with."

"...Thank you, San Lang." Xie Lian frowns, guilty. "You've already done so much—"

"It's nothing, gege." The Ghost King shakes his head, giving Xie Lian's shoulder one last Pat before taking a step back. "Go home and rest."

Xie Lian can't help but turn after him, sensing a portal opening. "...Will you go back to Ghost City?"

"Yes," Hua Cheng replies. "I'm assuming you will be returning to the Heavenly Capital, but," he turns his chin to look back at the god over his shoulder. "If you would like to return with me, you're welcome."

Xie Lian smiles, surprised by how...tempting that is.

"Next time," he promises. "I'll help you clean up the mess I left..."

"Ren Song already took care of that," Hua Cheng smiles. "All that's left is cosmetic touches. But you can sit back and relax, certainly."

Xie Lian arches an eyebrow, surprised by how swift that work would have been.

"...He really is an impressive young man," the prince murmurs, reaching out to catch Hua Cheng's sleeve, squeezing gently. "You've done very well with him, San Lang."

Xie Lian says that because he means it, but also...remembering how the mention of Shuo's brother seemed to weigh on him.

"..." Hua Cheng's lips quirk at the corners. "Thank you, dianxia."

"...I should be the one thanking you, after everything," Xie Lian frets. "I—"

Fingertips brush over his forehead, and he falls silent.

There's a tap at his forehead, so gentle, it gives the prince pause.

"You think too much," Hua Cheng murmurs, stepping back. As the portal closes behind him, he adds—

"Just keep doing as you like."

And with that, he's gone.

Xie Lian stares after him, remembering.

That night, in Puqi shrine, when Banyue tried to apologize to the ghost king—Hua Cheng didn't allow it.

'I didn't teach you magic for self defense.'

'I taught you magic so you would have the freedom to make your own choices.'

He wasn't just saying that, was he?

ARTWORK INSPIRED BY THIS STORY

Included with permission from the artist, do not reproduce or reuse for any reason

Shuo / Ren Song

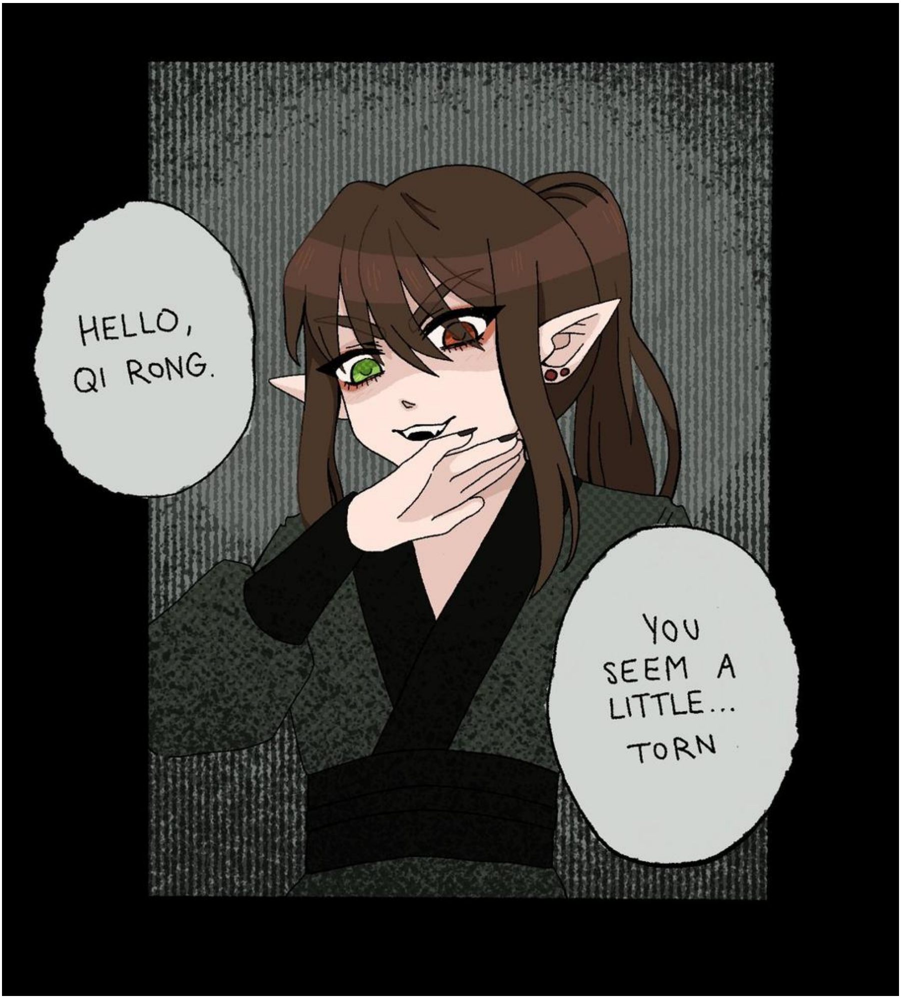
[image]

CREDIT: LACE

Shuo / Ren Song

[image]

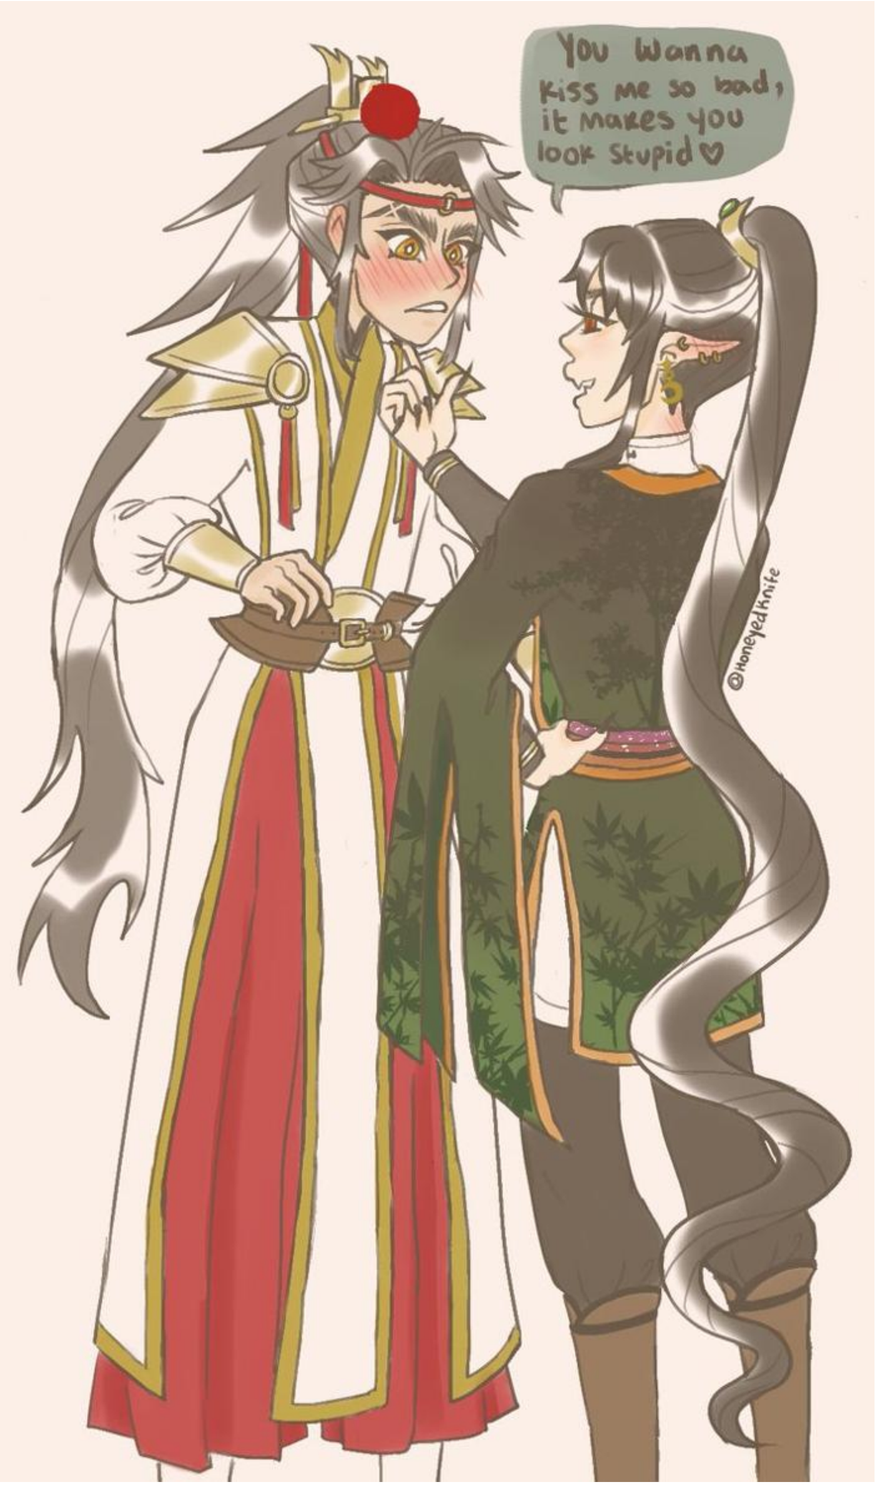
CREDIT: ENVY



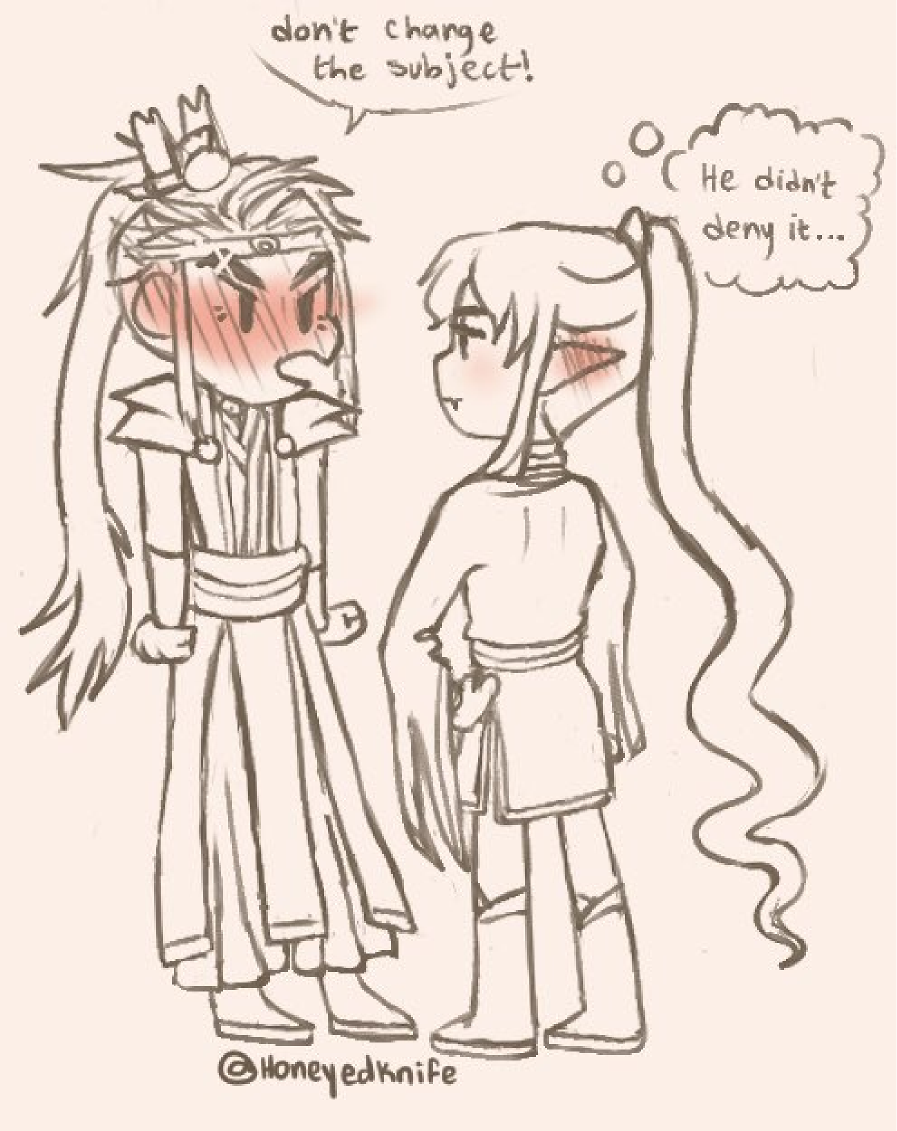
HELLO, QI RONG.
YOU SEEM A LITTLE... TORN

CREDIT: ASH

Shuo / Ren Song x Lang Qianqiu (Flirting)



You wanna kiss me so bad, it makes you look stupid ♡
@honeyedknife



don't change the subject!
He didn't deny it...
@HoneyedKnife

CREDIT: HONEY

[image]

CREDIT: SOCKS

CREDIT: YUE LING

Chapter End Notes

Thank you to Lace, Socks, Ash, Envy, Yue Ling, and Honey for their amazing artwork, and allowing me to share it!

xoxo, Evie

The Secrets We Keep

Chapter Summary

“I see.” The emperor replies. “Ling Wen, have your people investigate the matter. If that’s all, we’ll reconvene when we know more.”

There’s a smattering of voices as martial and civil gods begin to leave the hall, but before Xie Lian can make to join them—

“Xianle, you stay.”

The prince comes to a halt, not terribly surprised by that, but—

“And you as well, Lord Water Master.”

Chapter Notes

!! SERIOUS TRIGGER WARNING !!

This chapter contains a depiction of sexual assault, descriptions of past grooming, and domestic abuse. Please read with caution.

You do NOT need to read the sexual assault scene to understand the rest of the story. If you would like to skip it, skip from when Xie Lian leaves the Martial Hall in the first scene all the way to the large paragraph break, and there will be a summary at the end notes for the chapter for those who skipped. All relevant plot details will be included.

For those wanting to use the control + f function to skip to the scene after the assault, use the phrase, "When Xie Lian leaves the Heavens, he’s fortunate to avoid hitting any more clouds."

There will also be artwork linked at the end of this chapter that could be triggering to those who have survived sexual assault. No assault is depicted, but the aftermath is.

See the end of the chapter for more notes

Shi Qingxuan takes some mercy on Feng Xin, using his powers to blow most of the blood off of him, leaving him only mildly less stained, and the process of ascending to the capital once more actually goes rather smoothly, even if Xie Lian finds his thoughts drifting frequently.

To Lang Qianqiu, Qi Rong, and all of the rest.

What it could mean. Why all of this is happening now. And San Lang...

He's forced to give up that train of thought when they return to the Grand Martial Hall, and all eyes remain upon them.

"Xianle." Jun Wu muses, calm. "It's good to see that you're alright."

Xie Lian winces, apologetic. "I'm sorry for worrying everyone..."

"Not your fault," Shi Qingxuan assures him, patting his arm. "It's not like you asked to get swept off like that."

The god frowns, but bites his tongue.

"Was the crown prince injured?"

Mu Qing's voice is crisp, business like, and Xie Lian shakes his head. "No, but thank you for asking."

The martial god shrugs, crossing his arms, in too foul of a mood to allow himself to be seen as showing concern.

"It's my job."

"...Now seems like a good time to mention," Ling Wen speaks up, her voice carrying through the hall, "General Tai Hua has made contact, stating that the Crown Prince of Xianle is not the culprit behind the Gilded Banquet. He's in pursuit of the actual culprit now."

It makes sense that he would report that in, but Xie Lian can't say he enjoys the curious whispers echoing through the hall, half wishing he had taken up Hua Cheng on his offer to return to Ghost City.

"With that settled, I find there is a more pressing concern," Jun Wu muses.

“How Crimson Rain was able to breach the capital so easily. Who was on security?”

“...Me.” Pei straightens from where he stands beside Ling Wen, his jaw locked. “It was my lapse in judgment that caused this.”

He bows his head to the emperor, apologetic.

From his other side, the Water Master rolls his eyes, examining his fingernails for non-existent dirt.

“Leaving an injured man in charge of security seems like a bigger lapse in judgment.”

Xie Lian listens carefully, surprised that the man who forced his brother to remain silent in their last meeting would speak with such candor now, but...

Shi Qingxuan did say that Pei Ming, the Water Master, and Ling Wen were close friends.

That much seems true now, especially.

Jun Wu arches an eyebrow, looking at Pei. “General Ming Guang, do you wish to be relieved of your duties until you have finished recovering?”

The martial god shakes his head, casting Shi Wudu a pointed look. “No, your majesty. I have made no such request.”

“I see.” The emperor replies. “Ling Wen, have your people investigate the matter. If that’s all, we’ll reconvene when we know more.”

There’s a smattering of voices as martial and civil gods begin to leave the hall, but before Xie Lian can make to join them—

“Xianle, you stay.”

The prince comes to a halt, not terribly surprised by that, but—

“And you as well, Lord Water Master.”

That draws a note of surprise.

Xie Lian has never actually held a conversation with the god before. They have little to do with one another—

Why hold them both behind?

Both of the Heavenly Officials stand there in relative silence as the room clears out. Xie Lian, with his hands folded into the sleeves of his robes—curious, but relaxed.

Shi Wudu maintains a similar posture—but there's a defiance to it. His hip cocked, fanning himself, bored.

Xie Lian waits until the room seems relatively silent, murmuring, "Your majesty— there was something Xianle wished to discuss with you, but…it's of a rather sensitive nature."

Jun Wu considers that, resting his chin upon his hand.

"There is nothing you can say in front of me that you could not say in front of the Water Master," the emperor replies calmly. "He has my complete confidence."

Incredibly high praise, coming from the likes of him. Enough to even raise Xie Lian's brow, but…

It can't be helped.

"…Did you place Ming Yi in Paradise Manor as a spy?" He questions, keeping his head hung low.

Jun Wu's response is swift, lacking in any remorse. "The Water Master did, upon my orders." Shi Wudu remains silent, watching with a sharp gaze. "I thought you might ask about it."

Well, that certainly explains why he was kept behind.

Still, Xie Lian's brows remain raised. "I wasn't under the impression that Lord Water Master was involved with reconnaissance."

"Let me say it like this," Jun Wu muses, watching the two younger gods standing before him.

His expression is that of satisfaction.

"Xianle solves the mysteries that lie before us," the Emperor explains, his eyes remaining on the younger of the two—

"…And Shi Wudu keeps our secrets."

They make quite a pair, standing side by side.

Shi Wudu's gaze cuts over to Xie Lian, taking in the sight of him when compared to his own stature.

They're the same height, the same build. Though, due to his status as a martial god, the Water Master suspects Xianle's body is slightly more athletic than his own.

His hair is lighter in color, and styled differently–but similar in silken texture.

As for his eyes, that similarity would be impossible to discern–no one has seen what they actually look like in eight centuries.

But Shi Wudu is certain that Jun Wu remembers them well.

"If you should ever need the Water Master's assistance going forward," Jun Wu carries on, watching the two with satisfaction, "feel free to ask. He is at your disposal."

Xie Lian is somewhat sure that a proud god like Shi Wudu wouldn't be pleased to be at anyone's 'disposal.'

"...That's very kind," he mumbles with a polite smile, nodding in the Water Master's direction. "Of course, if you need my help for any reason, the same goes to you."

But when he returns his focus to Jun Wu, his expression is somewhat strained with worry.

But there's a response to his question that catches Shi Wudu's eye.

"...About San Lang," he starts, then corrects himself, "I mean–Hua Cheng, you know he didn't mean any harm, right?"

Jun Wu's eyes widen sharply.

He isn't a particularly expressive man. Not usually.

But now, his eyes are heated and narrowed, filled with emotions that Shi Wudu has never seen in the man's face. Not in his four centuries in the Heavens.

Anger. Pain. Resentment, and...to the Water Master's shock, a hint of guilt. But he works to rein that in before he replies.

"...Of course, if Xianle thinks that, I trust his insight into Crimson Rain's intentions." The emperor replies with a smile that seems a trifle forced, not that the intended recipient would ever know it. "But you should be wary of him, your highness. And of Blackwater as well."

Shi Wudu watches without saying a word, as the Heavenly Emperor rises from his throne, moving forward to stand before the prince of Xianle.

“It takes an immense amount of pain and suffering to become a ghost king,” he explains quietly. “For those two who have emerged from Mount Tonglu—it defines who they are.”

Xie Lian can’t speak to Blackwater’s state of mind, he knows nothing about the man— but it doesn’t line up with what he’s seen of Hua Cheng.

“...And what about the other Ghost King?” He questions. “He didn’t come from Mount Tonglu, did he?”

It’s rare that Xie Lian can speak of Bai Wuxiang. The mere memory of the damage that was done makes it near unbearable.

It takes Jun Wu a moment to answer, and when he does—he does so quietly. “Love can make a monster out of anyone.”

What an odd thing to say.

Though Xie Lian supposes that it’s true.

Love made a monster of him, once. Or rather—grief, the loss of it.

“You have had a trying few weeks,” the emperor sighs. “You should rest. The Palace of Xianle is being examined after the break in, but...”

He shrugs. “You’re welcome to reside in the Imperial Palace for as long as you need.”

“Oh,” Xie Lian’s eyes widen slightly. “That’s kind of you, my lord—but Xianle could never impose. Besides, this humble scrap god has matters to attend to in the human realm. But thank you.”

“Are you certain?” The Water Master speaks up, and there’s something about his tone that Xie Lian doesn’t have a word for, but...

It’s tense.

“No one would question you wanting a rest.” Then, his timbre becomes more recognizable—annoyed. “Some of us are too foolish to rest when we're told to."

He must be referring to Pei Ming, in that case.

"Oh, I'll rest," Xie Lian assures him with a smile. "But I would rather do so in my own shrine. I'm sure you understand."

The Water God lets out a soft 'tch.'

"I don't understand why you would want to slum it," he mutters, snapping his fan open, holding it in front of his face. "But to each their own."

His tone is condescending, of course—and it doesn't betray the emotion lurking in his gaze:

Anxiety.

Xie Lian smiles serenely.

"Oh, I don't think of it that way—and I should be thanking you," he murmurs, bowing his head to the Water Master. "Your younger brother was invaluable during our mission, and was valiant in his attempt to rescue me—even if I didn't need saving."

Shi Wudu's fan does not lower.

"...Thank him, then," he mutters, his fingers tightening their grip around the spiritual tool, the whiteness of his knuckles betraying his uncaring attitude. "That has little to do with me."

"...From the way Lord Wind Master described it, you were the one who raised him."

Xie Lian shrugs. "Not to mention the one who taught him cultivation. He's clearly a well brought up young man."

"..." Jun Wu can't see his expression, the fan hides that.

But it softens, ever so briefly.

Even the coldest, proudest of men have their points of weakness.

"Thank you."

Xie Lian smiles in assent, bowing to them both. "I'll be going, then—and thank you, your majesty, for hearing me out. I'll be returning now."

He turns to make his way from the room, and the Water Master goes to follow, but...

"No," Jun Wu murmurs softly. "Stay."

Shi Wudu goes still, his shoulders hunching as Xie Lian makes his way out the doors of the Grand Martial Hall, watching as they slowly click shut.

Caging him in. "...What is it?"

Jun Wu leans back on his throne, crossing his legs, leaning his chin against his palm once more.

"You know," He muses, taking on a far more relaxed posture, "him, I understand." He nods in the direction from which Xie Lian just disappeared. "Pei isn't particularly complicated. Even the likes of Mu Qing and Ling Wen aren't hard to figure out, if you watch closely. But you..."

Jun Wu arches an eyebrow. "You're trying to pick a fight with me, and I'm curious as to why."

Shi Wudu faces away from him, his posture tense.

"That scenario never ends well for you."

It never has. The scars have healed, but the water god can still feel them.

Every day.

"...I don't know," he mutters, lowering his fan. "Poor impulse control, I suppose."

"...Of all of the diseases I thought you might catch from that dog," Jun Wu sighs, "Impulsivity was never one of them."

The Water God's empty hand balls up into a fist.

"Are you sure you aren't the one that's trying to pick a fight with me?" He asks quietly. "Or is that just petty jealousy?"

"Ah," the emperor smiles, shaking his head with a fond chuckle. After all these years, his Water Master can still make him laugh. "Let's be realistic, darling," he rises to his feet. "It wouldn't be a fight. At best, you could accuse me of toying with you. But I am curious…does he know?"

Shi Wudu won't turn to look at him.

"…See, I was telling Xianle the truth," the emperor smiles. "So many secrets…"

Shi Wudu knows what he's doing.

Antagonizing.

Because then, he'll snap. Then, the emperor can pretend he was provoked. He knows that, and still.

"You're just angry because your precious Crown Prince of Xianle would prefer to sleep in a broken down shrine than your palace."

That sends the smirk dropping from the Emperor's face, and Shi Wudu —

He's angry.

People call him proud. Condescending. The 'Water Tyrant,' but none of them ever know.

There is a constant, boiling anger underneath his skin. One that stems from pain.

"And by the way," he turns around, his eyes narrowed into a harsh glare, "What secret have I been keeping from him, exactly? That you have a proclivity for younger men who just so happen to idolize you?"

Jun Wu doesn't react, but the rage in Shi Wudu's chest is cresting. For so many years, it felt as though he was lucky.

Lifted higher than the others. Favored. Like the weight of his sins came with an equal reward.

"How old was he when he ascended? Seventeen?" Shi Wudu's tone turns cutting. "How old was I, when you came to me?"

And back then, it didn't feel like something was happening to him. Shi Wudu's childhood ended when his parents died.

He saw it happen. Felt the last vestiges of naïveté stripped from his heart when he watched the life fade from them.

It was normal, after that, for him to have to do things that children shouldn't.

To make decisions that should not have been up to him. Fight battles that he shouldn't have had to. Face things he wasn't prepared for.

Shi Wudu lived in a world of adults.

It wasn't strange to him when Jun Wu treated him like one.

It never occurred to him that he was, in so many ways, still a child.

"You say that as though anything inappropriate happened at that time," Jun Wu raises an eyebrow, but his tone was cold.

"I simply saved your brother's life, as I recall."

"No," Shi Wudu shakes his head, his gaze narrowed. " I saved my brother's life. All you did was show me the method."

And while nothing happened when Shi Wudu was seventeen... It wasn't long after that, when things began.

Shi Wudu was so, so happy back then.

So proud, to have such an important man's attention.

So determined to be worthy of it.

"And this anger against Pei..." The Water Master sighs, crossing his arms. "What's the logic behind it? What, did you think we were lovers?"

"Are you two lovers now?" Jun Wu questions. "That would be somewhat contradictory, don't you think? He's also much older, and he had his eye on you the moment you ascended."

Shi Wudu's lips twitch, and in spite of everything—he's pleased. "Did he really?"

Jun Wu glares.

Of course, it was different.

Foremost, Shi Wudu didn't notice. Pei was friendly, helpful—but more of a friend than a mentor.

When he did notice that the general was attracted to him, it was centuries later. Shi Wudu was a powerful god in the Heavenly Court in his own right.

And the reason that Shi Wudu noticed—that was because he had begun to feel that way too. Had begun watching his friend closer, to see if that same desire burned in his gaze.

Pei might be a flirt, but he never began making advances until Shi Wudu's own glances began to linger.

It was slow, and easy. Then quick and terrifying, but he never once wanted it to end. And that isn't what he has with the emperor.

"If you wanted to have me in public, or take me as a consort, you could have done that years ago." The Water Master points out, his tone frigid. "I would have agreed to it."

In an instant.

In the beginning, Shi Wudu was enchanted by him. Dazzled by the power. The attention. Craving stability.

"But you didn't—probably because, among other things, people would have raised eyebrows at it." The Water Master shrugs. "And now, you act like a jilted lover."

"Oh, come now," Jun Wu's eyes flash, and his tone turns somewhat condescending. "Is that what this is? Resentful that I took you to bed without asking your hand in marriage? Is that what it takes to keep your legs shut to other men?"

The mere implication behind his words makes Shi Wudu flinch with annoyance.

"As much as you might want to," Jun Wu steps down from the dais, his footsteps echoing throughout the hall. "You can't revise the past, just because it doesn't suit your narrative. You know that."

He stops in front of the water god, reaching out to touch his cheek, watching those sapphire eyes glare back at him hatefully.

So, so beautiful.

If Jun Wu had a weakness for anything, it would be a person's eyes.

They tell so much, and hide so little.

Shi Wudu hadn't wanted marriage back then. The emperor knows, even if he never said so.

Because he didn't want to give anyone reason to think he had risen by Jun Wu's favoritism alone.

And he only brings it up now as a means of justifying an affair with... Pei, of all people.

"...You know," he murmurs, his eyes fixed upon Shi Wudu's, "I normally don't mind it when you challenge me. I often like it. You have always known that."

So few are proud enough, egotistical enough, to raise their voice to Jun Wu. There's something enjoyable, exciting, even, about arguing.

"...But I wasn't in the mood for that today," Jun Wu concludes. "You must have been aware."

Shi Wudu would beg to differ. Forcing him to sit through that conversation with the Prince of Xianle felt like being antagonized. Like Jun Wu wanted him to lash out—

"Now, my mood has changed. I think..." His fingertips lift from his cheek, and Shi Wudu feels the back of his neck go cold. A feeling that spreads down his limbs, his chest, until his body feels almost numb. Detached from him. "That I'd like you to be quiet, now."

Shi Wudu opens his mouth, planning on making some sort of sarcastic response, but...

A single sound doesn't come out.

Just a weak, hoarse sound. Too faint to even be a whimper.

His vocal cords are locked, frozen in place by magic.

"Always acting like you're trapped..."

Jun Wu mutters, glaring down at him. "Like I'm some hideous monster forcing a life of power and privilege down your throat."

The younger god glares back at him, fighting against the spell—to no avail. "You have never come close to seeing me angry. Did you know that?"

He slowly circles the god, his eyes narrowed.

“And after the things you’ve done…”

Jun Wu’s voice echoes in his ears, weighing Shi Wudu down. Making his shoulders tremble.

“How dare you act like a victim?”

He steps close to the Water God’s back, leaning down to whisper in his ear.

“Why don’t you pray to him, hmm?” The Emperor murmurs, his breath fanning across the side of his neck. “I haven’t stopped you. Go on. Ask him to help you.”

But he knows—Shi Wudu won’t.

Even if he was willing to put Pei in further danger by pitting him against the Emperor. Even if he thought it was possible that Pei might win—

That would require admitting to the things he has spent centuries fighting to hide.

Fingers brush his hair back over his shoulder, and when lips press against his throat, the Water God cringes, wishing desperately that someone might walk back through that door. That someone might see them like this, but—

“I have never forced anything on you.”

Jun Wu murmurs against his skin. The touch is gentle, but it rings with a subtle violence.

“But clearly, you need to learn the difference.”

Shi Wudu’s eyes widen, and his stomach plummets.

“Start walking.”

He makes no effort to move his legs—but still, they obey.

The spell is powerful, locking him in like a marionette.

Jun Wu orders him to follow him to the imperial residence, and he does. Demands that the Water Master strip himself bare, and he is obeyed.

In some ways, it doesn't feel that different from how it's always been. All the emperor has done is strip away the illusion of choice.

This feels like a more naked version of events. As though they've finally stopped pretending that one of them wanted this.

Ever since he was a child, Shi Wudu has been good at going somewhere far away in his head.

At pretending that certain things weren't happening to him. They were happening to someone else, and he was far away. He was safe. And it didn't hurt.

He's dragged back when Jun Wu orders him to stop with the tears, and the Water God's eyes go dry in response.

He's dragged back when he's ordered to move positions again. When he's told to smile. To be grateful for it.

With each forced return to reality, his mind scrambles to get away. To become blissfully blank, until it's over.

And it is over, eventually.

With the emperor sleeping, sprawled across his bed—having taken what he wanted.

With the water master curled on his side, arms cradling himself like tape cordoning off the scene of a crime.

Eyes staring at the wall, blank and hollow.

There are things no one tells you.

That sometimes, there's no one to pray to.

No one to ask for help, when the one who is supposed to answer those prayers is the one that's hurting you.

He sits up slowly, his body numb, robotic.

It hurts, but that feels removed from him. Distant, somehow.

Hair slips over his shoulder in an ebony curtain, obscuring the blood that lays beneath.

For a moment, he contemplates returning to his own palace—

But he can't.

Shi Qingxuan would notice something was wrong.

For the same reasons, Pei's home isn't an option either.

There's nowhere to go.

Something glints in the moonlight, catching his eye.

The Water Master's eye follows it, finding something sitting on top of the cabinet against the far wall.

Something all too familiar, by now.

A dagger.

"…"

Shi Wudu's head tilts to the side.

His footsteps pad silently across marble floors, so accustomed to this sort of pain, he doesn't limp anymore.

The steel is black. The engraving is intricate. A dragon curled around it's hilt. And, etched into the blade—

'The God Slayer.'

He lifts it up, fingers steady.

It's heavier than it looks, sitting solidly against his palm.

Shi Wudu lifts it before his face, dragging his fingertip along the edge, a small cut forming on the pad of his index finger, watches the blood bead up with quiet fascination.

It doesn't heal, dripping down the side of his finger, one drop landing on the floor beneath his feet.

Slowly, his attention turns back to the emperor, sleeping just halfway across the room.

And for a moment, it seems so easy.

Just to walk a few feet over.

To lean over him.

To stare at the pale column of his throat, fingers tightening around the grip of the dagger, and imagine it gushing with red.

Imagining what it would be like, for all of it to be over.

How his life might be different, if he wasn't constantly forced to dance in the palm of someone else's hand.

Then, imagining becomes yearning, and it grows inside of him, swelling until he can't stand it anymore.

Painfully aware of the limits of his chains. And he wants out.

It's so close.

So painfully close, that he'll find himself screaming with frustration later. Remembering the way the blade kissed the emperor's skin. That he was one flick of the wrist away from freedom, but—

But then, those eyes snapped open. Jun Wu doesn't even flinch.

"Oh?" He arches an eyebrow, surveying the Water Master with a curious gaze. "I didn't know you had it in you."

Shi Wudu grits his teeth, his wrist trembling slightly, but he forces himself to remain steady. "You know I do."

"To kill someone, yes..." The emperor smiles faintly. "But you'll never give up all of this."

For a moment, Shi Wudu thinks he must be referring to the twist, garbled mess of whatever it is that lies between them, but...

Jun Wu's expression sharpens.

"Go ahead," he snaps his fingers. "I won't stop you."

At first, Shi Wudu thinks Jun Wu means to allow him to slit his throat, but—

All the sudden, a wave of exhaustion sweeps over him—and it feels like a heavy weight has suddenly landed on the back of his neck, drawing him down.

"Didn't you hear me?" Jun Wu murmurs. "Go on."

Then, there's another snap of his fingers—and Shi Wudu's wrist becomes so heavy, it slams down to the floor, dragging him down with it.

"Y—You..." The Water Master struggles, trying to regain his bearings, "What are you —?!"

But when he looks down, he falls silent.

Sitting there, around his wrist, is the familiar pattern of a cursed shackle.

"That's two..." Jun Wu muses, looking him over. "How about a third?"

Of course, the Water God opens his mouth to protest, but...

Snap!

Just like that—the world goes dark.

"Go on." Jun Wu repeats the word, his tone cold as he watches the Water Master blink, disoriented as he struggles to regain his bearings. "You want out?"

He must, given how frantic his movements are.

"You know you don't need me to take them off for you. You know how."

That reminder makes Shi Wudu go still, staring blindly into the dark.

He's never felt more alone, than in this moment. Never felt more helpless.

It's hard now, to imagine living that way for eight centuries.

Still, he doesn't say a word, he just...

Does the harder thing.

"...I'm sorry," he croaks, his shoulders slumped, head bowed with...submission.

An agonizing thing, for a man so prideful.

"Will you be trying that again?"

The shackles tighten before he can answer, making him sink to the floor with a pained cry.

“N-No...” He gasps.

Jun Wu is sitting up now, bare chested, hair slipping over his shoulder as he smirks down at Shi Wudu, the moonlight illuminating one half of his face.

The other remains in darkness.

“You could get rid of them yourself,” he reminds him once again, lips twisting into a smile.

“But you won’t do that, will you?”

It’s never a real option.

“You won’t give up the power and privileges I have given you, will you?”

Jun Wu can’t put cursed shackles on a mortal, or a ghost.

Only a god.

And the easiest way to escape them?

Renouncing that godhood.

It’s a cage to which Shi Wudu holds the key.

He doubts Jun Wu has made the same thing clear to Xianle. The prince seems like the type who would have relinquished his godhood long ago, if he knew that he could.

But for Shi Wudu, it isn’t a real option.

He can’t leave.

He could never leave Shi Qingxuan behind.

And if he did, he would have to explain.

The Water Master would rather die, than force his brother to live with the truth. Would rather suffer, day in and day out.

Jun Wu wasn’t wrong.

Shi Wudu keeps their secrets.

But no matter how much power he has—

Living like this will never be a privilege.

Snap!

The weight disappears from his wrist and neck, light creeping back into his eyes, and he trembles, gasping, limp on the floor.

The emperor pours himself a glass of wine.

“I’ve kept every promise I ever made to you,” He muses. “Haven’t I?”

The Water Master doesn’t reply, curling up on the floor. Doesn’t move.

“Your brother has lived the last four hundred years in luxury and happiness, has he not? Your reputation has been without blemish.”

Luxury. Reputation.

Those things used to matter so much to him.

“And I think now, after that little outburst,” Jun Wu tilts his head, sipping his wine. “I’m starting to understand where all this is coming from.”

Shi Wudu very much doubts that.

“Do you know,” He sits back against his headboard, staring out across the darkness of the room. “I’ve always believed that fate can connect us through our lifetimes.” His wine has a bittersweet taste. “Don’t you?”

The water master feels muddled. Lifetimes?

“I’ve been around for so long—longer than any of you realize—I’ve actually encountered quite a few souls that I used to know. Over and over again,” he muses, twisting the cup between his fingers, watching the water slosh back and forth.

It shifts back and forth between wine at his command. Easily transmuted. Light then dark. Bitter, then sweet. Burning, then tasteless.

“It takes some time, to learn to recognize the similarities. They’re subtle. And of course—it's impossible for you to remember, but I do."

If you were to ask Jun Wu—he would tell you that some things about a soul never change.

He is fairly certain that the Prince of Xianle, for example, would have been stubborn. In every single lifetime.

"I suppose it makes sense that fate would bring you back to me…"

His eyes drift down to where the Water Master lies on the floor in a heap, his hair covering his face in a dark, silken curtain.

Obscuring his eyes. The masculine shape of his shoulders.

Now, it's easy to imagine a different face. Different eyes. A different body.

"…I don't know what you're talking about," Shi Wudu croaks, his voice hoarse.

"Of course you wouldn't," the emperor agrees. "And that makes it all the more ironic."

And it makes his cruelty to the younger god all the more justifiable.

It makes even more sense now, that he would try to kill Jun Wu with that blade.

The blade that she forged, so many years ago.

"But you know, I did keep something," the emperor tilts his head, lowering his glass from his lips. "Open that chest over there and take a look."

The Water Master doesn't move at first, so the emperor gives him a gentle nod in the right direction. "Go on."

"…" Slowly, reluctantly, Shi Wudu rises to his feet, legs wobbling as he walks to the corner of the room, where an ancient, stone chest remains, lifting the lid.

There are many things in the chest that seem utterly foreign to him. Weapons. Ancient artifacts that he can't even begin to recognize.

What seems to be a child's toy, a stuffed fox.

And sitting on top of it all, is a wooden box. One inlaid with gold. An beneath the glass—

A butterfly.

Silver. Wings tattered from so many years having gone by, despite careful preservation.

A beautiful display. But there's something hideously sad about the sight of it. It feels like a reflection of Shi Wudu's own situation.

"That was the first gift I gave you."

The emperor explains.

The first of many.

And in the end, she turned every single one of them into a source of pain.

Into a curse.

But when Shi Wudu stares down at that box, he feels something very different.

That Jun Wu is wrong.

Somewhere in the cracks and crevices of his soul, Shi Wudu knows that he isn't the soul who was given this box.

It feels utterly unfamiliar to him. Cold, poisonous underneath his hands. It's impossible to know one's past lives, of course. That isn't how it works.

But there are brief moments of familiarity. Where you think you might have felt something before. Done something. Met someone.

Shi Wudu has felt that. But never with Jun Wu, and certainly not with this box. But he supposes that might be fair.

After all, this all happened because of his own choices.

His decision to switch his brother's fate with that of someone else.

It makes sense, in the end, that he should be punished for someone else's choices. That he should be switched, in a sense, with someone else.

"Now," Jun Wu sets his wine glass down, watching Shi Wudu's back. The bruises he left there. "Come back to bed."

For a moment, the god doesn't respond—and the emperor smirks.

"You are far too intelligent to be such a slow learner, my dear."

The choice is clear.

It isn't up to him.

None of this has ever been up to him.

But it's better to go willingly than it is to be forced.

So, he does.

Climbs back into those sheets. Into those arms.

Lets him take what he wants with no struggle.

And Jun Wu has always been a taker.

He takes, and he takes, and he takes.

Until everything feels numb.

Inside and out. Like Shi Wudu is a tapestry that has been pulled apart at the seams, until only a pile of threads remain.

When the emperor sleeps again, he doesn't dare reach for that blade a second time.

He doesn't dare go home.

Doesn't dare seek out the one place where he has always felt safe.

He stands in the streets of the Heavenly Capital, empty in the night. Robes rumpled. Hair loose.

And it all feels so ridiculous. Even among gods, he is powerful.

His wealth is unmatched.

Few people in all three realms have ever risen so far as he has.

But now, at his lowest—

He has nowhere to go.

He finds himself leaning against one of the pillars that lines the street, examining his wrist.

Remembering the shackle that sat there. His lips twist into a bitter smile.

He, amongst the most powerful gods, in that moment, feels the desire to pray to one of the weakest.

And yet—

‘Do you think I would ever treat Xianle the way that I treat you?’

That’s the misunderstanding in all of it.

‘Do you think he would ever allow himself to be in this position?’

Shi Wudu has always been far weaker than him.

But in this contemplative silence, considering praying—

Shi Wudu actually hears one.

A prayer.

It’s been many years since he listened to one personally.

His deputies handle that now. It’s rare that Shi Wudu’s head is ever quiet enough to hear, but—

‘L-Lord Water Master!’ His throat tightens. ‘Please, help!’

When has he ever been able to help anyone? What has he ever done, besides causing damage?

Besides breaking things?

What good has he ever done?

‘I don’t know if you can hear me,’ the voice pleads. That of a young man, no older than a teenager. ‘I don’t—I don’t have any money to offer, but my little sister—she’s —!’

The Water god pauses, listening closely.

‘I can’t stop them!’

In the mortal realm below, a young man struggles.

Wrenching at the arms holding him back, trying to get free.

To get to her.

“L-LET HER GO!” He cries.

“G-gege!” The young girl whimpers, her eyes wide with terror. “H-Help me!”

They booked passage on this vessel weeks ago.

To escape the economic downturn in the north. The chaos that has been brewing for years now.

The plan was to go South, so he could cultivate under the clan in Yunmeng. It would be quieter there. A better place to raise his little sister.

But now, it seems they won’t make it.

The fall of Yong’an led to lawlessness across the plains.

The seas were no exception.

They had barely been on voyage for more than a day before their vessel was taken by pirates.

They already killed the ship’s captain and crew, along with most of the other passengers.

But, as foul men often do—they left the little girl alive. The only girl on the entire ship.

And now, her brother can do nothing but watch. Fighting as hard as he can, while the others hold him down.

“GEGE!”

“I—” He chokes, thrashing as the rain begins to fall down.

A storm is rolling in rather suddenly, it seems. It was perfectly clear only a few moments ago.

“I’M HERE, I WON’T—” He bites one of the hands holding him down, fighting with all of his might. “I WON’T LET THEM—!”

But he knows, in his heart, that he can't stop it.

He's prayed to every god he can think of, but he has nothing to offer—and he doubts any of them will answer. Not in time to help them.

One of the men holding him down snickers, glancing up at the brewing clouds in the sky, the sea slowly beginning to churn underneath them.

It's funny now, how unpredictable the weather on the ocean can be. Storms of violent nature brewing up—often out of nowhere.

"Your gege is brave," he comments, smashing the young man's face down against the planks of the ship deck. "But weak. There's nothing he can—"

BOOM!

The lightning strike so sudden, so powerful, it knocks many of the nearby men off of their feet. And with them, go the ones who were holding the young girl down.

"The hell kind of storm is th—?"

BOOM!

The entire sky flashes white, crackling with power. Now, there's a figure.

Standing in the center of the deck, long, dark hair whipping around in the breeze.

"S...Say," one of the pirates mumbles, leaning close to his companion. "W-Where did he come from?"

The stranger's face tilts up, sapphire eyes sparking with every flash of lightning.

Normally, it's not an odd thing for a stranger to appear in the middle of such a confrontation, drawn in by the noise.

It is odd, however, when you're on a ship.

"W-Who—?"

A voice cuts clearly through the sound of the storm, low and cold.

"You dare attack my worshippers?"

Scattered, frightened whispers echo among the group of pirates.

A god?

A god is here?

For what? These insignificant children?

And who—?

While they seem confused, the little girl is not. Sitting up, her tears mixed with the rain.

"L-Lord Water Master!" She croaks.

The men around stir, fright starting to permeate the are.

It's—

It's the Water Master?

The little girl scrambles to his side, hiding behind his robes, trembling like a leaf. "I said," the figure repeats, "you dare to harm my worshippers?"

"We...my lord, we didn't know—!"

CRASH!

Another bolt of lightning strikes the water nearby, briefly blinding them, sending the men holding the little girl's brother to the ground stumbling.

Now that he's free, he immediately rushes to her side, holding her in his arms.

"Gege!"

Shi Wudu turns his head, looking over the port side bow.

They're a few hundred meters off the shore. He can see a human city, twinkling in the distance.

"...Get off the ship."

It's a quiet demand, not spoken in anger, and—

It’s directed at the children.

The elder of the two stares up at the water god, his mouth hanging open with shock.

“I…She can’t swim, we’ll—!”

“You’ll be alright.” The Water Master murmurs, not casting so much as a glance their way. “Get off the ship.”

The teenager swallows thickly.

The sea is churning violently below them, but…

There really is no other choice.

Cautiously, with his sister in his arms, he makes his way to the side of the ship, taking one more anxious glance.

‘You’ll be alright.’

He bites his lip, and his little sister tugs at his sleeve.

“We’ll be okay, gege.” She whispers, still shaken and pale from what happened before, but—

A god is here to protect them.

They slip over the side, and instead of plunging underneath the waves—they land gently on top of them.

The water feels as solid as stone.

And when the next wave rises, it carries the two on top of it, swiftly carrying them back to shore.

“M-My lord,” one of the pirates whispers, dropping to his knees. “W-We had no idea —”

“Of course you didn’t.”

Shi Wudu tilts his face back, looking up into the sky.

That’s what humans do, when they think no one is watching.

When they think there are no consequences for the destruction they cause. When they know their prey is too weak to fight back.

They unleash the very worst of themselves.

The lack of consequences is their justification.

It turns exploiting the weak into a fact of life. Into justice.

Shi Wudu has used those justifications himself before, when he harmed others.

And in this moment, he wonders—

How many children have prayed for salvation, going unheard?

Not realizing that those same cruel men often ascend as gods too. "We—we didn't mean—!"

BOOM!

Thunder crashes again, almost like it could shatter the sky above.

Shi Wudu doesn't care what they meant. Doesn't care what they thought.

For a moment, the pirates think the sky has gone completely black, swallowing up all light, but…

It's water.

A wall of water, rushing towards them faster than the helmsman can respond.

A wave so tall, it shrouds the moon and stars above, even the lightning flashes can no longer be seen.

There are screams of course, pleas for mercy.

Prayers that go pointedly unanswered.

Shi Wudu has sunk many ships before.

He doesn't even flinch when the wave slams into him, obliterating the ship—and the mortals remaining inside. Reducing it to nothing but splinters.

Swallowing the remains, dragging them down, down, down, lost beneath the sea.

The wave dissolves back into the ocean itself, leaving one figure standing on its surface.

‘Gege?’

He can hear him there, in their private communication array, his tone slightly strained with worry.

‘Where are you?’

The Water Master sinks to his knees, his head in his hands.

The storm rages around him with no sign of letting up anytime soon.

If anything, it intensifies into a small hurricane, reflecting the raging inside. Can’t go home.

Can’t get out.

Can’t tell the truth.

CRASH!

From the shore, two children watch the lightning flash.

Shi Wudu clutches his head in his hands, wishing that the pirates would stop screaming and begging.

“LET ME GO!”

They’re dead already, why won’t they just stop—?

“WHY WON’T YOU JUST LET ME GO?!”

Oh.

That’s him.

He’s screaming.

The children can’t see the god who saved them, shrouded by the storm.

The raging winds and crashing waves that push him further and further out from everyone else. Cold words and arrogant stares given physical shape and form.

‘Shi Wudu keeps our secrets.’

That wasn’t true.

Shi Wudu keeps Jun Wu’s secrets.

And now, alone in the storm, he doesn’t know what he’s protecting anymore.

Not himself. Not Shi Qingxuan.

But by the time he sees the bars of his cage clearly, by the time he finds the key—

It will be too late.

And the Water Master will drown.

When Xie Lian leaves the Heavens, he’s fortunate to avoid hitting any more clouds. It would seem that, even without his sight—it’s really more about controlled posture than it is about aim.

Still, he doesn’t land where he intended. Rather than the hills below Puqi Shrine…

He finds himself standing on a mountain. A familiar one at that.

It’s been over eight centuries, but he knows it by the smell of the trees. The taste of the air.

The occasional broken swing he finds on the path.

Mount Taicang.

It’s been so many years since he returned here.

He used to come more, early on in his banishment. Less, as time went on.

Now, he doesn’t think he’s returned since he burst from that coffin two centuries ago. The path is familiar—but overgrown.

He finds himself forced to use fangxin to cut branches and brambles free, making his way to the top of the hillside.

Part of him is glad not to see the ruins where his greatest temple once stood. Sitting at the peak of 'the Summit of the Crown Prince.'

Not because he hasn't accepted his fall in rank in position. Heavens no, Xie Lian accepted that long ago.

It's hard, because he remembers how proud his father looked, when the temple was first built.

And it's that pride turning to disappointment that hurt him the most.

There's a well that sits among the ruins and rubble. Long since dried up and abandoned. Hardly something worth noticing—

To those unaware of what lies beneath, anyway.

It's a simple matter to throw one's legs over the side and slip down to the tunnel below.

His boots land with a heavy thud against the mud, barely sinking down as he reaches out, palms pressing flat against the bricks making up the side of the well, fumbling until he finds—

Ah, there, the handle.

It pulls open with a heavy screech, dust drifting through the dark.

If anyone actually knew that there was a mausoleum for the royal family of Xianle beneath the hillside of Mount Taicang, it would have been robbed long ago.

After all, diamonds and other jewels still glitter across the ceiling.

The monarchs who are buried here still wear the silken ceremonial robes that they did in life.

It feels strange sometimes, being here. As though he's treading the echoes of a life that no longer belongs to him.

The God Pleasing Crown Prince feels like a fictional character.

This beautiful, shining ideal that people look up to, but...

It’s not real. It’s not him.

And when he comes to the end of the royal tomb, the resting place for the last King and Queen of Xianle…

The god sinks to the ground, pulling his knees up against his chest.

“…Hi, Mom.” He mumbles, resting his chin against his knees. “Hi, Dad.”

Sometimes, in the dark, it still feels like they’re hanging over his head.

“…I’m sorry I didn’t bring anything,” He mumbles, hugging his legs a little tighter. “And I’m sorry it’s been so long.”

Really, it might be true that most sons don’t outlive their parents by as many years as he has, but really? Three whole centuries?

It’s disgraceful.

“…I ascended again,” he always leads with the good news. He knows they would have liked that. “Third time’s the charm, right?”

He bites his lip, tilting his head down until his cheek is pressing against his knees, and he shrinks into an even smaller ball.

“I’m doing much better now,” he adds, his voice small. “I’m eating plenty, so don’t worry. I saw Feng Xin and Mu Qing, by the way—they’re doing well.”

That would make his mother happy, he knows.

She was always so happy, seeing the three of them together. Even towards the end, she…

Xie Lian takes a deep breath.

“…And I saw Qi Rong again,” he mumbles.

He’s already come here and confessed to what he did before.

There’s no need to beg for forgiveness now. And even if there was—he wouldn’t actually be sorry.

“…He’s hurt a lot of people,” the prince admits, staring in the direction of his mother’s grave. “And I’m…not sure how I should deal with him. I don’t…know what to do.”

It’s not like they’ve ever answered him. Their souls moved on long ago. They don’t hear his words now.

But still, there’s comfort in coming here, and talking through the things that he doesn’t understand. Pretending that someone is listening.

Like praying, but more sincere.

It’s been so long since someone was willing to just sit around and listen to him talk— this feels as good as any other heart to heart.

That is, until he hears something. Quiet sniffling.

Not from him, but...

From inside his mother’s grave.

“...” His heart stutters. “...Mom?”

For a moment, some paranoid part of him wonders, but... The closer he listens, his heart sinks.

There’s a heartbeat. Quiet, but quick—terrified, like that of a small rabbit. And the tone of the breaths and sniffles—

They’re that of a child.

But what is a living, breathing child doing in his mother’s grave?

Are there grave robbers here? But if there were, why bring a little child with them?

Then, from the corner of his eye—he sees something that explains everything.

A glowing aura. Acidic green.

...Him.

“...You aren’t welcome here.”

Xie Lian’s voice is low. Frigid.

This is a place for members of the Xianle royal family.

A family that Qi Rong no longer has the right to call himself a member of.

“Why would you even come?”

There’s a pause, then a snide reply—

“Paying my respects to the man and woman who raised me, of course.”

Xie Lian makes a low noise of disgust in the back of his throat.

‘Raised’ is an exaggeration.

They fed him. Clothed him. Housed him. He was treated well.

But they weren’t his parents.

“...And you brought a human child here to do that?” The prince mutters, caught somewhere between exasperation and exhaustion. “What, was your plan to eat him?”

“...Maybe,” Qi Rong drawls. It’s not his usual voice. More like that of the human that he’s wearing as a skin.

“Kids are useful, y’know?”

“And you left it in a coffin,” Xie Lian retorts, his voice ringing with disgust. “Did you just decide at some point that you were such a failure at being good, that you would just overachieve in the opposite direction?”

There’s a shocked pause—and finally, a slightly manic giggle.

“You know,” his cousin grins, watching as Xie Lian moves to lift the lid of the coffin so he can pull the child out, “I suppose I should feel flattered that no one else gets to see this side of you. Just your cousin!”

And of course, Xie Lian knows what side he means.

The part of him that’s still capable of being condescending, angry, and cruel.

Though he doesn’t know if it counts as cruelty, when Qi Rong isn’t capable of the same thoughts and feelings of an actual human. He never has been.

But when he lifts the child out of his mother's grave, he feels that side boiling up to the surface. Coming just as quickly as it hides away.

Because—

There was too much free space inside the coffin, for a child to be able to hide successfully.

And at first, Xie Lian can feel the truth creeping up on him. The slow, dawning realization. Like a prickle on the back of his neck.

But he doesn't want to believe it. No matter how horrible Qi Rong might be, he— Xie Lian doesn't want to think he would do that.

The first time he asks, his voice is calm.

"...Where is my mother's body?"

There's silence at first. That, Xie Lian can live with.

What he can't stand is the jeering, sadistic little giggle that slips out.

"...WHAT DID YOU DO WITH HER BODY?!"

The child in his arms flinches and cringes with shock—and Xie Lian can barely bring himself to care, setting him down before he turns on Qi Rong, trembling with rage.

"Oh, there's no need to be so dramatic! Auntie is still there, just...in a different form!" He cackles.

Xie Lian doesn't want to know what he means. has a sick, twisting feeling in his gut, but he doesn't want to confirm it.

Still, he has to.

And when he reaches into the coffin, feeling the pile of ash underneath his fingertips, all he can think to say is—

"She was kind to you." It's true.

The Queen of Xianle probably showed Qi Rong more kindness than the boy ever received in his life. Never raised her voice to him, or treated him unfairly.

And this was how he repaid her.

“...But you remember what you said, don’t you?” Qi Rong hums.

He’s standing against the wall, watching every flash of pain and rage in Xie Lian’s expression with glimmering satisfaction.

“Back when you killed me?”

Xie Lian bows his head, and he grits his teeth.

“You said she didn’t love me. That her kindness was given out of guilt.”

Qi Rong taps his thumb against his chin. “Shouldn’t I hate her, then, for treating me so falsely?”

But Xie Lian knows that isn’t why.

Qi Rong doesn’t hate Xie Lian’s mother. And even if he did, he wouldn’t have done this to hurt her.

Because she’s gone.

No, he...

He did this to hurt him.

Because he didn’t want Xie Lian to even have a body to pay respects to.

“...What I said about your father before,” Xie Lian mutters, not looking up from the grave. “That really got to you, didn’t it?”

Qi Rong pales, then glares. “You think—?”

BAM!

The punch comes so swiftly, the ghost doesn’t even have time to flinch before he’s slammed against the wall.

And this time, in the mortal shell he’s using—blood begins to pour down his chin. “You’re too weak to hurt me directly,” Xie Lian snarls, holding him down.

He always has been.

Like a jackal that will only attack a calf when it’s been separated from the herd. Weak, and cowardly.

“So, you did this, right?”

Mutilated a corpse. That of his own aunt. And over what, indignation? As if he has a right to be indignant.

What a joke.

Xie Lian pulls his fist back, striking him over and over again. Until Qi Rong is laughing with childish glee as he slumps back, and Xie Lian hears the child from before crying out with terror.

“D-DON’T HURT MY DAD!” He cries.

Then, the choice of a human skin makes sense.

It makes sense, as much as it hurts.

(And it hurts so much, it feels like he can hardly breathe.)

Still, he laughs.

No matter how many times Xie Lian hits him. No matter how much anger he puts behind the blows.

“S-See what I mean?!”

“DAD!”

He can’t stop. He won’t, he—

“YOU’VE ALWAYS BEEN LIKE THIS!” Qi Rong cackles, blood pouring from his chin, staining his teeth. “EVEN WHEN EVERYONE THOUGHT YOU WERE PERFECT, YOU WERE ALWAYS LIKE THIS! I SAW YOU CLEARLY!”

His teeth come together with a click, and…

Xie Lian can’t listen to it anymore.

The hand gripping Fangxin rises up, and the laughter reaches a fever pitch.

“HA! HAHA! TOLD YOU SO, TOLD YOU SO!! COUSIN CROWN PRINCE IS A MONSTER, JUST LIKE ME!”

He won’t.

“DON’T, MY DAD—!”

He won’t.

“ENOUGH!”

Xie Lian knows that the person Qi Rong admired once, the figure he loathes now with so much passion—

None of that was real. It was all fake. Shrouded, pretending to be perfection. But—

‘When did I ever say that you had to be perfect?’

CLANG!

Finally, the blade comes down. But memory is a funny thing.

Something that you often learn not to trust, or find less reliable in the present, simply blaming your own lack of recall.

But sometimes, memories are far more honest than you might think. Sometimes, within memory—

We find who we really are.

ARTWORK INSPIRED BY THIS STORY

Included with permission from the artist. Do not repost or re-use for any reason.

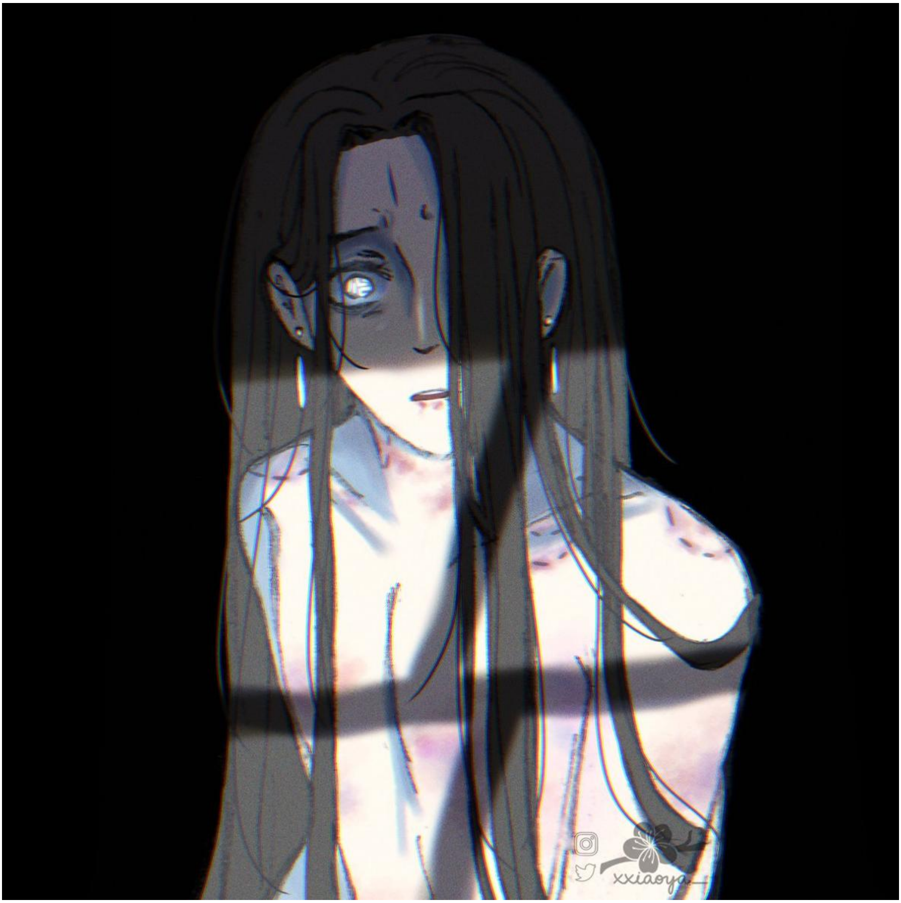
CONTENT WARNING: DEPICTIONS OF THE AFTERMATH OF SEXUAL ASSAULT + ABUSIVE RELATIONSHIPS

Shi Wudu + Jun Wu

[image]

CREDIT: SEONG

Shi Wudu (the aftermath + the cursed shackle)



CREDIT: PRI

Chapter End Notes

SUMMARY OF THE TRIGGERING SCENE: Jun Wu sexually assaults Shi Wudu. In the aftermath, Shi Wudu gets a hold of the God Slayer and attempts to kill him, only for Jun Wu to stop him and place him under cursed shackles, mirroring Xie Lian's. He taunts the Water Master, and reminds him that he can escape if he chooses to renounce his godhood. Shi Wudu gives in, and Jun Wu removes the shackles. Distressed and unable to reach out for help, Shi Wudu assists two mortal children who happened to be praying to him at the time, saving a young girl from being sexually assaulted, and slaughtering the pirates who captured them.

Origins

Chapter Summary

> Long ago, on the central plains, there was a Kingdom known as Xianle.
>
> Vast in land and resources—with four great blessings:
>
> Beautiful women. Vibrant music and literature. Wealth beyond compare, and most of all…
>
> Their Crown Prince, who pleased the Gods.

Chapter Notes

> You can find me on twitter and keep up with current updates of the story HERE

See the end of the chapter for more notes

824 YEARS PRIOR

Long ago, on the central plains, there was a Kingdom known as Xianle.

Vast in land and resources—with four great blessings:

Beautiful women. Vibrant music and literature. Wealth beyond compare, and most of all…

Their Crown Prince, who pleased the Gods.

But before his ascension and the war that followed, before the infamous parade on martial Avenue…

Around the feasting hall, the nobility raises their glasses, cheering over the sound of the music.

“TO THE CROWN PRINCE!”

…he was a child, just as any other.

Young lords and ladies dance throughout the palace, fireworks shooting off overhead.

After all, their queen had not only safely given birth to a healthy baby —but also a male heir.

No small task.

A string of failed pregnancies had haunted the Royal Family of Xianle for years.

Much of it was blamed on the King marrying an older woman, the sister of a childhood friend—reducing the years in which they could safely have children.

But now, the Royal bloodline is secure—and the kingdom rejoices.

The Queen sits fair above the feast, on the Royal dais. Reclined on a chaise sofa—in theory, so she could watch the celebrations below, but…

She can't seem to take her eyes off of the child in her arms.

Propped up against her knees, eyes wide as they take in the sound and the spectacle.

"Should he really be so quiet?" She murmurs, pushing his hair away from his face, gently tucking soft brown curls behind his ear.

The Queen had only thought the newborn would be able to tolerate such a party for a few minutes, at best—but he's been content to be among all of the sound and commotion for hours.

The King smiles, pressing a kiss against her forehead.

"He's happy to be with his mother," he assures her. "As am I, always."

His wife bites back a smile, her tone slightly scolding. "You flirt, here? In front of all of your subjects—!"

She's cut off with a squeak when he kisses her, softly, sweetly.

"With my Queen, yes."

She smiles into it, her heart softening.

"With the mother of my child, always."

Mother.

Her chest warms as he pulls away, and she looks down at that little face once more.

She's a mother, now.

"...My sweet little Xie Lian," she croons, leaning down to press her lips against his forehead, holding him close. "Welcome," she whispers as the little boy coos in response, pressing close to his mother's warmth. "We're so happy to finally meet you."

The King watches his family fondly, not caring for the feasting or the celebration. Only for her, and the child in her arms.

But still—Xie Lian is not a child like any other. He is the Crown Prince of Xianle.

And as such, there are traditions to be followed.

Representatives from around the continent, showing gifts from kingdoms far and wide to congratulate Xianle on it's new heir.

Trays laden with gold. Yards upon yards of silk. The finest of horses. Rare treasures from far and wide—

But the man at the end of the line has no gift. And he's a slightly peculiar fellow.

Dressed in white robes, holding himself with an air that seems far beyond his years— he doesn't seem a day over twenty—and with ivory hair, trailing down his back.

One of the guards steps before the royal family as he approaches. "Hold it!"

The Queen smiles, shaking her head. "Relax, General Feng. Allow the poor man to introduce himself before you're up in arms..."

The general frowns, somewhat reluctant—but takes a step back under his Queen's command.

"Approach."

The young man smiles, grateful. "Thank you."

When he reaches the Royal dais, he bows deeply, hands folded before him.

“It has long been tradition for a chief cultivator from one of the local sects to give a newborn prince his first fortune reading,” the ivory haired man explains. “I have come to offer my services.”

The king is familiar with such a tradition—after all, a cultivator from the local sect told his fortune after his own birth, so he nods. “Very well, go on.”

The cultivator bows his head, approaching the Queen’s side. The child in her arm is slightly small, born a little early.

But there’s already a mess of hair upon this head, a warm shade of brown, fluffy in texture, falling before his eyes.

And when Mei Nianqing bends before the child, examining his small palm, gaining the details of his birth—

He smiles.

The Queen watches him, cautious.

“...Is it good?”

“Well,” the cultivator looks up. “He was born under a cursed star, but,” he holds one finger up before the child’s parents can react, “this is not a reason to panic.”

The king stares, his brow furrowed with worry. “...Forgive me, priest—but it sounds worrisome.”

“No, no...” Mei Nianqing shakes his head. “To be born under a cursed star only means that one’s fate will have great impact on the world. This doesn’t necessarily mean it will be good, or bad.”

“Oh,” the Queen lets out a shaky breath of relief, holding Xie Lian closer. “Is that all it says?”

“...He will have to work very hard,” the cultivator cautions them both, “and it will not be easy—but he will shine brighter than any other.”

That small, flushed little face cracks with a tired yawn, pressing his face into his mother’s dress.

“...It won’t be too hard, will it?” The King smiles, laughing with a hint of nerves. “He’s only three days old, priest.”

"...I see many trials," the cultivator admits. "But the signs say he will endure them all, and rise past it. For he has the greatest blessing of them all."

The King and Queen raise their eyebrows in unison, and Mei Nianqing smiles.

"Your son will be adored like no other. Praised from one end of the horizon to the next. But he will have one great love of his life—one that will carry him through any hardship."

After all, no matter how far we fall—it is the ones who love us most who catch us, in the end.

"...Well," the Queen smiles, pressing her forehead to her son's. "I can't wait to meet this great love of yours, my darling."

There's shouts for another round of song—more fireworks.

The kingdom rejoices from one end to the other—and that night, they light countless incense sticks in the temple of the god the King and Queen prayed to for a successful pregnancy.

The Heavenly Emperor, Jun Wu.

Now, with eager excitement, they watch their little prince grow.

But...

"YOUR HIGHNESS!"

Excited peals of laughter echo through the imperial gardens.

"SLOW DOWN!"

...sometimes, growing up is quite a process.

"Just a little further!" The seven year old exclaims, stretching his fingertips up high overhead. "I've almost got it!"

He makes one well placed jump, stretching out as much as he can, but... The butterfly flutters just out of reach, darting back over the palace walls.

And the prince, naturally, goes tumbling back down to the ground in a tangle of hair and silk robes.

“OW!” He cries out, rolling over, pulling up his robes to reveal a skinned knee.

Maybe, some day, the prince of Xianle will be a great warrior, and a scratch like this will be forgettable.

But for now, his lip wobbles, and his eyes well up with tears.

“MOM!”

The Queen sighs.

“My darling, what have I told you about jumping like that?” She murmurs, leaving the table set up by the koi pond to hurry to his side, checking his knee. “You’re lucky it’s just a scratch!”

Her son pouts, eyes pricking with tears. “But I just wanted to catch it!”

The Queen sits back, exasperated. “Catch what, my love?”

“The butterfly!” Xie Lian exclaims, staring at the palace walls reproachfully. “I just wanted to say hi!”

The Queen thinks that over, kissing the cut on his knee to mollify him.

“...Well, butterflies belong in the sky with their mothers,” she explains, leaning up to kiss his nose, “and my baby belongs down here, with me!”

That finally draws a happy giggle from him, banishing all thoughts of skinned knees and butterflies, cuddling closer in her arms.

“...And,” she adds, and from her tone, Xie Lian’s giggling has already stopped, “it’s time to go inside anyway.”

“...Mom!” The prince whines, pulling back. “I already finished my lessons for the day!”

“You did,” she agrees, “and I let you play—”

“Only for TWO HOURS—!”

The Queen can’t help but laugh, pulling her son to his feet as she leads him back inside. “You say that like it’s no time at all!”

Xie Lian’s pout deepens as he drags his feet. “It went by so fast!”

“Well,” she smiles, ushering him down the hall. “It’s a big day.”

The prince huffs, his hair sticking out in every direction. “But my birthday already happened!”

“Xie Lian,” his mother shakes her head, “that isn’t the only important day of the year!”

“I know!” He blinks. “But it isn’t the mid autumn festival either!”

“Silly boy...” She sighs. “Have you already forgotten about the ceremony?”

Xie Lian pauses awkwardly, a sheepish grin spreading across his face as he shakes his head. “Haha...nope! Definitely not! I practiced!”

The Queen shakes her head.

Heavens, what is she going to do with him?

“But, you went and got yourself all messy, which means...” She trails off, and her son groans miserably.

It means he’ll have to be bathed all over again.

Xie Lian doesn’t actually mind looking fancy. He enjoys it—

It’s the process of getting there that he despises.

Being shoved (gently placed) into a tub of freezing (carefully heated) stinking (scented with lavender oil) water, scrubbed raw (with the softest of sponges), and forced to sit perfectly still while the servants fuss over his hair.

The entire thing takes an hour!

But by the end of it he is freshly cleaned, dressed, hair pulled up into a gleaming ponytail, topped off with a head piece of gold and pearl, holding onto his mother’s hand as she leads him back down the palace corridors.

“What if I don’t like him?” The little prince mumbles.

“You will,” his mother assures him. “You like everyone.”

Xie Lian pouts. That isn’t necessarily true.

He doesn’t like the royal gardener at all. He’s too tall, and his mustache is scary. “What if he doesn’t like me?”

Before the Queen can answer, Xie Lian is swooped up.

“Everyone likes you,” his father assures him, settling the prince upon his shoulders. “How could they not?”

“Darling!” The Queen scolds her husband as her son giggles happily, placing his hands on top of the King’s head to steady himself. “We just got him cleaned up!”

“And he’s still perfect, my love, don’t worry,” the king assures her, holding the prince up on his shoulders as they stride into the throne room.

Inside, a rather formal assembly is waiting for them.

The entire imperial guard, along with the commander of the armed forces.

He stands at the very front, his hands resting on a young man’s shoulders.

“Stand straight, boy.”

And of course, the child does, his expression horribly serious, because he knows—this is the most important day of his life.

The first day of the only job that he will ever have.

The door opens, and the entire world seems to shrink down to one small moment.

When the King and Queen enter the room, a boy striding between them.

Dressed in robes of white, red, and gold. Glittering jewels in his hair—and a smile that shines like the sun.

“Attention!” The guard is called to a salute, and the boy in front moves in perfect tandem with them, his eyes forward, even if he’s slightly pale from the nerves.

“Now,” the king kneels down behind his son, hands on his shoulders, “you remember General Feng, don’t you?”

Xie Lian nods, his eyes slightly wide.

The captain of the armed forces has always been a rather intimidating figure. Bulky and mustached.

But he isn’t as scary as the gardener. He gave Xie Lian a piggy back ride once.

“Hello…”

The General bows deeply, kneeling before him. “It’s an honor to see you again, your highness—may I present my son, Feng Xin.”

The boy before the general is taller, which is to be expected—he’s two years the prince’s senior. With sun kissed skin and dark hair, pulled up neatly.

And his expression— It’s so serious.

“As of this day forth, he is to be your personal guard and sword brother, until his final breath.”

The crown prince nods, rocking on his heels slightly—until he notices everyone staring, and he jumps to attention, clearing his throat.

“Do you, ah…”

He holds out his hand, trying his best to look rather serious. “Do you promise to do all that stuff?” His mother sends him a disapproving look, and he tacks on—

“Protect me forever, and everything?”

(She’s certain now that he didn’t practice his lines at all.)

Regardless of the slightly bungled delivery, Feng Xin sinks to one knee —

(Unlike his prince, he was practicing all morning.)

—takes his hand, and kisses it. He was personally a little embarrassed when his father told him that he had to—but rules are rules.

“I promise!”

Xie Lian smiles, standing still, being very graceful and dignified (for a whole five seconds) before the boy rises back up to his feet, and then he's back to being a small ball of barely contained energy, thrumming with excitement, having realized something—

For the first time in his life...

"Wanna see my room?"

He gets to be around someone his own age.

Well. Not exactly his age, Feng Xin is nearly ten. But close enough!

The newly vested guard hesitates, looking to his father, who simply shrugs.

"If dianxia likes, you may go."

Xie Lian beams, turning and running off down the hallway, and after a moment of being too stunned to react, Feng Xin chases after him.

"Wait up, your highness!"

They'll spend the afternoon with Xie Lian going through his things, going through all the toys they can now share.

Then, he realizes that might sound a little babyish. After all, Feng Xin is an older kid. Maybe he'll think this sort of thing is stupid, but—

He listens intently, trailing after Xie Lian like a newfound shadow.

It's never lonely anymore.

Far away, in a kingdom to the North, a far less heartwarming scene is unfolding.

CRASH!

A golden chalice crashes to the ground, spilling wine across the rug—ancient, expensive, and this stain won't come out.

"Qing Yuan! Control yourself!"

“HOW CAN YOU ASK ME THAT NOW?!”

The young woman paces the room like a wounded animal, dark hair loose around her shoulders.

A gorgeous young lady. Desired across the city for her poise, her mind, and her talents.

Now, she’s gone pale, deep circles edged beneath her eyes. She looks to her parents, wrathful.

“I hope you’re both happy,” she hisses, her hands trembling by her sides. “I married that pig for you! And now, the minute he gets back from Xianle, he’s going to...”

She trails off, covering her mouth with horror. She can’t look at the crib in the corner. Can’t bear the thought.

“Darling,” her mother frowns, fanning herself awkwardly. “I think that’s rather uncharitable of you, to assume he would reject the child...”

Of course, it’s easy for her to say.

She’s wearing the earrings Qing Yuan’s husband paid for. The carriage they arrived here in was a gift

Of course, she’ll give him the most generous interpretation. He provides the lifestyle of luxury and comfort that her family has always craved.

An old, near forgotten line of nobility, desperate to feel the trappings of wealth once more.

“He will,” Qing Yuan mutters. “Because he is greedy, and stupid—and he is cruel. He’ll take one look at the boy, decide he’s deformed, and—he’ll...”

He won’t want to live with the shame.

“Funny...” Qing Yuan’s sister speaks up now, leaning over the child’s crib.

He’s an interesting little fellow.

Even with the red eye—which she admits, is unsettling to look at—he has a cute face. Chubby cheeks and all that. Inky black hair sticking in every direction.

“…I would have thought he would be more upset about the fact that you gave birth to a fully formed child after…”

She pauses, tilting her head. “How long has it been since your wedding? Six months?”

If that.

Qing Yuan flushes, but she doesn’t say a word.

It doesn’t help matters that the child looks nothing like either one of them—other than having his mother’s hair. That’s it.

“Furthermore, wasn’t he born under the star of solitude?” Her sister muses, reaching down to poke at the baby’s cheek.

He giggles, unaware that he’s the subject of such strife, reaching to grasp at her hand with his little fingers.

“…What of it?”

“I thought, for a child to be born under such a star…it meant his parents would have to love one another deeply,” she muses, glancing up at Qing Yuan, eyebrows raised. “Am I to take this to mean that you’re actually in love with…how did you say it? Your ‘stupid, cruel, and greedy’ husband?”

Qing Yuan doesn’t answer, and her father lets out a heavy, exasperated sigh. “Why didn’t you say something before we finalized the match?”

“…Because I didn’t know,” she mutters, wrapping her arms around herself. “I wasn’t sure, not until…”

She gave birth so early. To a strong, healthy child.

“…And what of the child’s actual father?” Her mother groans, picking at the pearls around her neck, already using a tone of distaste when she references the matter. “Could he be of some use? Or do you not know who it could be?”

Qing Yuan’s lips turn up into a wry, slightly bitter smile.

“You know, with such a warm, supportive mother figure like yourself, it’s a shock that I was so desperate to find affection in others.” She murmurs, turning back to the liquor cabinet. “A real fucking head scratcher.”

“Don’t blame your mother for your mistakes—”

“I am telling you,” their daughter glares, gripping the edge of the table tightly, “that my son, your GRANDSON, is in danger. And all you care about is calling me a whore?! Ha!” She pours herself another glass of wine. “Unbelievable.”

“That’s why she asked you about the boy’s father,” her own father intercedes with a frown. “Do you think he could help?”

“...” Qing Yuan is quiet for a moment, staring down into her wine glass. “...No,” she mutters, downing it in two swallows. “I can’t ask him.”

“What, is he really that much of a cad?” Her sister mutters, still watching the little boy play with her finger in his fist, blinking up at her curiously. “You think he wouldn’t help the child?”

“...He would,” Qing Yuan shakes her head. “He’s an honorable man. But...”

“But?”

His help would come with a price.

Involving her child in a world that she wants to keep him away from.

“...I can’t ask him,” she repeats, shaking her head.

“Well, that limits our options.” Her mother frowns. “Couldn’t we just...give him to a well-to-do family for adoption?”

“No,” Qing Yuan shakes her head vehemently. “We can’t do that, either.”

“But—”

“You screamed, when you looked at him in his crib,” she mutters, holding her glass tightly. “My husband is likely to have him thrown from a window on sight. I can’t trust anyone else to...”

She’s the child’s mother. She loves him. She’ll protect him.

Qing Yuan can’t trust anyone else to do that. The world is cruel. And —they'll only ever see him as one thing. One deformity.

Maybe the affair was a mistake—but she won't abandon him. Not now, not ever.

They eventually come to the settlement: they'll tell her husband that the baby came early, only to be stillborn.

Her son will be taken into her parents' household as a ward. To be raised in relative comfort, invisible. There's even discussion of sending him to Xianle, but...

"I knew you were going to run," her sister makes the comment later, when she finds Qing Yuan throwing together a pack later that night, working under candlelight. "Where will you go?"

"...Mother and father were going to send him away the moment they had the chance," she mutters. "I'll make my own way."

After all—she'll have to lay low for a few years. She has no doubt her husband will make a show of looking for her—he loathes to be humiliated.

There's a noble family near Qinghe. The eldest son is...open minded, and a friend.

He won't care that one of his concubines has a child. And while her son grows, she can fade into the background.

It's not a terrible plan. If she's lucky—she can make it work.

"...I always did admire that about you, you know." Her sister sighs, glancing over at her nephew. "So self possessed. Independent. Determined to do everything on your own. I was jealous of you, really."

Of course, she could hardly be jealous of her now, in this predicament.

She understands.

"But you were also far too proud," her sister concludes. "If you hadn't kept it a secret for so long, I could have helped you, jiejie."

"...Yes," Qing Yuan mutters, pulling her pack together. "And your comments earlier were extremely helpful."

"I was angry with you for not at least telling me," the younger woman admits. “And mother and father were never going to believe that your husband could kill an infant without adequate justification. But…” She glances down at the boy one more time. “Do you think…the eye is some sort of curse? Are you…in more danger than you think?”

“…No.” Qing Yuan lifts the back over her shoulder, shaking her head. “It’s no curse.”

She walks to the side of her crib, reaching down to touch the side of his face.

She believes, with all of her heart, that the perceived deformity her son was born with will be a blessing, in the end.

That’s how it’s always been in many of the fairytales she read as a child. That one’s greatest trials can become their greatest strengths.

“…Can you tell me one more thing? Before you go.”

Qing Yuan nods, however hesitantly.

“…The boy’s father, who is he, really?”

The older sister pauses, her shoulders slightly hunched.

And it’s impossible now, to fathom which one of them that she’s trying to protect.

“…His name is Hong,” she mutters.

“The father?”

“My son,” Qing Yuan mutters. “His father was a soldier. And he loved me.”

The way she says it—

“…Is he dead, jiejie?”

She’s quiet, still so tense.

“…Yes,” she lies, and it comes from her so smoothly, so easily. “Before the wedding. That’s why…I wasn’t sure.”

Part of being prideful is being a good liar. It’s the best armor there is.

And in her case—he may as well be dead.

That's part of why they have to leave.

Because if he finds her, he'll find the boy. And if he learns the truth...

Qing Yuan knows he'll step forward to claim him. And bringing Hong into a world that...

...it's no place for a child.

She leaves her home for the last time that night. Leaves no note nor letter of goodbye.

Turns away from the life of power and privilege that she could have had—with a certainty ringing in her heart.

That this choice is the right one.

That her Hong'er is special.

And that someday, if given the chance—he could change the world.

She slips out on horseback that night, her child clutched in her arms. Looking for safety in the great cities of the north.

But unlike before, when she would set off on a long journey... Qing Yuan does not pray.

The kingdom of Xianle flourishes in the six years that follow.

And with it, their crown prince continues to grow.

From a charming, overeager little seven year old, to the very beginnings of a teenager.

And throughout those years, his dearest friend was by his side.

Running through the palace grounds. Sitting through lessons. Staying up in the night, listening as his prince read him stories from his scrolls.

Training with him, day in and day out, growing in tandem.

Well, except…

Feng Xin has the tendency to grow a bit faster than him.

Which is getting harder and harder not to notice, the older the prince gets.

And he wants to be a good friend. To congratulate his guard on his tallness and broadness, and all that. Like it's some sort of achievement, but…

"Your highness?" Feng Xin blinks, "Are you alright?"

He's bent over the river, hair down, for once—wet from where he was splashing water over his face.

Xie Lian supposes it's fair, that he'd be more grown up. He's two and a half years older. Xie Lian…

His eyes are stuck on one drop of water slipping down his bicep. It slips down tanned skin, disappearing into the dip of his elbow. Xie Lian…you see, he—

"Xie Lian?"

The prince glances up, startled, "Hmm?"

Feng Xin tilts his head to the side, raising an eyebrow. "Was training too vigorous today? You seem distracted."

Oh.

"…I'm fine!" He agrees quickly. After all, if it's not too rigorous for Feng Xin, then it's not too vigorous for him. "I just got lost in my thoughts, that's all!"

He glances back up the hill towards the palace, shoulders drooping with a sigh. "…We should probably go back."

These days, between lessons, training, and everything else—he doesn't get nearly as much time out here as he used to.

Actually having fun, that is.

Feng Xin nods, shaking his hair out like a wet dog before pulling it back up into a messy bun on top of his head. "Of course."

While they’re walking up towards the palace, a very different conversation is happening within.

Between the King of Xianle, as well as his Chief Guoshi.

“I don’t mean to say that any harm should befall the boy,” Mei Nianqing mutters, keeping his voice low. “But this...”

The King seems tired, glancing over the railing, down to the palace grounds below.

“What would you have me do, Guoshi?” He mutters. “Send him off to god knows where, not knowing if he’ll keep quiet? Or have a child killed?”

“Neither,” his advisor shakes his head. "But he's been working in the kitchens, hasn't he? Why not keep him there? Why..." Mei Nianqing glances around, lowering his voice. "Why bring him so close to the Crown Prince? Is that not reckless?"

The King of Xianle grows quiet, watching the grass sway in the breeze.

"...You see this ring?" He murmurs, lifting his right hand into the air. A gold circlet glimmers on his pinky, a ruby set into the face. "It means absolutely nothing to me. I have a dozen just like it."

The words sound callous, unfeeling, but...

"But to a peasant, this is more than most could achieve in an entire lifetime." He shrugs. "If I were to give it away to someone on the street–their grandchildren could reap the benefits from it. Do you see what I'm getting at, Guoshi?"

"...I'm not sure I do," he admits.

"If I keep him in the kitchens, I know where he is, yes." The king agrees. "But that doesn't provide much more than that. However, if he's a royal attendant..." He glances over at Mei Nianqing. "He can support a family on those wages. He has many sisters I hear, and no father."

Finally, the Guoshi seems to understand what the king is getting at.

"...And in that position, he has no reason to speak about what happened."

If he did, he would only have everything to lose.

"Precisely. And he isn't a threat to my son, if anything..." The king shrugs. "I think it could be a good experience for Xie Lian. Being around someone his own age, who is..."

He almost says 'normal,' and realizes that word couldn't be applied here.

"...working class," he concludes.

Mei Nianqing doubts that the exposure to a peasant is necessary.

After all, the prince has always displayed a high amount of empathy, and in spite of his station...

He's quite egalitarian.

The move seems like one that stems more from self preservation, but he relents. "...Fine," he agrees, "I will defer to his highness's wishes."

"Good."

The king smiles, even if it wasn't up to Mei Nianqing in the end.

After all, this is, at its core...a family matter.

"Now, if you don't mind..."

It's a polite way of being dismissed, and the Guoshi takes it gracefully, bowing his head.

"Of course, your majesty."

He leaves the room. Not part of the official royal residence, but rather a tertiary meeting space. Somewhere where trade ministers or generals might meet, but the royal family is rarely seen there.

As such, the young man who is ushered inside freezes upon seeing who awaits him.

He's thin, even for his age. Naturally sun kissed from performing Labor in the fields over prior summers—but his complexion is rather pale now, seeing the king's face.

"...I'm s-sorry, your majesty," he bows his head, nearly bending in half as he scrambles back towards the door. "W-wrong room—"

"No," the king corrects him, watching the young man with a grim expression. “I summoned you here, Mu Qing.”

The boy freezes before he can reach the door, still bowing low, his shoulders trembling.

“…I haven’t said anything,” he whispers, visibly frightened.

“I know,” the king steps forward, his expression grim as he takes in the boy’s stature. The way he instinctively averts his gaze. How eager he seems to remain close to the door. “You aren’t in trouble.”

The child doesn’t say a word, remaining tight lipped, and he…

It feels utterly bizarre to the King, taking time out of his day to meet with the son of a woodworker and a housemaid. Normally, this is something he would delegate. It seems like madness that he hasn’t, but…

Some issues are so sensitive, they have to be handled personally. Still, he can’t help but ask…

“How old are you now, anyway?”

Mu Qing doesn’t look up, his heart rattling in his chest.

“…Thirteen next month, your majesty,” he whispers hoarsely. The King rubs the bridge of his nose with the heel of his palm.

…He really is Xie Lian’s age.

Good fucking heavens, it makes one slightly ill to think about.

“…Well, it just so happens, my son turned thirteen recently.” The king murmurs, forcing his tone to remain light. “At that age, he’ll no longer have a nursemaid or a governess, but rather…a personal attendant.”

The responsibilities are mostly things that the boy is already familiar with doing. The hairdressing and the tailoring will be a learned skill, but he’s at an age where he can pick it up quite easily.

Still…

The king doesn’t personally hand out promotions to his servants.

Such things normally come down from higher level attendants and housekeepers. For the king to do this himself, means…

"...Is this a bribe?" Mu Qing questions cautiously, "Because I-I really wasn't going to —"

"I know," the king repeats himself calmly. "But think of it like this—I am aware, as are the others involved, that your family has...suffered significantly from past events. And that...I bear some responsibility for that."

Mu Qing sneaks a glance at him through his lashes, lips trembling with uncertainty.

"Think of this...as an opportunity," the king explains. "You'll be with my son, day in and day out. You'll be compensated well for your work. Receive the same education as he does. There's been discussion of him studying cultivation on Mount Taicang..."

The King trails off.

"And no one will ever ask you for something inappropriate," he adds quietly, watching the way the word 'inappropriate' makes the boy shrink even further. "Rather than thinking of it as a bribe, let's just say I have a desire to...make things right, as they stand."

The young man doesn't argue with him, but the king knows—he's too cynical to trust that this is purely being done out of kindness. And he isn't wrong.

"...It's in both of our best interests if you are close to this family. Loyal to this family." The king's gaze bears down on him. "I don't want the guilt of having to harm a child to keep this quiet. Accept the kindness. Make the most of it. And, if you're smart—"

(And they both know, the boy is highly intelligent. He wouldn't have survived if he wasn't.)

"—you'll forget the entire thing and start over."

That's where he loses him, in part.

Mu Qing can make the most of it. He can start over. There isn't much that he can't do, with regards to his family.

That's why he's here to begin with.

But he can't forget. As badly as he wishes he could. Or pretends that he has.

It also isn't entirely a kindness.

There are opportunities, like the king said. The pay is substantial, but...

It would also mean living in the palace full time. Away from his mother. His sisters.

Not that he has a choice, but it's a terrifying prospect for a boy so young.

"...Thank you, your majesty," he mumbles, not lifting his head. "I'll make the most of it."

Of course, he doesn't have to threaten Mu Qing. He already did. Saying that he didn't want to have the guilt of harming a child.

But he could , if he had to.

The option is there.

One wrong step. One secret slipped loose. The mere perception that he's taking advantage of the royal family's kindness, and it could all come crashing down.

The king absolves his guilt, the secrets are kept...

And Mu Qing keeps the house of cards tilting just so .

When Xie Lian arrives back in the great hall for the afternoon, he half expects his Guoshi to jump down his throat for not returning earlier to begin his meditations for the evenings, but...

There's no such scolding to be found. Instead, his mother is waiting for him.

"Ah, darling," she smiles, walking over to meet her son in the entrance, pressing a kiss to his forehead. "How was training? Oh, Feng Xin," she glances over at the guard, "Are you alright? You look like you've fallen in the river..."

The teenager perks up, shaking his head. "Oh, no, your majesty—I just fell in some mud during training and had to wash up after."

He says he fell, but Xie Lian actually struck him with more force than he meant to during sparring, sending Feng Xin tumbling.

(Which he apologized for, naturally—even if Feng Xin insisted he'd done nothing wrong.)

"I see..." The Queen sighs, turning back to Xie Lian. "Well—we have news. I'm sure you remember how your Uncle passed, recently..."

It wasn't particularly sad news for anyone, but he nods.

"...Well, my sister and your cousin, Qi Rong, have come to live with us here—in the palace. Isn't that nice?"

The prince doesn't react immediately, his face frozen as he tries to school it into something like excitement.

Xie Lian's mother adores her sister, he knows that.

He also knows that his Aunt has been in declining health since the death of her husband...so, it's reasonable to have her here.

But Qi Rong...

Look, Xie Lian knows he's supposed to be nice to him. To care about him. He's family, after all.

But something about the younger boy...

...Makes Xie Lian's skin crawl.

But, before he can put too much thought into it, she adds—

"Oh, and I almost forgot—your personal attendant was selected for you today. M... M...Oh heavens, they just told me his name—"

"Mu Qing, your grace," a voice pipes up quietly.

Xie Lian follows the sound of that voice, and standing behind his mother is...

A boy around his own age. Taller, much more thin, with long, raven hair pulled up into a high, neat ponytail.

"...Oh," the prince smiles, taking a step closer. "Hello then—it's very nice to meet you."

The servant nods politely, keeping his head bowed low, arms clasped behind his back —and Xie Lian sends Feng Xin a look.

“Aren’t you going to say hello? He’s going to be with us everyday.”

“Oh,” the older boy blinks, nodding in Mu Qing’s direction. “...Nice to meet you.”

The raven haired boy glances up, his eyes lingering on Feng Xin’s face for a moment, eyes widening briefly before he looks down again “...I promise I’ll work hard.”

The prince nods amicably, and...

“...Wanna see my room?”

...Some things never change.

ARTWORK INSPIRED BY THIS STORY

Included with permission from the artist, do not reproduce or reuse for any reason

The King and Queen of Xianle + Baby Xie Lian

CREDIT: YUE LING

The Confrontation between Xie Lian and Lian Qianqiu (post Guoshi Fangxin reveal) tug tug

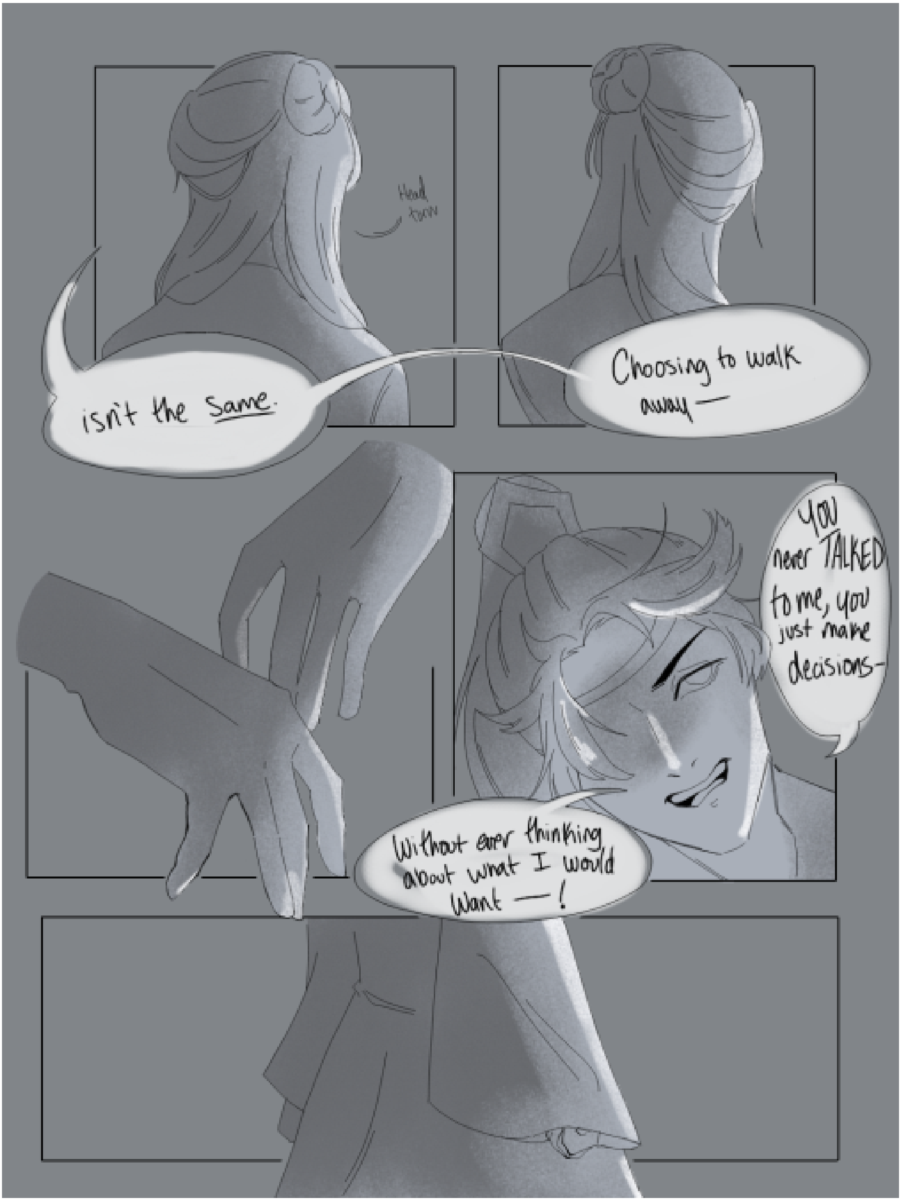
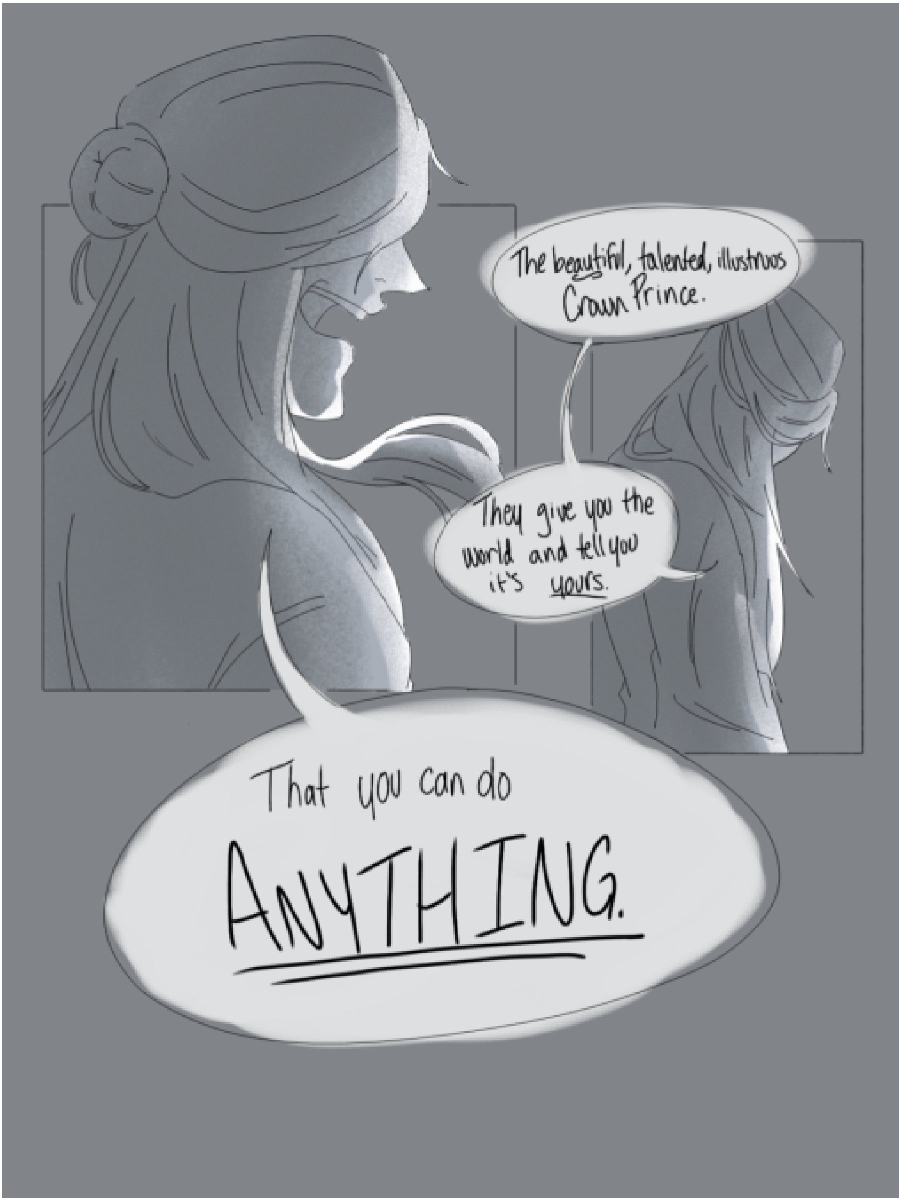
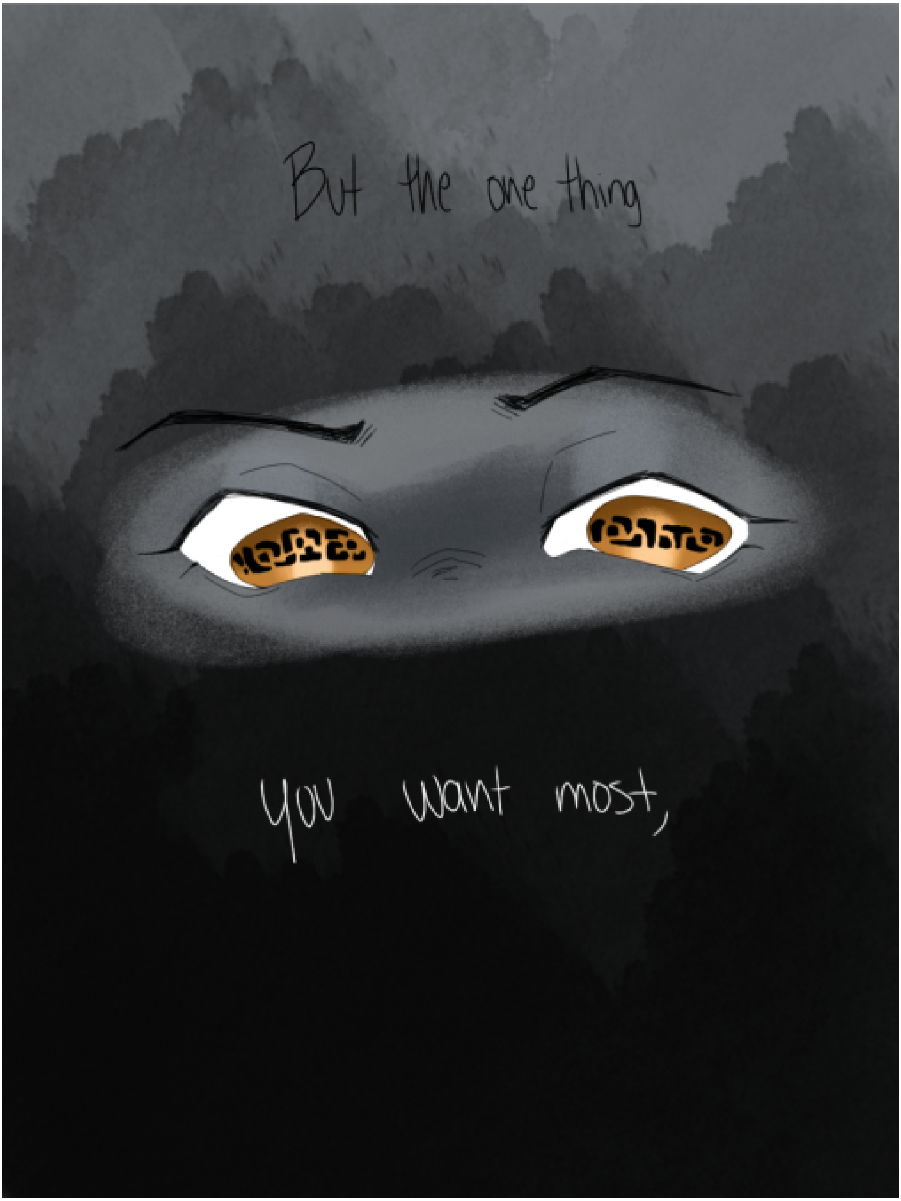
San Lang, let's go.
THAT'S why you hid who you were all that time!
Because the minute anyone gets close, the minute anyone sees who you are—
THEY CARE!
So you just RUN AWAY!



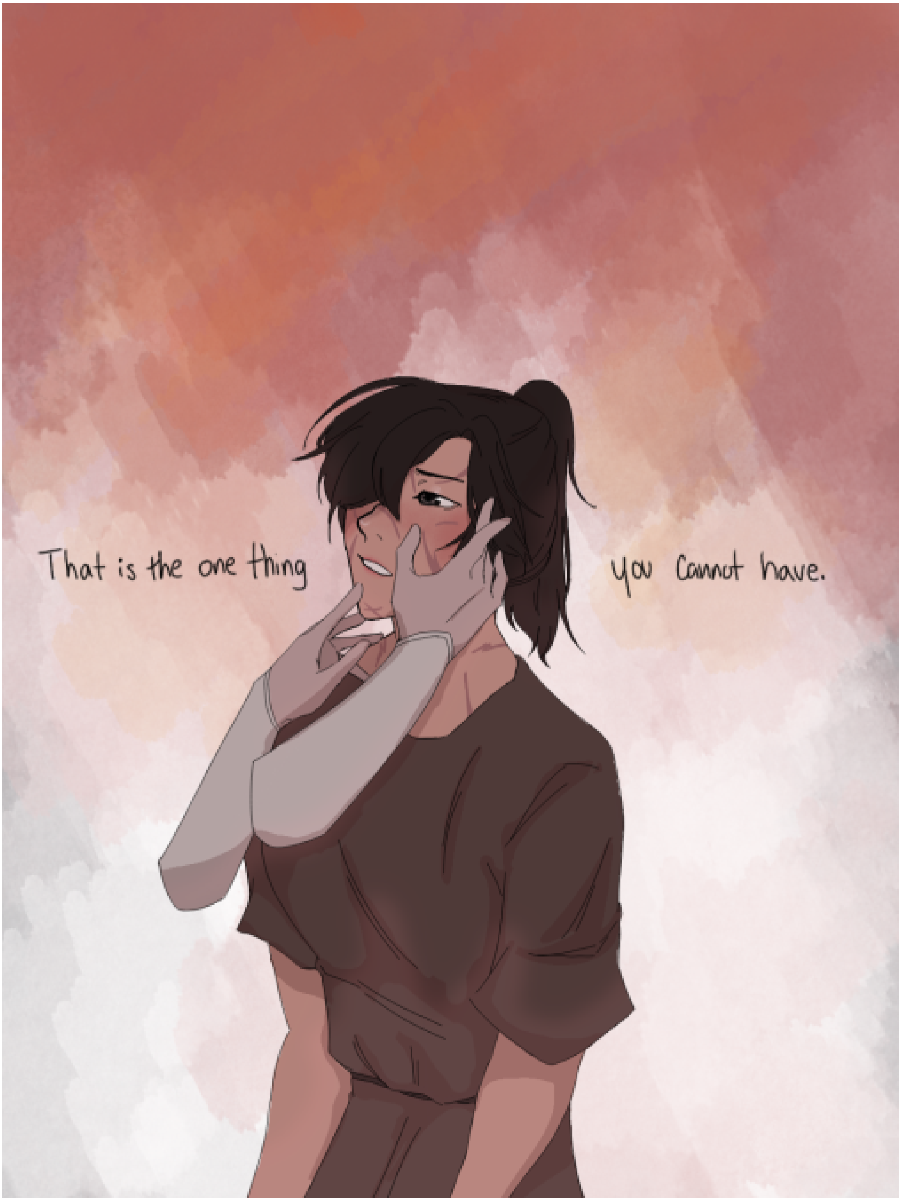
Head turn
Choosing to walk away—
isn't the same.
YOU never TALKED to me, you just make decisions—
Without ever thinking about what I would want —!



The beautiful, talented, illustruos Crown Prince.
They give you the world and tell you it's yours.
That you can do ANYTHING.



But the one thing
you want most,



That is the one thing
you cannot have.

CREDIT: CASS

BABY FENGLIAN

CREDIT: HITHREN

Chapter End Notes

> Thank you to Cass, Hithren, and Yue Ling for their beautiful artwork, and allowing me to share it!

Tales from Xianle

Chapter Summary

> “W…wake up Feng Xin first, I’m…m’ gettin’ there…”
>
> Mu Qing rolls his eyes, but there’s little bite to it. “Yes, dianxia.”
>
> There’s a bit of a routine to get through, anyway—he doesn’t mind.

Chapter Notes

> Content Warnings for this chapter: fraught familial relationships, teenage awkwardness, and congee
>
> Enjoy the baby Xianle trio!

See the end of the chapter for more notes

For years, it was just the Crown Prince and Feng Xin. Rising in the morning together. Training together. Xie Lian sitting through his lessons while his guard waited dutifully in the corner.

And in some ways, things don’t change, but… In other ways, they do.

“Good morning, your highness,” the door to Xie Lian’s bedroom always opens promptly, half an hour past sunrise—with the prince’s attendant already deep into the work day, a breakfast tray balanced on one hip, drawing the curtains with the other. “Did you sleep well?”

Xie Lian groans softly, pressing his face into his pillows, pulling the sheets over his head. “‘M having…a good dream, Mu Qing…g…gimme a second…”

The servant arches an eyebrow, setting the tray down on the bedside table with such practiced grace, it doesn’t make a sound.

“What about, dianxia?”

“Mmmmmm…” he sighs with a yawn. “Hand…some…butterflies…”

Mu Qing cracks a small smile, alone in the dim lighting of the Royal apartments. He’s always out of it when he first wakes up.

“W…wake up Feng Xin first, I’m…m’ gettin’ there…”

Mu Qing rolls his eyes, but there's little bite to it. "Yes, dianxia."

There's a bit of a routine to get through, anyway—he doesn't mind.

First, setting out the prince's clothes for the day. Checking to see that his boots are properly shined.

He always buffs them after the prince is off to bed for the evening—but sometimes, Xie Lian sneaks off to the kitchens for a snack during the night, and Mu Qing returns to find them scuffed.

Last night was one of those nights, it seems. The attendant sighs, starting again.

Then, he deciphers Xie Lian's incoherent grunts to figure out which blades the prince wants to use during training today, sending word to one of the palace runners so the armorer can have the proper weapons brought up.

(Xie Lian is mumbling something about a mountain, now.)

One of the better parts of the morning, of course, is waking the guard hound that sleeps on a tasseled silk cushion by the food of The prince's bed.

"...Morning, Jun Jie," the teenager whispers, kneeling down to scratch him behind the ears until his tail thumps tiredly.

"Did he keep you up last night?" The hound lets out a soft 'boof!' Of agreement, snuffling at Mu Qing's palm, looking for a treat.

(He sneaks a piece of meat from the prince's tray for him, knowing that Xie Lian won't notice or care—he hardly eats it anyway.)

And then, comes the worst part of Mu Qing's morning. Obviously. Going to the kennel and waking up the dog.

The ugly, smelly one.

There's a door to the room adjoining to the prince's bedchamber, and the moment Mu Qing opens it, he stumbles.

He catches himself silently, of course—not even crying out when he twists his ankle. Better than making a scene, anyway.

And when he sees the culprit, a stray boot strewn across the floor—he glares.

"…"

… THUNK!

The boot rebounds heavily off of the side of Feng Xin's sleeping head, making him sit up with a startled squawk, scrambling for his sword before he goes tumbling to the floor in a heap.

CRASH!

"…" Mu Qing leans against the door, crossing his arms and raising an eyebrow.

"Well, I can't speak for the crown prince, but I feel safer already," he drawls, watching as Feng Xin sits up, rubbing the side of his head with a glare.

"Shut the fuck up, why don't you?!" The teenager glares, and Mu Qing shrugs.

"Put on a shirt, no one wants to see that."

Who wants to see someone's pectorals when they're in the middle of their workday, anyway?

Not him. Certainly not him.

Before Feng Xin can muster a response, the servant turns away, ponytail whipping around behind him as he returns to the prince's chambers.

"W…" Xie Lian is sitting up now, his hair sticking up in every which direction, "What was that?"

"Oh…" Mu Qing shrugs, walking over to move the tray from his bedside table, to setting it on the prince's lap, "it would seem Feng Xin fell out of bed, your highness."

"Oh…" Xie Lian yawns, already more than familiar with this part of his routine, scooting forward, picking at his breakfast while Mu Qing slides in behind him with a brush and comb, working out the newly formed knots in his hair. "Is he alright?"

"Oh, I think so."

By the time Feng Xin does arrive, slightly concussed, his robes for the day thrown about him loosely, he finds the two sitting together like that—Xie Lian, picking at a bowl of grapes while Mu Qing kneels on the bed behind him, working his hair up into a perfect ponytail.

“Oh, Feng Xin!” Xie Lian brightens, smiling over at him sleepily. “You’re up!”

And just like that, his irritation seems somewhat secondary.

“Good Morning, your highness.”

His own tray is left on the far cabinet—but he takes it without complaint.

Because sure, he loathes dealing with Mu Qing in the mornings. And the evenings. And meal times.

But, there is one point in the day where he gets a break. A precious, much needed–

"Oh, by the way," Xie Lian mumbles, swallowing down a grape, "Mu Qing is coming to lessons today."

“...What?” The bodyguard glances up, nearly choking on his congee. “Are you k—?!” He pauses, forcing himself to school his tone when Xie Lian raises an eyebrow. “I mean...won’t he be busy with...work?”

“No,” Mu Qing replies calmly. “I finish that before you two wake up.”

“Besides,” Xie Lian smiles, “I think I might learn a little better with someone studying with me.”

Feng Xin picks at his plate, suddenly not as ravenous as he was before. “That’s really only helpful if he can keep up, right?”

Mu Qing gives him a sharp look, stepping behind the changing screen with his prince, helping him strip from his night clothes, then dressing him in his robes for the day. “I can keep up, thank you.”

“You—”

“Mu Qing is very intelligent, Feng Xin,” Xie Lian cuts him off. “And it’ll be more fun if he’s there!”

“...” Feng Xin doesn’t say a word to that, turning his attention back to his bowl of congee.

‘He isn’t your friend.’

That’s what the guard wants to say.

That this is someone new. A stranger. And Xie Lian shouldn’t let him close so easily.

Before, it was just them, walking the hills up and down from Mount Taicang, and now...

There’s a third person there. Sitting beside him in his lessons. Training alongside the both of them in the afternoons, and...

In part, Feng Xin feels a little...

Left out, when the other two devolve into academic conversation, in which he can take little part.

It can feel somewhat threatening at times, but also...

Maybe, on some small, near minuscule level...

"...You should finish up for the night."

...He worries.

Mu Qing glances up from where he's knelt on the floor outside of the prince's bed chamber, buffing out his boots for the second time that day, leveling him with a glare.

"What are you talking about?"

Feng Xin stares down at him, arms crossed, tight lipped.

To be absolutely clear: if Mu Qing wants to work himself to death, that's his business. Feng Xin doesn't care.

But, if you happen to be a casual observer, you'd notice that he works eighteen hours a day.

To the point where his eyes are unfocused, and his hands are slightly raw.

"...Maybe worry about yourself, instead of bothering me," the servant mutters, keeping his head down, shining the boot between his hands just a little more aggressively. "Wouldn't want you telling the prince that I 'can't keep up.'"

"When did I—?!" Feng Xin Sputters.

Then, he remembers that Xie Lian went to bed only a moment before, and he forces himself to lower his voice. "When did I say I was going to tell him?!"

"You didn't have to," Mu Qing snaps quietly. "And if you don't start putting your boots up before bed, I swear I'll–!"

Then, Feng Xin makes an unfortunate decision.

A poor choice of words, if you will.

“...Isn’t that your job?”

Mu Qing’s hands freeze on top of Xie Lian’s boots. “...Excuse me?”

“I mean—putting stuff away—”

“For the prince,” the raven haired teenager hisses. “Not YOU!”

It’s the first time that Xie Lian wakes up to the sound of his bodyguard and his servant arguing in the hallway, loudly enough that it stirs the entire eastern wing of the palace—

(But it’s certainly not the last.)

And in the years that follow, that’s all either of them seem to remember.

Feng Xin, watching a forming friendship, feeling somewhat threatened by it.

Mu Qing, watching the other two obliviously mooning over one another, and—not caring. Only finding it irritating and disgusting.

But there were other days.

Days when they didn’t argue.

Days that were...Fun.

“Your highness...” Mu Qing mumbles, feeling somewhat reluctant. “I don’t think this is going to work.”

Xie Lian blinks, rocking back on his heels, “What do you mean? I made the plan up myself.”

Which naturally means that it is, without question, a perfect plan.

(If you ask Xie Lian.)

Mu Qing isn’t perfectly convinced.

“...Your clothes...are going to stick out.”

“Oh...” Xie Lian frowns, glancing over into the mirror. “These are the cheapest ones I have...”

And for where they’re going, they’ll...

Stick out horribly. The mere thought makes Mu Qing want to cringe.

Then, Xie Lian seems to be struck by an idea, glancing over his shoulder, an excited glint in his eye.

“...Couldn’t I just trade with you?”

Mu Qing pales.

“...That’s not possible, your highness.”

“I don’t think so,” Xie Lian muses, turning around fully and looking him over, tapping his perfectly manicured index finger against his chin. “You’re taller, but I weigh more, so...the fit should be about the same...”

As if that is the problem.

“...My clothes would probably fit you,” he admits, fighting the urge to snap at how ridiculous the entire thing is, “but I can’t wear yours, dianxia.”

Xie Lian frowns. “Why not?”

It feels ludicrous he even has to say it.

“I would get in trouble.”

“Even if I ordered you to?”

Mu Qing falls silent, not saying a word.

There are moments when the prince seems to think that, with the sweep of an order, he can make every problem go away. Like that’s helping, somehow.

But it isn't helping. Mu Qing still gets in trouble.

Still, luckily for him—Xie Lian seems to pick up on the underlying anxiety.

This time.

"...Alright, what if I borrow an extra set from you?"

Mu Qing doesn't ask if it's an order or not—he doesn't want to resent it later, if it is.

The robes are a little scratchy, if you ask Xie Lian—but not too bad. A little baggy around the hips, slightly tight in the arms, and overlong at his wrists, but...

It achieves the desired effect, certainly.

"...Now...if we're doing this," Mu Qing stops him, "there are terms."

The prince stops in his tracks, staring at him curiously. "...What sort of terms?"

"You don't talk to anyone, if you do, you don't tell them who you are—actually, it might be better if you just pretend you can't talk at all—are—are you listening to a word I'm saying?"

Xie Lian nods, his eyes slightly wide. "Yes, of course, just..."

He tilts his head to the side.

"I didn't realize you could be bossy, Mu Qing."

The servant blanches, his cheeks splotchy and pink. "I just..."

"I didn't say it was a bad thing," the prince points out. "Actually, no one ever bosses me around—except for Guoshi, anyway...so I don't mind it, it's different!"

On one level, the fact that he finds something charming about someone speaking to him sternly is a little endearing. Mu Qing won't admit that.

But as someone who has been ordered, day in and day out for his entire life— Mu Qing finds it somewhat grating.

"And keep that guard of yours on a leash," Mu Qing mutters, eyes flickering about as they make their way to the servant's exit.

"Oh," Xie Lian blinks. "Well—I didn't tell him."

Mu Qing rolls his eyes, opening the door for him to step through.

(Even when Taizi Dianxia is posing as a servant, he waits for someone to open the door.)

"That doesn't mean he doesn't know you're sneaking out."

"Well," the prince frowns. "I'm not doing anything I'm not allowed to do."

Technically speaking, he can leave the palace—or Mount Taicang—whenever he wants. He just usually doesn't.

'No, you're just disguised as a servant and sneaking out the back...' Mu Qing thinks to himself, but doesn't dare say.

And luckily, he doesn't have to say another word before Feng Xin proves his point, falling into step behind them.

"...Your highness? What are you wearing?"

Xie Lian spins around, clasping his hands behind his back. "Good afternoon, Feng Xin! We were just...ah..."

"..." Mu Qing glances between the two of them, letting out an irritated sigh. "His highness asked me to escort him down to the village at the foot of Mount Taicang for the day."

After all, it's one of his last free days in the summer. The rest has been spent rehearsing.

The festival to celebrate the Heavens—one they hold at mid-autumn every year—and this year in particular, the crown prince himself has been chosen to portray the Heavenly Warrior.

Not surprising, given he's the foremost disciple on Mount Taicang, but it requires much preparation.

As such, this is his last day to go and do as he likes—and he has every intention of making the most of it.

"...Why dress like that, then?" Feng Xin frowns, following closely behind them both. "And why not inform the guard?"

"Well…" The prince smiles, somewhat sheepish. "…I didn't exactly want all of the attention to be on me."

It's a somewhat novel idea.

Xie Lian doesn't inherently loathe attention. He was born and raised into it—it's natural to him.

To be admired by everyone. To hold a room in rapt attention when he speaks.

And he's never once seemed to be one of those nobles that hungered for the idea of what it might be like to live a 'normal' life, or anything like that.

So…

Feng Xin watches the back of the prince's head, curious.

Where is this coming from?

Feng Xin puzzles over that the entire walk down the mountain, and he notices something:

Xie Lian is as carefree as ever, walking lightly, but…

Mu Qing seems slightly more stressed than usual, his shoulders hunched. Maybe because of the sneaking around, but…

When they finally do reach the village, they end up waiting outside of a small building, with Xie Lian twiddling his thumbs, Mu Qing tapping his foot anxiously, and Feng Xin—

He can't take it anymore.

"What the fuck are we waiting for—?"

Before he can finish the statement, the doors open.

And with it, a small flood of school aged children comes flooding out.

Which Feng Xin is even more surprised by—not because of the fact that Xie Lian is visiting a local school, he's done that before—

But doing it here, like this—and so quietly.

Why is he—?

"Gege!"

A little girl comes rushing down the steps—her dark hair pulled into low pigtails, and the sight of Mu Qing—

It makes her smile wide, dimples cut into her cheeks as she throws herself into his arms.

"You came!" She cries, hugging him tightly around his waist. "You said you couldn't come!"

"...I wanted to surprise you," Mu Qing mumbles, bending at the waist to hug her back.

His tone is softer than Feng Xin has ever heard it. Gentle and warm.

Honestly, he hadn't thought that Mu Qing was capable of sounding like that.

"...Aren't you gonna get in trouble?" She mumbles against the front of his robes, and Feng Xin distantly remembers—

Mu Qing does have younger sisters, doesn't he? Several.

"Yeah, well..." the older brother in question smiles awkwardly, glancing over at Xie Lian. "Someone important wanted to meet you."

"..." She glances in the direction of Mu Qing's gaze, following it until she sees...

Xie Lian, kneeling down beside her with a warm smile. "You must be Miss Suyin, is that right?"

At a passing glance, Mu Qing's clothes disguise him easily enough. But when you look him in the face...

Even if he wasn't recognizable, the red pearl earrings that he forgot to take off before leaving the palace that morning gleam in his ears, and the little girl's eyes widen.

"...Dianxia?!" She whispers, shocked, then starts to bow very low, clearly startled, but Xie Lian quickly waves that off.

"Your older brother mentioned it was your birthday today, is that true?"

"..." Suyin nods, eyes the size of dinner plates.

“I see…” Xie Lian hums. “Well, it just so happens that I came here to enjoy the end of summer festival, but…” he sighs, blowing a lock of hair out of his eyes. “I don’t have a date. And you know, as a prince, I can’t just take anyone, but…I thought the birthday girl might make time for me.”

Suyin wasn’t always a shy child, but in the last couple of years, she’s been…reclusive at best.

Mu Qing wasn’t sure how she was going to react to having this sprung on her, but—

The ten year old smiles, bobbing her head cautiously, and Xie Lian grins right back at her.

“…But does that mean gege won’t have a date?”

Mu Qing’s expression softens. Obviously, a day with a prince is any little girl’s dream come true—and she’s still worried about him.

Xie Lian brushes that off with a quick laugh—

“Oh, no—Feng Xin’s his date!”

His friends choke.

Suyin glances over at the two, quickly sizing Feng Xin up.

The guard shrinks slightly under her gaze, and Mu Qing’s hand smacks against his forehead, exasperated.

“Are you kidding?”

“What?!”

“She’s ten, and she’s four feet tall.”

“I don’t know what you’re talking about!”

Mu Qing had assumed Feng Xin’s terror of women only extended to adults, but— apparently not.

“…Well,” Xie Lian looks back at Suyin with a smile. “They’re having fun. Wanna show me around?”

Suyin offers a slow, eager smile in response, taking his hand. “…Okay!”

Mu Qing had to admit...initially, when Xie Lian broached the idea, he thought it was ridiculous.

And even still—he was absolutely certain that the prince would forget that he offered, so...

He never expected to be here, in his village, watching his little sister leading the crown prince of Xianle from stall to stall, sharing sweets with him, braiding flowers into his hair.

And it...makes him look at the prince slightly differently than he did before.

It wasn't that he thought little of him. Mu Qing isn't blind to what the rest of the world sees.

He just...sometimes found him to be lacking in sincerity.

And that's hard to believe now, watching Xie Lian carry Suyin on his shoulders, watching the fireworks above.

It's hard to believe that he isn't sincere, when they make their way back to Mu Qing's home. He doesn't go inside, Mu Qing insists on that much, but he's rather chivalrous, dropping Suyin off at the door and presenting her with flowers, kissing her hand.

He's very much a prince charming, and Suyin's eyes sparkle with happiness.

"...He'll make a good husband one day," Mu Qing comments offhandedly, where they're standing off to the side, his arms crossed.

Feng Xin keeps his eyes trained ahead, his expression flat. But his lips turn down slightly at the corners, and Mu Qing...

He feels a little bad. And then he resents himself for feeling sorry. It's a ridiculous crush. He's an idiot, and he should get over it, sometimes you just–

"Of course he will," Feng Xin replies calmly.

Mu Qing watches him from the corner of his eye, biting his lip. He never really has to hide his expression from Feng Xin, in moments like this.

Because he's never looking at Mu Qing.

"She'll be a very lucky princess." He shrugs, arms crossed.

"..." Mu Qing looks away.

...Sometimes, you just want things that you can't have.

But sometimes, Feng Xin is looking at him.

Laying back on the grass that night, watching the last of the fireworks before they walk back.

The prince between them, listening as Mu Qing hesitantly answers his questions.

About how many nights he used to lay out here, with his father and his sisters. Counting the stars until they couldn't keep their eyes open.

How they held onto the grass, so that way they wouldn't float away.

But one day, his father let go.

Feng Xin watches Xie Lian's expression crack slightly with sympathy. Watches, as he reaches for Mu Qing's hand, and promises not to let go.

The prince's kindness always makes Feng Xin's heart soften, but...

That isn't what he's looking at, in that moment.

...It's Mu Qing.

How wide his eyes get, when someone shows him kindness. Not narrowed or guarded, just...

Shockingly vulnerable.

They're obsidian in color. Feng Xin has called them ugly before, in arguments, but...

He's never meant it.

They reflect starlight so easily, so expressive.

And there are things that Feng Xin sees, things that Xie Lian can't–simply because he's never had to worry about such things.

Like when a family has been broken, and one child is left holding it all together.

He didn't know Mu Qing had so many younger sisters.

He didn't know that Mu Qing's mother had such a kind face–but with the laugh lines around her eyes comes shades of grief. Evidence of crimes years from years past, like the witness marks on a clock. The scars that peek beneath the sleeves of her dress hold a story that no one wants to tell.

Feng Xin was born to protect things. That's all he's ever been taught to do. And guarding his prince has never been hard.

It's a natural instinct, to protect the things we love.

But for the first time, Feng Xin finds himself noticing...

No one is protecting Mu Qing.

And he doesn't say anything then.

He's too proud to admit that there's more to his forced interaction with the younger teenager than brewing resentment and antagonism.

When it's time to go, Xie Lian is sleeping peacefully, his cheek pressed against Mu Qing's shoulder.

The servant goes to wake him up, but Feng Xin stops him, shaking his head. "I've got him."

Xie Lian mumbles sleepily, his arms hooking around Feng Xin's neck as he's pulled over his back, one leg hitched around his waist while the guard holds the other beneath the knee.

"...He's such a baby," Mu Qing mutters, walking beside them. "He's about to be seventeen, he can't just fall asleep all over the place..."

"Sure, he can," Feng Xin shrugs. "That's what he's got me for."

The servant falls silent, his chin tilting down.

The night is quiet, leaving them surrounded by the soft rush of the breeze through the grass. The crickets chirping lazily in the forests framing the path to Mount Taicang, fireflies drifting lazily through the air.

Suddenly, Mu Qing feels someone grasp for his hand.

Feng Xin's fingers are rough, calloused from training too often without cloves. He has them, the idiot just forgets to wear them.

Mu Qing's hands and feet are always cold like ice. When he visits home, he'll press them against his sister's legs when they're trying to sleep, just to hear her scream and giggle, flailing as she tries to get away.

But Feng Xin's are warm, making Mu Qing's fingertips naturally seek out his palm, not even thinking about it.

It just comes naturally.

For a moment, neither of them say a word. Mu Qing has wide eyes, lips slightly parted, and Feng Xin is pointedly staring ahead.

"...I didn't know about your dad."

That makes Mu Qing's eyes narrow slightly, his stomach sinking with disappointment, even though he feels stupid for having hopes at all, not even knowing what he was hoping for, but...

He doesn't want Feng Xin's pity.

But...it isn't.

"My mom died."

The admission is calm, blunt, with little art to the delivery. "I was about the same age. I saw it."

Each phrase is a little clipped, like it's still hard for him to talk about, but delivered with careful intent of what he wants Mu Qing to piece together.

That Feng Xin gets it.

That it hurts. That it's frightening.

And he gets it.

"...Oh," Mu Qing mutters, watching the back of Feng Xin's eyes with a wide eyed gaze.

"But I don't have any siblings, so..."

So, he can't understand that part.

'It's hard.'

That's what Mu Qing wants to say.

That it's hard, and it's scary, and he's tired, but he doesn't get to be tired. Because he isn't just letting himself down if he breaks down.

That his mother is so proud of him for learning cultivation. The whole village talks about it.

Even if it's just a spot that the royal family gave him out of charity, and the Guoshis certainly don't want him there.

That his mother cried with happiness, when she found out Mu Qing had been chosen to play the demon in the festival for the heavens this year.

But Mu Qing isn't like the other cultivators there. Xie Lian is training with every intention of becoming a god, and Mu Qing...

He's just lucky to be there at all, and it would only take one wrong step to ruin all of that.

He knows it, and he's scared, and he can't say so.

Instead of saying any of that–he opts for not saying a word.

Keeping his head low, holding Feng Xin's hand a little tighter.

Because it's comforting, and he needs it.

For the entire walk home, Feng Xin doesn't let go.

Only when they reach the back gates of the palace, and Xie Lian begins to stir against his back, mumbling under his breath.

"Shhh..." Feng Xin lets go of Mu Qing's hand reaching up to pat the back of the prince's head, "We're back, your highness."

"And thank goodness you are."

Mu Qing freezes, and he'd never admit that he shrinks behind Feng Xin at the sound of General Feng's voice, but that's exactly what he does.

The young guard swallows dryly, setting the groggy prince down on his feet, "Yes, sir."

"Where were you three all afternoon?"

"...In the village," Xie Lian replies calmly, rubbing at his eyes, yawning as he starts to wake up fully. "I wanted to enjoy the festival. Is there a problem?"

Mu Qing stays behind the two of them, face downturned, shoulders tense. Of the three, he has the most to lose.

It was his sister that Xie Lian snuck off to spend the day with. Even if it was the prince's idea, no one would see it that way.

"...His highness should have informed the palace guard, so we could have sent an escort." General Feng replies calmly. "It isn't safe."

"In the village?" Xie Lian arches an eyebrow. "...I respect that you have a job to do, General Feng, but I am capable of protecting myself. And if I wasn't, I had Feng Xin with me."

The General arches an eyebrow. "Is that so?" He glances over Xie Lian's face, taking in sight of a small cut on the prince's cheekbone. "It doesn't seem as though you were completely unscathed."

Xie Lian touches his cheek, then shrugs. "I was playing with some children, and we rolled around a bit. It was probably a rock."

General Feng doesn't seem particularly impressed by the explanation. "You've never forgone an escort before, dianxia. Is there something you're trying to hide that your parents ought to know about?"

Mu Qing shrinks silently behind them.

(Or someone he's trying to protect.)

Feng Xin watches Xie Lian's eyebrows rise up sharply, slightly insulted. He's a tolerant person, hardly ever irritated, but...

He doesn't like being treated like a child, not under any circumstances. "I–!"

"It was my fault." Feng Xin speaks up. "I said he didn't need one." Both of the other teenagers look at him, shocked.

"It was a small excursion, and it was so close...his highness wanted to enjoy the festival without a fuss, and I told him I could do the job by myself." He explains. "It was my fault, General."

His father surveys him coldly.

"I see." He turns to Xie Lian, bowing his head politely. "I hope you enjoyed your afternoon, dianxia. I'm sure you probably have to wake up early for the rehearsals, don't you?"

Xie Lian frowns, because...he does.

General Feng isn't a bad man, just...old fashioned and strict.

Particularly since his wife died. The entire thing was miserable business, and he hasn't been the same since.

"...Yes, I suppose I'll see you both in the morning," he murmurs, sending Feng Xin a look of quiet worry before he turns to go inside.

Mu Qing follows after him. After all, the prince still needs to bathe and ready himself for bed, but...

He hesitates in the doorway while Xie Lian carries on down the hall, pulling one of the floors from his hair, twirling it between his fingers, breathing it in with a sigh.

He doesn't hear what Mu Qing does.

CRACK!

The sound of a vicious slap.

"You don't come back unscathed when your prince doesn't," General Feng reminds him coldly. "You know better."

It's an unfair reaction–and punishment–over something as minor as a scratch, but...

"...I know, general." Feng Xin replies quietly, his head bowed. "I'm sorry."

"I don't want to hear 'I'm sorry,'" His father glares. "Don't let it happen again."

"...It won't, sir."

Feng Xin sounds calm, unaffected.

Always the soldier, even with his own father.

"Good." General Feng glances up at the sky, the moon already rising high. "Run three laps around the grounds. And you'll be running extra training rounds during the prince's lessons for the rest of the month."

It's obvious overkill, but the guard doesn't argue. "Yes, General."

Feng Xin turns on his heel, moving to fulfill the order without another word. And Mu Qing...

Slips down the hall after his prince, lost in thought.

In the years that follow, he'll be angry, and he won't be generous enough to look back on this moment when he's frustrated.

Wondering how Feng Xin could be so emotionally obtuse. Why even the most obvious parts of a relationship could flummox him.

But on this night, with the sound of that slap settling heavily in Mu Qing's chest...

He understands it.

Xie Lian is quiet that evening, watching himself in the mirror as Mu Qing combs out the wet strands of his hair.

“If you’re worried about Feng Xin, he’ll be fine.” Mu Qing offers, his eyes averted.

“...I’m not worried, not really,” the prince shakes his head. “I just feel guilty that he’s being punished over something I did. I hate it when he does that. General Feng would never punish me.”

It isn’t about whether or not Xie Lian would have been punished, but Mu Qing doubts the prince would understand that.

“...Thank you, for today.” The servant mutters. “It meant a lot to Suyin.”

Xie Lian smiles at him through the mirror. “I had fun, and I was happy to do it.”

But Mu Qing notices something else—dark circles underneath the prince’s eyes. “...Have you not been sleeping well?”

Xie Lian shrugs, glancing away. “If I explained, you would probably think I was crazy…" he mutters, laughing self consciously.

Mu Qing shrugs, going back to combing his hair—

"Alright, well," the prince finds one wet lock, twirling it between his fingers.

And he starts with, of all things…

"Remember how, ten years ago…there was a volcanic eruption? Far out west?"

Mu Qing arches an eyebrow. "…Yes?"

"Well…" The prince bites his lip. "I had a dream, and I woke up just as the shockwave passed through Xianle."

Well. That's admittedly odd. But it was also years ago. Xie Lian would have only been seven years old.

"Was the dream that bad?"

"...That's the thing," Xie Lian winds that lock of hair around his finger a little faster. "It wasn't. It...it's my favorite dream that I have."

Implying that it's recurring.

Which is odd. Volcanos are never considered to be a good omen. Few even knew there WAS a volcano in the south west, but...

So much land must have bene abandoned for a reason--and more than a thousand years ago, no less.

"...What's it about?"

Xie Lian bites his lip, pulling his knees up against his chest, where he's sitting on a stool in front of his vanity. "It always starts out dark, where I can't see a thing...and then..."

"What?"

"Butterflies," Xie Lian mumbles. "They're everywhere."

"...You're losing sleep because you're dreaming about butterflies?" Mu Qing questions flatly, and Xie Lian's cheeks...

Well, to the servant's surprise, they get a little pink.

"No!" He twirls that lock of hair round and round his finger. "But they're beautiful, Mu Qing." His voice gets quiet, awestruck from talking about it. "Silver, and they glow in the darkness. That's when I start following them, and..." He trails off, and Mu Qing can't help but notice...

That blush isn't getting any less noticeable.

"...And what?"

"There's...a..."

Xie Lian is forced to stop when that lock of hair is wound all the way up his finger, and when he lets it go, it curls loosely.

"...a man, there," the prince mumbles, seeming a little sheepish.

Mu Qing pauses, comb held aloft.

"A man." He repeats flatly.

Xie Lian's eyes meet his in the mirror, and he has the sense to look a little embarrassed.

"You shouldn't be losing any sleep over a man, your highness."

"It's not like that!" Xie Lian shakes his head vehemently, finding another lock of hair to pull at anxiously.

"I've never met him! And..." He sends Mu Qing a look that is riddled with an uncharacteristic level of anxiety, "It's not like I'm a princess or something, it's not...something...inappropriate..."

Right.

Mu Qing keeps forgetting the prince hasn't come to terms with that.

He figured out that Xie Lian had no interest in women about three weeks into working for him. Three years since, and the prince seems to be aware of that fact as well–but terrified of admitting it.

Understandable, but still.

"And does this man happen to be good looking?"

"..." Xie Lian tilts his chin down, nodding. "He's...handsome," the prince admits.

Mu Qing is a little bit suspicious that the King and Queen might be a little too stuffy to have certain...conversations with their son.

It isn't weird for a teenage boy to have...intense dreams.

Sure, with his cultivation method, it's not like Xie Lian needs a full blown 'talk.'

Mu Qing's own mother didn't really have one with him either, but the circumstances were slightly different, and they both knew a conversation wasn't necessary.

Still...

"But it's odd." Xie Lian mumbles, pulling his finger away from another newly formed curl.

Mu Qing sighs, trying to think of a way to say that it isn't 'odd,' wondering if that's even his place, when–

"It's like he knows me," Xie Lian whispers. "But I've never met him before."

And despite his insistence that it isn't like that, it...

...Well, it sounds very much like that.

And Mu Qing finds himself inexplicably relieved to hear that it's someone the prince has never met.

"What happens next?"

"...He kneels before me, kisses my hand..."

All normal ways to greet a prince, it's somewhat by the book.

"...And then he tells me to wait," Xie Lian frowns, his brow creasing. "That's when I wake up. Every single time."

Mu Qing frowns.

Well. That sounds somewhat unlike a...teenage boy kind of dream, and more like a...

"I think it means something," the prince murmurs. "I've been having the dream more and more lately, and..." He glances back at Mu Qing over his shoulder. "I feel like something is about to happen. Like...I'm going to meet him."

"Meet...the butterfly man," Mu Qing repeats slowly.

"...Well, that's obviously not his name."

Mu Qing bites back a smile. "Dream man didn't tell you that?"

"No," the prince murmurs, resting his chin on his knees. "I asked, but...it was like he couldn't answer me."

Mu Qing falls silent, contemplative.

Xie Lian sighs, looking away from the mirror. "I'm tired–you must be too. We should both rest, okay?"

"..." The servant sets down the comb with a nod, picking up Xie Lian's boots as he heads for the door. "Sweet dreams, dianxia."

The prince blushes outright this time.

"Mu Qing!" He whines, but the door is already closing, leaving the younger teenager in the hallway, snickering.

It might be a little mean, teasing him, but...

Xie Lian never gets embarrassed like that. Never lets loose, or acts like a normal kid.

Sometimes, it's like he doesn't realize that he actually is a child. Not quite a man yet.

And while he thinks he's sent Mu Qing to bed, he's just given the servant a slightly early start on his nightly chores.

Preparing for the next day, re-shining his boots.

He finishes up with running the breakfast order to the kitchens before heading back to his rooms, and on his way there...

Feng Xin is slightly sweaty–understandably so, it's three kilometers around the perimeter of the grounds, and he just ran that three times over–rubbing the back of his neck as he walks down the hall. Likely to go to the baths, then to bed.

There's a welt on his cheek.

"..."

They stop in the hallway, staring at one another.

After all, it's rare that they're ever alone.

Mu Qing is slightly unkempt himself. Sleeves rolled up to the elbow, hair a little scraggly after cleaning for the last hour or so.

And he wants to ask...

...It's stupid, but Mu Qing wants to ask Feng Xin if he's alright.

But he doesn't find the words to say that out loud.

Instead...

"...C'mon," the servant mutters, turning on his heel, leaving Feng Xin standing there, staring in confusion.

"Huh?"

"You heard me."

Mu Qing doesn't look back, his ponytail bouncing behind him lightly as he walks toward the kitchens. "Move your ass."

Feng Xin's eyes narrow slightly with irritation, and yet...

Well, he follows after him, shoulders hunched as Mu Qing leads him to...

The kitchens.

Empty now—the cooks won't arrive for a few more hours, anyway.

Mu Qing reaches for a few ingredients, tossing them into a bowl in near silence as Feng Xin watches, neither speaking a word.

They always keep a small fire going in the night, burning low under the stoves.

As such, he's able to place a pot over one of them without an issue.

“...” Feng Xin watches the mixture bubble with a raised eyebrow. “What are you doing?”

“Shut up.” Mu Qing mutters, grabbing a second bowl, throwing in a few more ingredients, mashing them up into a paste.

Feng Xin falls silent again, none too thrilled about it, trying to figure out how this relates to the prince, because that's the only reason the two of them are ever together —

Or, well—this could be a prank, but he can't figure out how, and Mu Qing doesn't seek him out for that.

He's like a cat that will knock something valuable off of the counter if it happens to be in his path.

He's more interested in crimes of opportunity.

Having finished whatever it is he's doing, Mu Qing turns his head to look at Feng Xin contemplatively.

Mu Qing is almost seventeen, still in the middle of a late growth spurt, and at nineteen, Feng Xin is as tall as he's going to get.

And he's not going to stretch up, or actually ask the idiot to bend down, so...

He hops up onto the kitchen counter, the bowl in hand.

"Come here."

"..." Feng Xin watches him reluctantly, and Mu Qing rolls his eyes.

"I'm not gonna fucking bite you, but if you wanna be a baby about it..."

That inspires some irritated grumbling, but the teenager steps over until his hip brushes lightly against Mu Qing's knee.

Which he doesn't seem to notice. And Mu Qing doesn't either.

Obviously.

He dips two fingers into the bowl, bringing them up to the welt on Feng Xin's cheek. The guard doesn't wince, even though it must hurt, he just raises an eyebrow.

"What is this stuff?"

"...It'll make the swelling go down by the time he wakes up," Mu Qing mutters.

It’s an easy deflection. Obviously, Xie Lian would be upset to find out that Feng Xin got slapped over the incident.

Hiding it from him is easier.

Obviously.

“…” Feng Xin seems to accept the answer, looking over towards the pot sitting on the stove. “What’s that for, then?”

Mu Qing blinks, setting the bowl with the makeshift salve down. “Congee.”

“…How is that supposed to help?”

The servant stares at him like he’s stupid.

“You just ran for what, two hours straight?” He questions dryly, “Were you seriously going to go to bed without eating anything?”

Feng Xin stares at him, his expression frozen and blank, gears moving slowly in his head.

“…You made me congee.”

Mu Qing isn’t looking at him.

He’s wiping the mixture off of his fingertips with a rag, and grumbling. “Honest to fucking god, you’re a grown ass man, I shouldn’t have to tell you to eat something after that.”

Feng Xin’s expression hasn’t changed.

“You made me congee,” he repeats, eyes locked on his face.

Mu Qing carries on, not paying attention to what he’s saying, “And it was my sister he went out to see today, so if anyone found out why, it would’ve been my ass. I don’t wanna owe a stupid prick like you.”

He finally does stop talking when Feng Xin’s hand lands on his shoulder.

Finally, he stops, looking up, and…

Feng Xin is staring down at him intently, and he repeats it one more time…his voice noticeably softer.

“You made me congee.”

“...How many times are you gonna fucking say that?” Mu Qing mutters.

But now...it’s...

Congee isn’t particularly hard to make. And it isn’t fancy, either. It’s not a particularly big gesture, except for the fact that...

It’s the only thing Feng Xin eats for breakfast in the morning. Ever. Even with the array of dishes that gets sent up each morning.

And now, Mu Qing can’t seem to shut up.

“And the stuff was already out for breakfast in the morning, I didn’t go out of my way or anything, so don’t go and get any—!”

It’s not exactly like Feng Xin decided to do it.

At first, he just wanted to make him shut up.

Which he did.

With his mouth.

Leaving Mu Qing frozen, eyes wide, his hands holding the lip of the counter in a death grip.

Feng Xin’s lips are just a little bit chapped, but warm against his own. Insistent too, even if they’re slightly clumsy.

And it’s...

Slightly terrifying.

Because it’s easy to hide what you’re thinking, to hide that you want something, when you aren’t under strict scrutiny.

Mu Qing didn’t realize how badly he wanted to be kissed until it actually happened.

And now he’s here.

He’s here, and his heart is pounding, and he can’t breathe.

He’s here, and it feels like there’s a balloon swelling in his chest.

If it explodes, he might die.

They're both frozen for a moment. Mu Qing with an avalanche of self revelation, and Feng Xin, realizing what he did.

And Mu Qing—ever sarcastic, guarded, slightly vindictive Mu Qing—

"…You're really sweaty," he mumbles.

Which sounds like something that might be a complaint, but he doesn't say it that way.

His voice is a little small, though not upset, just…

Nervous.

Like a boy who just got kissed for the first time.

And it might be Feng Xin's first time kissing someone, but he's older. Supposedly more worldly. And he'd rather die than admit to that.

Instead, he answers rather intelligently—

"You still have grass in your hair."

This time, it's harder to say who leans in. Just that someone does.

Mu Qing's lips part under his, trembling slightly. The movements are slow, awkward —then clumsy and rushed.

But good.

His hands are in Feng Xin's hair, and it's good.

Feng Xin's hands are on his waist, and they're warm.

Mu Qing doesn't know it right now. That over the next eight centuries, this is the only boy that he's going to kiss.

Usually when he's angry, or hurting.

Over time, he'll forget that their first kiss was the sweetest.

It lingers too long for either of them to call it a mistake. It can't be labeled as impulsive either. Not when it's a series of decisions.

Feng Xin, pressing closer. Mu Qing's knees slighting farther apart. His lips parting, and Feng Xin's tongue peeking between, drawing a gasp.

Feng Xin seems to decide at one point that it's too good to pull away. Mu Qing comes to the parallel conclusion that he doesn't want him to.

The frantic rush of it all won't come until the next time. This is...

Touching without a destination in mind.

With every brush of Feng Xin's mouth comes with a question:

Is this okay?

Should we stop?

Mu Qing thinks it is, and doesn't ever want to.

But eventually, they do.

When there's the faint clang in the distance—probably one of the cooks arriving to start breakfast preparations.

The two jump apart—well, Mu Qing can't do more than lean away, but Feng Xin practically leaps back, hair standing on end, blushing from ear to ear.

They sit in silence for a moment, wide eyed and breathless, staring at one another, unable to think of what to say.

Eventually, Feng Xin blurts out—

"I'm sorry!"

Mu Qing doesn't respond, lips still slightly parted, a usually overactive brain struggling to catch up.

The guard turns to go, then stops, remembering—

Then, he's fumbling for one of the extra bowls, snatching a spoon.

He barely manages to ladle himself a serving before one of the cooks walks in, raising an eyebrow. "What are you two doing down here so late?"

Feng Xin jumps at the sound of her voice, his shoulders hunching, and he barely manages to blurt out—

"Thanks for the congee!"

There is something mildly hilarious about the way that he makes a beeline for the door, running into it and nearly spilling the rice porridge all over himself before slipping out.

The cook stares after him, sending Mu Qing a curious look. “What’s gotten into him?”

Mu Qing shrugs, looking away. “A girl tried to hold hands with him in the village today. He might be in the process of faking his death to escape the embarrassment as we speak.”

That draws a soft laugh from her.

“You’re too hard on him, you know,” she points out gently. “He’s a good lad. Just a little thick headed.”

Mu Qing knows that.

He’d rather die than say so, but he does.

“And you should be in bed, little dove.” She adds, tying an apron around her waist. “You’ll be lucky if you get more than an hour of sleep at this rate. Go on.”

Mu Qing shrugs, looking down at his feet. “I’m not a little kid anymore…” he points out quietly.

“Bah,” the cook sighs, reaching over to pinch his cheek. “Could’ve fooled me, with that sulky expression of yours. Take a bun with you, understand? There’s hardly any meat on those bones.”

All of the women in the kitchen treat him like that—but then again, they’ve known him since he started here, back when he was only twelve years old.

He does take the bun, but he hardly eats it. Laying in bed, staring at the ceiling.

Occasionally brushing his fingertips over bruised lips, curling up on his side.

‘You still have grass in your hair.’

He reaches up to feel for it, but…

Feng Xin must’ve brushed it off already.

Is it going to be different tomorrow?

Will they say anything?

Will it be worse if they don't?

He barely sleeps at all, and the next morning—Feng Xin doesn't wake up to a boot slamming against his head, or a kick against his door.

They're both quiet, looking anywhere but each other, and...

The day before—the stupid festival, the fireworks, walking home after, even that brief lapse in sanity in the kitchens—

It was a good day. Like...

What it might have been like, if the three of them were normal teenagers, and the world wasn't complicated.

But they aren't.

He's reminded of that when the palace seamstresses drop off the robes for the mid autumn festival for the final fitting.

When he's busy placing flowers in the prince's hair, arranging his sleeves as the Queen stands off to the side, examining the costume's details.

"Oh, darling..." she smiles, her eyes brimming with pride. "You look perfect."

"Well," Xie Lian pushes his hair behind his ears, trying not to get in Mu Qing's way. "They don't have the mask finished yet—"

"And when it is, that will be perfect too," The Queen waves him off. "You always are."

The performance will be perfect, naturally. The entire day will go off without a hitch, because—

Because it's Xie Lian. And Xie Lian is perfect.

That's easy to stomach, coming from a mother to her son. Even if it seems to make the prince a little tense, but...

When Mu Qing's gaze slides towards the door—

He sees him watching.

Or—

The better way of saying it is that he sees the way Feng Xin is watching.

Eyes trailing over the prince's face, the jewels in his hair, the graceful poise of his arms.

It's more than simple admiration.

Mu Qing's fingers grow still.

In a distant way, he thinks to himself—

'Oh. That's fucked up.'

And it sounds so calm in his head. Unbothered.

But it isn't.

Because it's unfair, and terrifying, and vulnerable, and— Mu Qing doesn't have to hide it when his lips tremble.

Because no one is looking at him anyway.

'Why did you do that?'

That's all he can think about, watching him look at someone else like that.

'Why would you kiss me like that, and then look at him like this?'

But it's a necessary reminder:

That most of the time, you don't get what you want.

And it's hard not to look at that perfect face, the face of the boy who never gets mad, the boy who doesn't have any secrets—the boy that always gets what he wants—

It's hard not to look at that face, and hate him.

Just a little bit.

Then, he swallows it down.

ARTWORK INSPIRED BY THIS STORY (FENGQING EDITION)

Included with Permission from the Artists, do not repost or use for any reason.

Xie Lian + Suyin

CREDIT: EVE

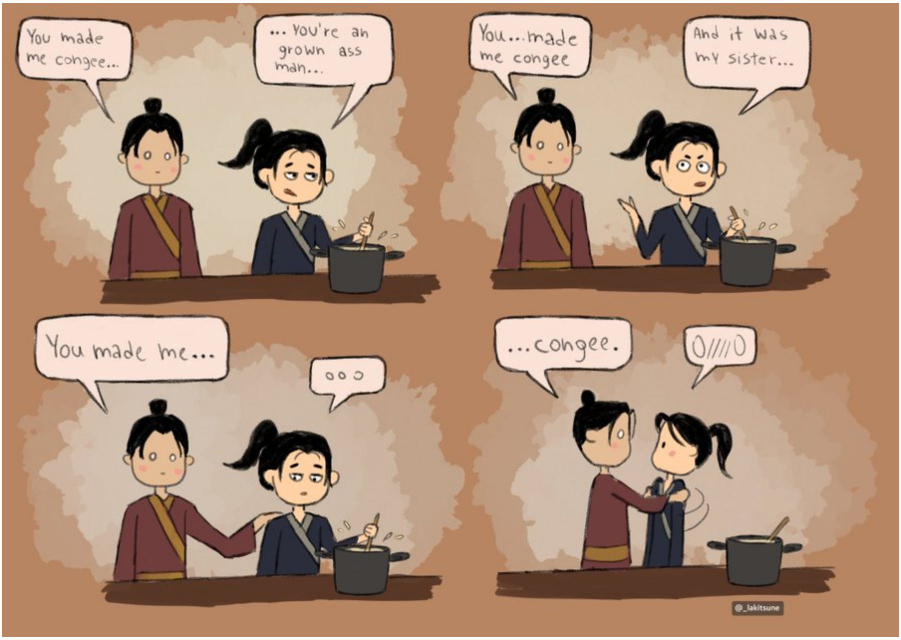
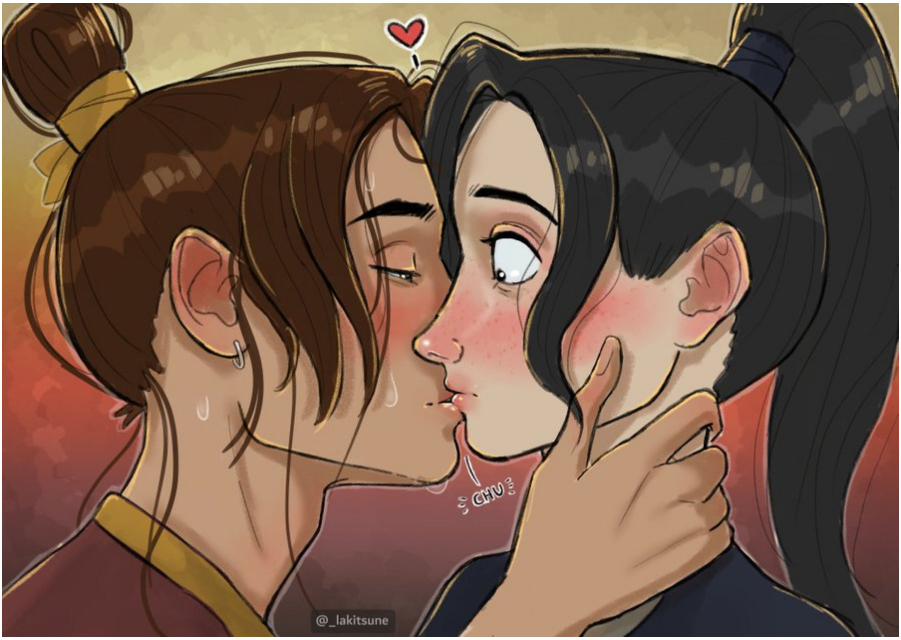
CREDIT: PANICKING_ARTIST



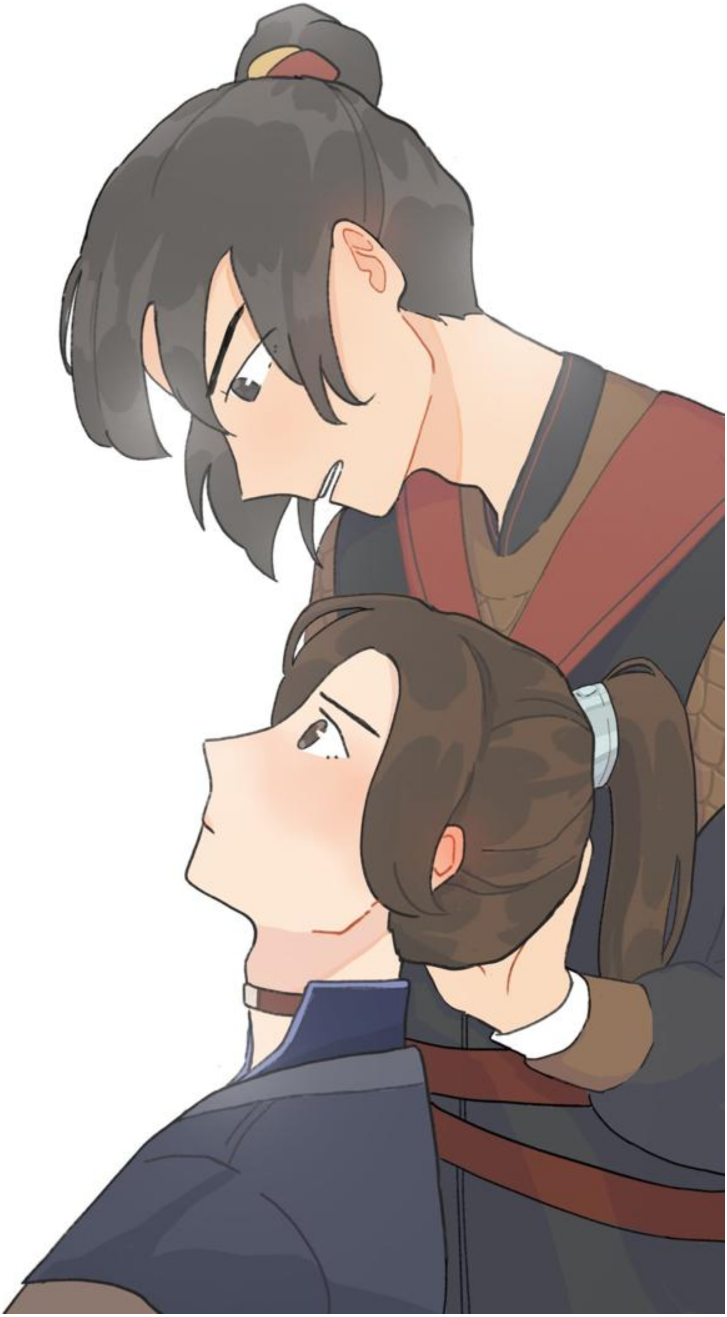
You made me congee...
... You're an grown ass man...
You... made me congee
And it was my sister...
You made me...
o o o
...congee.
O////O
@_lakitsune



CHU
@_lakitsune

CREDIT: LAKI

Nan Feng + Fu Yao (the Banyue hair pulling incident)



CREDIT: LILI

Chapter End Notes

Thank you to Eve, Laki, Lili, and panicking_artist for their beautiful artwork, and allowing me to include it!

This chapter is basically just a love letter to fengqing / the xianle trio, thank you for indulging me!

xoxo, Evie

It's Always Been You

Chapter Summary

> But that's the thing about perfection—it doesn't exist.
>
> When you assign that quality to a person, all you're doing is building a palace out of golden blocks.
>
> And one day, it's doomed to come tumbling down.
>
> Because one day, for the first time in Xie Lian's life…
>
> Things weren't perfect.
>
> The day his life changed forever, and he didn't even know it yet.
>
> The day when, after making three laps around the Grand Martial Avenue, all of the screaming and cheering seemed to go quiet.
>
> The day when a boy dropped from the sky like a falling star.

Chapter Notes

> No major content warnings necessary for this chapter, but! This is an important one!

See the end of the chapter for more notes

But that's the thing about perfection—it doesn't exist.

When you assign that quality to a person, all you're doing is building a palace out of golden blocks.

And one day, it's doomed to come tumbling down.

Because one day, for the first time in Xie Lian's life…

Things weren't perfect.

The day his life changed forever, and he didn't even know it yet.

The day when, after making three laps around the Grand Martial Avenue, all of the screaming and cheering seemed to go quiet.

The day when a boy dropped from the sky like a falling star.

And he would feel so ashamed later, to remember how, at the time, it didn't feel like he had done anything special. Other than the scolding he got after, the memory didn't stick out to him.

Not until later.

But for the little boy who fell, it was everything.

"Oi!" The kick is sharp, landing heavily against a small set of ribs, sending the little stray scurrying back from the street stand. "You think I'm supposed to believe a mongrel can pay?! Go on!"

The child lingers on the ground for a moment, holding his side.

"Are you deaf?!" The stall owner glares, "I'll kick that ugly little face of yours in if I see you near here again!"

There isn't a coherent reply from the boy, his head hanging low, and the man glares.

"Be a little more generous, love." His wife mutters from beside him. "He's the one who..."

The entire neighborhood remembers it, but scarcely speaks of what happened to the poor woman.

It's not something that bears repeating.

"Doesn't give him the right to be a little thief," her husband grouses, crossing his arms stubbornly.

"..." The Stall Owner's wife shakes her head, sending the boy a sympathetic look. "Why don't you go to the temple of the Heavenly Emperor? I hear they're giving out bread for the festival. Or...the procession always hands out sweets, how about that?"

The boy pulls himself to his feet, spitting blood onto the pavement before wiping his mouth with the back of his hand.

His movements are slow, stumbling.

He doesn't even look at her as he turns, moving back towards the crowds.

"Who cares," he mutters, keeping his head down.

He's gotten so used to being hungry, it's almost uncomfortable to feel the absence of it. He only tried to swipe an apple because his head has been so light today, but...

It doesn't matter.

He wanders through the screaming, cheering crowds.

None of it matters, and he won't pray to anyone.

That's one of the lessons from his mother that he's managed to keep with him, even if they become harder and harder to remember as time goes on.

You don't waste time, asking for gods to help you.

You look after yourself.

She only ever prayed in their old temple in Qinghe, but never once here, in Xianle.

When the boy asked why—she said there wasn't a temple for him here.

Though Hong'er never asked who 'he' was, he doesn't think that he cares.

All he knows is that the cheering is too loud.

And for what, he can’t imagine.

There’s absolutely nothing in this place worth celebrating.

Xianle is a wealthy city, it’s true—but unless you were born in a certain house, you’d never know it.

For those who aren’t so fortunate, life is a much more brutal existence. It makes them ungenerous, selfish, and cruel.

It doesn't leave room for a boy with no mother, no father, and no food. He's constantly crowded out, shoved away. Hiding like a rodent in the shadows of an alley, just to avoid being beaten.

Even the children here are hopeless. Driven to cynicism at such a young age.

Hong'er is unlucky, because he's ugly. People are even less generous with something they don't want to see.

And no one seems to want to see him, even now.

They grumble with irritation, shouldering him out of the way.

They all want to get closer to the front of the crowd. To see the show.

More accurately, to see the God Pleasing Warrior fight off the wicked Demon.

Saving the precious people of Xianle. Guaranteeing another year of good fortune.

What a joke.

They had the parade last year. They supposedly guaranteed good fortune last year.

But Hong'er's life was miserable last year. And it'll still be miserable this year, too.

But still, everyone around seems to genuinely believe it. Screaming, throwing flowers in the air.

That was something else his mother used to tell him.

Gripping his shoulders, looking him in the eye very seriously. "Don't believe anything, or anyone without a good reason."

Raising a child alone in a city was hard work, after all. Dangerous work.

He keeps on losing memories of her, the older he gets.

Hong'er is afraid that one day, she'll completely disappear from his thoughts.

Then there won't be anyone left to remember who cared about him. Who was kind to him.

Then, he'll really be alone.

But he remembers one thing.

The day they left. Before all of that walking.

Walking, walking, endless walking.

Now, Hong'er that he hadn't complained so much.

He remembers that last day when they were in Qinghe, when his mother, who had always been so cynical of gods and humans alike, asked him to pray.

Hong'er refused. He isn't used to big, grand places. The marble pillars and grand hall of the temple felt alien to him.

His mother went alone. Never forced him to believe in something that he didn't want, but when he returned, he asked a reasonable question, given what she had always taught him–

'Why believe in some martial god, anyway?'

Her answer was simple:

'He gave me a reason to.'

He envies that now.

Because she's gone, and he's alone. She's gone, and no one will look at him.

Even now, he finds himself getting pulled deeper through the crowd–like a pebble, lost in a current.

The only way to escape it, naturally, is to climb the city walls.

Other children are watching there too, elbowing one another as they try to get a better look at the soldiers. The flower maidens, dressed in silks and jewels tossing petals so high, mixing with that of the crowd–to the point where it's practically a rain shower of flowers.

"He's coming!"

"Would you shut up and move out of the way?!"

"They'll be around the corner any minute!"

The cheering is reaching a fever pitch, he's surrounded on all sides, and...

All Hong'er can feel, in that moment, is anger.

Angry at how selfish, stupid, and hungry people are.

At how idiotic it is, to put on a show like this. And for what? To make people think that the world is better than it is?

It isn't.

Awful things happen every day. And people just watch. They think they deserve to celebrate?

For a moment, there's just a desire to ruin it. To shatter that warm image of happiness and reveal it for what it really is.

That's what Hong'er has always done. He breaks things.

But it feels so much better when he's doing it on purpose. When he's in control.

And in that brief flicker of a moment, there's temptation. Staring at the edge of the wall and the plunge below, remembering something else his mother said, long ago.

'I think you'd be an adorable ghost–promise you'll haunt me forever, alright?'

She said that, but she was the one who ended up becoming a ghost.

Hong'er drifts closer, his eyes fixed on that edge.

And it seems better to ruin everything, to smash his fists against this scene and break it, to see her again, than...

The cheering builds to a thunderous roar.

And it isn't until then, that Hong'er actually looks at the parade below.

It isn't until then, that his entire life changes.

There are other figures, of course. The soldiers. The flower maidens. The demon to be vanquished.

But Hong'er doesn't see any of them.

There's just one person.

One person in the entire world.

And for a moment, he already feels like a ghost. Like his body was knocked away in the space of a moment, leaving him without breath or pulse.

Moving like water, long strands of hair streaming in the breeze.

Every step comes with ease, the gleam of his sword marking each movement as he dances through the streets, shining brighter than any of the jewels in his hair.

Hong'er feels caught by it.

Like a hook has sunk into him, and this impossible person is on the other end of the line.

His heart swells in his chest, lips trembling as he leans closer, jostled by the people around as he claws between them, desperate for just one look, just one more look, a small sound of panic escaping his throat when the figure disappears from view.

He needs, he–he just needs to see–

The person in front of him steps away suddenly, when he wasn't expecting it, and he's sent tumbling forward, until...

There's screaming.

It takes him a moment to realize what for, but...then, the wind is rushing past his hair, and pulling in his stomach, like...

Freefall.

He's falling.

And there isn't fear in that moment. Not at all. Just...

Regret.

Hong'er hadn't expected to feel that, before his death.

He's wanted to die so many times, but now, staring up at the sky, feeling it as the ground rushes closer, he just--he just wants...

Thump!

The boy slams into something solid with a thud, but...not the ground.

Ba-bump.

A white jade mask falls away, and the world with it.

Now, the screaming is deafening, but not the same as before.

Not out of fear, or excitement.

No, this–this is euphoria.

'DIANXIA! DIANXIA! DIANXIA!'

But it all fades into a low buzz in Hong'er's ears, his eye wide, focused on the face above his own.

A face adored by so many. Revered in poems and song. Every artist, musician, and author has tried to put the essence of such beauty to words.

For Hong'er, only three come to mind.

'This is it.'

Just those three, his heart hammering in his chest.

'DIANXIA! DIANXIA! DIANXIA!'

This is it.

Deep in his heart, no, his soul, he knows.

Hong'er has never had any love for himself. The world never allowed it.

He's ugly, hateful, and selfish. He always has been.

And, he's always said so.

Sometimes, he's even said the words: 'I never should have been born.'

There was nothing he ever did that made his mother so angry. Gripping him by the shoulders, and saying—

‘Hong’er, look at me.’

A hand envelopes his trembling fingers, squeezing them soothingly.

‘Your life will never be easy.’

When they land, it’s impossibly graceful.

Hong’er is barely even jostled by it, despite falling from such great height. And still, it feels like he’s falling.

‘But you are stronger—and braver—than you could ever understand.’

Those eyes are like living gold, staring down at him with such warmth, he can hardly breathe.

‘And I know, with all my heart—fate put you on this earth for a reason.’

The Crown Prince of Xianle smiles down at him softly, trying to speak over the roar of the crowds, but it’s no use.

‘My brave Hong Hong’er—you were born for a reason.’

“DIANXIA! DIANXIA! DIANXIA!”

In that moment, he knows:

This is it.

The arm around him squeezes gently, holding him completely secure against the prince’s side.

This is what he was born for.

He doesn’t know why, and he doesn’t know how—but everything he’ll ever be, everything he’ll ever do—

It’s for him.

The prince glances back towards the rest of the procession, and Hong’er suddenly squeezes his hand back, getting those eyes to return to him.

‘Look at me.’

He’s selfish, and greedy, and hungry.

‘Don’t ever stop looking at me.’

“...” The prince smiles at him, gently reassuring.

He lifts his sword with one arm, holding the child's trembling form against him with the other, whispering;

"Don't be scared."

He isn't.

This is the first time in two years that someone has touched him without cruel intentions.

The first time in just as long that he's felt...safe.

Not jostled for even a moment as the prince holds him close, fighting with one hand without a single hint of strain.

And when it's over, the screams of the crowd are unmatched. But Hong'er doesn't hear.

All he sees is that smile, the halo of petals around his head.

...Almost like a crown of flowers.

Centuries later, he will relive his.

He'll jump down into a pit, just to catch his savior when he falls down again.

He'll fight a demon, while cradling this man in his arms.

But that is a hundred lifetimes away. With countless years of longing and suffering and waiting in between.

For now, all he can do is stare, clinging closer. Shivering when the prince's other arm wraps around him, carrying him through the street.

"Are you alright?"

Hong'er doesn't answer. Can't seem to find his voice at the moment, cautiously pressing his cheek against taizi dianxia's sleeve.

"..." Xie Lian holds him close, rubbing a hand up and down his back soothingly as guards surround them, leading them away from the crowds.

The demon from before slips free from his own mask, pushing sweat soaked locks of hair from his forehead as he sends the crown prince an annoyed stare.

"What were you thinking?"

Hong'er frowns, gripping the prince's hand a little tighter.

Who is he, to talk to him like that?

"What was I supposed to do?" Xie Lian tilts his head, "I couldn't let him get hurt."

It's baffling to hear.

It's been so long since anyone cared if he was alive at all, much less if he was injured.

"And if I had left him back there, he would have been trampled," Xie Lian explains with a shrug, glancing down at the child once more, looking him over. "I think he's just shaken up."

"Understandably so," a nearby guard mutters, stepping over. "Do we know where his parents are?"

Still, Hong'er doesn't reply.

That seems to worry the prince somewhat, but in this situation...there's little he can do personally.

"I have to deal with my parents and the Guoshi...could you take him away from here? Getting somewhere quiet might help him calm down."

Feng Xin nods, reaching over to take him when Xie Lian tries to hand the child over.

"...Aren't you going to take him?" The prince frowns, to which Feng Xin grits his teeth, his eyes narrowing slightly with effort.

"I'm trying, but...this little...he...doesn't want to let go!"

Xie Lian can feel as much from the way the child is clinging to his sleeves—and he sighs, offering the boy a patient smile.

“I know you’re scared,” he murmurs, rubbing his back. “But Feng Xin won’t hurt you. And I’m afraid I still have more work to be done.”

‘Don’t.’

That’s all he can think, staring up at him.

Selfish, selfish, selfish.

Don’t go. Don’t stop looking at me.

I just got you. I don’t want it to be over yet.

But slowly, however reluctantly, Hong’er let’s go, allowing himself to be carried away in the guard’s arms.

Still, he looks back over Feng Xin’s shoulder, watching the prince’s shrinking form—

And that feeling in his chest hasn’t changed.

A deep, unshakeable knowledge that Hong’er’s purpose lies with him.

That he’ll see him again.

But next time, the terms will be different.

That’s what he tells himself,

And the rest of Hong’er’s life, all of the years that he draws breath, is defined by the moments he spends with the crown prince of Xianle—and the moments of aching in between.

The next time he sees him—it’s through a veil of fear and pain.

And it’s dianxia, saving him again.

Even when all Hong’er can seem to do is break things. Even when he isn’t trying to.

Even when a building is set on fire, malicious spirits are released, and all anyone can seem to do is blame him.

Hong’er hasn’t pleaded before, but he did then.

That he wasn’t cursed, even if, in part, some small voice in his head was always saying it was true.

And unlike every other time in his life, where he was cast aside, called hideous, scorned and recoiled from like a deformed beast—

The prince just held him close.

“I know,” he whispered. “I know you’re not.”

And it was the third time they met, when everything seemed to fall into place. Which makes sense.

Throughout Hong'er's years on earth, the third time will always be the charm. When he's standing in a temple, more lost than ever.

Asking for a reason. For meaning.

Later, with a note of sheepishness, his god will tell him that these words were arrogant.

Foolish.

'If you can't find meaning, please—allow me to be that meaning.'

In that moment—it was as though Hong'er's life finally made sense.

All while the world rapidly seemed to be learning a lesson:

That Xianle wasn't as invincible as it seemed. That their crown prince was not as perfect as he pretended to be.

It changes nothing, however, for Hong'er.

Because he never needed him to be perfect.

And Xie Lian—

Maybe he was arrogant when he was young. Had a tendency towards delusions of grandeur.

But he always knew that he wasn't perfect.

It was only when he began to fail, for the first time in his life, that he felt afraid.

Because then—everyone else knew it, too.

There were no more festivals. No more nights laying under the stars, counting until his eyes began to feel heavy.

Feng Xin buried a father. Mu Qing a sister. And Xie Lian—

Xie Lian watched so many faces, young, bright, and full of hope, walk onto the battlefield.

For him.

And he watched so many of them come back, only to be laid down in a grave. Over and over again.

To the point where he can't look at them anymore.

To the point where he feels himself beginning to change.

Becoming so angry, so frustrated, so— So helpless.

And Xie Lian expected to be blamed for failing. When his people began to cry out in frustration, he understood it.

What he never expected, not in a hundred years, was for the Heavens to blame him for trying.

His visits become more limited—and noticeably strained. His deputies stand by him, as is expected. But otherwise... The other gods avoid him, when possible.

Treat him like a bad omen.

And, as time goes on, they begin to view him with his newfound reputation in mind:

A god of misfortune.

Still, there is one willing to speak to him.

And it leaves many scandalized, on the eve of the prince of Xianle's trial, that a martial god of such high rank would pay him a personal visit in his Heavenly Palace.

Xie Lian doesn't look up from his calligraphy when the door opens, his posture tense. "Who is it?"

"Your highness."

The sound of that voice is enough to make him lift his chin, startled.

"...General Ming Guang," he murmurs, gripping his calligraphy brush just a little tighter. "Have you come to bring me to the trial?"

The Martial God of the North shakes his head.

"His highness the emperor has requested a private meeting with you before all of that," he shrugs, his arms crossed.

In spite of being so similar in rank and strength, they haven't interacted much since Xie Lian's ascension.

He finds himself regretting that now.

Maybe things were always meant to turn out this way, but—

Part of Xie Lian wonders if it might have been different, if he had asked for help.

Still, it's too late for that.

"Are you here to bring me to him, then?"

"...I doubt you need an escort, your highness."

"..." Xie Lian sets the brush down, turning his head to give Pei his full attention. "Then why are you here?"

"...I didn't think I would have the chance to discuss it with you later," Pei admits with a small shrug. "But I plan on entering your territory."

"...Xianle?" Xie Lian questions flatly. "Why would you want to go there?"

If his intention is to help, that would be maddeningly hilarious.

The war is already over. He already lost.

"...I've been looking for someone, and I now have reason to think they're in the central plains."

Xie Lian finally looks in his direction, raising an eyebrow. "Someone from your territory?"

Pei seems slightly hesitant, but...

He nods.

The prince arches an eyebrow. "...A mortal?"

The general stands a little straighter.

"Last I checked, having relationships with them isn't a crime."

No, it isn't. Not unless you decide to do something more than watch them suffer. Then, you're a criminal.

Xie Lian is slightly bitter.

"And what makes you think this person is in Xianle?"

The tone in Pei's voice surprises him.

"Because it's the only place where I haven't looked."

It's that of…naked worry.

Xie Lian slides back from his table, silks and jewels tinkling softly as he looks at Pei full on.

"General, this sounds like a serious matter for you."

Xie Lian, of course, won't remember this conversation very much as the centuries go on. A moment in a fairly painful time in his life, years that Xie Lian would work very hard to forget—

But Pei Ming won't forget the sympathy. The lack of judgment.

"…She ended things years ago," the description makes Xie Lian's eyes widen slightly. "She would still pray, on occasion—to let me know that she was alright, but…"

The General's shoulders slump.

"One day, she stopped. I started looking soon after that."

It's shocking to hear Pei admit he had that sort of relationship with a mortal woman.

(Of course, if Xie Lian had paid any attention to the gossip in the Heavenly Realm during his time as an official, he would have known the affair was not the part that was shocking. It was the fact that the woman was the one who ended it—and that Pei had continued to worry for her welfare after the fact.)

And while he does feel sympathy, privately, he does think that falling in love with a mortal sounds like a terrible idea.

Xie Lian hasn't had to mourn someone dear to him before. No close friends or relatives. He thinks of the fact that he'll one day outlive his parents with distant dread.

The thought of falling in love with a mortal, then losing them—the prospect of such grief seems overwhelming.

"…If she was in Xianle, I'm afraid her odds of survival wouldn't have been particularly high," the prince admits, trying to avoid sounding particularly self pitying when he speaks. "We didn't have only the war to contend with, after all."

The plague took far more.

Pei bows his head. "I understand that. But I have to know, even if she..."

Xie Lian understands what he means, even if he doesn't say so explicitly.

Even if she was the one who walked away—the General doesn't want to feel as though he...abandoned her.

It's a horrible feeling.

Being all powerful, and still being unable to protect that which you love.

Xie Lian understands.

His lips turn up at the corners, slightly bitter.

"Well, you hardly need my permission to entire Xianle after today. I doubt that anyone does."

Pei watches him for a moment, then lifts his chin.

"If I were to enter a martial god's territory without announcing my intentions, that would only be because I no longer respected the man."

"..." Xie Lian looks away, fighting to hide the emotions on his face, his throat tight.

"...I should go and see the emperor, before the trial starts," he mutters, rising to his feet. "But..." he glances over at Pei Ming one last time.

The next time they meet, he won't be able to see the General's face.

"If you tell me her name, I can check with my deputies."

After all—Feng Xin has been left in charge of dealing with what remains of the Xianle army, but Mu Qing has been handling a growing refugee crisis. If the woman Pei is looking for is alive—it's not impossible that he's encountered her.

The general hesitates, at first.

But finally, he answers.

“Qing Yuan.”

Xie Lian takes mental note of that, and Pei adds—

“She was the same height as you—dark hair, gray eyes, with a small scar on the right side of her jaw. High born—and she spoke like it, too.”

Basic, identifying features.

“...Do you have any idea why she would have stopped speaking to you?” Xie Lian questions softly, adjusting his sleeves as he prepares to leave.

The general bites the inside of his cheek, regretful.

“No,” he admits. “But she is a proud woman. Often to her own detriment… I suspect it has something to do with that.”

“...” Xie Lian nods, making his way towards the door. “I wish you the best of luck then, General. May Heaven’s blessings be upon you.”

Pei’s smile is tinged with a sense of foreboding.

Somewhat frightened by what he might find.

Still, he completes the phrase:

“And by Heaven Official’s Blessing, No Paths are Bound.”

But the news awaiting him when he descends upon Xianle is as cruel as what Xie Lian himself learns upon checking with Mu Qing on his way to the Imperial Palace.

That there was a young woman by that name, matching Pei Ming’s description in the capital city. But Mu Qing doesn’t know that name because he encountered a refugee.

He knows that name, because before the war, most of the working class in the city had heard of what happened.

The young woman known as Qing Yuan had been living in the warehouse district. A former concubine, still known to do such work, but not as a sole occupation. People also knew her to have worked in bookkeeping with a local merchant.

At one point, she was even the assistant to the instructor at a local academy. Intelligent, capable, and hardworking.

But, unfortunately for her—Qing Yuan's past erased the chance for any future. Apparently, when she came to Xianle...it was to flee her husband.

A violent man.

A wealthy one, as it turned out. One who was willing to do whatever it took, to find her once more.

And when he did...

It resulted in one of the most gruesome scenes to rock the streets of Xianle, even with the war and plague that would come.

Mu Qing spares the worst details.

But what he does mention, the detail in the story that makes Xie Lian's heart break for Ming Guang—

It's that Qing Yuan's son saw the entire thing.

A boy of just seven years old.

He disappears from the record soon after that. Likely killed like his mother—or dead, in the war.

A miserable story, riddled with pain and misfortune.

It almost makes Xie Lian wonder if there was some point, to the idea that gods should never interfere in the lives with mortals.

A point that only feels more clear now, standing before the entrance to the Imperial Palace.

It's only been three years since his first ascension. Xie Lian was seventeen then. So excited, so proud.

And all he wanted, more than anything, was the acknowledgement of the god above the rest.

His friend, his mentor—his emperor—Jun Wu. He wanted so badly to seem grown up.

But now, standing before the gates to his palace—Xie Lian feels like he's still an ungrateful, oversized child, waiting for a scolding.

That's not what awaits him, however, when he steps inside.

The emperor is facing away from him, cross legged on the ground.

There's a screen on the back wall of the imperial palace, one that can be pulled back to reveal the gardens below, as it is now.

Endless rows of flowers.

They used to dazzle the young prince. He could lay there for hours, speaking with the emperor about the world below.

It was quiet, peaceful, even.

The only times from the Heavens that Xie Lian ever finds himself looking back on with some measure of fondness.

After all, Jun Wu was a man with the entire world upon his shoulders, but he would take the time to spend an afternoon with him.

A signal that, even among gods, Xie Lian was special.

Leaning his head against the emperor's leg as he laid back against the grass, flowers in his hair, talking on, and on, and on.

But those times are long since passed.

Jun Wu simply watches the flowers, remembering.

There's a sadness to him now.

Xie Lian presumes it must be from disappointment.

Or dread, even, of what's to come.

(And it is. For what is to come. For what he is going to do.)

"You asked to see me?"

(For how far things will go.)

"Yes," the emperor murmurs. "I did."

Xie Lian stands there, silent. Unsure of what this conversation will bring, but knowing it isn't likely to change his predicament.

“You must know that you’re facing conviction.” Jun Wu murmurs, not turning his head.

Xie Lian grits his teeth. “I have a defense, your majesty.”

“Good intentions are not a defense, Xianle,” the reply is quiet, and it makes him flinch. “The road to hell is paved with them.”

He swallows thickly, his hands balled into tight fists behind his back. “It had nothing to do with my intentions,” he mutters.

“There was someone else involved—”

“Bai Wuxiang,” Jun Wu recalls calmly. “You’ve told me.”

“...” Xie Lian’s brows knit together. “Then you should understand. We should be out trying to find him, not wasting time—”

“He will trouble the people of Xianle no more.”

That makes the prince pause.

“What...” He stares at the back of Jun Wu’s head, confusion and frustration boiling inside. “What do you mean?!”

“Calamities are drawn to suffering and pain, Xianle.” Jun Wu stares at the flowers.

The emperor is tired.

“They cannot help it.”

Xie Lian takes a step back, unable to understand what he means. “Are you... sympathetic to him?”

“Of course not,” the emperor shakes his head. “But when a rule is broken, fate will bring a consequence.”

The weight of it is dawning, like a wave beginning to crest.

He can see it, looking down upon him.

And god, he wants to run from it so badly.

“...Are you trying to say that I did this?”

Xie Lian has been called a god of misfortune with increasing frequency in the last few months. A calamity in his own right.

But he never believed it.

Because he knew the truth. He saw the white clothed calamity, standing across the field.

He saw how Lang Ying was protected, over and over again, with the aura of a hero— For a man who, while complicated, and not entirely a villain—

He wasn't a hero either. He couldn't be.

Because if he was, that would make Xie Lian the villain.

That would make him the one who...

His stomach starts falling, and it never stops.

A perfect prince. A perfect son. A perfect god.

"...I didn't do this," he croaks, taking another step back.

Jun Wu won't look at him.

A villain. A curse. A failure.

"We'll never know what would have been, if you had not interfered." The emperor murmurs. "But Bai Wuxiang was brought forth, because you did."

No.

Xie Lian's hands clap over his mouth.

No, no, no.

He—

All he sees now, are those faces.

Young men, marching to their deaths.

'To die for the Crown Prince is our greatest honor.'

An honor.

He—

Jun Wu hears the quiet sounds of distress. The tears the young man is shedding, bordering on hyperventilation.

Still, he doesn't look.

"The punishment will be exile."

Xie Lian sinks to his knees, hands gripping either side of his head.

How could he have done this?

How could this have been him, when all he ever wanted was to—?

"You will be given a cursed shackle," Jun Wu continues. "And forced to wander, until when and if you ascend again."

The prince is barely listening, just trying to breathe, hands trembling. If...if that was true...

Why didn't Xie Lian listen…before so many people got hurt?

He—

"But it does not have to be that way," Jun Wu murmurs. "There is another option."

Xie Lian stares, tear stricken. "...There is?"

"Instead of going into outright exile, or losing your godhood, you could choose to make a sacrifice." Jun Wu explains softly. "A chance to make amends, and start anew."

Xie Lian pauses, his lips trembling. "What is it?" He whispers.

"Your name." Jun Wu explains calmly. "The new kingdom of Yong'an will still need a martial god, after all. No one needs to know that it's you."

Xie Lian listens, frozen and numb.

"A masked martial god would make a rather mysterious sight, people might like it."

Xie Lian reaches down to touch his cheeks with trembling fingertips.

"Of course," Jun Wu leans back on one palm, finally turning his head to glance back at Xie Lian's face, "to be without a name makes one Wu Ming."

It's a new life, laid out as a possibility.

Wu Ming, the masked Martial God of the Central Plains.

Slayer of the rotten, cursed Prince of Xianle.

"...And that would be...I could never...go back?" Xie Lian mutters, his cheeks wet.

The emperor watches those tears closely, and he shakes his head.

"It would be permanent."

Of course, Jun Wu would know who he was. Jun Wu would be the only one allowed to see his face.

Xie Lian doesn't see the offer as an eternal Gilded cage, as it's intended to be.

But still, his answer is the same.

"...No," he croaks, shaking his head. "I can't do that."

Jun Wu raises an eyebrow as the crown prince wraps his arms around himself, taking shuddering breaths.

"I would never see my parents again," Xie Lian whispers. "Or Feng Xin, or Mu Qing. And even if I could...w...wouldn't taking a new name...be running away from what I did?"

Now, the emperor goes rather still.

"If this is my fault..." Xie Lian swallows thickly, wiping at his tears. "Then let me suffer for it. Let me be punished for it. My—my people's loss isn't so cheap, that I could just walk away from the blame."

For a moment, there is no reply.

Only his ragged, pained breaths. The sniffles accompanying his tears. Finally, Jun Wu asks—

"You think that's cowardice?"

Xie Lian doesn't apply with an affirmative, too lost in his own sorrow. "Even if that means you will be sealed with a cursed shackle?"

“…If that’s what I deserve,” the prince replies quietly, his head hanging low. Then, after a pause—

“…Then Xianle will accept the emperor’s punishment,” he whispers, his voice trembling.

Jun Wu stares him down.

“You will suffer,” he reminds him coldly. “It will be hard.”

“…I know.”

Oh, but he couldn’t have known.

Couldn’t have known then, that he would never see his mother and father again with his own eyes.

That he would never again see the sights of his childhood home before they were reduced to ancient ruins.

Couldn’t have known how heartbroken his mother would be, when she saw that he had lost his sight. How painful it would be, to hear how hopeless Mu Qing sounded. Grim, but determined as he helped the royal family adjust to a…different standard of living.

He couldn’t have known that it would hurt even more, listening to Feng Xin remaining hopeful in spite of it.

Believing that Xie Lian could ascend again, in spite of it.

And in that moment, alone in the dark, Xie Lian, the God Pleasing Crown Prince of Xianle, realized something:

That he no longer believed in himself.

Given the breadth and the depth of his destruction, how could he?

No, no.

He—

He isn’t perfect. He isn’t all powerful, and he isn’t all knowing.

Xie Lian, in the end, is just a human.

He was born human, and he rose as a human.

And when he fell again—

He was so painfully, bitterly human.

And so, rather than becoming a burden on his friends, a burden on his parents—he chooses to be alone.

Because that is what he deserves. That is all he deserves.

But…

There is still someone watching over him.

The bandages over his eyes create a natural disguise—and there are days when he's lucky, and people decide to offer charity. Enough for him to have a hot meal.

What little remains of his skills from cultivation allows him to navigate somewhat— enough for menial work.

People let him help with the harvest, tend to farm animals—but that work comes and goes.

Eventually he finds one of his own shrines in a remote village, worn down and abandoned.

It feels fitting.

Local farmers give him work—and when they can't, he goes hungry.

He used to spend many nights hungry as a child, refusing food due to his delicate palette—but this is different.

This is cold, gnawing hunger—laying on the floor of his shrine, waiting for sleep to spare him from the ache.

But then…someone starts bringing food.

The first time he wakes up with a plate of fruit beside his head, he's too hungry to wonder. Maybe a farmer took pity, sent one of his children out to leave a lame beggar something to eat.

He devours them with little pride, even the berries that he used to loathe as a child. But every morning, there's a plate.

Often in the evenings too, when he returns from a day of working himself to the bone in the fields.

Fruits. Meats. When there's bread, Xie Lian sheds a few grateful tears.

After weeks of this—his curiosity gets the best of him.

But the first time he tries to speak—the creature runs from him.

Scrambling off blindly into this dark, frightening void. Leaving Xie Lian alone, again. Oh, but he can't bear it, even if he knows that he deserves it.

He pleads for the stranger to stay. To come closer. Eventually, he does.

A young man.

Skinny, stubborn—but endlessly kind.

Constantly thinking of Xie Lian, over himself. Offering the prince cares and gestures that he doesn't deserve, over and over again.

All when Xie Lian is—

Is nothing.

He's nothing.

Still, the boy does so much for him.

'I can't do anything for you,' Xie Lian reminds him. 'I can't give you anything.'

Oh, and the reply is so innocent, while holding so much depth.

"I don't want anything."

Still, the boy prays to him.

'I can't answer,' Xie Lian warns him.

"That isn't why I pray."

And of course, eventually—he tells the god that there was a time when he did answer. A time when the child was asking for a reason.

"...And what answer did I give?"

Oh, if only he could have heard it then, the tenderness in the young man's voice. He did, however, hear the smile.

“You.”

That was when Xie Lian knew.

Kneeling in that old, forgotten shrine. Staring blindly into the dark, eyes wide as he whispered that name. The name that would, for the rest of his time on this earth, be carved into his soul.

“...Hong’er?”

Silence followed—and all Xie Lian could hear was the boy's trembling breaths. They sounded a little wet, laden with the occasional sniffle, and eventually—

"...Dianxia remembered me?"

His voice wasn’t smooth, stubborn, or cocky. It was small, awed—thick with tears.

Xie Lian had assumed the plague took him.

The fact that it didn't—that means that the small, terrified child that he caught in his arms that day, the boy who clung to him later, bleeding and broken, sobbing that he wasn't cursed—became a killer.

Xie Lian failed to protect him.

And he would fail again.

He would fail over, and over, and over again.

Never knowing that his Hong’er—his handsome, brave Hong’er, would come back to him each and every time. Because that is who he is.

He’s the one who, against every obstacle, always comes back. That is what he was born to do.

All Xie Lian has to do, in the end, is wait for him. Even when he doesn’t know it. Even when that waiting only feels like suffering, it never is.

Waiting is part of growing.

And that hurts, sometimes.

In that moment, the prince couldn’t explain what he felt.

That even then, when he was nothing, when he could offer nothing, he was still something that brought someone else's life meaning.

That even when the Crown Prince was worthless, he was still Hong'er's reason to remain in this world.

"I remember you," he whispered, lips trembling.

Xie Lian found something in himself that he thought was gone—worn away with every mistake he had made.

Faith.

His arms opened, and the child was hesitant—but eventually, he fell into them, his body trembling with silent sobs.

He wasn't alone—his god was shedding tears of his own. Slipping from underneath the bandages over his eyes, making shining paths down his cheeks as he held his Hong-er in his arms.

"I remember you," he whispered again, voice breaking as Hong-er clung to him. I remember you.

I remember you.

I will always, for as long as I live, remember you.

Remember that name, crying out for him through the centuries, with no hope of an answer. Unwittingly imitating his love's form of prayer.

Hong'er.

His Hong'er.

His handsome, brave–

PRESENT

He sits up sharply, disoriented by the dark.

He always is, when he wakes after a dream.

But he knows where he is. Surrounded by the familiar sounds and smells of the shrine around him.

Their shrine.

His breaths are slow, and ragged.

Xie Lian has never been able to remember his dreams. Not since his first banishment. But sometimes, when he knows he was dreaming about him—he wishes that he could. Still.

He reaches for the chain around his neck, pulling gently.

A ring lands against his palm. Unforgiving metal, cool to the touch. The prince of Xianle brings it to his lip, kissing the face gently.

“Good Morning, Hong’er,” he whispers, letting out a slow breath. “It’s going to be a good day.”

He just has to deal with his cousin, first.

ARTWORK INSPIRED BY THIS STORY

Included with permission from the artist, do not reproduce or use for any reason.

[image]

LACE

Chapter End Notes

> since we slipped back into the beginning this chapter, I wanted to include this piece from lace back from october! thank you so much for making it, and for allowing me to share it!

Next chapter, we're back into book three territory!

xoxo, Evie

A Gathering in Puqi Shrine

Chapter Summary

> His head slowly turns toward the back exit of the shrine, and he scowls.
>
> He can still hear him, after all.
>
> “When...when I get out of this—!”
>
> Angry, screeching. Like a small, agitated dog.
>
> But no cute little ears, unfortunately—so he has no redeeming qualities.
>
> “Ruoye.” Xie Lian calls out coldly, rising to his feet. “Make him be quiet.”

Chapter Notes

See the end of the chapter for notes

His head slowly turns toward the back exit of the shrine, and he scowls.

He can still hear him, after all.

“When...when I get out of this—!”

Angry, screeching. Like a small, agitated dog.

But no cute little ears, unfortunately—so he has no redeeming qualities.

“Ruoye.” Xie Lian calls out coldly, rising to his feet. “Make him be quiet.”

He cuts off with a strangled squeak, and when Xie Lian hears the child stir, he sighs.

His name is Guzi, and he’s five years old. Xie Lian learned as much, toting Qi Rong back from Mount Taicang.

Obviously, Xie Lian wasn’t going to slaughter Qi Rong in front of a child. He thought about it. A younger version of him would have done

it.

No, he'll just have to find a way to get him out of this body, then he can deal with him properly.

But for now, he kneels down, offering a gentle smile, gently ruffling the boy's hair. "Don't worry, little one. You can sleep a little longer. We'll have breakfast later."

He nods off with a tired mumble, and Xie Lian's expression turns cold once more. When he steps outside, there's a familiar, quiet creaking.

His hand reaches out, snatching Qi Rong's ankle to stop him from spinning too much in the air.

"You know, it's been a while since I was that angry," Xie Lian admits. "But I have a question for you."

He snaps his fingers—not the way he usually commands Ruoye, but there was something satisfying at the way Hua Cheng signaled his chains in the gambler's den.

When he does, Qi Rong is unceremoniously dropped to the ground from the branch he was hanging on.

The moment he can speak, he's swearing and grumbling, rubbing at his throat. "Arrogant asshole–!"

"The dead bodies in the trees," Xie Lian questions coldly. "Were you really trying to imitate Crimson Rain, or was that intended to taunt me?"

"…" Qi Rong rubs his Adam's apple, glaring. "I figured you would have known that the moment you heard the stories about me."

Xie Lian picks at his cuticles. "I hadn't heard of you until a couple of weeks ago, and even then—I didn't realize it was you until last night."

The ghost sputters, sitting up on the ground. "How the fuck did you not know?!"

"You really aren't relevant enough to take up much space in conversation," Xie Lian shrugs. "And I didn't think you would be stupid enough to use your real name."

Qi Rong scowls, then sighs, because…

"...Well, how was I supposed to know all of these fuckers were using fake names until recently, huh?! Even Hua Cheng! I had no fuckin' idea, that sly piece of shit!"

Xie Lian raises an eyebrow. "What are you talking about?"

And just like that, the creature goes from scowling to grinning from ear to ear, snickering, "HA! I couldn't say if I wanted to! It's funny though, SO FUNNY!"

Xie Lian's eye twitches slightly, fighting the desire to string him up again.

"...Say, what's that thing you're wearing?" Qi Rong's eyes drift down to the chain around Xie Lian's neck, glinting with curiosity. "Looks cursed, something REAL fowl, you should just give it to your good ol' couSIN—!"

He reaches for it, but a fist hits his cheek first.

The blow is so forceful, his head makes a small dent in the tree trunk behind him, and while Xie Lian shakes out his fist, he comments,

"You know, while I have no intention of stopping you, you should know—I can see your spiritual energy. I know you're here."

Qi Rong stops in the middle of his wails of protest, glancing up—

Just to see a familiar pair of eyes staring down at him, one burning, one green.

"...HOLY FUCK! STAY AWAY FROM ME!" He shrieks, scrambling back, and...

Hiding behind his cousin, of all people.

Shuo sighs, his hair trailing beneath him from where he's hanging upside down on a tree branch, his hands dangling where Qi Rong's throat was just a moment before.

"...Hua Chengzhu didn't tell me that," he admits, crossing his arms. "Sorry for trying to sneak up on you."

"I'm not offended," Xie Lian shrugs, stepping away from Qi Rong, effectively refusing to shield him. "You can do whatever you like with him, but I need to get him out of this mortal's body first."

Shuo drops down, landing lightly on his feet. “I figured as much.”

Xie Lian raises an eyebrow. “You knew he was in another body already?”

“He abandoned his old one when I was arguing with Prince Shit for Brains,” Shuo shrugs. “So, I figured. I’m not looking to kill him, either.”

He strides forward, bending over to examine Qi Rong’s new form.

“I had a plan for dealing with the body switch too, but…” He frowns, “That got more complicated.”

“Oh?” Xie Lian didn’t expect it to be easy, but he’s relieved there was an option in the first place.

“Hua Chengzhu showed you his armory, yes?”

“He did,” he agrees, feeling somewhat…sheepish, remembering how the evening concluded.

Shuo leans back against the Qi Rong shaped dent in the tree, which seems to quickly heal under his touch, bark knitting back together.

“And he showed you Zidian?”

Xie Lian nods, quirking an eyebrow. “Do you mean to torture him?”

“Oh,” Shuo blinks, his eyes widening—then, he lets out a surprised laugh, shaking his head. “No, no, dianxia, that’s not my style—but we’ve used Zidian on him before.”

The mere mention makes Qi Rong shudder.

“Y-YOU THINK I GIVE A SHIT?! YOU CAN SMACK ME AROUND AS MUCH AS YOU WANT, I’LL COME BACK!”

The forest demon rolls his eyes, explaining, “It removes any spirit unlawfully possessing a human body.”

Xie Lian’s eyes widen, impressed.

San Lang built something as elegant as that?

“You make it sound as though that wouldn’t work in this case, though.”

"Oh, it would," Shuo sighs. "But when I was putting the armory back together..."

Xie Lian winces.

Right.

After he inadvertently blew the entire thing up.

"...Zidian was the only weapon that was missing."

"Missing?" Xie Lian mutters, his stomach plummeting from the guilt.

It wouldn't be, if he hadn't been so foolish.

"Oh, I'm so sorry, I never meant..."

"Don't apologize, dianxia," Shuo shakes his head. "Not your fault a thief decided to take advantage. It's being handled." He glances back down at Qi Rong, his eyes narrowed. "Given that someone else is hunting him now as well, I sent subordinates to look for the whip, and I came to find him."

Xie Lian winces at the reminder of his former student. "I'm sorry about him..."

The demon shrugs. "He's an annoyance, not an obstacle."

Xie Lian nods, relieved. Lang Qianqiu certainly isn't weak. He's the martial god of an entire region, after all. But someone strong enough to nearly be a calamity—not a mere honorary position, like Qi Rong—should be able to handle him easily.

The prince sinks into thought for a moment, contemplating the predicament, and finally, he asks—

"Can you cook?"

Qi Rong slams his fists against the ground angrily, "What, YOU'VE CAPTURED ME, AND NOW I'M A FUCKING SERVANT?! I—!"

"Not you—Ruoye, gag him." Xie Lian sighs.

The spiritual tool wriggles slightly with distaste, but it obeys the command—all while Shuo tilts his head, surprised.

"...You mean me, your highness?"

"Well…" Xie Lian sighs. "The body he's stolen—the man has a young son. I'm afraid they're a package deal until you're able to remove Qi Rong from that body."

Shuo grits his teeth, glaring at the ghost with dismay. "But what does that have to do with—?"

"I don't think I can submit a child to my cooking in good conscience," Xie Lian explains, remembering the way Banyue used to vomit up anything he tried to give her. "So, if you could make him breakfast, I'd be grateful."

"…" Shuo looks up at the sky with a heavy sigh. "I can."

Then, he looks down at himself—the pointed ears, mismatched eyes, and sharp teeth, knowing that isn't exactly a comforting sight for a human child, so…

He spins on his heel, shifting into a slightly less intimidating form.

Hazel eyes, a loose ponytail, simple robes.

They begin to move inside, and Xie Lian can't help but ask, "Oh, Ren Song?"

"Hm?"

"Do you happen to know San Lang's Daruma Doll spell?"

It's much more convenient than making poor Ruoye gag him, after all.

"Oh…I do," the demon agrees. "But I'm not allowed to use it anymore."

"Not allowed?" Xie Lian bites back a smile.

"Well," Shuo deposits Qi Rong rather unceremoniously in the corner after dragging him in by the collar, "I turned someone into one without Hua Chengzhu's permission, and he was pretty angry."

"…I see." The prince sits down at one of the chairs by the table. "Was it someone important?"

"Uh…" Shuo pushes his bangs behind his ears, kneeling down to examine the ingredients the shrine has to offer. "Yeah, he's a valued employee, I guess."

Xie Lian leans his chin on his hand.

There's something about him—the arrogant, slightly childish nature—that he finds amusing. Endearing.

"And why did you turn him into a Daruma doll, exactly?"

Shuo hums, placing what he needs on the counter, beginning to chop the vegetables. "I think it was just for fun."

Xie Lian can't help but let out a surprised laugh, and the ghost smiles, adding—

"But I was pretty drunk at the time, so I'm not sure what the reasoning was." That's surprising to hear.

"I had no idea ghosts could get drunk..." He murmurs, eyes wide.

A pot is set out to boil.

"If you're enough of a go-getter about it, sure you can."

Xie Lian smiles, thinking back slightly less fondly on the times in his life when he actually has been drunk, and he sighs, trying to turn his attention to something slightly less...depressing.

"...You've been very accommodating," Xie Lian comments, toying with the chain hanging around his neck. "I'm grateful."

He isn't used to people being helpful as a rule. San Lang's generosity is much more noticeable, and it takes getting used to.

"..." Shuo shrugs. "You're a friend of Hua Chengzhu," he mutters, focusing on the task at hand. "That's reason enough to lend a hand."

He knows his place, after all.

Besides, their interests are aligned.

Xie Lian nods, and after a few minutes of companionable silence, he realizes...

Something has been bothering him. For a while now. Ever since returning from Mount Yu Jun, actually.

"Could I ask you about something?"

Shuo glances back at him, raising an eyebrow, but he nods. “About what?”

“...Calamities,” Xie Lian’s fingers tighten around the chain.

Shuo doesn’t reply immediately, simply waits to see what his question will be, bringing the pot of rice to a simmer.

“...Crimson Rain and Black Water came from the Kiln,” Xie Lian reasons slowly.

“Yes,” Shup agrees, stirring the mixture with a set of chopsticks. “I was there.”

Xie Lian raises an eyebrow—curious. After all—he knew Ren Song was older than he seemed, but...

That’s far more ancient than he had guessed.

“Do you know anything about Bai Wuxiang?” He finally asks, not seeing how the forest demon’s hands go still.

His eyes flicker over to Qi Rong, glaring and squirming in the corner—but he doesn’t seem to care much for their conversation, focusing on his own misery.

“...He was the first calamity, and he destroyed the kingdom of Xianle. I figured you would already know all about him.”

Of course, Xie Lian does. Parts of him, anyway.

“...In the last month, it’s become clear the Heavens...misunderstand quite a bit about the ghost realm,” Xie Lian mutters. “And it made me question something that someone once told me.”

“Well, you’re right about that, dianxia.” Shuo sets the chopsticks down, leaving the food to simmer. “The heavens haven’t bothered to gather accurate information about the ghost realm.”

That way, they can maintain a combative stance, anyway.

“What did they tell you, anyway?”

Xie Lian frowns, picking at his sleeve.

“...That calamities are drawn to pain and suffering,” he recalls quietly. “That they can’t resist it.”

Shuo frowns, resting his hands against the counter. “You’ve spent some time with a calamity now. Did he seem unable to control himself to you?”

“Of course not,” Xie Lian shakes his head. Actually—Hua Cheng seemed far more in control of himself than most people Xie Lian has ever met.

“Then you already have your answer,” the ghost shrugs, pulling the pot off of the stove. “I’ve known him for pretty much my entire life,” he adds, glancing over in Xie Lian’s direction, his gaze...complicated.

“There’s only one thing he can’t resist.”

And from the sounds of it—Shuo isn’t talking about suffering.

Xie Lian’s eyebrows quirk, confused.

“...What—?”

But then he stops, his head whipping to the side, detecting movement. “...Did you hear that?”

Shuo tilts his chin up. “Yeah,” he places a lid on the pot, leaving it on the counter to keep. “There’s a man on your ceiling. Looks like he’s trying to steal a pickle jar.”

Xie Lian gawks, turning his head up, and—

He can’t see any aura at all, heavenly or demonic. But there’s only one person that would want to steal something like that.

“...Pei Junior?! Put Banyue down! And—” He glances over at Shuo, “Did you already know he was here?”

The demon shrugs, watching the former heavenly official with slitted pupils, like a cat observing a moth on the ceiling. “I’ll be honest, given what I’ve seen of your life so far, I didn’t know what would be out of the ordinary for you. So, I went along with it.”

“...”

...That is depressingly logical.

“I see.”

“Would you like me to deal with him?” Shuo murmurs, licking his lips.

There's something about that tone Xie Lian finds worrisome. "Pei Junior—you had better get down here, before he...ah..."

He looks to Shuo, who smiles.

"We'll have to take it outside, if it comes to that. No need to scare the kid, right?"

He stares down Pei Xiu, who slowly—reluctantly—drops down to the ground.

Guzi sits up with a start, frightened by the sudden arrival of strangers.

"...Daddy!"

Shuo's expression turns irritated as he watches the child flee to Qi Rong's side. "That isn't..."

Xie Lian shrugs, holding his hands up, exasperated. "I've told him. Now—you, put the jar down, now!"

"..." Pei Xiu sighs, going to set the jar down, but just as he does...

Instead of landing on the table, it flies through the air—only to be caught by the figure standing in the open doorway of the shrine

"Pei Xiu," a voice rings out, irritated. "I'm disappointed."

At first, Xie Lian is surprised.

"...General Ming Guang?!"

And then, he's irritated

Exactly when did his shrine become a tourist destination, anyway?

Whatever he might feel about it, however, Pei Xiu is the one hanging his head with shame.

(Not for trespassing. Simply for the fact that his general caught him in the act.)

"Throwing your career away for a little girl..." General Pei grits his teeth, shaking his head. "And then trying to make things worse by stealing her away?"

From Xie Lian’s side, Shuo raises an eyebrow sharply, crossing his arms. “Little girl?” He questions dryly. “They’re the same age.” He glances towards Pei Xiu, sending him an unimpressed look. “Is he a little boy?”

Xie Lian is almost surprised to hear him take up for Banyue, but then he remembers witnessing Shuo looking after children in Paradise Manor.

Back then, Banyue was likely one of them.

And in the interest of accuracy, Pei Xiu was three years her senior in their mortal lives. But in three centuries, that difference has become quite negligible.

Immortality tends to complicate comparisons of maturity, anyhow.

Xie Lian is older than Mu Qing by a few months, for example–but he no longer considers himself the martial god's senior. Because, in his mind, he lost a century of life experiences. Memories. Locked underground, trapped in dreams and torment.

In a literal sense, he might be eight hundred and twenty four years old. But in a practical sense, he's only lived seven centuries of that.

Making him literally eight centuries old, mentally seven centuries, and physically… Maybe twenty, give or take.

Funny enough, Hong'er might have been seven years younger, but if he had lived up until now–he might feel older than him too.

"He's certainly acting like a little boy," Pei Ming glares, startling Xie Lian from his thoughts. "So yes, I think we have two unruly children on our hands."

There's something different about him. He's clearly more on edge now, than he was the last time Xie Lian spoke with him.

"At least now I can interrogate the preceptor and learn her true involvement," he mutters.

"…Let's not be so hasty," Xie Lian cuts him off flatly.

It's in that moment when Pei Ming seems to notice the fact that the prince's posture has gone stiff, one hand resting over the hilt of fangxin.

"Come on now, your highness, I'm not arresting her." The general points out. "Do you really think I would harm a young lady?"

"Not a young lady," Shuo mutters, rolling his eyes–and now, he finally seems to warrant Ming Guang's attention.

"...Your highness, who's the kid?" The forest demon's eyebrow twitches.

Xie Lian smiles awkwardly, answering before the younger man can, "His name is Shuo, and he's a friend of mine. Now, could you please put Banyue down, and we can talk about this reasonably?"

"I'll tell you what," Pei mutters, tugging at the lid. “How about I let her out of this thing, and we can all have that conversation together?”

Xie Lian opens his mouth to protest—not that Pei has given Xie Lian much of a reason to think he would lie, but the prince is no longer quick to trust, either—

BOOM!

The minute the lid lifts off of the jar, there's an explosion of air rushing out from the inside, covering Pei Ming in...

Pickles.

The scent is so strong, Xie Lian has to cover his mouth to stop himself from gagging, and he hears a familiar voice.

"So, THIS is how the Great General of the North behaves when he thinks no one is around to stop him?"

Ah.

Xie Lian rubs his temple, wishing he could go back to bed already. Lady Wind Master is here as well. They might as well call it a party.

Pei seems just as irritated.

"What are you doing here?!"

Shi Qingxuan appears in a puff of pastel green smoke, fanning herself haughtily. "Well, as any good friend would do, I relocated Banyue during the crisis upon our return to Ghost City. I thought you might try and pull a stunt like this."

Oh.

Xie Lian blinks, surprised.

That was actually remarkably considerate.

(And he does smile a little bit, hearing someone refer to him as a friend.)

"And what have you done with the girl, may I ask?! You can't just hide her away on your own!"

Shi Qingxuan smiles, smug.

"Oh, I don't mind telling you exactly where I put her," the Wind Master smiles sweetly, turning her gaze to Xie Lian. "Miss Banyue is currently residing under the protection of the Rain Master, Yushi Huang. She's welcome to leave whenever she likes."

Shi Qingxuan snaps her fan shut, smirking in Pei Ming's direction, "If you'd like to try and retrieve her, you're welcome to do so."

"..." Pei grits his teeth, and Xie Lian finds himself...somewhat curious about the tension around the Rain Master's name. "Shi Qingxuan...why are you always involving yourself?" He mutters, shaking his head.

After all, it's not as though he's ever done anything to offend the Wind Master personally.

Other than taking up an iota of his brother's attention, anyway.

Speaking of...

"...Aren't you supposed to be with your brother right now, anyway?" He mutters, scratching the side of his head. "How come you have time to cause trouble down here?"

Shi Qingxuan pauses, her lips parting. "...I thought gege was with you," she mutters, eyes narrowing. She's suspicious, naturally. "Are you trying to distract me from the point? Because if so, it isn't working."

"..." Pei presses his lips into a grin line, his body rife with tension, and... Xie Lian speaks up, his voice quiet–but firm.

"That's enough, both of you." Both gods stop, looking in his direction, and the prince crosses his arms. “Whatever personal dispute the two of you have, now isn't the time or place. Honestly, you're just as bad as Feng Xin and Mu Qing."

The comparison makes both Pei Ming and Shi Qingxuan cringe.

"I'm not interested in having something with the Wind Master that could even be considered remotely close to that dynamic," Pei grouses.

"My brother would kill you if you did," Shi Qingxuan agrees, her pallor slightly green.

...Xie Lian blinks.

"I don't understand—?"

"We'll be going," Pei mutters, grabbing his former deputy by the collar. "But don't think this is the last you'll hear from me about this."

Xie Lian tilts his head.

That was a rather abrupt change of time. And right after...

Once the other two are gone, Shi Qingxuan sighs.

"I'm sorry about that, your highness—but he shouldn't trouble you over the girl again. He and the Rain Master have a...complicated past."

Xie Lian raises an eyebrow. He considers himself to be on good terms with the Rain Master—even if they've never met in person.

And from what he remembers—she isn't the sort to be on bad terms with anyone.

"...I'm the one who should be sorry," Xie Lian sighs. "You've had to go to so much trouble for me over the last few days..."

"Huh? Trouble?" she grins lopsidedly. "It was no such thing! Besides..." Shi Qingxuan reaches out, placing a hand on his shoulder and squeezing it gently. "You helped me rescue Ming-Xiong," she explains quietly. "I'll never forget that."

Xie Lian's lips turn up slightly at the corners. "The friendship the two of you have seems quite special."

The Wind Master looks up for a moment, shaking her head with a small smile.

“...I’ve always made friends easily, but as far as those close to me...it’s always been just me and gege,” she explains. “And he would do anything for me.”

(If only she knew to what extent.)

“Ming-Xiong might be rough around the edges, but...he doesn’t treat me like a baby,” she shrugs. “He makes me feel like I can handle things on my own.”

Which is an important relationship to have. The closest Xie Lian ever came to having someone like that was probably Mu Qing.

Still, Xie Lian was seventeen at that point. The fact that Shi Qingxuan only made that sort of connection as a goddess–over four centuries old, to boot–gives him slight pause.

...Just how much has the Water Master sheltered her, anyway?

In any case, Xie Lian smiles, replying;

"...If there's anything I've learned since meeting you, Lady Wind Master, it's that you are quite capable."

That makes her brighten, eyes crinkling happily at the corners.

"Oh–and if you're looking for Lang Ying, I had him brought to my palace for safe keeping. I'll have him sent back down at once, if you like."

"That would be appreciated," Xie Lian smiles gratefully. "Thank you, for..." He struggles to phrase it, and Shi Qingxuan laughs.

"Like I said, while I have many friends, few of them are close, but you..." She squeezes Xie Lian's arm once more. "I have a feeling we were destined to be friends. I've got your back, your highness, don't worry!"

There's something undeniably naive about that statement, but...

There’s an undeniable warmth in Xie Lian’s chest.

“Well, if you ever need my help,” he shrugs, knowing the offer probably isn’t good for much, “you have it.”

But in the end…

Xie Lian's help is worth more than he thinks.

Shi Qingxuan smiles, glancing over Xie Lian's shoulder at Shuo, who has taken to calming Guzi down, helping the little boy eat his breakfast. "That boy...he works for Hua Cheng, doesn't he?"

Xie Lian shrugs, scratching the side of his head as he glances back in Shuo's direction. "Not...exactly. The dynamic is somewhat complicated. But he's a friend of mine."

Shi Qingxuan nods, accepting the explanation without question. "I should be heading back."

After all, she needs to figure out where exactly her brother went off to, if he isn't with Pei. It's been three entire days.

"But you will be coming to the mid-autumn festival, won't you?" Shi Qingxuan adds, pulling out her whisk. "It'll be no fun without you!"

Xie Lian hesitates.

Of course, the idea of going to the yearly celebration isn't particularly compelling, but he can't afford not to.

He isn't the Rain Master, who has a reputation for keeping to herself. He isn't Ming Yi, who was on assignment for years at a time.

And he certainly isn't the Water Master, who, it seems, has the freedom to contradict even Jun Wu whenever he likes.

He isn't anyone important at all. Certainly not important enough to cause a scene by refusing the invitation.

So, he'll have to go.

But luckily for him, the festival is weeks away.

Much needed time to take a breath, doing work around the shrine, helping the villagers with the harvest.

To his surprise, Shuo stays for the majority of that time, taking his job monitoring Qi Rong somewhat seriously.

He'll cook meals for Guzi, and after mistakenly accepting Xie Lian's offer to cook lunch one day, has artfully dodged repeating that error again.

What he didn't expect was how...peaceful that time would feel.

Qi Rong spends his days forcibly silenced by Ruoye, or pinned underneath Dian Dian (whom Xie Lian must admit, is exceedingly adorable. He can't picture the creature ripping anyone's leg off, it's impossible to imagine.)

Shuo spends his time attempting to psychologically torment Qi Rong out of the human's body (usually by taking him out into the woods for several hours at a time-- Xie Lian hasn't witnessed the demon's magic yet, but he has heard the distant screaming.)

When he isn't doing that, he's helping with menial tasks, not so different from what San Lang did, before.

Or flirting with the girls in the village, very different from what San Lang did, before.

Actually...

Xie Lian stops one afternoon, halfway through a new silk pattern.

Oddly enough, despite his playful, cocky nature, Xie Lian hasn't seen Hua Cheng behave that way with anyone. Well, other than him.

Is he only that way with his friends? Or is there someone...

"..." Xie Lian's fingers drift to the chain around his neck, pondering.

Does it really matter, if that's the case? After all, he's not...

Shuo leans against the doorway, crossing his arms, watching the change in Xie Lian's posture.

"Something bothering you, your highness?"

Xie Lian jumps, nearly dropping his threads. "...No," he mutters. “No, I just...”

He bites his lip, knowing that it’s a silly question, so he puts it from his mind.

Nonetheless, Shuo is still watching expectantly, so...

“Does San Lang not mind you staying away for this long?”

"…" The boy scowls, sitting down with a huff. "He isn't my dad."

He turns his head to the side, staring at the pattern Xie Lian was working on. "He doesn't always keep up with what I'm doing."

Xie Lian doesn't say so, but he isn't sure how there's much of a practical difference between their relationship with parenthood.

"I was only asking since you mentioned being grounded," he murmurs, punctuating that statement with a shrug.

Shuo can't help but blush a little at that, pink splotches popping up across his cheeks. "That was different," he mutters.

"And he said you couldn't use the Daruma spell—"

"He's a ghost king, alright! He's the boss of everyone, not just me!" Shuo crows, and, as a point of how mature he is—definitely not a child in Hua Cheng's care—he flops down on his back, kicking his feet against the floor.

"Stop laughing!"

Xie Lian covers his mouth, shoulders shaking. "I'm not, I'm not…"

"…The point being," Shuo concludes, his hair pooled around his head on the floor, "He doesn't care that I'm here, as long as I'm not causing trouble." Then, after a pause. "…Am I?"

"No, no…" Xie Lian shakes his head, not missing the relieved little sigh Shuo let's out in response. "I guess I was just wondering…what he was up to, that's all."

"…What Hua Cheng is up to?" Shuo's eyebrows quirk. "Dealing with some renovations I think. Why?"

Renovations.

Xie Lian pauses to contemplate that for only a moment, before remembering—

Yes, well, when half of the place got burned down last time, he would probably need to renovate a thing or two, wouldn't he?

"…I was just curious," he mutters, going back to his work.

Shuo sits up on his elbows, a slightly sly smile twisting his lips as he watches the god work. “You want to see him?” He comments, not missing the way Xie Lian’s fingers work slightly faster on the loom.

“He already knows he’s welcome here whenever he likes,” the prince replies.

After all, the last time they were alone together—really alone, here, in Puqi shrine— the ghost king told Xie Lian there were two reasons that he could have approached him on Mount Yu Jun:

1) Just to see him, or

2) because he was bored.

Now that he’s busy, it seems obvious.

“I’d love to see him, but not if that means interfering with his business.”

Xie Lian stops after, pressing his tongue against the roof of his mouth.

He’d ‘love’ to see him? Isn’t that a bit much?

Shuo sits up fully, legs crossed, hands propped against the floor behind him.

“...” His gaze drifts over to the silk that Xie Lian is working on, and he tilts his head. “What’s that for?”

“Ah...” Xie Lian glances back at his loom with a shrug. “There’s a festival in the heavens that I’m required to attend.”

“And you have to dress fancy?”

“Precisely.”

“...Hua Chengzhu’s got all sorts of fancy clothes,” Shuo comments, adding airily, “I bet lot’s of it is in your size, too.”

Xie Lian can’t imagine why. Hua Cheng seems quite a bit taller and broader. Unless—

Unless he’s keeping them for someone else.

Xie Lian frowns, then replies:

“Oh, but I’m accustomed to making my own, by now...”

After all, he's been doing it for the last eight centuries.

Shuo doesn't argue him that point, pulling one leg up against his chest. "I heard you used to sell this sort of thing."

Xie Lian nods agreeably, his fingers working quickly but gracefully as he finishes out the pattern. "It's helped me get by."

'Get by,' is right. From Shuo's perception, the prince has consistently underpriced his work over the centuries.

"I could make you something sometime, if you'd like," Xie Lian offers, making the ghost's eyes widen with surprise.

"...Me?" He questions, sitting up a little straighter. "Why?"

"Oh...we're friends now, aren't we?" Xie Lian glances back with a smile. "Isn't that reason enough?"

"..." Shuo pulls up his other leg, wrapping his arms around his shins with a nod, glancing over to the open doorway.

Guzi is playing in front of the shrine, chasing around Qi Qi, who occasionally stops and turns around on his hind legs, chirping excitedly as the child giggles.

"...And," Xie Lian adds, glancing over to where Qi Rong is bound and gagged in the corner, "my cousin has caused you quite a bit of trouble over the years. It's the least I can do."

Trouble is an understatement, but Shuo shrugs. "That isn't your fault, dianxia, but..."

He glances back and forth between the two. Of course, there is a physical resemblance between the prince and Qi Rong's original physical form. Both good looking, but one...significantly more so. And taller.

"It's hard to believe you two grew up in the same house, to be honest."

Xie Lian is quiet for a moment, working until he finishes the bolt of silk, and when he speaks—he chooses his words carefully.

"...My mother was a strong woman, you know," The prince murmurs, smoothing the fabric out across the floor. "But in a quiet sort of way."

There was never any need to make displays of strength. Simply quiet confidence.

‘So,’ Shuo thinks to himself, watching the prince quietly, ‘you take after her.’

“But my aunt…” Xie Lian trails off with a sigh. “They rarely ever saw eye to eye on things.”

It feels so silly now, remembering the things that they used to argue about. Politics, marriages. Who to be friends with, who to avoid.

"She wanted an advantageous marriage, just like my mother's, but one day…" The prince shrugs. "She ran off with a wealthy merchant."

Shuo frowns, picking at a loose thread on his pants. "Is that such an awful thing?"

"If you asked my father, yes." Xie Lian smiles wryly. "A queen's sister marrying a merchant was quite a scandal. But that wasn't the real issue, it…"

His expression darkens.

“My uncle was a vile man,” Xie Lian mutters, his gaze drifting in Qi Rong’s direction. Unable to see the way his cousin squirms with anger and discomfort, but not caring. “He was violent with women and children. A predator.”

And his son grew up to be exactly the same.

“…Did Qi Rong tell you that?” Shuo questions curiously, watching the green ghost’s expression with faint satisfaction.

After all, he doesn’t have a right to privacy. Not after the damage he’s caused.

“…No,” Xie Lian shakes his head. “My friend worked in their house before he passed away. Between that, and the rumors…I heard enough.”

Enough to know that Qi Rong’s father was a monster.

And the fact that Xie Lian’s aunt returned as a shell of herself, passing away not soon after…

Her husband shattered her.

“...He already had the worst kind of example by the time he came to live with us,” Xie Lian sighs, going back to his work. Now that the actual fabric is done, the act of cutting and sewing the garments is comparatively quick. “And my parents felt so guilty about his mother, they...”

They gave too much leeway to a child who utterly took advantage of every kindness he was given.

And Xie Lian knows better. He doesn't think a childhood marked by cruelty creates a cruel man.

Hong'er taught him better than that.

Qi Rong is vile, because he refuses to change.

"...I had some notion of that before," Shuo admits. "Just from seeing his memories."

Xie Lian turns his chin towards the forest demon. "You've...seen Qi Rong's memories?" He mutters, startled.

"Nearly all of them, but his early years are...fuzzier."

Which means, in all likelihood, he saw...Qi Rong's death.

And Hong'er's death, too.

The thought makes Xie Lian's stomach churn, but he fights the urge to show it.

"...You must have expected to meet someone very different, based on his memories alone," the prince mumbles.

"..." The younger man is quiet, watching lighthearted self deprecation, shrouding something much deeper.

Centuries of self loathing.

"...No," Shuo murmurs, reaching up to twist an earring beneath his fingertips, a small bell tinkling softly as he does.

"He took someone I loved from me too, dianxia," the demon reminds him quietly. "I know how it feels."

...Yes.

Xie Lian swallows hard, hit suddenly by the realization that… Shuo does know how it feels. Exactly how it feels, actually. To lose someone so dear, then live on.

And on, and on.

“…I didn’t have any expectations for what you would be like,” Shuo explains carefully, fidgeting as he chooses his words, “because no one deserves to be judged for their grief.”

Xie Lian is quiet, allowing those words to wash over him. It’s…complicated.

Because on one hand, Xie Lian was grieving. Shuo hasn’t misread that. And his actions then are far removed from the person he is now.

…And still, Xie Lian can’t help but feel as though he deserves to be judged. “…How were you able to see his memories, anyway?”

Shuo shrugs, reaching down to scratch at a scuff on the toe of his boot. “It’s possible to share memories with those you have a strong connection with, but that isn’t the method I use.”

Xie Lian raises an eyebrow, and the young man leans his chin on his knees.

"Forests are my territory," he explains, a fact that Xie Lian was already aware of, but there's more to it than that clearly, "if I place someone inside an array of mine, regardless of whether or not we have a strong bond, I can access their memories."

Ah. That must be it.

When people say that Ren Song's magic causes 'madness,' well…

Xie Lian can certainly imagine how reliving one's worst memories might drive a person mad.

"…Where did you learn how to–?" Xie Lian stops, glancing toward the front entrance of the shrine.

"…" Shuo glances in the same direction, curious. "What is it?"

Xie Lian doesn't reply–instead he just sighs, pinching the bridge of his nose.

You see, tracking demonic entities is a bit of a nuanced art, one that takes time to learn. Particularly for someone, well...alive.

First, he had to go through Ling Wen. Who was not particularly helpful. Then, unfortunately for him, he had little luck with gaining intel from the Ghost Realm.

Finally, he resorted to paying a cultivator in Gusu to divine his most recent location, which is what led him here.

To a small, relatively run down shrine in the middle of nowhere.

Still, now that he's close enough, he can sense the demonic energy coming from inside, leaving Lang Qianqiu with little reason not to charge through the front door, sword drawn.

"REVEAL YOURSELF, MONSTER!"

...And then there's no answer.

Well, no immediate answer.

And when he surveys the inside of the shrine, he notices three things:

First and foremost, his guoshi, sitting in front of a loom, looking...exasperated, but by what he couldn't say.

Second, a man gagged in the corner.

Third...a teenage boy, sitting beside his guoshi, with soft cheeks, hazel eyes, and what would be an...objectively attractive face, if not for...

The roaring laughter.

"Oh my GOD!" Shuo cackles, flopping backwards until he's strewn across Xie Lian's lap, kicking his feet.

"He's so fucking EMBARRASSING!"

Xie Lian isn't sure whether he wants to laugh, or cry.

"...Guoshi?" Lang Qianqiu's eyes are slightly wide. "What are you doing here? There's demonic energy all over the place, you..."

Xie Lian's smile is slightly pained. "I know, thank you..."

Shuo's continued snickering isn't exactly helping the matter.

"Y-You should have seen it!" He wheezes, "He–He POSED!"

The demon sits up, extending one arm in front of him, mimicking holding out a sword, dropping his voice to imitate him;

"REVEAL YOURSELF, MONSTER!"

At this point, he seems to become overwhelmed by the comedy of his own impersonation, slumping back against Xie Lian's lap once more, clutching his stomach and wailing with laughter.

Now, Lang Qianqiu recognizes him, his face twisting with shock and frustration. "...YOU!"

The ghost is laughing so hard, he's practically wheezing–leading to Xie Lian patting his back, trying to help him catch his breath, and Lang Qianqiu practically flails with indignation.

"THIS is where you disappeared to?!"

Shuo sits up in Xie Lian's lap again, breathing hard.

“It’s not my fault that you couldn’t keep up, or that you’re shit at tracking ghosts,” he drawls, “I didn’t even want you following me in the first place!”

“We BOTH have a score to settle with him, you can’t just—!”

“There is no WE!” Shuo glares, eyes flashing.

“You...” Lang Qianqiu growls with frustration, gripping his sword tightly. “Would you get off of him already?!”

“...Hm?” Shuo tilts his head, eyes wide with mock innocence. “What do you mean?”

“A heavenly official doesn’t need a ghost hanging all over him like a —!”

He steps forward to pull him off, and as he does, Ren Song shifts into a smaller form, that of a boy younger than ten years old, flinging his arms around the prince’s neck, hiding his face in his chest, and Xie Lian, well—

He wraps his arms around the ghost.

“Lang Qianqiu!” He scolds him, his voice turning stern. “Enough!”

His student GAWKS.

“GUOSHI!” He cries, his voice cracking with indignation. “He was the one making fun of me!”

“You don’t have to rise to the bait, do you?”

“And—he’s OLDER than me, apparently!” Lang Qianqiu protests. “He can’t just turn small to get out of trouble!”

“He’s my guest here,” Xie Lian frowns, hugging one arm around Shuo’s back, using the other to pet his hair. “You’re the one who burst in unannounced.”

Lang Qianqiu huffs, staggered by the injustice of it all.

“Only because I was looking for—!” He stops, his gaze suddenly turning to the third occupant of the shrine—the man in the corner, bound and gagged. “...Is that him?”

“How we sneak anything past the heavens is a miracle,” Shuo comments, his voice dry. “The observational skills of a martial god are truly inspiring.”

“Shut your—!”

“Quiet, both of you,” Xie Lian mutters, exasperated. “He’s possessed a mortal’s body, so we’re stuck until we find a safe way to remove him without harming the human.”

It’s quite a predicament.

Lang Qianqiu falls silent, his face screwed up with concentration, trying to come up with a course of action, and...

Xie Lian sighs.

“I’m assuming you won’t be leaving until he’s removed from the human’s body either?”

Shuo glares, hugging his neck tighter. “Bad idea, dianxia.”

The younger prince glares right back at him, hands on his hips, “Why is that a bad idea?!”

“Because you’re loud, you’re distracting, and you bring nothing to the table.” Shuo replies dryly.

“H...!” Lang Qianqiu sputters, trying to decide which point to address first. “...How am I distracting?!”

After a pause, Shuo’s eyes narrow. “Because you’re loud,” he grouses. “Weren’t you paying attention?”

“Hey, I already told you both to stop it,” Xie Lian mutters, lifting a hand from Shuo’s head to rub at his temple. “And he can be helpful.”

“I can!”

“—He can?!”

Xie Lian lifts Shuo out of his lap, setting him down on the ground—to which the ghost shifts back into his adult form out of annoyance.

“Now, you don’t have to look after Qi Rong, Guzi, and Lang Ying by yourself.” Xie Lian shrugs, and Shuo stares.

“I’m not doing it by myself right now!” He protests, watching as Xie Lian stands up, taking his newly finished set of robes with him.

“I’m due in the Heavens. I’m sure Lang Qianqiu won’t mind helping out while I’m gone. Isn’t that right?”

He glances in his student’s direction, and there’s a slightly awkward pause.

Obviously, after the last time they spoke, things were left...slightly tense. After all, he was angry—justifiably so—with Xie Lian for lying to him. And guilty, for what he had done.

Still, he had said the words that, if Xie Lian hadn’t committed the crimes he was accused of after the Gilded Banquet, Lang Qianqiu would, ‘Spend the rest of his life trying to make it up to him,’ so...

“Of course I can,” he mutters, crossing his arms, jaw locked—determined.

“See? There you go.” Xie Lian shrugs, stepping behind the changing screen. “There’s no reason you can’t work together while I’m gone, is there?”

“It’s not about can or can’t...” Shuo mutters.

It’s more that they don’t need to.

“Shouldn’t he go to the Heavens with you, anyway?”

“No,” Xie Lian shakes his head. “Jun Wu expects him to be searching after Qi Rong, so he won’t be expected. Unless he wants to come, in which case…”

“No,” Lang Qianqiu shakes his head, crossing his arms. “I won’t be letting him out of my sight until he’s been dealt with.”

The mere implication that he might be dealing with the Crown Prince of Yong’an indefinitely makes Shuo cringe with distaste.

“Then it seems fairly simple to me,” Xie Lian murmurs, shrugging out of his old robes.

Of course, only the shadow of his form can be seen behind the screen, but Lang Qianqiu still looks away politely, while Shuo rolls his eyes, examining his sharpening fingernails.

“Neither of you are obligated to stay, but I have custody of Qi Rong and Guzi,” the prince explains. “So, neither of you can force the other to leave, either.”

It seems fair to him. Lang Qianqiu doesn’t protest the matter either, seeming to find the conclusion reasonable.

Shuo, on the other hand, looks like he would rather be force fed shards of glass.

After adjusting his robes around his body, seeing that the fit is correct, and running a comb through his hair—Xie Lian steps out, staring blindly in the direction of the two younger men.

“Is there anything else?”

For a moment, both of them stare.

It’s not like Shuo of all people should be surprised. After all, he watched Xie Lian make the robes in the first place.

And yet…

It can be startling, watching the god shift from the plain, unadorned white robes of a cultivator, to something so…

Elegant. Ethereal.

The silk itself is rather simple, compared to other patterns he's made in the past, but woven so finely, it almost seems to shine.

More surprising for Lang Qianqiu is the fact that…

He doesn't think he's ever seen his Guoshi wearing red before.

But in this case, the inner layer of the robes Xie Lian is wearing are…distinctly red.

Or, more accurately, crimson, with the outer layer being more similar to his usual white, with the light outline of a floral pattern along the hem.

Even his hair is slightly different.

Instead of his usual top knot, the style is closer to the way he wore it back during his days as Guoshi of Yong'an—half of it pulled back, but tied low, with the hairpin Hua Cheng gifted him several weeks before holding it in place.

"…Well, that's a change of pace."

Shuo's comment is intended to be slightly more flippant, but his voice is slightly too faint to be mistaken for something less than awe.

Xie Lian shrugs, reaching down to pat Guzi's head when the child makes his way back inside the shrine.

"Compared to all of the other officials, I'll be somewhat underwhelming," the god promises with a light smile.

After all, the mid autumn festival is an affair in which every god is looking to display their wealth and power.

For Xie Lian, wearing a slightly nicer set of robes is merely not being an embarrassment.

During his first ascension, he once attended the festival wearing a crown of crystal, so lovely it cast reflections of light everywhere he went.

By comparison, he looks rather modest now.

Shuo glances over to Lang Qianqiu, who looks like he's been kicked in the head by a horse—but after a moment of pointed staring, he seems to come back to reality, admitting—

“Typically Heavenly Officials are slightly more ostentatious, but Guoshi, you still look...”

Shuo glances back and forth between the two of them, pursing his lips with thought, then steps closer to Xie Lian’s side, reaching up to press his fingertips against the god’s temple.

Xie Lian is curious when he feels something spring forth, sliding through his hair.

Delicate vines, interweaving together to make a handsome circlet around his head, adorned by white blossoms, petals stained with red towards the center.

“There,” the ghost mumbles, pulling his hand back.

Xie Lian reaches up to touch the flowers with his fingertips, surprised.

Lang Qianqiu sends a curious glance in Shuo’s direction, and the demon shrugs, toying with his ponytail. “What? Now he actually looks like a Flower Crowned Martial God.”

Xie Lian’s expression softens, and he smiles. “Thank you, Ren Song,” he murmurs. “That was kind of you.”

Shuo crosses his arms with a shrug, looking away and grumbling. "It's not a big deal..."

In any case, he accepts the pat the crown prince places upon his head nonetheless. "Don't destroy anything while I'm gone."

Lang Qianqiu mutters an affirmative in acknowledgement.

Ren Song, however, makes no promises.

The two watch as the prince leaves his shrine, disappearing off to the heavens as day begins to turn to night, and the forest demon huffs, crossing his arms.

"You can deal with the kid with the bandages," he mutters, turning back to Guzi. "He's from Yong'an, anyway."

Therefore, it makes sense that Lang Qianqiu should have to deal with him. Shuo can't even look at him without feeling slightly nauseous, anyway.

"..." The Martial God shrugs, moving in that direction, adding– "I'm not giving up, you know."

“On Qi Rong?” Shuo questions flatly. “Yeah, I got the message the first time we spoke.”

Lang Qianqiu stares after him, his lips turning down into a frustrated frown.

“You know, I offered to share him,” he mutters. “I’m not the one being a child about this.”

“Share him.” Shuo repeats flatly. “What, you wanna hold hands while we stab him at the same time? It’s a fucking stupid suggestion,” he shakes his head, “and I don’t want him dead. You think I’m being childish? Really?”

“As a matter of fact, I—” Lang Qianqiu starts, then stops.

When he glances down, there’s one clawed finger poking into his chest.

Hard.

“I get that you have this whole oblivious puppy attitude,” Shuo stares up at him, his eyes burning with anger. “That’s why no one is ever honest with you.”

“...Oblivious puppy?!” The prince sputters.

“Yeah. And it’s blown up in your face already, hasn’t it?” The ghost glares, watching as Lang Qianqiu grimaces sheepishly. “Our situations are not the same. What he did to you—it isn’t the same as what he did to me.”

He opens his mouth to protest, but Shuo’s finger digs into him a little more sharply, and he closes it.

“My brother was already dead,” Shuo explains, his voice trembling slightly with emotion. “Dispersing someone’s spirit is—believe it or not—way worse than dying.”

There’s only one ghost that has come back from being dispersed. Ever.

Hua Cheng.

And while no one knew him from before, it’s clear that the experience left him…changed.

“And even if it wasn’t worse, it wouldn’t have mattered if it was Qi Rong, or An Le, or anyone else.”

“How could it not matter?!”

“Because your bloodline was already cursed!” Shuo snaps. “Something awful would have happened to your clan eventually, it just happened to be Qi Rong.”

They both stop, standing in front of the shrine, sun sinking under the hilltops in the distance.

“…What are you talking about?” Lang Qianqiu mutters, staring at Ren Song’s expression—hostile, twisted with bitterness and…

Pain.

“…The man who founded your clan,” Shuo mutters, “the first King of Yong’an.”

“What about him?”

“He was a sick, pathetic piece of shit.”

Ren Song drops his hand from Lang Qianqiu’s chest, fists balling up at his sides, and…

The martial god’s eyes widen with understanding.

“You…” He realizes, looking the ghost over, “…You were born in Xianle, weren’t you?”

“…What was left of it,” Ren Song mutters.

Lang Qianqiu glances away, swallowing hard.

“…I’m sorry that you were harmed by the war,” he takes a deep breath, “but wars… they happen. That isn’t enough to curse an entire bloodline. And I was born five centuries later—”

“I’m not talking about the war.”

Lang Qianqiu stops, his eyebrows creasing. “…King Lang Ying died shortly after the war. Everyone knows that.”

"Qi Rong had your clan slaughtered as a ghost." Shuo mutters. "You think your ancestor wasn't capable of causing damage after his death?"

The prince doesn't seem to have a response to that. Which is fine. Shuo does.

"He didn't care about the people of Yong'an. He wasn't a savior." The ghost sneers, crossing his arms. It's a defensive posture, but really—

He's holding himself. Self soothing.

"I died because of the plague that bastard caused when I was six years old, and do you know what happened after that?!"

...The plague he caused?

"The plague was caused by—"

"Bai Wuxiang. With the help of YOUR ancestor. And even after the calamity killed him—he wouldn't stop."

In the distance, from behind a layer of bandages, eyes are watching him.

"He thought the plague would give him his wife and son back. But the way he summoned it the first time—it was by burying children. And you know what?" Shuo throws his hands up, fingers trembling.

"After he died, there weren't any children left to bury!" It's almost funny, in the scale of it's tragedy. "His war, his plague—it killed an entire generation of children. Can you even understand what that means?!"

Suffering so beyond the human scale of comprehension.

"He had to use souls of the children he already killed," Shuo mutters, his fingers trembling, then going still as he takes deep breaths, his pupils blown with anger. "I woke up in the afterlife, confused, and scared, only for him to catch me and my older brother, and hang us."

Lang Qianqiu is silent, knowing there's no reason or motivation to lie about something like this—but struggling to comprehend that anyone—much less his ancestor—would be capable of such a thing.

"I watched him bury hundreds of children's souls in the forests of Mount Tonglu."

Hanging there. Unable to move. Unable to do anything but scream and cry. Knowing that no one was coming to save him. Knowing that he was already dead. That his brother was dead.

That his own father was the one who put him there.

“One by one. Knowing one day, I would be next.”

It broke most of the children there before they even went into the ground. When Lang Ying cut them down, they wouldn’t even fight.

Shuo doesn’t know why he was different. There was never anything special about him.

No royal lineage, like Lang Qianqiu. No epic love story, like Hua Cheng. No grand destiny, like Xie Lian.

Shuo just, for whatever reason, didn’t break.

And so many of the people he cared about did.

“I was like that for eight years, before Hua Cheng rescued me and my brother.”

Shuo spent more time hanging in a tree, watching children being buried, their souls slowly dispersing under the weight of the torture, than he did alive.

“Your family. Your kingdom. Every bit of wealth, power, and privilege you grew up with, is built on that man’s legacy.”

Shuo thought he might feel better. That giving verbal weight to his emotions might make them go away.

But it doesn’t.

There was already a weight on Lang Qianqiu’s shoulders. It’s only bigger now. Heavier.

And that doesn’t make him feel better.

“You’ll have to forgive me, for not wanting your grief compared to mine.” He mutters.

He doesn’t need to breathe, but still—his breaths are shaking as he glares at the ground.

"...That's bullshit."

Shuo's eyes grow wide.

He hasn't heard the god swear before.

"You didn't deserve what happened to you. Neither did your brother, or any of the other children. And—fine, knowing that—my ancestor was a monster." Lang Qianqiu agrees, even if it's hard. "But curses—being doomed by the choices of our ancestors—I don't believe in any of that."

Shuo looks up from the ground, looking the martial god in the eye. His jaw is locked, and there's a stubbornness to him.

"My father, my aunts, my uncles, my cousins—they're all dead, because Prince An Le believed in that. But that was a lie."

If there's such a thing as a curse, then maybe, it puts you in a difficult situation. Or it brings tragedy to your door.

But how you respond to that is still your own choice.

"There's a difference between justice and vengeance."

His Guoshi taught him that a long time ago.

"What you want, what I want—is justice. Qi Rong directly hurt us both. But punishing people for things beyond their control, injustices that they can't fix—that's vengeance. That's what An Le did to my family. And once you go down that path—it never ends."

Shuo stares at him, eyes wide, his expression unreadable.

...As if he's seeing the Crown Prince of Yong'an for the first time.

"...What?" Lang Qianqiu mutters, his brow furrowed. "Are you about to laugh at me and call me an idiot again?"

"...No..." The ghost mumbles. "I just...wish you could have had that conversation with someone else a long time ago," he mutters, turning back towards the shrine.

"I should check on Guzi," he concludes, walking away.

Because if he had—and if that person would have listened—

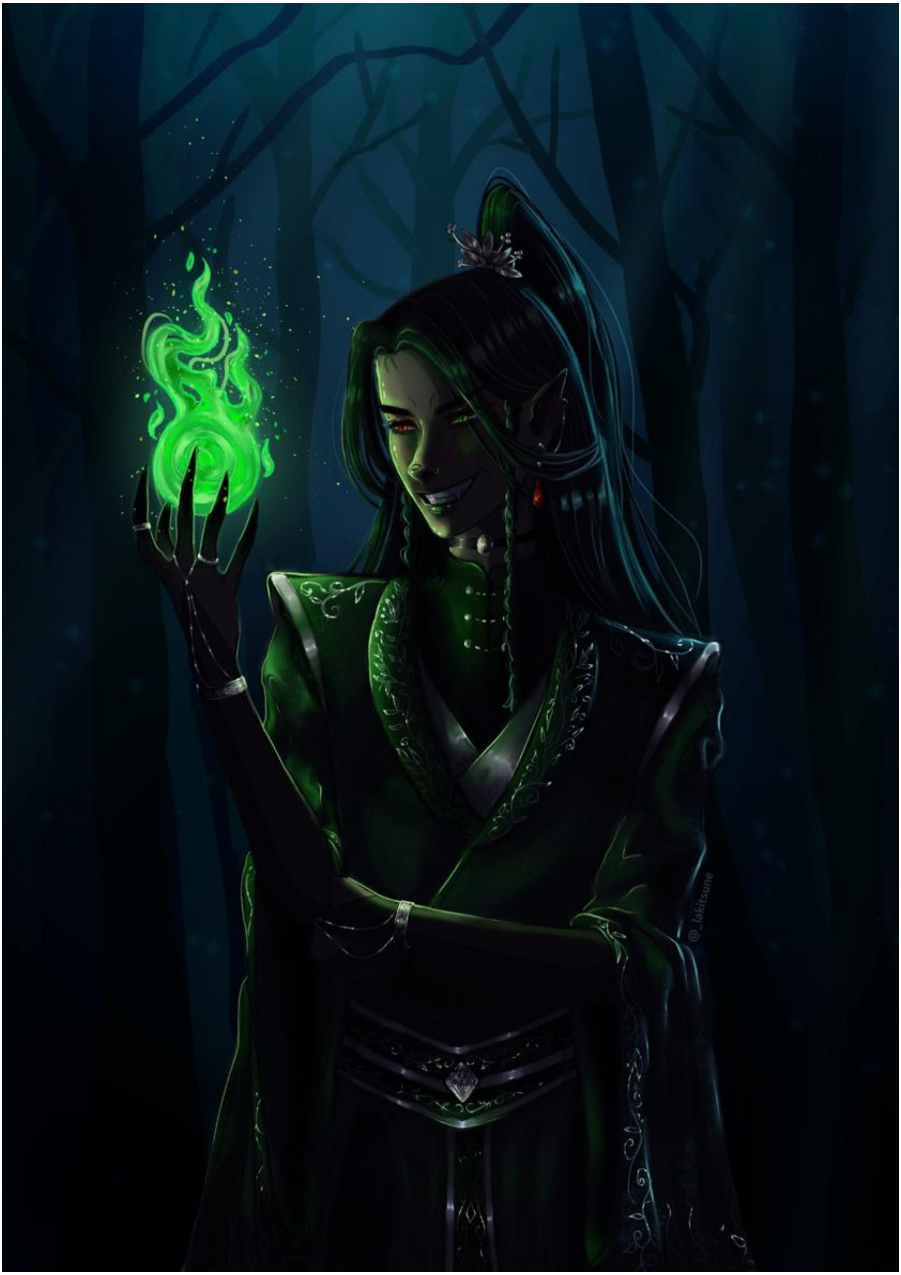
Maybe things would be different.

FOR THOSE WANTING TO CONTINUE READING ON TWITTER:
START HERE

ARTWORK INSPIRED BY THIS STORY

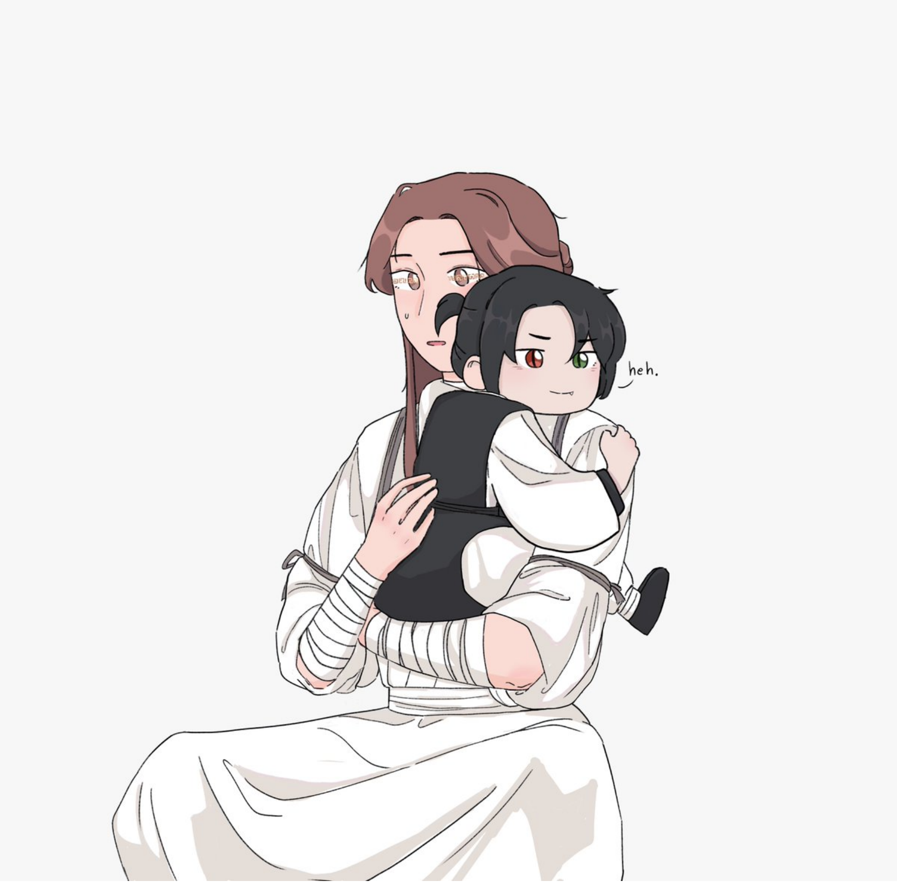
Included with permission from the artists, do not reproduce or reuse for any reason

Autumn Twilight Shrouding Forests (Ren Song / Shuo) + Ghost Fire! Qi Rong



CREDIT: LAKI

XIE LIAN + SHUO'S CHILD FORM



CREDIT: LILI

SHUO COOKING + XIE LIAN + DIAN DIAN + GUZI

sner
Hmph
@currant_bliss
JunkyArtist 2022
Pls Do Not Repost

CREDIT: JUNKY

Chapter End Notes

thank you to Laki, Lili, and Junky for their beautiful artwork, and allowing me to share it!!

xoxo, Evie

Rumors and Myths

Chapter Summary

> “But why are you sitting back here alone?”
>
> “I...” Xie Lian swallows dryly. “Well...”
>
> “Your highness!” Another voice cries out from across the room, broken up with nervous laughter. “Hahaha, you’re here! Why don’t you come and sit with me, yes? Over here!”
>
> ...Shi Qingxuan.
>
> Xie Lian sends Feng Xin an apologetic smile, rising to his feet as he makes his way across the room.
>
> (And, unfortunately for him, Lady Wind Master is front and center.)
>
> “Lady Wind Master,” he smiles, reaching out to feel for the edge of the table so he can find a seat. Shi Qingxuan notices, reaching over and taking his wrist, guiding him down into the seat beside her. “How are you?”
>
> “GREAT!” She beams, so loud it makes Xie Lean start. “I thought you would NEVER get here!”

Chapter Notes

See the end of the chapter for notes

Xie Lian's first Mid Autumn Festival as a god was when he was just seventeen years old. Eagerly bounding through the streets of the Heavenly Capital, his friends on either arm. Taking in the sights, the shows, the music all around.

It's even more opulent now than it used to be.

Of course, Xie Lian can't see the multi-story high displays of makeshift golden palaces. Or the massive pyramids of acrobats and performers dancing through the streets. But the sound of it, the rush of movement, the roar of the music, the heat of the fireworks...

It's overwhelming.

Junior officials laugh and gather in the streets, observing the free entertainment, making bets about the battle of the Lanterns, later.

(Xie Lian is unsurprised to never hear his name come up in such conversations.)

The Upper Court, however, is far removed from the streets of the capital, already gathered for the Mid Autumn Banquet.

For such events, the Grand Martial Hall is completely renovated. Ivory tables moved in, velvet and silk curtains hung throughout, music and laughter in the air.

Since Xie Lian's appearance here is perfunctory at best, he drifts towards the back of the room, taking a seat at a nearly empty table, his hood pulled halfway over his head.

After all, if he doesn't make a scene, he can leave after the lanterns are–

"...Your highness?"

Xie Lian glances up, surprised, finding a familiar aura before him. Earth toned, very hard edged.

“...Feng Xin,” he smiles, pushing his hair behind his ears. “Are you enjoying the festival?”

The martial god stares down at him, slightly tongue tied, the tips of his ears pink.

Dark eyes watch him resentfully from across the room, glaring over the rim of a wine glass.

“No,” Feng Xin mutters. “I hate parties.”

He always has, Xie Lian remembers that much well. It was one of the only things he and Mu Qing ever had in common, back in the old days.

After all, they always tended to disappear from gatherings at the same time, back in Xianle.

“But why are you sitting back here alone?”

“I...” Xie Lian swallows dryly. “Well...”

“Your highness!” Another voice cries out from across the room, broken up with nervous laughter. “Hahaha, you’re here! Why don’t you come and sit with me, yes? Over here!”

...Shi Qingxuan.

Xie Lian sends Feng Xin an apologetic smile, rising to his feet as he makes his way across the room.

(And, unfortunately for him, Lady Wind Master is front and center.)

“Lady Wind Master,” he smiles, reaching out to feel for the edge of the table so he can find a seat. Shi Qingxuan notices, reaching over and taking his wrist, guiding him down into the seat beside her. “How are you?”

“GREAT!” She beams, so loud it makes Xie Lean start. “I thought you would NEVER get here!”

There’s a sort of strain to her voice, and Xie Lian can’t understand why or how, but it feels like he’s been pulled into the middle of something.

And, like everyone else, the goddess is dressed to impress.

Her dress is made of soft, swishing fabric—a light shade of jade green with gold embellishments—and her hair is pulled up into a sumptuous, extravagant style, jade and emerald combs holding it in place.

On her other side, Ming Yi wears simple black robes, looking utterly bored.

Well, that’s not entirely true, he seems somewhat engaged with the rack of beef ribs in front of him, gnawing them down to the bone.

(Shi Qingxuan seems a little distracted whenever he licks the sauce off of his fingers.) Other than the gold earrings he always wears, he’s completely unadorned.

It’s disgraceful. Even the laughingstock of the three realms made an attempt at being presentable.

“Come now,” Pei snorts boisterously. “It’s not that serious either way.”

“Of course you would say that.” The Water Master’s voice rings clear from his seat beside the general—at the highest table there is, aside from Jun Wu's.

"Lord Water Master, always so judgmental," he chides him, "I'm not embarrassed." He slides the blade across the table, showing where his blood has stained it

Sapphire eyes cut down to stare at it before glancing back up at him, unimpressed.

"Yes," he muses, his tone dry as a bone, "it would be a bit late for you to feel shame."

That draws laughter from across the room, and Pei shrugs, throwing his hands up, not offended in the least.

"I'm just saying, there's nothing wrong with not being a virgin."

Xie Lian's eyes widen.

Ah, Yan Zhen.

Jun Wu has many swords in collection, with enchantments ranging from useful to the peculiar.

This one, for example, won't be stained by the blood of a virgin.

Shi Wudu rolls his eyes, reaching down to slide his finger up over the blade, a drop of his own blood running down the edge, remaining there.

"Well, well..." Pei clicks his tongue, smirking over at him. "And you were shaming me..."

The water master arches an eyebrow.

"Compare my two to your...hundreds, or is it thousands?" He muses, rolling his eyes. "I'm not particularly ashamed, no."

Pei snorts, then stops, his wine glass halfway to his mouth, and when he speaks again, his voice is much softer—and surprised.

"...Two?"

Shi Wudu shrugs. "Are you shocked it's so few, or are you being a hypocrite now?"

After all, very few could imagine why the general would care, either way.

“...” Pei takes a drink, shaking his head. “Then why should it matter if your little sister isn’t? Let her play.”

The Water Master huffs, and Xie Lian can feel Shi Qingxuan stiffen beside him, silently reeling from the stress.

Xie Lian remembers this game. It didn’t bother him, during his first ascension. After all, his chastity was a point of pride, back then. He practically showed it off.

“Of course she is,” Shi Wudu mutters, crossing his arms, “I just think it’s a ridiculous, immature game.”

“And what makes you so sure?”

“She isn’t married,” Shi Wudu replies haughtily.

Pei lets out a surprised laugh, pointing with his glass, “YOU aren’t married either!”

“Yes,” the water master agrees, “who can blame me for a lack of suitable candidates.”

Finally, there seems to be something that Genera Pei doesn’t find amusing—his laughter ceasing as he takes another drink from his wine, grumbling something unintelligible into his cup.

Shi Wudu looks away from him, turning his gaze in his sister’s direction. “Just do it, Shi Qingxuan,” the water god rolls his eyes. “It’s not like you haven’t done it before.”

Maybe not in the last decade or two, but still. What difference does it make?

The sword is passed over, eventually coming to rest on the table in front of them.

Shi Qingxuan bites her lip, Xie Lian frowns, and Ming Yi tilts a bowl of curry in front of his mouth, downing the entire thing in two gulps, meat and all.

“...You don’t have to do anything,” Xie Lian murmurs, his brow pinched with disapproval.

He Xuan has to catch his breath, having been so focused on devouring an entire shank of lamb, he forgot to breathe. “And if you’re not, it’s not like anyone knows who did it.”

“...” Shi Qingxuan swallows thickly, staring down at the sword like it might as well be an executioner’s ax, reaching for it hesitantly, and...

Xie Lian sighs, unable to take it any longer, reaching out to take the blade himself, sliding the sharp edge along his palm.

Of course, it was a noble thing to do, stepping in to take the turn from the wind master, though it certainly won’t distract people from—

Several people pause, startled when the blade begins to glow brightly, rattling against the tabletop.

“...Oh,” Shi Qingxuan stares, shocked.

Xie Lian can’t help but feel...pained, hearing her say it like that. Not hatefully, or with judgement. Just...

Surprised.

Meaning she heard those rumors.

Even now, they still exist. Reminding him of one of the more humiliating moments of his life.

More than simple embarrassment

It was a moment of painful, bone deep humiliation. When the connection between the person he had become and the image he had been clinging onto completely shattered.

Across the room, General Xuan Zhen has grown starkly pale, staring down at his plate, hands limp in his lap.

Remembering his greatest regret.

‘That’s how much you hate me?!’

From two tables over, Feng Xin’s jaw is clenched, his hands balled into fists on top of his silverware.

‘You’d rather allow him to sell himself than accept my help?!’

It wasn’t the worst thing he said that night.

But Mu Qing rarely says things in anger that he actually regrets. The consequences, maybe, but never the action itself.

And god, he—

His shoulders hunch slightly, his eyes narrowed into a glare.

(But only to hide the emotions behind them.)

Mu Qing regrets everything he said that night.

“...Well,” a nearby martial god speaks up, snorting with disbelief. “I suppose we misjudged you, your highness.”

Feng Xin’s glass of wine cracks, and Mu Qing looks positively green. Xie Lian doesn’t say a word.

He reaches for a napkin, calmly using it to staunch the blood on his palm, rather than getting it all over the table.

It’s certainly enough of a distraction from Shi Qingxuan, anyway. Xie Lian expected to have that effect, when he did it.

It’s an uncomfortable reminder, but if it prevents the public revelation that Xie Lian expects she was trying to avoid, well—

It’s a price he’s more than happy to pay.

No one deserves to feel ashamed over something like that, one way or the other.

“Come now,” one of the civil gods snickers, covering his mouth. “It’s not as though he ever said a word to defend himself. And to think, we could have held him in such higher regard...”

Shi Qingxuan glares, opening her mouth to defend him, but—

Before anyone else can say a word, the first person to leap to his defense—

“You say that as if you would have believed him.”

…is Pei.

Xie Lian sits in shocked silence.

“And if your high regard is so cheap, what makes you think anyone wants it?"

Pei, whom Xie Lian has (albeit unintentionally) embarrassed and insulted multiple times since his return.

He's the first to speak up for the Crown Prince of Xianle.

"Ah, yes," the Civil God rolls his eyes. "General Ming Guang, the great defender of concubines and prostitution."

"And?" Pei arches an eyebrow. "You know, in my experience, men only resent concubines because they believe what they're selling is something that they are entitled to have for free."

That statement leaves the civil god red all the way up to his ears.

"It's no prostitute's fault that you couldn't convince a woman to go to bed with you, divinity and all." Pei sits back, crossing his arms over his chest.

Shi Wudu doesn't say a word, fanning himself lazily from the general's side, but... There's an approving glint in his eye.

From the head of the room, sitting at the highest table—Jun Wu seems to have had enough of the commotion, clapping his hands.

Yan Zhen flies from the table, returning to its scabbard.

"I think enough people have had a turn," the emperor murmurs, pouring a glass of wine.

Xie Lian let out a sigh of relief. Not for his own sake, but for Shi Qingxuan's—but when he hears a low drum beat kicking up, his expression becomes a mask of confusion.

"...They came up with this game three centuries ago," the wind master explains, leaning close. "Every time the drum beats, the glass of wine is passed to another god. When it stops, whoever has it has to drink the entire thing."

Oh, a drinking game? That sounds surprisingly normal—

"And," she adds, "a play about them in the mortal realm is displayed for all to see."

And it turns out, Xie Lian wasn't the last heavenly official to arrive.

“Ling Wen!” Pei barks over the drums, “We were wondering when you would arrive!”

To the prince’s surprise, a distinctively male voice replies. “I had a stack of reports to complete, forgive me.”

He takes a seat on the other side of Shi Wudu, their shoulders brushing together. “I’m sure the Water Master was able to keep you entertained in my absence.”

He sends a wry smile Shi Wudu’s way, only for a fan to be snapped in front of his face, blocking it from view.

“I’m always entertaining,” the Water God replies haughtily. “I wish you didn’t have to come in that form.”

Ling Wen arches an eyebrow. She’s handsome as a woman, to be sure —but there’s a different amount of confidence to him, when he takes form as a man.

Tall, broad, with an air of quiet, easy confidence that is...undeniably attractive to anyone within range.

(Even Xie Lian has to admit, he finds Ling Wen’s male voice somewhat alluring.) Still, he’s never seen Ling Wen take his male form before. Why now?

Sensing his confusion, Shi Qingxuan whispers in his ear. “Ling Wen is more often worshiped as a god these days, rather than a goddess—and we’re expected to attend the mid-autumn festival in our most powerful forms.”

Ah, well, that makes sense. And it also explains why—

“And I wish my brother didn’t have to attend in that form, either,” Shi Wudu mutters, slumping back in his seat, his arms crossed. “It’s ridiculous.”

Shi Qingxuan glances down at her plate, her lips sagging into a small frown.

Xie Lian can’t see Ming Yi’s expression. The way his food stops halfway towards his mouth, his gaze sharpening as it turns in the Water Master’s direction.

Hateful.

“Come now,” Pei’s voice is playful, though more teasing than it is boisterous. “You say that as though you don’t have a female form yourself.”

Shi Qingxuan stiffens, startled, and her older brother, hidden behind his fan, is scarlet from ear to ear.

“And I think she’s rather lovely,” the general adds with a grin, even if it doesn’t quite reach his eyes.

General Pei has little love for Shi Qingxuan, it’s true.

But the same cannot be said for her elder brother, and the general understands how important that bond is. And that Shi Wudu’s attitudes towards his sister’s feminine form are...easily misunderstood.

Not stemming from genuine distaste, or small mindedness, but rather...

Protectiveness. Fear and distrust of others. Particularly men.

Where that comes from, Pei Ming doesn’t know. He’s tried and tried, but...There’s only so far that someone will let you in, when they are afraid.

And with that damn pride of his, Shi Wudu would far rather be perceived as anything but frightened.

Shi Qingxuan stares at her older brother, shocked, though not unpleasantly so. “Gege, you have a...?”

Before she can finish her questions, the drums come to a halt.

The victim of the first round is some minor martial god, who takes the chalice, downing it with a grin, chortling as they play shows off some minor victory.

Ming Yi goes back to his meat, and Xie Lian leans his chin on his palm, thinking. He’s always found these games odd.

He can’t say that he’s ever enjoyed them, but that never seems to be the intention.

There’s no rush in winning. The only possibility of fun is the amusement of the crowd at one god or goddess’s expense.

But this game, at first blush, doesn’t seem so bad.

After all, plays in the mortal realm about the gods are usually flattering, aren't they? And in the cases of less popular gods, like him—they aren't included in plays at all.

There's no risk. Nothing to build anxiety.

(And, for some reason, the games always seem designed to create that sense of tension.)

Shi Qingxuan remains close to his ear, narrating the plays as they go by, none of them particularly noteworthy, but it's nice to know what's happening.

The first play of note occurs when the cup lands with Feng Xin, and from the mere sound of it, paired with Shi Qingxuan's stuttering as she tries to explain what's going on—

It sounds mildly erotic by nature.

There's a storm of swearing erupting from Feng Xin's table, followed by snickering from Ming Yi, swallowing down a mouthful of roasted duck.

"What do you expect them to write plays about, with a nickname like Dick Yang?" He mutters under his breath.

Shi Qingxuan can't help but giggle behind her hand, but Xie Lian feels bad for poor Feng Xin...

Of the three of them, he was the only one who wasn't forced to practice chastity due to cultivation, and yet (likely because of his father) he was always uncomfortable with intimacy.

"You know," Ming Yi leans back, wiping his mouth with a napkin, his arm resting against the back of Shi Qingxuan's chair, "I've always wondered..."

It's interesting. Normally, the Earth Master is quiet and sullen. He still is now, but...

He seems slightly more talkative, around Shi Qingxuan—directly contradicting his constant insistence that they aren't friends.

"Why does Xuan Zhen's hair look like that at these events?"

Xie Lian's brow furrows—because obviously, he has no idea. "What does he mean?"

"Ah," Shi Qingxuan taps her thumb against her chin, "Well, you remember how, during the plague four centuries ago, Mu Qing began being worshiped as a medicinal god as well as a martial god?"

Xie Lian and Ming Yi nod in tandem, and she continues;

"Mortals don't tell stories as cut and dry as that, like, 'Oh, the Heavenly Emperor sent down a few gods to deal with the mess, and Xuan Zhen happened to be one of them, ' no, they have to make it more...fantastical, you know?" She drags her fingertip around the rim of her cup.

"So, back then, some playwright took the old stories of Xuan Zhen being born a servant, and twisted it into a new story: that he was bullied and hated by his fellow officers, resented for the status of his birth. His master, however, was oblivious to his struggle."

Shi Qingxuan tells the story like it's entirely fictitious, missing the flash of discomfort in Xie Lian's expression.

"Eventually, a plague ravaged the land. Taking young and old, rich and poor. Xuan Zhen was sent, along with his master's other generals, to find a cure."

The drum beat begins once more as the cup is filled to be passed around again.

"General Xuan Zhen discovered a lake with healing properties. Those who drank from it would be cured. But—whenever someone else attempted to fill their cup, the surface of the lake would turn to ice."

As if by fate, just as she continues to tell the story, the cup lands on Mu Qing's plate.

He stares down at it, lips turned down into a slight frown, silver earrings clinking at his ears as he leans over to pick it up.

"The other generals called it witchcraft—and they refused to tell Xuan Zhen's master it was him providing the cure. He worked tirelessly, without credit, bringing casks of water from the lake day in and day out."

Finally, Mu Qing lifts the glass to his lips, swallowing it down.

"Eventually winter came—and with it, the plague reached the royal capital. Infecting the generals, the nobility, and eventually, Xuan Zhen's master."

As she speaks, the velvet curtain on the stage at the center of the room lifts, depicting the scene she's describing.

"Still, without credit or thanks, Xuan Zhen walked in the snow, bringing water to the people of the city. Curing his master, the men who discredited him, and the nobles who looked down on him. But, eventually—he caught the sickness himself."

As she speaks, the actor on stage—heroic, of course, as any dramatic lead is—falls to his knees, clutching his chest with a dramatic groan.

"One general—and only one—offered to carry him up the mountain side, so he could drink from the lake himself."

On cue, another heroic figure appears, carrying the lead on his back, struggling rather theatrically.

"But the mountain was steep—and with the snow getting deeper, it was impossible to carry another person to the summit, where the lake awaited."

Mu Qing watches the scene unfold with a bored expression, his gaze rather guarded.

"Desperate, afraid he would be too late, his fellow General left Xuan Zhen beneath a cherry tree, hurrying to the summit on his own. But, try as he may, the lake remained frozen solid."

Shi Qingxuan leans back in her chair, twirling a lock of hair between her fingers. "The general returned, planning to try carrying him to the summit again—but it was too late. Xuan Zhen had succumbed to sickness and the cold."

Xie Lian frowns, confused by the story.

"But if he dies in the story, how could he be worshiped as a god?"

"That's the thing," Shi Qingxuan smiles, "the drama of it all—the moment he drew his last breath, he ascended. Not only as a martial god, but as a god of medicine and the winter season."

"That makes sense," Ming Yi murmurs, watching Mu Qing's passive expression as he watches the story of his own 'ascension,' "Even if it is a lie, he's certainly cold blooded enough to be a god of Winter."

"Hush," Shi Qingxuan swats his arm playfully, "I'm not finished."

Xie Lian doesn't entirely agree. Mu Qing is the opposite of cold blooded. He might seem unfeeling at times—but he's one of the more emotional people the prince has ever known.

People just judge too quickly to see it.

"When Xuan Zhen ascended—his hair changed too."

The play makes its dramatic conclusion as she explains—

"It changed in color to match the surface of the frozen lake. As such, General Xuan Zhen is worshiped and painted as having silver hair."

The very same look he's sporting now, silken locks gleaming like starlight as they float around his face, making his eyes seem even darker and more mysterious by comparison, watching as they play draws to a close.

"...That's quite a story," Xie Lian murmurs.

"Too bad it's not true," Ming Yi yawns. "Mortals are truly ridiculous."

"Oh, that's not the most bizarre claim," Shi Qingxuan smiles. "There's even a story that drinking his blood can cure any ailment."

Xie Lian's jaw goes slack, his brow pinching with worry. "...What?"

"Oh," his friend laughs, shaking his head. "Don't worry, your highness! No one is about to take a bite out of him. His worshippers just create dishes incorporating animal blood every winter solstice to obtain blessings for good health in the following year."

"It is odd though," Ming Yi muses, watching the glass pass around the room again. "The things that mortals come up with."

"Oh, I've heard stranger things," the wind master muses. "You know—they'll even make up stories for why certain gods don't exist."

Xie Lian's eyebrows raise. "Why would they do that?"

"Well," Shi Qingxuan snaps her fan open, giving it a couple of gentle flaps to re-adjust some flyaways in her hair. "We have a Water Master, a Rain Master, an Earth Master, and a Wind Master, yes?"

"...Right," Xie Lian agrees.

"The Thunder Master only faded away a few centuries ago, the vacancy isn't old enough that it draws mortal attention—but we haven't had a fire master in over a thousand years. So, with no one to worship, they made up a story to explain it."

Now that she mentions it—it is odd.

Even when Xie Lian was a child, there hadn't been a fire master for several hundred years. Maybe there hasn't even been one in Jun Wu's entire term as Heavenly Emperor.

"See, according to the mortals, there was a volcanic eruption eight centuries ago—and a star that burned so brightly in the aftermath, it could even be seen in the daylight, and it remained that way for several months—" Shi Qingxuan prattles on, and Xie Lian stops her.

"That actually did happen."

Shi Qingxuan stops, surprised. "...Really?"

The drum beats stop again, this time landing on another civil god, with some tale that doesn't seem particularly worth describing.

After all, Xie Lian's revaluation is more interesting.

"Yes," the prince agrees, straining to remember. "It happened when I was...around seven years old. The star burned red in the sky for around three months. It was... beautiful, but strange."

Later on, it would be called a cursed omen, foretelling the fall of Xianle. Xie Lian only remembers thinking that it was beautiful.

"Well, who knows—maybe there's some truth to it. The story goes that the Fire Master was an ancient star, looking down on the world each night—until one day, he fell in love with a mortal. One of royal blood."

The prince smiles faintly, listening close.

"He would watch the mortal each night in his dreams, and the young noble would look up at the stars each night, finding one more beautiful than all the rest. And as time went on, it became more and more painful to be apart."

It's a beautiful story. Something like a fairytale, but...

"The Fire Master knew his beloved would ascend as a god one day. So, he waited, and he waited…but when the noble's day of ascension came, his godhood was stolen from him."

That's the thing about fairytales.

"And so, the exalted fire master, bound to the heavens, was torn from his beloved, shackled to the earth below. In his rage, a volcano rocked the earth, spewing flame and ash into the sky. And his star burned brighter and brighter, until…"

He faded away.

Xie Lian frowns, his stomach sinking.

What a miserable story.

But—

"He gave up his godhood, and his star fell, crashing to the earth below." Xie Lian pauses, his lips parting. "His beloved caught him, cradling the fading god in his arms." Shi Qingxuan recalls.

"And in exchange for giving up his own life, his beloved rose at last as a god, separating them once more."

There's something heartbreaking about the tale—and without thinking, Xie Lian finds himself grasping the chain around his neck, his chest aching with something bittersweet

"According to such tales, his beloved still roams the earth as a martial god now, sustained by one believer—the fallen fire master, who watches over him from the ghost realm below."

There's a heavy pause, and eventually, Ming Yi empties his glass. "That's fucking depressing."

Xie Lian can't help but agree, and Shi Qingxuan shrugs. "Sure, but it's where the term 'star crossed lovers,' came from."

"Really?" Xie Lian's eyes remain wide. "I had no idea."

"Have you ever wished on a falling star?" Shi Qingxuan points out wryly. "That's where that superstition comes from, too."

"That seems like a crock of shit," Ming Yi mutters, picking at his bowl of pickled plums, and Shi Qingxuan's pouts.

"I'm not making it up! Back when I was a little kid, they used to call falling stars 'Tears of the Fire Master!' And if you wished on one, your love would be bound by fate!" She huffs, crossing her arms.

"And how do you know so much about it?"

"Because my gege used to tell me that story every night before bed!" She cries, indignant. "It was my favorite!"

"Oh," Ming Yi snorts derisively. "The Water Master was telling you bedtime stories, was he?"

"He wasn't the Water Master back then, he was just my big brother!" Shi Qingxuan pouts, fiddling with her whisk. "And he was so busy working during the day, I hardly ever got to see him."

"Working?" Xie Lian questions. "Is he that much older than you?"

It always sounded as though they were close enough in age to grow up together as children.

"Mmm..." Shi Qingxuan shrugs. "Our age difference isn't that large—but our parents died when I was a toddler, so he was running the merchant business for as long as I can remember."

At first, it's difficult to imagine someone so young being given such responsibility, but...

As someone who was made the martial god of the central plains at the ripe old age of seventeen, he has no room to call such a thing unbelievable.

"Did he—?"

Just as Xie Lian opens his mouth to question it, the drums stop.

And, as if by fate—

Shi Wudu is left holding the cup.

There's a pause before the curtains draw up, and when they do—Ming Yi snorts, and Shi Qingxuan swats his arm again.

"Don't laugh!"

"Why shouldn't I?" The earth master mutters, heaping more beef into his plate. "It serves him right."

...What is that supposed to mean?

“Oh...” Shi Qingxuan groans, watching the play between her fingers. “He’s going to hate this...”

“Hate what?” Xie Lian questions, given that this is the first play The Wind Master hasn’t leapt into a narration for.

“...” The wind master bites her lip, watching the actress on stage. Long, raven hair— luminous blue eyes—and a haughty expression. Beautiful, but...

“...You know how...the ocean’s tides change with the phases of the moon?” She whispers hoarsely.

“...Yes?”

“Well, uh...”

Shi Qingxuan picks at her food fretfully, and Ming Yi smirks.

“He’s often worshiped as god of the moon as well because of it. But, there’s already a Sun god.”

...The Heavenly Emperor, Jun Wu.

Shi Qingxuan sinks lower in her seat as Ming Yi explains it further.

“The Sun and the Moon have always been worshiped in tandem. But in this case, people already worshiped the Wind and Water masters as siblings.”

For once, the earth god is oh-so-happy to be talkative.

“So, it was natural to worship the god of the moon as the Sun God’s consort.”

Across the room, Shi Wudu’s face is impassive as he watches the display.

But his knuckles are white, where they grip the handle of his fan.

“In some kingdoms, this made little difference, and the Water Master is still worshiped as a man. But in others...”

In places less accepting of relations between members of the same sex, naturally, the Heavenly Emperor could only have a wife.

An Empress, always setting and fading as her husband rises.

“...She is worshiped as a goddess.”

“And gege hates it,” Shi Qingxuan mumbles. “It makes him so upset...”

Xie Lian can’t imagine why it would be such an issue. He wouldn’t mind being worshiped as a goddess. Actually, while it was brief, and the circumstances were stressful, he enjoyed his time in a female form.

But then again, Shi Wudu is different.

Some people care very deeply about being perceived as masculine—as a matter of pride. Xie Lian has just never been one of them.

He’s been stronger than most men since he was a child, but more beautiful than most of them too.

He’ll dress as a woman when needed without a care. And he’s rarely felt compelled to prove his prowess to others. It has always spoken for itself, regardless of his looks or actions.

Strength is strength, regardless of what form it comes in.

But, once again—Shi Wudu’s pride often leads to him being misunderstood.

There are certain stories tied to his female form he doesn’t mind.

A goddess of resilience and rebirth. Known as a protector of mothers and newborn children.

Others, however, draw horror and disgust.

Among them being that, rather than being his younger brother, Shi Qingxuan is actually his daughter with the Heavenly Emperor.

The first time he heard it, he had to excuse himself, becoming sick to his stomach.

And this play—

It feels grotesque.

“...What’s happening?” Xie Lian inquires quietly, feeling somewhat awkward, and Shi Qingxuan startles, clearing her throat.

“Haha…” She laughs nervously, “S-sorry your highness. This one—it’s about the waxing and waning of the moon.”

Oh, well—that sounds harmless enough.

“In this story, she’s reborn over and over again with the new moon, and this is depicting one of the cycles, see…” Shi Qingxuan glances over the stage, biting her lip. “Here, her first born has been promised to a monster.”

Depicted as a horned, hunchbacked beast on the stage, long claws and sharp teeth, reaching for the swaddled infant with a greedy eye.

“But the Moon goddess is clever, creating a golem from stone and earth, tricking the monster into thinking that was the child he demanded…”

The play shows as much, with the monster running off with the child gleefully.

“But, when the child came of age, the golem turned to dust—enraged, the monster returned to demand payment. This time, the cost was far more harsh. He demanded that the child pay with her life.”

Ming Yi watches the horned beast loom over the woman and child, armed crossed, his expression impassive.

“But, rather than allow her child to pay the price…” Shi Qingxuan winces, watching as the actress makes a great show of brandishing a knife. “She takes her own life.”

Shi Wudu seems bored, watching his female counterpart slit her own throat on stage, even if Pei has suddenly grown pale and silent by his side.

It’s only the sight of the heavenly emperor’s actor holding her in his arms, weeping and screaming with grief, that makes him feel sick

The curtain suddenly drops down, and Xie Lian raises an eyebrow, surprised to hear that the play has been cut off so suddenly. “…Is it over?”

“Oh, No, it looks like gege made them stop, thank heavens…” Shi Qingxuan mutters, slightly nauseous.

“You can do that?”

"Oh, sure! You just have to donate a hundred thousand merit credits!"

"..."

The drumbeat starts over again, the glass refilled, being passed again, and Xie Lian can still sense Shi Qingxuan's anxiety, so...

He tries to change it to a subject that she never seems to tire of.

"Your brother and Pei...seem much closer than I realized," he mutters, taking a sip of water.

Ming Yi's eyes widen slightly as he glances over at him, as if silently asking if Xie Lian really wants to open that can of words, but...

Remembering the prince can't see verbal cues, he quickly gives up. "Huh?" Shi Qingxuan blinks. "I already said they were friends."

"Yes, but..." Xie Lian glances in Shi Wudu's direction, eyeing a swirling, deep blue aura. "He seems more tolerant of Pei than he is of others."

"It's even WORSE when we're alone," Shi Qingxuan groans. "He won't let me say ONE bad word about him! In my own palace!"

Xie Lian can see how it might frustrate her, but he actually finds that level of loyalty rather endearing among friends.

It reminds him of Feng Xin.

"And the way he talks about him!" Shi Qingxuan glares, her face reddening slightly with outrage. "He'll never give me a SINGLE compliment—and he won't give Pei one to his face, either—but when we're alone, it's always 'Pei this' and 'Pei that!' It makes no sense!"

In all honesty, Xie Lian brought this up because he expected it to distract the wind master—and it did—but he never expected her to become this agitated.

"Honestly, why is he so BLIND when it comes to him?!" She grumbles, lifting her cup of wine to her lips, glaring.

Ming Yi doesn't look up, picking up a pickled plum, and just before he drops it into his mouth, he casually states—

"It's probably because they're fucking."

...To which Shi Qingxuan spits her wine across the table, choking on it.

(Even Xie Lian lets out a shocked wheeze.)

“They—!” Shi Qingxuan squawks, quickly lowering her voice into a scandalized whisper, “They are not!!”

Ming Yi chews on his plum, catching some juice dripping from the corner of his mouth with the tip of his tongue. “It’s highly probable.”

“My brother would never!!”

“One of us needs to get our eyes checked, because I saw his blood staining that sword, clear as day.” His gaze cuts over to Xie Lian, realizing that might have been slightly insensitive, “No offense.”

“None taken,” the prince replies hoarsely.

“Just because my brother has had...” Shi Qingxuan swallows hard, her pallor faintly green. “Just because he’s been with someone, doesn’t mean that person was Pei!”

“I’ll be brutally honest—”

...Was he not being brutal about it before?

“He has no choice but to put up with you. But no one would put up with the two of you fighting over him unless the sex was spectacular —”

“Would you shut up?!” Shi Qingxuan hisses. “They aren’t having—they aren’t doing that!”

Ming Yi turns to face her, smiling faintly.

“Why is it so upsetting for you?”

“Because it’s not true! You’re just saying it to tease me!”

“I am not, I think it’s true,” Ming Yi shrugs, glancing over to Xie Lian, “and so does he.”

The prince stiffens, sensing the wind master looking in his direction. “You do?!”

Unable to think of what to say, Xie Lian fumbles for his plate, shoving some mantou in his mouth, but…as he chews, he can feel Shi Qingxuan watching him, waiting intently, and…

He chews faster, fumbling for another bun…only to have the plate pulled out of his reach.

Shi Qingxuan clutches it to her chest, glaring, "You can't eat your way out of this!"

"…" Xie Lian starts chugging his water.

"Your highness!!"

"…Is it so bad if they are?" The prince questions weakly. "They seem very fond of one another."

" Fond?! I—!" Shi Qingxuan sputters. "I'm FOND of lots of people, I don't sleep with all of them!"

"Aw," Ming Yi smiles wider, his arm still slung along the back of her chair, "that's very nice."

She's actually irritated enough to elbow him in the ribs for that one. "Oof!"

Xie Lian is too distracted, fumbling for a gentle form of reasoning, to notice the subtext behind that exchange. "Well, you know," he mumbles, blood rushing in his ears, "I'm a virgin."

"…Yes," Ming Yi agrees. "I think everyone knows that, now."

Right. Right.

"But, if I was going to be with a person…" Xie Lian trails off, awkward. "It would be with someone I trusted, and was fond of…and those two seem to be…"

"What, so you haven't had someone like that in 800 years?" Well.

"I thought about it, once," he mumbles without thinking. "It didn't work out."

That once, of course, being Wu Ming.

Not for the right reasons. And if Xie Lian was being honest with himself—he wasn't ready back then. He was still young, so vulnerable, and…

Xie Lian thinks Wu Ming would have known that, if he had asked.

And unlike the kiss—when he was so gentle, so considerate—Xie Lian thinks the ghost would have told him no, if he had asked for something he hadn't been ready for.

It makes him remember a small detail. Tactile, sticking out brightly in his mind.

Back then, just before he kissed him on the lips—Wu Ming kissed his forehead first, his nose trailing down, allowing Xie Lian to feel the kiss coming, since he couldn't see it.

Such a small, considerate little detail. Remembering it makes the prince's heart swell with affection.

Followed with a hint of sadness.

"...Just once?" Shi Qingxuan questions, surprised

Well—it has only been once, hasn't it?

Xie Lian gives the matter some thought, wondering if there was anyone else he would...

"..." His face turns slightly red, and he nods—a jerking movement.

"...The point being," he mumbles, swallowing hard, "If they are...together—I don't think that's such a bad thing."

"They're not!"

"They are."

"And what makes you so sure?!"

"First of all," Ming Yi holds up a finger, "your brother allows Pei to tease him without consequence."

In public no less. For someone like Shi Wudu, proud and spiteful, that's no small thing.

"Pei is a powerful ally to have," Shi Qingxuan mumbles—willing to pay the general a compliment before she'll agree that he MIGHT be having relations with her brother.

"It could be for purely political reasons!"

Maybe. If the Water Master wasn't so powerful as to not need allies, but that isn't Ming Yi's only point—

"And," the earth master lifts up another plum, lifting it to his lips.

"All you have to do is watch Pei Ming for more than a few minutes at any point in time to know that he's absolutely mad for your brother."

Shi Qingxuan gawks at the very idea that Pei might be 'mad' for anyone.

"He's a philanderer. The only thing that makes him 'mad' is someone that doesn't want to sleep with him. In which case, sure, he might be mad for my brother!"

"I don't see why it really matters..." Xie Lian mumbles, wishing they would both stop.

Ming Yi, however, seems to have found a cure to the desperate boredom he's been experiencing all night, and isn't keen to give it up.

"Because the Water Master is her brother, mother, and father rolled into one, and the idea of Pei wrecking his—"

"Enough!" Shi Qingxuan hisses.

"...Point being, she doesn't like it," Ming Yi concludes with a wry smile, seeming satisfied with the chaos he's wrought.

"Would you?!"

"What's next, are you going to tell Pei he isn't your 'real dad?'"

"You—!"

Finally—mercifully—the drums stop.

This time, the wine glass has landed rather close. Actually, closer than Xie Lian realized.

With the person sitting on his other side.

He had no idea who was sitting there before. They had been quiet the entire time, wordlessly eating the food, but...

"Ah, General Qi Ying!"

Xie Lian strains to remember where he's heard that name before—likely from one of Qi Rong's minions, back in that cave...

Isn't that Quan Yizhen? Martial god of the West?

He doesn't know anything about him—and to be fair, no one has brought him up very much since his ascension.

From beside him, the young martial god glares down at the cup of wine, knocking it back with one large swallow.

He's got a slightly wild look, compared to the other gods present. Thick, curly hair, pulled halfway up and out of his face, trailing down his back.

It's somewhat akin to that of a lion's mane. His countenance is youthful—square jawed, straight nosed. Handsome, but in a rather straightforward way, with eyes the color of melted caramel, and sun kissed skin.

Even sitting down, he's tall—broad, and...distinctly quiet.

And when the velvet curtain rises from the stage once more, he remains so. Eyes wide, flickering to and fro as he watches the actors move about the stage, taking every movement in.

And clearly, not liking what they see.

Shi Qingxuan doesn't volunteer to narrate this time—and with Quan Yizhen sitting directly to his right, Xie Lian doesn't feel comfortable asking what's going on.

The play itself is intended to be comedic, by nature.

Depicting a handsome hero in gleaming armor, committing one act of bravery after another. Saving a town. Defeating a demon. Wooing young ladies along the way.

And all the while, another actor—a squat, unattractive man—is trying to sabotage him at every step of the way.

The hero doesn't lift a finger to stop him. No, he doesn't even seem to notice that someone is trying to sabotage him at all. Rather, the man is thwarted by his own clumsiness or stupidity each time.

Tripping over his own feet, falling for his own traps.

At one point, he even confesses to his crimes, unprompted, dismayed to find that no one noticed—or even cared.

Xie Lian can't see any of this—but he can hear the laughter from the audience. It's distinctly...cruel.

And Quan Yizhen—he's trembling, but not with laughter.

The air around him is distinctly distressed—whether from rage or hurt, it's difficult to tell, but...

Something about the silent unrest bothers the prince. And the fact that so many people seem to feel comfortable laughing at his expense.

(Even if they don't realize it.)

The more it goes on, the worse Xie Lian feels—until he just can't stand it anymore.

He feels around on the table, finding a wooden chopstick, delicately sliding one of his boots off under the table, pressing the bare sole of his foot against the floor, feeling the vibrations.

It gives him a rough estimate of where the stage is, the size and height of it, and where the cords holding up the curtains connect to the ceiling. It's not perfect, and he doesn't expect to get it on his first try, but—

SNAP!

The chopstick pierces through the cord perfectly.

The curtain comes crashing down, obscuring the stage from view, all while the gods look around, trying to figure out what happened.

(After all, it was so quick, no one saw.)

Well. Almost no one.

The young man beside him is staring at Xie Lian with wide eyes.

His pupils are almost slightly dilated, but they narrow in on the prince's face for a moment, focused.

And of course, Shi Qingxuan and Ming Yi are watching silently, unsure as to what the temperamental martial god is about to do, but...

He reaches down, carefully lifting the remaining mantou on his plate, placing it on that of the crown prince, one by one.

Xie Lian sits there awkwardly, about to ask what he's doing, but...

That's when Quan Yizhen leaps from his feet, charging over towards the stage.

"G-General Qi Ying!" One of the other gods cries out, "There's not—!"

He dives beneath the curtains, finding nothing, seeming to remember —the play they are seeing is nothing more than an illusion.

The actual play is coming from the mortal realm, below.

"..."

The Martial God then turns, moving towards the exit of the martial hall, descending without another word.

Xie Lian glances towards Shi Qingxuan, who has started fanning herself to alleviate the stress. "...What just happened?"

"He's probably off to beat up his own worshippers again..." she mutters, shaking her head. "Honestly, it's a miracle he still has so many..."

Xie Lian opens his mouth to ask why general Qi Ying is going to beat up his own worshippers, but—

"And you know what?" Shi Qingxuan turns back towards Ming Yi with a huff, crossing her arms.

The earth master's eyebrows quirk, amused, his mouth lifting at the corners as he crosses his legs, leaning in to offer her his undivided attention.

"What?"

"There's no way you're right."

Xie Lian bites back a groan, shoving one of his newly obtained buns in his mouth.

They're still on this?

"And how do you figure?"

“My brother wouldn’t sleep with someone philandering about with countless other lovers! He’s too proud.”

“You have a point there,” Ming Yi agrees, dark hair falling around his face as he leans down to her height, gold earrings flashing in the candlelight, “but Pei, hedonistic as he may be, hasn’t been seen with a lover in some time.”

“I—” Shi Qingxuan pauses, her lips parted. “How would you know that?!”

Ming Yi’s smile turns slightly sharp as he leans in even further, whispering next to her ear, “Didn’t you hear? I’m quite the spy.”

Bold enough to deceive Crimson Rain Sought Flower, no less.

His breath fans over her skin, the cold metal of his earring brushing against the side of her neck—and she shivers, fighting the urge to bite her lip.

Across the room, sapphire eyes narrow sharply.

“It’s my job to know everything.”

Shi Qingxuan swallows hard, her throat dry.

“...Not everything,” she mutters, but she seems to have no argument left in her. Ming Yi raises an eyebrow, but...

...The drums are back.

And of course, since Quan Yizhen has abandoned his glass, and the feast, Xie Lian picks it up, passing it over to Shi Qingxuan.

It’s the natural step, since she’s sitting right next to him, and so she passes it to Ming Yi—

Who passes it right back.

“...Ming-Xiong!” She hisses, shoving the glass back at him. “Take it to the next table!”

“You do it,” he grumbles, pulling over a bowl of pork belly. “I’m eating.”

“You’re ALWAYS eating!” Shi Qingxuan grumbles. “Just carry it over!”

“Why?”

(They’re still furiously passing the cup back and forth.)

“Because you’re the last one at the table to have it!”

“That’s not an actual rule.”

“It’s common decency!”

“I’m not decent.”

“Well, then I guess the next play is just going to be about YOU!”

But that is something the Earth Master doesn’t actually seem keen on, so— He shoves the cup back into Xie Lian’s startled hands, and...

The drums come to a sudden halt.

Shi Qingxuan stares, utterly scandalized.

“You can’t just do that to a blind man!” She hisses, sending Ming Yi a glare.

“He’s not actually blind though,” The earth master mumbles through a mouthful of pork. “He’s just been running around for eight hundred years with an evil magical blindfold. Not the same thing.”

“MING—!”

“Well, hold on,” Xie Lian holds up a finger, the wineglass dangling from his other hand, “he’s got a point there.”

Shi Qingxuan stares at him, slightly agog, mumbling, “Your highness, we really need to talk about how your threshold for being insulted is far too high...”

“No, no,” the prince shakes his head, “I’m really not blind. I can see spiritual power. And aside from the shackles, there’s nothing wrong with my vision.”

He wouldn’t call it ‘evil magic,’ but Ming Yi isn’t wrong, and Xie Lian doesn’t want to be pitied.

Someone blind through birth defect or injury didn’t choose to be that way.

Xie Lian, however, is being punished for his choices.

The difference is very real.

"..." Shi Qingxuan grimaces, watching as the curtain rises up, and Xie Lian smiles, patting her leg.

"You've already said it," he murmurs, "I have a very high tolerance for being insulted. I'm less likely to be bothered than anyone else here."

The wind master frowns, watching him sip the glass of wine. Disapproving, but unable to dispute his logic.

"...These plays get to everyone, your highness," she mumbles, her expression tinged with a deep frown. "That's the point."

If that was the case, Xie Lian can't imagine who is supposed to be entertained by it. Besides, he's the 'laughingstock of the three realms.'

If there are any plays about him in the mortal realm, he suspects they're probably of a comedic nature.

But he can't help but notice, even as he finishes his glass...

No one is laughing.

Which is surprising, given how low the standards for comedy in the Heavens are.

But more so than that...

It's the silence that Xie Lian finds odd. Not a single soul in the room is willing to make a peep.

"...What is it?" He murmurs, reaching over to touch Shi Qingxuan's sleeve.

The Windmaster starts, clearing her throat. "It—Um—it really doesn't...you don't..."

Her voice is filled with confusion—and...discomfort. "It's clearly something made up..."

The prince raises an eyebrow.

"If it's made up, then why not tell me?"

After all, what could be so bad?

“It’s…” She trails off, unsure, and finally, Xie Lian hears something:

One of the actors on the stage.

Sobbing.

“I-It HURTS!”

Xie Lian’s expression freezes, and his blood runs cold.

No.

That’s—

“HELP ME!”

No.

He knows the answer now, before Shi Qingxuan says it, and the world around him is spiraling.

“…It’s about Bai Wuxiang, your highness.”

Then, the screaming just gets louder.

“PLEASE! IT HURTS! IT HURTS! SOMEONE—ANYONE—HELP ME!”

He can’t see it, but everyone else can, and…

He knows.

That an actor version of himself is strung up on stage, hands bound, being stabbed over and over again with a prop sword.

All while one person watches, wearing a mask. Half smiling, half crying.

Then, it dives slightly off script.

“XUAN ZHEN! NAN YANG!”

And for the worse.

“WHERE ARE YOU?!” The actor screams, “WHY DID YOU LEAVE ME?!”

Ming Yi's plate is suddenly untouched.

From beside him, Shi Qingxuan has turned slightly green, glancing between the play, and the prince, whispering; "This isn't funny, this shouldn't be part of a game, even if it's not true..."

Ming Yi glances over at her, his expression suddenly deathly serious. "Stop it."

Shi Qingxuan stares, not understanding him at first—

"Stop the show, now," he mutters, his gaze carefully trained on Xie Lian's face. The Wind Master glances back over at him, but...

The prince doesn't look upset, not exactly.

Actually, the only way to even tell that he's awake is the fact that his eyes are open, staring blankly ahead. Lips slightly parted, but slack. His brow is smooth. Completely unmoving.

She hasn't seen anything quite like it before, and she doesn't...she should... Ming Yi is right, something's wrong, she—

"...This is a play in the mortal realm?"

Xie Lian's voice is quiet, small. Normally, there's something inherently comforting about the way the prince speaks. His tone is always gentle, always calm, even under difficult circumstances.

Shi Qingxuan has never heard him sound...

Weak. Fragile. Hurt.

Not until now.

"...Yes," Shi Qingxuan mutters, "based on an old, stupid story, I'll stop it r—"

Xie Lian's hand lands on her wrist before she can raise it in order to donate the merit credits.

"Wait."

Shi Qingxuan looks over at him, her expression pinched with worry. "It's no trouble, your highness, it's a drop in the—"

"...This play has been around...for a long time?"

On the stage, the masked figure laughs mockingly, lifting the prince back up when he collapses each time.

"…Yes," Shi Qingxuan admits. "I've heard of it, but I've never seen it before—"

"What is it about?"

Bai Wuxiang's actor drags him back by the hair, cackling with delight—

"BEHOLD! THE SAVIOR OF XIANLE!" His voice—

It's so loud. Too loud. Echoing off of the walls.

"LET'S SHOW HIM OUR GRATITUDE, SHALL WE?"

There's no one showing up to save him, obviously. Xie Lian's character isn't the hero in this play. No, in this scene—They're slaying the villain.

That's the thing about this play, one that makes it so unique—and it's rarely performed.

Bai Wuxiang peels off his mask, revealing his true face:

The same as the Prince of Xianle.

In this play, the lead and the villain must always be portrayed by identical twins.

"It's just…um…" Shi Qingxuan clears her throat, wincing as the extras in the play count the blows.

"THIRTY ONE!"

"THIRTY TWO!"

"THIRTY THREE!"

"It just…there was a rumor, back in the old days, that…the cure to human face disease was…murder," she mutters, clearly uncomfortable. "And a myth that…Bai Wuxiang used…used your immortal body to…"

Right.

Xie Lian forgot.

Before he passed out, back then…

Among the first to cut him were a father and child, fleeing the temple before all the rest.

They probably survived.

They probably—

'You promised you wouldn't tell.'

They probably told the story.

"HELP ME, HELP ME, HELP ME, HELP ME—!"

"FORTY FIVE!"

"FORTY SIX!"

"Your highness," Shi Qingxuan pleads, attempting to tug her wrist out of his grip, but —

He's remarkably strong.

"Please, just let me stop it, I—"

"LET ME DIE! WHY CAN'T I DIE?!"

"FORTY EIGHT!"

"FORTY NINE!"

Ming Yi grits his teeth, his eyes flashing towards the front of the room, then back to Shi Qingxuan and Xie Lian, muttering something under his breath as he reaches over.

"NAN YANG! PLEASE, I-I'M SORRY, PLEASE COME BACK!"

"FIFTY!"

"XUAN ZHEN—WHY DID YOU LEAVE ME?!"

"FIFTY ONE!"

Xie Lian has a tight grip on her, but he isn't looking in her direction. He's just staring ahead blankly, the words rattling around in his head. Echoing like water in a cave, the sound swelling and swelling, never escaping, until it's all he can hear.

"IT HURTS!"

Ming Yi's hand wraps around his fingers, and—with an amount of strength that shocks even Xie Lian, as far away as he is—he wrenches his hand off of Shi Qingxuan's, freeing her.

"IT HURTS, IT HURTS, IT HURTS—"

Help me.

Help me, help me, help me, help, help, help, help me!!!!

It hurts, it hurts, it hurts, it hurts, it hurts, it hurts...it hurts, it hurts, it hurts, it hurts, it hurts, it hurts, it hurts, it hurts, it hurts, it hurts, IT HURTS IT HURTS IT HURTS IT HURTS IT HURTS IT HURTS IT HURTS IT HURTS IT HURTS IT HURTS IT HURTS IT HURTS IT HURTS!!!

Shi Qingxuan lifts her hand immediately to stop it, but before she can open her mouth—

The curtain suddenly drops down, and the play falls silent.

The martial hall remains quiet as well. No one is eating their food, nor drinking their wine.

"...That wasn't me," Shi Qingxuan mumbles, glancing around. "Who—?"

From across the room, the Water Master lowers his hand, going back to his wine. He's the first person to move—much less breathe—in the aftermath, taking a sip.

"I happen to know for a fact that there is a very appropriate play titled, 'Tales from Banyue' featuring the crown prince," he comments, setting his glass down. "I certainly hope it was only his bad luck that resulted in me witnessing that during my dinner," his voice rings out, cold and annoyed.

His plate is pushed aside, forgotten.

Instead, he gestures for someone to bring him more wine.

"Ling Wen, which of the deputy gods is in charge of selecting the plays for this year?"

The head civil god startles out of a horrified stupor, shaking his head.

“It was supposed to be Pei Xiu,” he admits, slightly pale after that spectacle. “But as for the replacement, that...”

He doesn’t say it, but he doesn’t have to.

Shi Wudu knows.

That was likely left to the Palace of the Heavenly Emperor, who has no deputies.

Only servants.

They do only as they are told.

“...I see.” He reaches under the table, squeezing Pei’s hand, trembling with anger. “Well, it must have been an error. How embarrassing for us.”

He had to stop the martial god from making a scene twice, expecting Shi Qingxuan to deal with it.

But with the prince stopping him, and Pei ready to burst a blood vessel trying to open his mouth, drawing the emperor’s ire once again...

There had been little choice. Still, it doesn’t matter.

Shi Wudu glances down at his wine glass, and Pei stews, snatching an entire cask from one of the passing servers, keeping it for himself.

He stares at the dark liquid before rising to his feat.

None of it matters.

With one sweep of the Water Master’s arm, the stage disappears.

All eyes turn from Xie Lian, who has yet to move, or react in the slightest—settling upon him.

And Shi Wudu—

His smile is dazzling, his cup raised.

To the emperor, Jun Wu.

“You’ll have to forgive me, your majesty,” his voice oozes with a charming level of confidence. “But this is my last mid-autumn festival before facing my third heavenly calamity, and I intend to enjoy it to the fullest.”

With a sweep of his fan, golden leaves of paper come raining down, drawing whoops of excitement across the room.

Merit credits, falling in abundance.

“The Water Master is so impressive!”

“At his age, facing a third calamity! That’s never been done before!”

“His little sister clearly learned her generosity from him—AH! I CAUGHT A THOUSAND!”

Shi Qingxuan is popular, yes. By contrast, Shi Wudu has always been respected.

Everyone in the room looks at him now, eyes filled with admiration—and, however reluctant, deep respect.

All except for one person.

Dark eyes, watching him with nothing but resentment and contempt. Waiting in the shadows of glory and success.

There lies the price of secrets.

Jun Wu lifts his hand, shaking his head.

He doesn’t seem angered by the Water Master’s outburst.

If anything, he seems pleased. As though this was exactly what he wanted.

Shi Wudu wipes his wine.

“By all means, Lord Water Master, enjoy yourself,” he murmurs. “Nothing brings me greater pleasure.”

Of course it does.

The water god downs the rest of his glass, setting it down.

No matter what he does. Somehow, someway, the choice is never his own. It’s simply one domino crashing into the next. Part of a larger picture he cannot see.

“Thank you,” he mutters, bowing his head before turning around, waving his fan once more.

Outside, a fanfare of fireworks explodes, bringing the mood of the party back up to where it was before, dragging the attention away from that grotesque spectacle of a play.

“If I’m not incorrect, I believe there are lanterns to be counted.”

His grip on Pei’s arm is far more gentle than it looks as he pulls the general from his seat, pulling him up—doing the same with Ling Wen, who still seems to be trying to puzzle things together.

By dragging the two of them out, he leads the procession of heavenly officials out of the martial hall, making their way outside, to the newly constructed pavilion in the center square, surrounding a hole cut out to the mortal realm below, where the lanterns will soon arrive.

Inside, five gods remain in place.

Two at tables further from the front, neither have been able to move, much less speak since the play began.

And at the front of the room, Shi Qingxuan rubs Xie Lian’s shoulder, watching his face with concern.

“...your highness?” She murmurs, her tone pinched with anxiety. Even Ming Yi has lingered, standing behind her. Not saying a word, not getting close, but watching him intently. “I know, those plays are awful, but...it’s all pretend, it’s not...”

The Wind Master swallows thickly, wishing he would say something.

“It’s not real,” she reminds him—though really, it feels like she’s reminding herself. “Mortals just make up dramatic stories like that, the truth is always much more boring...”

After all, none of the other plays displayed tonight were real, either. They were all exaggerated, twisted, or outright false.

“...Right?” She questions, starting to wonder, because Xie Lian has been quiet for so...

“Right,” the prince agrees—and now, that tone is back.

Calm, measured—and gentle. Not frightened or bothered, like before.

"None of that was true," Xie Lian smiles, reaching over to pat her arm gently. "I'm sorry I reacted that way, I was just so surprised."

Shi Qingxuan stares at him, unsure—and Ming Yi remains expressionless. "...You were?"

"Yes," Xie Lian laughs gently, shaking his head. "That didn't happen. Many stories like that went around after the fall of Xianle in order to make me look weak. I just... forgot how colorful they were."

"You just..." The Wind Master frowns, watching him closely. "...you seemed upset, your highness."

"I was," Xie Lian admits. "The name Bai Wuxiang brings up bad memories, but..." He smiles wryly, shaking his head. "Do you think I would be sitting here, talking to you right now, if anything like that had actually happened?"

Admittedly, no. Being stabbed a hundred times...

Even a god would have difficulty surviving that. Or maintaining their sanctity in the aftermath. And even if they did...

It's hard to believe they could smile, or talk about it calmly, after listening to it all over again.

Shi Qingxuan bites her lip, and...

Xie Lian squeezes her arm again, repeating it serenely:

"It's just a silly story people tell to frighten children, Shi Qingxuan. I'm alright." The prince rises to his feet, pulling her hand gently.

"Don't you want to see the lanterns?"

She follows him, however reluctantly—and Xie Lian doesn't look at either one of his friends as he walks past, feeling them follow behind as he finally exits the martial hall.

Part of him dreads the fact that they might try to find him later, and ask him more questions.

Part of him is even more afraid of the possibility that they won't.

From behind them, unseen by the others, someone grasps Feng Xin's hand, making trembling fingers grow slightly more steady.

Mu Qing doesn’t look at him, his gaze locked on the path ahead.

They haven’t spoken since the day Crimson Rain Sought Flower broke into the Heavens. Actually, Mu Qing hasn’t spared a single look in Feng Xin’s direction.

But now, in a small, private moment, he squeezes the martial god’s hand. A brief, comforting touch.

At first, he’s too surprised to respond, glancing over at Mu Qing’s face.

The stubborn set of his jaw. The trained, uncaring expression.

His hair—

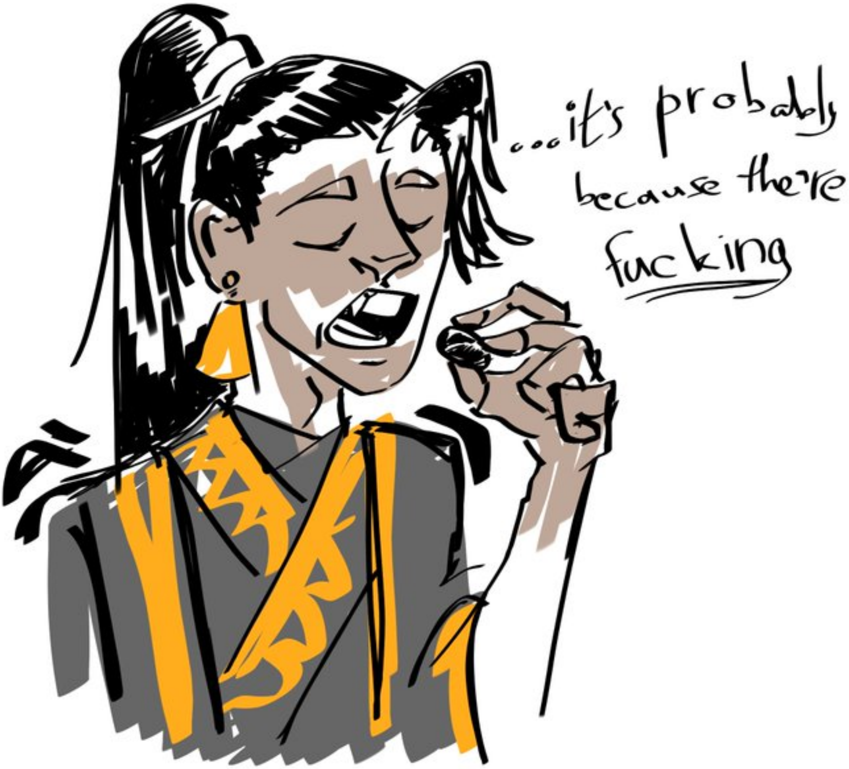
It hurts, looking at Mu Qing when he’s like this. Feng Xin doesn’t know why.

There’s something about the way his hair shines under the starlight that makes his chest feel tight. Like it’s a struggle to breathe.

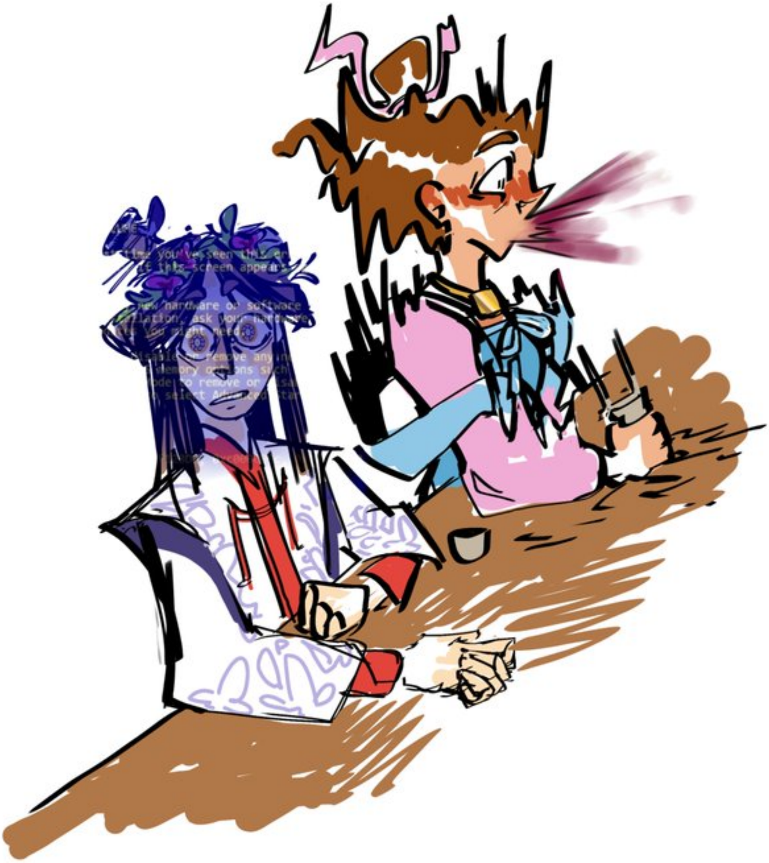
When Feng Xin tries to squeeze his hand in return, Mu Qing lets go. Walking faster, disappearing into the crowd of officials without a word.

ARTWORK INSPIRED BY THIS STORY

Used with permission from the artist, please do not re-use or repost



...it's probably because there're fucking



time you've seen this er
if this screen appears new hardware or software
llation, ask your hardware
you might need.
isable or remove any memory options such ode to remove or disa
select Advanced Star

CREDIT: Шуряндр

Chapter End Notes

> Thank you to Шуряндр for this amazing work of art, and allowing me to share it!! I'm so grateful!
>
> P.S. I wanted to apologize for the lack of daily updates! When I started posting this story on AO3, around 100k was already written! As I've been playing catch up, there was always about 100k of the story that wasn't posted on AO3, so I could throw up a chapter each day without issue! The only problem now, unfortunately, is that we have reached the point where there are only 49k words of unposted content, so if I continued posting daily, we would quickly run out! I'm in my last year of graduate school, and while I could get away with writing 10k words a day over winter break, unfortunately my brain gets a little tired during the semester and I write a bit more slowly. I'm trying to let a little more content build up, and in the mean time I'll still be updating frequently (like 2-3 days), and the chapters will probably get a little shorter. (I know they've been pretty long so far, I've been trying to keep the final chapter count for this story under 100, but I have given up.)

Thank you for your patience!

xoxo, Evie

The Battle of the Lanterns

Chapter Summary

> The Water Master rolls his eyes, opening his mouth to say something about having enough of festivals after this, but…
>
> He stops, his eyes narrowing slightly.
>
> "…Hold on," he mutters, shaking his head, "There's something off with the count."
>
> "What are you—?"
>
> "That was nine."

Chapter Notes

> enjoy a valentine's day special, hualian style!

See the end of the chapter for more notes

Being as popular as she is, the Wind Master is able to snag them a spot near the front without a problem, leaning against the railing as she pulls Xie Lian up beside her, smiling. "It always starts slow," She comments. "But the top ten in the count are always exciting!"

"Yes," Xie Lian agrees with a smile, happy to be in the open air at least, and slightly less…distracted, hearing her sound so excited. "It's nice."

He only attended two or three mid-autumn festivals in the heavens before this, it's difficult to remember…

But back then, he was always in second place, only beaten by Jun Wu.

This year, he knows he won't receive any lanterns at all—which is fine, no one expects anything different of him.

The only person left to be disappointed in it is himself, and he's just fine. There is one pleasant surprise to be found in all of this.

Slowly, a gold speck of light, not so different from a small flame or a tiny star, drifts up into the air, floating over their heads.

And Xie Lian—he can actually see it.

Which is a surprise—but it makes sense.

He never knew that the offering lanterns from the mid-autumn festival contained spiritual power, but it certainly explains why they're so expensive to purchase—and even more difficult to make.

Obviously, only the most powerful gods with devoted hordes of followers would be able to receive them in larger numbers.

Xie Lian smiles faintly, the golden light of the lantern reflected in the shackles of his eyes as it floats overhead.

Pretty.

It's very pretty.

An announcer calls out over the crowd, reading over the numbers. "FOR THE RAIN MASTER, YUSHI HUANG...ONE LANTERN!"

Xie Lian pauses, surprised to hear that name.

"...She really only got one?"

Obviously, he isn't being judgmental. After all, he has none.

But for such an ancient, popular goddess...a patron of agriculture no less...he expected her to receive more than that.

"Oh, yes," Shi Qingxuan nods, "she orders her followers not to send them—she insists it's wasteful. She just sends one up for herself each year, and that's all."

"Really?" Xie Lian perks up, his tone notably approving. "How economical."

The Wind Master smiles at him fondly, shaking her head. "She'll have them leave offerings of vegetables instead—then have them come pick them up the next day, so nothing goes to waste."

"That is such a good idea..." Xie Lian mutters, rubbing his chin. It's not as though he has any worshippers to order to do the same, but if he ever does, he'll have to try and get that message out there.

After all—Gods are around to help mortals, not the other way around.

Shi Qingxuan wasn't wrong—it was slow going, in the beginning. One by one, minor gods and deities with smaller totals have their names called out, along with their number of lanterns, the names of their temples.

Some even grumble to have received so few.

Xie Lian finds it horribly ungrateful, listening as they complain about their followers not working hard enough.

Considering how expensive the lanterns are, they're lucky that humans in the mortal realm were able to send as many as they did. How can they complain?

Still, he's proud when they come to eleventh place, and he hears Lang Qianqiu's name called out.

It's impressive, for a martial god his age to rank so high, nearly cracking the prestigious 'top ten' in the Battle of the Lanterns.

A gong rings, signaling that they've finally entered the final phase, and the crowd stirs with excitement.

From beside him, Shi Qingxuan bounces with happiness, squeezing Xie Lian's arm, "This means I'm in the top ten, your highness!" She whispers excitedly. "That's never happened before!"

Xie Lian can't help but smile, pleased on her behalf.

"Congratulations, Lady Wind Master—it's quite an accomplishment."

She beams, just as tenth place is read out—

"TENTH PLACE—THE PALACE OF QI YING, WITH FOUR HUNDRED AND TWENTY ONE LANTERNS!"

Xie Lian gawks, surprised. After all, that's quite a big jump from the place below it, and...Quan Yizhen is half Lang Qianqiu's age.

...Just how powerful is he, anyway?

Still, there's polite cheers and applause, even if the martial god is too busy beating his own worshippers (who are in the middle of sending up these lanterns, WHILE being beaten by the god they're offering them to) to accept the praise.

The entire situation is utterly bizarre.

"IN NINTH PLACE, THE EARTH MASTER, MING YI, WITH FOUR HUNDRED AND TWENTY FOUR LANTERNS!"

"MING-XIONG!" Shi Qingxuan gasps, whooping with excitement as she turns around, "YOU MADE NINTH PLACE!"

Everyone else barely claps politely, but she more than makes up for it.

In this form, she's even shorter than Xie Lian, forced to leap up to fling her arms around the earth master's neck, feet dangling as she congratulates him. "You deserved more!" She beams up at him, hugging him tightly. "Way, way more!"

"..." Ming Yi rolls his eyes, looking away. "Who cares," he mutters.

(Even so, he wraps one arm around the small of her back, making sure she doesn't stumble back to the ground when her arms grow tired.)

Shi Qingxuan pouts. "I care!" She grumbles. "It's annoying, waiting for everyone else to notice how AMAZING you are!"

Xie Lian smiles behind his hand, feeling a little bad for Ming Yi, who is clearly embarrassed (but too stubborn and proud to admit it) by Shi Qingxuan's praise.

Still, it seems like part of him enjoys it.

It's rare to see two people so different, but so well suited.

"IN EIGHTH PLACE, THE WIND MASTER, SHI QINGXUAN...WITH FIVE HUNDRED AND TWENTY THREE LANTERNS!"

The crowd erupts with shocked applause—and for someone as popular as Shi Qingxuan, many people cry out her praises.

"AS EXPECTED!"

"CONGRATULATIONS, LADY WIND MASTER!"

Shi Qingxuan glances up at Ming Yi, still dangling from around his neck, biting her lip—practically vibrating with excitement.

"..." The raven haired man rolls his eyes once more, but...

She sees the slightest twinkle there—

"Go on and gloat, you big baby."

Shi Qingxuan lets out a breath she didn't know she was holding, smiling brighter than any of the lanterns pouring into the sky in her name.

Quickly, she drops to the ground, running to the railing again to greet the roaring crowds, jumping and waving.

Ming Yi leans back against the pillar behind him, crossing his arms, watching her with the smallest of smiles on his face.

"GE!" She cries out, brimming with pride and happiness, "I MADE EIGHTH! DID YOU SEE?"

And just as quickly, that smile fades.

From his place at the head of the crowd, Shi Wudu hums, fanning himself, "Of course you did." As if such a thing was only to be expected. "Next year, you'll do even better."

Shi Qingxuan's smile fades slightly, and Xie Lian feels...a very specific kind of sympathy.

The Water Master isn't being cruel. His words are technically praise, and yet...

It's the mere expectation of greatness—perfection, even—that can make one's accomplishments feel like less. And the threat of disappointment so much greater.

Xie Lian knows the feeling all too well.

Still, the Water Master is proud of Shi Qingxuan. Xie Lian knows that from their conversation before, when Xie Lian returned to the grand martial hall after Hua Cheng swept him away.

He just wishes that Shi Qingxuan's older brother had an easier time showing it.

"IN SEVENTH PLACE, THE PALACE OF LING WEN, WITH FIVE HUNDRED AND THIRTY SIX LANTERNS!"

Absolutely none of the civil gods congratulate him, doing little more than clapping politely. Shi Wudu, however, grins, poking his friend lightly in the arm.

"When's the celebratory feast?"

"No, no," Pei snorts, catching Ling Wen in a headlock from the other side, ruffling his hair as the other martial gods shout out their congratulations, "Drinking and women, that's how a winner celebrates!"

"Pei!" The Water Master scolds him. "You'll make him blush!"

Ling Wen rolls his eyes, but squished between the two of them...

The Civil God actually, for once, seems happy and relaxed.

"...Yeah," he smirks, glancing over at Shi Wudu, "You can show me your female form, and I'll buy you a drink."

Pei chokes on his own laughter.

"OI! Let's not take it that far!"

"What?" The Water Master arches an eyebrow at him, hanging off of Ling Wen's other side with a teasing smile. "You said you liked my female form."

"But—!"

"Don't be selfish, Pei," Ling Wen snorts, enjoying seeing him so riled.

"You already said, that's how a winner celebrates!"

Their ribbing carries on as the rest of the lanterns drift up, and Xie Lian can see what Shi Qingxuan meant, when she explained the concept of the "three tumors."

Pei Ming, Ling Wen, and Shi Wudu do stand apart from the rest.

But the friendship that runs between the three of them seems to be deep—and genuine.

To the point where it almost aches, reminding Xie Lian of those who stood beside him before. How the three of them stood apart from the others—but always close to one another.

And, as though prompted by his thoughts alone—

"IN SIXTH PLACE, THE PALACE OF NAN YANG, WITH FIVE HUNDRED AND SEVENTY TWO LANTERNS!"

Ah.

Xie Lian smiles, lifting his hands to clap for his friend as the other martial gods cheer.

He—

“IN FIFTH PLACE, THE PALACE OF XUAN ZHEN, WITH FIVE HUNDRED AND SEVENTY THREE LANTERNS!”

...They’ve both done rather well, haven’t they?

“...Are they normally so close together in number?” He murmurs, watching the lanterns flood up towards the sky curiously.

After all, it would make sense for it to get more competitive, the closer you get to the top.

“...Not THAT close,” Shi Qingxuan shakes her head, “but the followers for those two make it a competition between, always trying to one up the other.”

Now, isn’t that familiar.

“Usually they’ll be rushing to beat the other out until the last second. It looks like Xuan Zhen finally edged one out this year...”

(Usually, Nan Yang eeks it out by two or three lanterns.)

Still, neither of the martial gods in question seem to care.

Even Mu Qing, who has never before achieved the top five, can’t even manage a smile.

His lips turn up in a mere show of obligation, but it’s clear that there’s no real joy in it.

He can only think about...

“IN FOURTH PLACE, THE PALACE OF MING GUANG, FIVE HUNDRED AND EIGHTY LANTERNS!”

Every martial god immediately leaps forward, crying out praise, applauding the general. Xie Lian claps too, but...he’s surprised it was close to Feng Xin and Mu Qing at all.

Not to say that his friends are weak—they aren’t.

But in means of power and the number of worshippers—Pei Ming is by far the strongest martial god (aside from the obvious winner.)

And Xie Lian isn't the only one surprised.

Even Shi Qingxuan sounds...bothered.

"...That's a lot less than last year," she mutters, her brow furrowed. A hundred less, to be more specific.

Likely due to the highly public scandal of Pei Xiu's banishment. Without the strong foundation the god already had, he might have lost even more than that.

Xie Lian can't help but feel a little bit responsible, even if the general didn't seem to blame him.

Ling Wen doesn't congratulate him, simply patting his shoulder, and...The Water Master squeezes his arm, looking up at him.

"They'll be back next year, Pei. It will pass."

"..." The Martial God glances down at him, offering a half hearted smile.

The Water Master, always so guarded and jaded, seems to sincerely believe that.

It's funny, because really—it's easy to come to the conclusion that Shi Wudu doesn't believe in anything but himself.

But that isn't true. "You're sure?"

No one is looking at them, awaiting the next group of lanterns, watching the mortal realm below.

As such, no one sees the look that is shared.

"Even if I have to drag them up myself."

Pei clicks his tongue, pretending to be disapproving.

"Such a tyrant," he murmurs.

His gaze, however, is warm.

"AND FINALLY..." The announcer cries, an entire horde of lights bursting through the opening, "THE PALACE OF THE WATER MASTER, WITH SEVEN HUNDRED AND EIGHTEEN LANTERNS!"

Gasps echo throughout.

Jun Wu's total was announced at the beginning, of course—he's rarely ever counted in the ranking, as it would be considered unfair.

A thousand lanterns.

But Shi Wudu has now come closer than anyone else has, less than three hundred lanterns short of his total.

Actually rivaling him.

Even in Xie Lian's day, when lanterns were far more difficult to come by, he didn't come that close. Not even proportionally.

It's quite the accomplishment.

The crowd absolutely roars with applause, louder than any before, civil and martial gods alike.

But the Water Master, even in light of such a rare achievement, doesn't turn his eyes away from Pei for even a moment.

It seems to matter very little to him.

Pei, however, smiles wider than he has all night, leaning down to whisper in his ear— something that no one else hears.

"Look at you go, kid."

Shi Wudu's eyes widen.

"I'm proud of you."

Now, they grow as wide as they could possibly be—and his cheeks...turn somewhat pink.

That never happens, not in public—and he has to snap his fan open in front of his face in order to hide it.

"I'm four centuries old," he grumbles, glaring up at him sharply. "Don't call me that."

Pei throws his head back with a laugh, and before Shi Wudu can continue chewing him out, Ling Wen pulls him into a brief—tight—hug.

“It better be a celebratory festival, not just a feast.”

The Water Master rolls his eyes, opening his mouth to say something about having enough of festivals after this, but…

He stops, his eyes narrowing slightly.

“…Hold on,” he mutters, shaking his head, “There’s something off with the count.”

“What are you—?”

“That was nine.”

Xie Lian hasn’t even noticed the issue, too busy being hugged and spun around by Shi Qingxuan, who is still celebrating the Water Master’s win.

“That’s MY BROTHER! Did you see?! That’s MY gege!”

“Yes,” Xie Lian can’t help but laugh affectionately, nodding in agreement. “That’s your big brother!”

The celebration and mirth fades, however, when he starts to hear the whispers.

“…Someone beat the water master?”

“No, no, that can’t be right…”

“Could it be that Pei’s numbers weren’t actually so low this year?”

“Even if they weren’t…”

“Shi Wudu’s numbers were high enough this year to beat Pei at his best…”

So, what on earth…?

“Hey—look!”

The Heavenly Court turns in unison, looking down at the opening to the mortal realm below, Xie Lian among them.

Just in time to see an explosion of light. So bright, it fills the entire night sky.

An ocean of lanterns, so many of them, their reflections completely drown out the cursed glow of Xie Lian's shackles. And he—

He's seen so many things in the last eight hundred years. Some good, some bad. But nothing like this.

So bright, that it's almost like seeing the stars again.

Like that night on Mount Yu Jun, with the butterflies—but this—

Xie Lian gasps quietly, tilting his chin back, attempting to take in the sheer scope of them.

They must be Jun Wu's, but...

Suddenly, Xie Lian notices that everyone standing near him has gone completely silent, standing back to give him a much wider berth than they did before.

"T..." The announcer stammers, "THREE THOUSAND AND ONE LANTERNS..."

That many? How—?

"...FOR THE CROWN PRINCE OF XIANLE!"

For a moment, there's only shocked silence.

Xie Lian stops, staring out at the light surrounding him, his jaw hanging open. "...Me?" He whispers, disbelieving, countless sparks of light reflected in his eyes.

"You," Shi Qingxuan agrees faintly, equally stunned.

And Xie Lian isn't the only one who has a hard time believing it.

As a matter of fact, some officials openly protest the call.

"There must be a mistake!"

"Are those even real lanterns?! They could be fakes!"

Xie Lian can't imagine why anyone would do that—except as a prank.

Which isn't beyond the realm of possibility, of course—but that's quite a bit of effort for a simple joke, and Xie Lian can't imagine anyone caring enough about him to do that.

Then again, he can't imagine anyone caring enough to send that many real lanterns, either.

Ling Wen steps back from examining the list, shaking his head, speaking loudly and clearly over the protests of the crowd:

"They're all real."

Then, over the outburst of shock in response to that— "And clearly labeled, too. They're for the crown prince."

"But! But…who—?!"

Ling Wen picks out one lantern from the horde, checking the label. "One is from the Shrine of The Crown Prince of Xianle in the city of Gusu…"

Xie Lian perks up, surprised, and… Genuinely touched.

He…he has a shrine in Gusu? They…built one for him?

Honestly, given the fact that it's only been a couple of months, and the city was left in absolute disarray…the fact that they took the time to do that, and they were even able to scrape together enough for just one lantern…

Xie Lian swallows hard, his chest filled with warmth

Well, that lantern is real, then.

The rest are definitely a mistake, but—still.

He got a lantern! An entire lantern, just for him! His first offering in eight hundred years!

He—he has a shrine—one that he didn't build himself! He—He needs to visit, and bring some charms!

Oh, and he'll have to tell them to offer vegetables next year, instead. If they even want to make offerings next year. If they don't, Xie Lian won't mind!

Just the one is plenty!

He presses his hands to his cheeks, struggling to contain the sudden rush of… happiness.

He really isn't used to it anymore—it's a little difficult to handle!

That's when Ling Wen finishes his survey of the other lanterns, speaking to the crowd:

"The other three thousand are clearly labeled in his name…sent from Qiandeng temple."

…Qiandeng Temple?

Several people glance around, speaking among themselves, trying to figure out if anyone has heard of the place before—and no one has.

Even Xie Lian feels compelled to admit: "…I've never heard of it either, actually."

But…

He has a temple?

An entire temple? Just for him?

But…why?

It makes sense, with Gusu. He helped free the city. Even if the shrine and the lantern was more than he expected in return, Xie Lian understands why they would do that.

But…he can't think of anyone else who would bother with that.

After all, it's a complete waste. Why build a shrine to him, when other gods can actually provide something to their worshippers?

Who would go through all of that effort, knowing they would receive absolutely nothing in return? People don't just—

"Ah," Pei Ming smirks, his arms slung around Shi Wudu and Ling Wen's shoulders as he speaks up, his voice easily carrying across the crowd, "I told all of you—Crimson Rain Sought Flower didn't kidnap the Crown Prince with ill intentions."

Xie Lian stares, his lips parted.

Well—he's right. Hua Cheng was only trying to help him. But what does that have to do with—?

That’s when he notices it.

See, the spiritual shell around any blessing lantern is gold, a byproduct of the spell lifting them up to the heavens.

But the flames inside these lanterns…

…They’re burning crimson.

Xie Lian stares, his hands still pressed against his cheeks, eyes wide.

Oh.

One Lantern floats down to hover in front of his face.

Hua Cheng…

The prince swallows hard, reaching out to take the lantern between his hands.

…Hua Cheng did this.

Ba-bump.

Hua Cheng did this…for him.

He can hear people around muttering that it must be some sort of taunt to the heavens. Spitting in their faces by turning the Battle of the Lanterns into a joke, but…

All of the sudden, a silver butterfly springs from the lantern.

Several people nearby scream and jump back—but Xie Lian doesn’t even flinch when the creature flutters forward, landing on the tip of his nose before dissolving in a shower of silver sparks.

And he can’t help but laugh happily, holding the lantern close against his chest. In that moment, the prince knows two things:

First, that whatever reason Hua Cheng sent so many lanterns, it wasn’t as a joke. He would never make Xie Lian the punchline.

Second: Xie Lian realizes, in that moment, how badly he wants to see him.

It wasn't as though he hadn't been aware of it before. There were moments in the last few weeks when he wondered if San Lang would visit the shrine.

After all, he had warned Xie Lian that he might 'get sick of him' if he gave him free reign to visit, but...Then, he didn't.

And Xie Lian hadn't held that against him. Hua Cheng is a busy man, and there was every chance that he had only said that to be nice, but...

The crown prince clutches the blessing lantern against his chest, looking at the flood of them still rising through the air.

All this time...was Hua Cheng preparing this?

Xie Lian bites his lip, fingers crinkling the paper sides of the lantern for a moment before he remembers his strength, not wanting to crush it accidentally.

Just for him, who hadn't been likely to receive a single lantern? Xie Lian, he...

It's been such a long time since anyone worked so hard, just to do something kind for him.

Finally, he lets go of the lantern, allowing it to float back up and join the rest. But his hands are still pleasantly warm from where they held it.

Xie Lian wants to see him.

To thank him, of course. And to ask him about how Paradise Manor is doing. Oh, and to tell him what a help Shuo has been. And to ask him what he thinks of Ming Yi's theories about Pei, Xie Lian...doesn't trust his own instincts with that.

(Unlike before, when he received his lantern from Gusu, the thought of asking Hua Cheng to send vegetables next year doesn't cross Xie Lian's mind, not once.)

Debate still echoes across the pavilion, with everyone trying to discredit the prince's win, but...

"Congratulations."

The Emperor's voice forces everyone else to fall silent, stunned at first.

After all--if there was some form of cheating going on, he was the one robbed of a win, but...

On the contrary, he's the first to congratulate the prince, leaning his chin on his hand as he watches the lanterns drifting overhead.

"Xianle has always had a way of creating miracles..." He muses, his lips twisting into a small smile.

Half fond, half something else.

A darker emotion lingers behind his gaze; faint and unknowable.

Xie Lian shakes his head, his eyes never leaving the sky above.

"I had nothing to do with this, my lord." He replies.

(It's rare that he forgets to refer to himself in the third tense, speaking to Jun Wu.)

This was all San Lang.

He's the amazing one, not Xie Lian.

Once she recovers from the shock, Shi Qingxuan finally manages to congratulate him, wrapping her arms around the prince as she jumps up and down, cheering him on.

Few other gods do, but the prince doesn't mind.

Despite being one of those slighted by Xie Lian's sudden win, Shi Wudu doesn't seem to mind. Instead, he's simply listening to Pei and Ling Wen making plans to celebrate in the mortal realm—drawing Shi Qingxuan's attention.

"Ge, are you going with them?"

"...No," the Water Master shrugs. "I have business with the emperor."

"Are you looking to take his place?" Ling Wen questions, his previously neat hair style askew from Pei's rough housing. "We'd be delighted."

That's a lie, and both Pei and Shi Qingxuan roll their eyes in unison

"Actually, I already have plans," she mutters, glancing over at Xie Lian. "What about you? You're welcome to join, your highness!"

"..." The prince finally manages to break his gaze from the lanterns, lowering his chin. "Actually, I plan on returning to my shrine."

The Wind Master frowns, glancing over at Ming Yi, but...as per usual, he's not any help. Actually, he somehow managed to sneak an entire lamb shank out of the feast, and has taken to tearing hunks out of it with his teeth.

"You're sure? It's a night for celebration!"

"I need to check on things," Xie Lian explains. "And after that, I need to thank..." his voice fades, and he's almost surprised to find himself...sheepish. "I need to thank San Lang."

"Ah," Shi Qingxuan perks up, her eyes wide. "Safe travels to you then, your highness!"

Xie Lian nods, stepping back from the crowds. She offers to help him descend, of course—and as enjoyable as that sounds, the prince wants her to be able to enjoy the rest of the celebration with Ming Yi.

Ruoye shivers around his neck, still overwhelmed from all the excitement.

Xie Lian reaches down to stroke it gently, "It's alright," he murmurs. "I know you don't want to bind Qi Rong again when we get back, but...I can give you a bath soon, how does that sound?"

The bandage curls against his skin, sulking.

"...I can try to find fancy soap?"

It's not particularly comforting, but it's more luxurious than what Ruoye usually gets, so...

"Wait."

His steps halt in the city street, just before the gates leading down to the mortal realm below.

He's half relieved that they stopped him. Half dreading the reason why.

Feng Xin was the one who spoke first, but once the word is out of his mouth, he falls silent again, hanging his head.

His lips are pressed together tightly, hands balled up into fists by his sides. Xie Lian is facing away from them both, his expression hidden from view.

"...Congratulations," Feng Xin mutters, and for a moment, in spite of everything, Xie Lian almost forgets what he's being congratulated for.

If not for the lights floating overhead–the only lights that he can see–the anxiety of this moment would have made him forget.

"...Thank you," Xie Lian mumbles, not realizing how hard he's biting his lip–not until the skin nearly breaks. "I was glad…to see the two of you do so well..."

After all, ranking only beneath Pei and the Water Master is quite an achievement, but...

"...I was just going," he mutters, swallowing hard. "I have things I need to–"

"We're really not going to talk about it?”

ARTWORK INSPIRED BY THIS STORY

Included with permission from the artist, do not reuse or repost for any reason

(Xiong Li and Lan An sending up a lantern from Gusu)

CREDIT: ESME

@cursedkefir ♥
2022

CREDIT: Kefir

CREDIT: MARTA

CREDIT: ARTISTEALIGHTFUL

[image]

CREDIT: SYL

Chapter End Notes

thank you so much to kefir, esme, tealightful, syl and marta for their beautiful artwork, and allowing me to share it!

xoxo, Evie

Crossroads

Chapter Summary

> “You expect us to hear that...and then what, just...nothing?”
>
> Xie Lian doesn’t look back at either one of them. “It was just a play, there’s nothing to talk about.”
>
> Feng Xin grits his teeth, hanging his head once more.

Chapter Notes

> I want to apologize in advance for how long this chapter is, I couldn't find a good way to split it. The delay in update is a direct result of the length! Thank you for your patience!
>
> Content Warnings for this Chapter: there is a PTSD related panic attack.

Feng Xin is prone to frustration. Aggression is his means for masking anxiety. Xie Lian knows that.

It's just rare for Feng Xin to be frustrated with him.

“...About what?”

It might sound like he’s playing dumb—but he isn’t. There’s an edge to his voice. A hunch to his shoulders.

Mu Qing’s arms tighten where they’re crossed over his chest—but, for once, he’s oddly quiet.

“The play!” Feng Xin stares at the back of his head intently “You expect us to hear that...and then what, just...nothing?”

Xie Lian doesn’t look back at either one of them. “It was just a play, there’s nothing to talk about.”

Feng Xin grits his teeth, hanging his head once more.

Slowly, his attention turns to the one person who hasn’t said a word:

“...Did you know?!”

Mu Qing starts, sending him a shocked look, proverbial hackles rising defensively.

“Why the fuck would you ask me that?”

“There’s nothing to know,” Xie Lian repeats. “It was just a...”

“...” Mu Qing sends Feng Xin a frustrated glare, but when he speaks, his voice is...

Well, for once in his life, the god actually sounds...gentle.

“...It did happen, your highness,” he mutters. Quietly, but firm.

Xie Lian doesn’t turn around, his heart in his throat.

Of course, they know.

‘It hurts.’

Those were the words he said before, on Mount Yu Jun. Just before he passed out.

The words he said in his sleep, trembling with fright when Mu Qing was trying to treat his injured arm.

And if that wasn’t enough... They saw his reaction.

Shi Qingxuan—she’s only known Xie Lian for a month at most. Xie Lian can pull off a fake smile and a calm voice, and have her perceive that as calm.

Not with them.

But it’s Mu Qing’s response that surprises him.

“You don’t have to talk about it,” he mutters. “But...we know.”

Feng Xin sends him a look that seems...

Betrayed isn’t the right word. That implies that he expected Mu Qing to be on his side.

But on this—on this one thing—he seems to have genuinely thought they were going to be a united front.

“Like hell he doesn’t!”

Feng Xin glances back and forth—from Xie Lian’s back, turned away and silent, to Mu Qing's guarded, distant expression, and—

"How are we supposed to just ignore that?!"

Mu Qing's arms are firmly crossed over his chest, a defensive stance, just as closed off as Xie Lian's.

"…There are some things you don't make a person talk about, Feng Xin," he mutters, and Feng Xin…

His tone is angry. His stance is angry. Everything about him reeks frustration. But his gaze is agonized.

"…Right," he mutters, his tone somewhat raw as he stares Mu Qing down, all while the silver haired god refuses to look back at him, "you two have that in common."

Having things—painful things—that they refuse to speak of.

"…Talking about it won't help—"

"HOW THE FUCK DO YOU KNOW?!"

Mu Qing and Xie Lian each recoil in their own way. The martial god shrinks back slightly, while the prince jumps at the sudden shout.

"We've spent the last EIGHT CENTURIES not talking about ANYTHING! Guess what?! THAT hasn't helped EITHER!"

Xie Lian can't seem to make himself turn around, because—

If he does, he'll see the hurt in Feng Xin's eyes, and he doesn't think he can stand that right now.

Mu Qing, however, doesn't back down.

"You could have picked a better fucking moment!"

"When?!" Feng Xin throws his hands up. "Because there will ALWAYS be a reason to put it off, or to avoid it! Or, even worse, you just—you just DISAPPEAR for centuries, and—"

"—Feng Xin—" Xe Lian tries, just as Mu Qing reaches out, however reluctantly, placing a hand on his shoulder—

"NO!" Feng Xin wrenches away from him, away from both of them, taking a couple of steps back. "The two of you—you ALWAYS act like I'm this oblivious idiot who can't understand shit, but—" He grits his teeth, shaking his head, "Neither of you EVER tell me ANYTHING!"

"I didn't—"

"And then it's, 'it's not a good time,' and 'he doesn't have to talk about it,' but—" He presses his hands against his temples, his shoulders shaking. "That just means that we are never going to talk about it."

He isn't wrong.

"It's not like we're gonna sit down and have a nice heart to heart about the coffin thing either, right?" He shakes his head, "We just...sailed right on into the next crisis, didn't we?"

Because that's what they always seem to do.

Xie Lian finally forces himself to turn around—and when he does, he's relieved that he can't see the look on Feng Xin's face. He doesn't think he could stand that.

Mu Qing isn't given the same luxury—and he can barely stand to look at him.

"...Bai Wuxiang is dead." The prince has to fight to keep his voice even, just saying that name. "He's been dead for eight centuries."

"...And did knowing that make it any easier for you to sit through that?" Feng Xin asks, already knowing the answer. "Do you think that made it any easier for us to hear?"

No, it—

Xie Lian hangs his head, pressing his palm against his forehead, taking a long, slow breath.

No, it didn't.

"...It's been eight centuries," he repeats those words again—but this time his voice... It's quiet. Tired. "Why does it even matter anymore?"

Mu Qing stares at him, opening his mouth, struggling for words—but he can't seem to find them.

After all, he doesn't have just the play on his mind. Before that, there was the sword.

Knowing that, all this time, he...

"...I don't know why it doesn't matter to you." Feng Xin's voice has always been strong. Steady.

Not right now.

"It matters to me, because—I didn't promise to protect you until it got hard," he croaks, nails biting into his palms. "I promised to protect you forever."

Now, it's wavering, and Xie Lian's heart aches with it.

"And one day, you—" He sucks in a deep breath, his eyes stinging, "...you just stopped letting me."

Xie Lian has perfected the art of selective memory. Keeping the things that make the days go by easier, working hard to forget the things that hurt to remember.

"Then, I just had to sit there, listening to—'Feng Xin, help me,'" his voice cracks, and this time, when Mu Qing places a hand on his elbow, he doesn't have it in him to shove the other god away.

Xie Lian was almost able to forget.

'Stop following me, Feng Xin.'

'You can't help me.'

He hurt Feng Xin, back then.

And Xie Lian can't explain it to him—not fully—without hurting him even more. He can't explain what Bai Wuxiang did, wearing his friend's face.

That would hurt so much more.

"...I don't think you're an idiot, Feng Xin," Xie Lian mumbles, wanting to reach out for him, but it feels as though he's rooted in place. "And if you want to talk, I just...I don't..."

Xie Lian has no idea what there is to say. "When?"

The prince winces, biting his lip.

"When did it happen?"

“That really won’t—”

“Was it before, or after?”

Xie Lian knows what he means, of course.

Before Xie Lian sent Feng Xin away, or after.

“...” The prince grits his teeth, closing his eyes tightly. “It was before.”
“And you just—you never said?”

Xie Lian probably would have, if he hadn’t forced Feng Xin to leave immediately after that. He would have told someone.

It’s just...there was nobody around left to tell.

“Was it during those years you were off on your own?!”

“No...” Xie Lian mumbles, grasping the chain around his neck. He can understand why Feng Xin might think that. After all, the prince was so profoundly damaged when he returned, but...

That was from losing Hong’er. Which, in the long run, hurt so much more than the stabbing.

“Then when could it have—?”

There’s a certain level of irony packed into this moment, when Xie Lian’s patience frays, and he just wants to say whatever Feng Xin needs to hear.

“It was after the fight the three of us had—”

“Which one?!”

“Feng Xin,” Mu Qing yanks at his arm. “Just let it go, this isn’t—”

“The last one!”

The words fall out of his mouth, and Xie Lian can’t see the look on Feng Xin’s face. The way his eyes slowly widen with recognition.

But that isn’t the worst part, or where the irony lies. There’s a pained, broken sound.

So often, Mu Qing has tried to hurt someone with his words, only to have them land on someone he never intended.

Always sharpening his knives—but never as good at aiming them.

It's almost fair, then, that the one argument he didn't help start was the one where he got hurt.

Because—

'You know I—I really felt bad for you, when you told me about that guy you were in love with.'

He takes a step back from both of them.

Because that means...

'I guess it must be a relief that he never had to see this, isn't it?'

...It was Mu Qing's fault.

He was the reason Xie Lian ran off by himself that day.

He was the reason that fight happened, to begin with.

He should have known better, than going back there. Trying to fix it, when they—

When Feng Xin and Xie Lian—they didn't want him to come back.

Mu Qing knew that.

And he's regretted the things he said that night. More than he's ever been able to say.

But he never knew the extent of the harm he caused.

Feng Xin stares at him, not quite understanding, but slightly panicked to see—

In 800 years, he's almost never seen Mu Qing in tears.

The most vivid instance he can remember was when they were young. During the war, when one of Mu Qing's sisters...caught it.

Back then, there was absolutely nothing that could be said to comfort him.

"...Hey," Feng Xin croaks, reaching out to grab his shoulder. "What...what the fuck..."

There’s no bite to his words, just…

“Don’t…”

Worry.

That’s when it clicks for Xie Lian, and his face falls.

“Oh…” He swallows hard, taking a step forward. “Oh, Mu Qing, you didn’t…”
It wasn’t his fault.

They both made mistakes.

Xie Lian only hurt Feng Xin once. And he hurt him deeply, but—

Mu Qing has always been the most complicated relationship in his life. A bond somewhere between friendship and servitude, strained by imbalances of power.

Marked with so many moments of unintentional cruelty.

Mu Qing is bitter, insecure, and wrathful. When he's unkind, it's obvious–and everyone sees it.

But coming from someone like Xie Lian–someone gentle, beloved, and admired… His moments of immaturity went unnoticed.

And he was unkind to Mu Qing. More times than he can count.

So many tiny moments of carelessness, when they were growing up.

Most people would never think back on them. But Xie Lian–

He's had 800 years to do nothing but think about those things, and there are two moments that have always stood apart.

Not that they were particularly cruel–but simply because of how careless he was. How self centered.

From the day he met Hong'er for the first time.

He had wanted to make a more convincing entrance as a 'god,' planning to leap down onto the Martial Avenue from above.

He asked Mu Qing–who already had so much on his own plate, getting the prince prepared for the parade, preparing for his own role, along with his other duties--to go and tell the Guoshis of his plan.

Then, allowed Feng Xin to berate Mu Qing for failing to deliver it properly.

And looking back on it, Xie Lian never paid attention to or cared much about the way Mei Nianqing and the others treated Mu Qing.

It wasn't of enough importance to be noticed.

Or how, later, when Hong'er was clinging to his robes, Mu Qing had said something about them getting stained with blood and dirt...

And Xie Lian's response had been to snap at him. To say, ' you'll just have to wash them, then.' Because that was Mu Qing's job.

But you don't speak to a friend that way.

You don't treat someone you respect that way.

Mu Qing has said worse to him. Far, far worse. But on far fewer occasions.

Xie Lian has years of small, passive moments of unkindness to reconcile himself with.

And, of course–

'I was HAPPY when you left!'

'It was a RELIEF, so just–just GO!'

Mu Qing hurt Xie Lian. He hurt him deeply.

But that doesn't mean Xie Lian hasn't made his own mistakes, and he sees no point in weighing their wrongs against each other.

He's never once blamed Mu Qing for what happened that day. Blamed him for his words, yes. Blamed him and Feng Xin for constantly letting their arguments get out of control, but...

What happened in the temple–that will never be Mu Qing's fault. That's no one's fault but his.

Xie Lian caused Bai Wuxiang's descent upon Xianle. He brought it upon himself.

And he knew, that day–even when Wu Ming's ghost fire tried to stop him, over and over again–that he was chasing the calamity into a trap.

He just didn't care.

What happened after...was his fault.

Knowing that, and listening to Mu Qing's pained, shuddering breaths–

That makes it so much worse.

"You didn't..." Xie Lian repeats, trying to find the words to explain it, to make Mu Qing see that he doesn't blame him, but...

There are tear tracks on Mu Qing's cheeks.

Wetness drips from his chin. Silent, other than the broken intake of his breaths.

Feng Xin's hand tightens on his shoulder, his expression dark, strained.

And of course, Mu Qing knows he must be angry with him too.

Feng Xin must hate him for this, too.

Because Mu Qing does. Because Mu Qing always has.

(The truth, however, is that the Martial God simply can't stand to see him in tears.)

"..." He tugs his shoulder out of Feng Xin's grip, taking another step back.

They were always better as a duo.

The Crown Prince fo Xianle and his personal guard. Loyal to the end.

Mu Qing was always the one thing that didn't fit. The part of the story that didn't belong.

Always wanting things he can't have. Losing his temper. Saying things that he can't take back.

And nobody ever wanted him there. He was placed by Xie Lian's side because of a secret.

A crime. Their friendship was built on a bribe of silence.

Feng Xin certainly wasn't happy with his presence. Xie Lian was kind enough to tolerate him.

Neither of them ever wanted to be his friend.

Neither of them ever wanted Mu Qing there in the first place.

And neither of them ever wanted Mu Qing to come back.

Because when it's just Xie Lian and Feng Xin, they don't fight. Xie Lian–

Xie Lian doesn't get hurt.

Because they love one another.

They always have.

But never him.

And why should they?

His jaw trembles, and the tears keep accelerating on their own.

"Mu Qing..." Xie Lian tries again, "Please, don't–"

When Mu Qing speaks, something in the prince's heart cracks.

"...Con-C..." he chokes, his voice cracking and wobbling with every syllable. Because for once, Mu Qing isn't lashing out. "Congratulations...for the lanterns, your highness."

Mu Qing spins on his heel, walking away as quickly as he can, before he can say anything else.

Before he can ruin, break, or hurt anyone else.

Feng Xin reaches after him, taking one step-then looking back at Xie Lian, clearly torn between the two.

The Prince stares after Mu Qing's fading aura, biting his lip. "...I'm okay, Feng Xin," he mumbles. "Go after him."

It's a few moments of hesitation.

Because on one hand–Xie Lian is clearly the least distressed of the three. And on the other...

How can he leave, having just learned–?

"Go," Xie Lian repeats, with the message behind it clear, even while it remains unspoken:

He needs you.

"..." Feng Xin grits his teeth, wishing that they just...that things were...

"...Alright," he mutters, turning around, hurrying off after him.

They'll have to talk about it now. Eventually.

If they don't, and the wounds inflicted are left to fester...

Xie Lian can put things out of his head, when he needs to.

Mu Qing can't.

Things like this–they eat him alive, straight down to the bone.

And Xie Lian would go with him, but...

If he was kind to Mu Qing right now, that would only make his friend feel worse. The best thing he can do, for now, is give Mu Qing space.

(And hope that Feng Xin irritates him enough that he forgets to feel miserable.)

He descends from the Heavens, still aching, slightly bruised from the emotional turmoil of the evening, but...

The lights floating overhead make it hard to feel despair, or loneliness.

The Mid Autumn Festival has always been one of the largest affairs in the Heavens, with celebrations often pouring on into the next day, sometimes even the next week.

But one god isn't celebrating.

Shin Qingxuan’s slippers are nearly silent against marble floors, arched ceilings near cavernous as she strolls through the halls of their palace.

Things haven’t changed much over the years.

Parts of it are actually modeled after their childhood home.

She can still remember it clearly.

By the time she was ten years old, it was just them. No parents, grandparents, no aunts or uncles…distant cousins, but that was all.

But it was so important to her elder brother that she remembered them.

Their parents didn’t marry for love. Not in the beginning. Their mother initially found their father cold and unforgiving.

Eventually, their father learned that she had a love for songbirds, and spared no expense planting a grove of ash trees to attract them.

He would tell her that story when she was small. About how their mother would smile each morning, waking up to the sound of song birds trailing through the open window.

And now, when she hears the birds sing, and the wind stirring leaves in the trees—she remembers her parents.

Their mother used to crave yuèbing, back when she was pregnant with Shi Qingxuan. Filled with lotus paste, soft in texture, sweet on the tongue.

Most people only eat them during the mid autumn festival, but they can be found in the Palace of the Water and Wind Masters year round

There are countless tiny details like that, strewn throughout. So seamless with the rest of the palace, no one knows of Shi Wudu’s secret sentimentality.

But she does.

She steps into her brother’s study, eyeing the stacks of scrolls on the walls. Collected over the centuries.

Some of them were their grandfather’s, bringing the nostalgic scent of dusty paper and long dried ink.

“…I thought I would find you here,” She comments, leaning against the doorframe. “So much for having business with the emperor.”

Her brother shrugs from behind his desk, not seeming particularly ashamed.

Reports and ledgers are spread out in front of him. He isn’t a civil god—but as the god of wealth, he hasn’t escaped paperwork the way the other elemental masters and martial gods have.

“How did you know I was lying?”

Shi Qingxuan shrugs, fiddling with her fan between her fingers, opening and shutting it. “The emperor was still at the celebration when I left.”

Shi Wudu sighs, leaning away from his desk. “Does this mean you were lying about your plans as well?”

“No,” she mutters, eyes downcast, “I have plans.”

Shi Wudu watches her, asking evenly—

“With Ming Yi?”

His little sister’s lips press together tightly, and the fan snaps shut. “Yes. Why?” There’s a defiant edge to her tone, and the water master sighs.

“What sort of plans?”

“Hot springs and massages,” she replies sarcastically. “Seriously—you’ve never asked me that before.”

Shi Wudu presses his index finger down on the surface of his desk, smoothing out the bent surface of one of his ledgers.

“You never refused to touch Yan Zhen before.”

Her cheeks heat up, and before she can sputter out something defensive, her brother holds up a hand. “I’m just asking if it’s like that between you two.”

Her mouth screws up, fingers grasping her fan tightly.

“No!” She lies. “But in any case, you should know—”

Shi Wudu rolls his eyes.

"If this is about you being attracted to men…I know." He points out dryly, and when her lips part with surprise, he has to fight the urge to snort.

Apparently, she thought it was subtle.

"You…do?"

"Our mother guessed when you were three."

Her brother shrugs, crossing his legs. "She guessed about me too, don't feel bad."

She starts, giving him a surprised look—but he doesn't elaborate on what their mother actually guessed—sexuality or otherwise, so…

"And she…was fine with that?" Shi Qingxuan asks, surprised.

"I was too young for it to be much of an issue by the time she passed, so I don't know."

"But…" Shi Qingxuan pushes away from the door frame, stepping into the study fully. "You were betrothed, right?"

To the daughter of another wealthy family, yes—set up when he was seven.

Shi Wudu doesn't think he would have minded it too badly. She was pretty enough. (Not as much so as him, but few are.) And her personality was tolerable.

"It's different when you're the eldest son," he muses, "but ascending invalidated that contract—lucky me."

Shi Qingxuan smiles, feeling honestly relieved. There's no point in telling him about Ming Yi, mostly because…well…

They agreed on keeping that side of their friendship private. Well. More like Ming-Xiong decided, but she didn't disagree.

Still…

"…If you weren't bothered about him being a man, then why would it matter if me and Ming-Xiong were…doing that sort of thing?" She mutters, her eyebrows knitting together.

Shi Wudu sits forward with a sigh.

"...I don't care if you're with a man," he agrees. "Just not that one."

Shi Qingxuan's eyebrows shoot up, then, her eyes narrow. "...What's that supposed to mean?"

Her brother watches her, his gaze evaluating. "Shi Qingxuan..."

"What?!"

"Not that one," he repeats firmly.

"Why?"

Her eyes are so bright, so ready to defend him.

And her brother's response, in the face of that, is painfully blunt. "He isn't good enough for you."

"Not good enough—?" Shi Qingxuan's jaw drops, and her hands drop down to her hips. "Ming-Xiong is BRILLIANT, and he's funny, and he was ninth in the contest this year!"

"...Shi Qingxuan..."

"You can say it as many times as you want! Shi Qingxuan, Shi Qingxuan, Shi Qingxuan! It doesn't change the fact that you don't think ANYONE is good enough for me! Ming-Xiong is great!"

"That's not true," Shi Wudu disagrees.

When his sister stares at him, expectant, he actually has to think about it.

"...I'd be fine with Nan Yang."

Shi Qingxuan practically chokes. "Him?!"

"He's good looking, isn't he?"

"That's not the only requirement!" She sputters. "I'd sooner have Xuan Zhen!"

"Absolutely not," he brother shakes his head.

"Hah?!"

"Vetoed."

“I’m FOUR CENTURIES OLD!” She glares, stomping her foot. “You don’t get VETO POWER on the people I have relationships with!”

“Sure, I do.”

“No!”

“Yes.”

“You can’t stop me!”

“Oh,” Shi Wudu smirks, leaning his chin on his hand, “I could just tell them you didn’t stop wetting the bed until you were nine.”

“That—!” She gawks, “That isn’t even TRUE!”

“Yes,” he agrees, his eyes sparkling with amusement. “But who are they going to believe? Me, or you?”

“GEGE!”

He throws his head back, laughing. Not a mean laugh—but easy, relaxed.

He’s only ever like this when it’s just them.

And even if it’s at her expense, Shi Qingxuan is glad to hear him laugh like that. He hardly ever does it anymore.

“...What makes Nan Yang any better than Ming-Xiong or Xuan Zhen?”

“He doesn’t have anything to hide,” Shi Wudu replies easily, like it’s obvious.

Shi Qingxuan rolls her eyes, crossing her arms. “It’s not Ming-Xiong’s fault he was a spy! It was a mission from the emperor!”

“...” Her brother shrugs. “It seemed a little too easy for him.”

“Don’t blame him for being good at the job YOU picked him out for!” She huffs. “That’s totally unfair!”

“I’m not saying he’s a degenerate or something,” Shi Wudu grouses. “But you could do better.”

“Oh,” Shi Qingxuan laughs, lifting her chin, “Like you and Pei?!”

The expression on her brother's face momentarily freezes, surprised—and he doesn't ask, but the question is clear in his eyes.

'Who told you?'

"..." To which his sister stands there, agape. "...wait..."

She'd thrown the words out there, expecting her brother to immediately laugh it off, or deny it, but...

"...It's actually true?!"

"Is what true?"

"You and Pei!" Shi Qingxuan snaps, pointing at him, and when he doesn't answer— "Oh my god, it IS!"

"Don't be so dramatic—"

"You're—You're FUCKING!" She cries, her face going bright red, all the way up to her ears, and now her brother is the one choking.

"SHI QINGXUAN!"

"You're not DENYING IT!"

"Don't be so VULGAR!" He glares, using outrage to distract from the heat in his own face.

"But you ARE!"

"You know—I—yes!" He agrees, "But that isn't the same thing."

"It's EXACTLY the same thing!"

"No, it isn't!"

"That's just a DOUBLE STANDARD! If we're talking about who is and isn't good enough—!"

"Would you calm down and listen before you jump to conclusions?" She glares, crossing her arms, and Shi Wudu sighs.

"...Pei and I are friends," he holds up a finger to silence her before she can argue, "and...there is an intimate aspect to that friendship."

"What does that even mean?!" Shi Qingxuan glares. "Are you in love with him?!"

Shi Wudu isn't taken by surprise by the accusation, this time.

"Of course not," he replies. "Do you think I'm stupid? You know how he feels about that sort of thing."

That makes it easier to lie.

"But he is important to me."

(The best lies, of course, add layers of truth.)

"...Of ALL the people to do... that ...with..."

(It's an immature way of saying it, but it's better than her loudly declaring that he and Pei are 'fucking,' so he prefers it.)

"...WHY him?! He's—"

"You don't know him, Shi Qingxuan."

"And you don't know Ming-Xiong, but that didn't stop you from deciding he's—!"

"Look," Shi Wudu cuts her off. "I'm your big brother. It's my job to worry about that sort of thing—and you tend to see the best in people."

"I—!"

"And I love that about you."

Shi Qingxuan falls silent, her eyes widening slightly.

"I don't want you to look at your friends, and feel unsure." The Water Master mutters. "So, just let me be the one to worry about it, okay?"

There's the silent question of course—about the clear double standard.

"Have I ever seemed naive to you?"

Obviously not.

If anything, her brother has always had a jaded, incredibly cynical view of the world, and people—especially men.

"...No..." She admits, biting her lip as her brother looks her in the eye.

“I trust Pei.” He says the words firmly, without an ounce of doubt. “He would never hurt me.”

He could have said ‘he would never betray me,’ but it’s not as simple as that.

Pei is loyal, but that isn’t unique.

The difference is that Pei is never cruel, even when he could be.

“...I would never hurt you either,” his sister points out, her tone doubtful.

After all, her brother has never expressed such faith in anyone. And—he isn’t even family.

“You would never mean to,” Shi Wudu murmurs.

That isn’t quite the same as agreeing, but she doesn’t seem to notice.

“Just understand—there’s nothing going on between him and me that I can’t handle,” he shrugs. “You don’t need to worry.”

She hardly seems mollified, but there’s something else he’s curious about.

“...If you already had plans with Ming Yi, why come here looking for me, anyway?” He murmurs, tilting his head to the side.

Shi Qingxuan shrugs, glancing towards the ground—suddenly self conscious. “I guess...I just wanted...”

“...Wanted to what?”

“...To check on you,” she mumbles.

“On me?” Her brother arches an eyebrow, visibly surprised. “Why?”

“...You disappeared for three days,” Shi Qingxuan frowns. “And you’re never explained.”

Shi Wudu stares at her for a moment, then he shrugs.

“I was attending to business in the mortal realm.”

That’s what he says.

But it’s never stopped him from answering in their communication array before.

“You didn’t answer me for three days, gege.” Her eyes remain downcast, and her tone is riddled with worry.

“But you knew I was alright.” He reminds her, his gaze unreadable. After a moment, he gestures with his hand. “Come here.”

She does so without hesitation, walking over to the side of his desk—and he reaches up, grasping the locket hanging around her neck between his fingers.

“You always know that I’m alright,” his tone is gentle, reassuring.

After all, he’s wearing the other half of the set, tucked underneath his robes. She Qingxuan stares down at it, unable to argue with its literal meaning. Physically, she knows that her brother is alright.

Mentally, however…

She bites her lip, and Shi Wudu sighs.

After taking a moment to think of an appropriate thing to be worried about, he mumbles—

“…I suppose I’m worried about facing my third calamity,” he admits. “It won’t be easy for me this time.”

Her eyes widen, remembering.

“We can talk more—about everything—once that’s over.”

Thankfully she seems to believe that, nodding. “I’ll let you focus on that, then, gege— oh, and I almost forgot,” she rummages around in the folds of her dress for a moment, pulling out a package.

“I bumped into the emperor leaving the celebration—he wanted me to give you this.” Her brother takes it, not asking any questions, just setting the box down on the table.

“Why don’t you go and enjoy the rest of the celebration?”

“What about you, gege?”

“Oh…” her brother shrugs, “I think I’ve had enough excitement for one day.”

She nods, leaning up to kiss his cheek before sliding down from the desk. “Promise you won’t be lonely?”

He snorts, but indulges her with a nod. “I promise.”

With that, she slips out of the room—and her brother is left alone, looking over ledgers and reports.

But that box has a pointed presence of its own. Lingering on his desk—almost like it has a set of eyes, and they’re staring at him.

It’s more than an hour or two before he finally caves, gripping the corner, pulling it towards him.

It was probably intended as a gift for winning the contest. Jun Wu always gives him one (as a show of how gracious, he is, pretending that second place is ‘first.’) And even though Xianle won this year, no one could have predicted that.

But this is no gift.

The dagger gleams up at him, sharp and dangerous. A reminder of that knight. Shi Wudu stares, his jaw locked.

He’s long since stopped trying to discern Jun Wu’s every motivation behind an action. He’s a man riddled with contradiction, but this—

This is a threat.

Or maybe a warning. It’s difficult to discern which.

Either way, it seems a petty reason to leave such a dangerous weapon with the Water Master, of all people.

Before he can contemplate the matter further, he hears a dull thud and a rattle on the other side of the palace.

“…” The Water Mater covers the box back up, setting it on one of the shelves behind him.

He’s surprised Shi Qingxuan would be back so early. After all, when she’s off with Ming Yi, it’s never brief, but…

When he reaches the entrance hall, it isn’t his sister, no— It’s Pei.

Steadying a large, potted tree that he clearly stumbled into, rattling against the marble floors before it settles back down.

“...What are you doing here?” Shi Wudu questions, biting back a smile. “I thought you were celebrating with Ling Wen.”

“I...was,” the general agrees.

Shi Wudu crosses his arms, looking him over. He’s slightly disheveled, as though he’s taken a stumble or two on the way here.

“Drinking, women, and all that.”

“Yeah...” Pei is still holding onto the tree, staring at it as though it’s offended him.

“Well...I did most of the drinking, and he...he did the women,” he explains, and Shi Wudu’s smile widens.

“You left early?”

The general’s gaze turns away from the tree, his current adversary, towards his lover —gleaming violet in the dim light.

“...I wanted...to see you...”

The Water Master laughs, covering his mouth as Pei lets go of the plant, making his way over to him. “In this state, I think you’d just pass out on top of me. I’ll pass.”

“I bounce back fast!” The general protests with a slight pout, his brow creasing. “But that...isn’t why I...”

Shi Wudu raises an eyebrow as Pei Ming leans over him. The Water Master has been leaning back against a pillar as he observes him, and the general has both hands braced against it now, just over his head.

“Then why are you here?”

Pei frowns, staring down at him.

Then, his head sinks down, face pressed into the side of Shi Wudu’s neck. It isn’t exactly a seductive technique. He isn’t kissing him. But his nose does brush against the Water Master’s skin as he breathes him in, drawing out a reluctant shiver.

“I’d...make a good husband.”

Shi Wudu chokes, his hand frozen from where it had been moving to pat the back of Pei’s head.

"…What?"

"Before," he mutters, his tone sulking. "When you said you hadn't had any suitable candidates."

What, back during the feast?

"I'm…suitable…"

The Water Master falls silent, too stunned to reply—and Pei noses closer against his neck, one arm dropping down from the pillar over head, wrapping around his waist.

"I know everything about you," he mumbles—and Shi Wudu's heart sinks.

"…Not everything…" He mutters.

Pei doesn't seem to be bothered by that, holding him close. "I know the important things."

He lists them off, one by one, mumbling against Shi Wudu's hair. Words slightly slurred, from the alcohol—but clear.

Pei knows everything he likes. He knows what pisses him off, too.

Pei knows how much he loves his brother. He knows how he works to keep him safe.

Pei has always known what makes him laugh, and…

"I make you happy," he mumbles, his arm tight around the Water Master's back, fingers stroking through his hair. "…Don't I?"

Shi Wudu bites his lip, his throat tight, aching.

"…Yes," he whispers, reaching up and wrapping his arms around the general's neck, returning the embrace. "You do."

Everything is so easy with him. So comfortable and familiar. Shi Wudu has always been burdened with self awareness. He knows, at his core, that he is not a good man.

Affection has always been his one redeeming quality.

He isn't only fond of those close to him—he adores them. With such a ferocity, it blinds him.

And loving Pei Ming—that has always been the sweetest kind of ache.

"...Then why not marry me?" Pei mumbles, sounding somewhat petulant.

The Water Master's heart is pounding so violently against his ribs, it's difficult to sound unbothered—but he perseveres.

"You never asked."

Pei opens his mouth, but the Water Master stops him. "And you're only saying this now because you've been drinking."

"I am not..." The general grumbles—but still, he presses a kiss against Shi Wudu's throat, "...I've asked someone to marry me before, you know."

That actually is surprising.

"Did you really?"

"...She said no," Pei admits.

But that isn't the point.

The point is that there have been times in his life where he wasn't universally opposed to monogamy—or commitment. He's not incapable.

It just has to be the right person.

"...I was engaged once," Shi Wudu offers, just to enjoy the sensation of Pei stiffening against him with jealousy. "Back when I was mortal."

"I'm glad it didn't work out."

The Water Master gasps playfully, pretending to be offended. "Pei—don't you want me to be happy?"

Instead of replying, Pei lifts his head, taking his lips in a searing kiss.

Slightly clumsy, compared to the usual—but still, Shi Wudu's eyes slip shut, his arms tightening around the general's neck as he pulls him closer, closer.

Teeth scrape at his lower lip, and he sighs.

"...With me," the words rumble in Pei's chest as he bends over him, holding him closer, kissing him deeper. "Just with me."

The Water Master shudders, letting him closer, his knees parting under the onslaught.

He supposes Pei was right, he does bounce back fast, doesn't he?

One leg is already hitched up around the general's hip by the time their lips part— only for Pei's mouth to sink back down against his neck, finding soft, sensitive skin. Nipping and biting until Shi Wudu's breath hitched with want.

"You shouldn't be..." He protests faintly, pushing at his shoulder. After all—he was injured, before—and he's been drinking, but—

Pei catches his wrist, pinning it over Shi Wudu's head as his teeth sink in, leaving a mark.

"'M fine," he mumbles, pressing forward with his knee, drawing out a shudder, "Want you..."

It's not an issue of consent, clearly—he seems plenty cognizant enough to make that decision, and...

Shi Wudu's eyes roll back into his head, his hips rolling forward with a quiet moan. At first, it seems okay.

It's good, with Pei against him, over him. His lips on his skin. There's a slight tension to it—but that's not because of him. It's never because of him.

And it's fine. Good, even, when Pei's mouth is under his chin, and his hand is on his hip, but...

At some point, both of his wrists end up pinned over his head, and that tension starts to build—this time, in an unpleasant way.

Normally, he likes being touched like this. Pei knows that. It's never been a problem before, but now—

Now, he can't move, and the room is dark, and—

"...Stop!"

The moment he gasps the word out, his voice small, weak, and frightened—his chest fills with shame.

It’s the first time he’s ever said that to Pei.

It’s also the first time anyone has ever listened—because the General is off of him in an instant.

Both of Shi Wudu’s hands cover his mouth, his shoulders trembling as he fights to control his breaths.

What’s wrong with him?

His eyes sting.

It’s just Pei. It—

He swallows hard, his chest heaving. Pei would never. Why is he—?

Pei Ming watches him from a few feet away, his hands up in front of him in a gesture of surrender.

But his gaze is heavy with worry.

“...What happened?” He questions—and from his tone...he’s clearly sobered up.

The Water Master shakes his head, fighting to even out his breaths.

“...Nothing,” he chokes—feeling lightheaded, because he—

He’s always composed. Always level headed.

But something in him cracked that night.

He thought, taking that time to himself, waiting three days until the pain went away—

He thought that meant it was gone.

He thought that meant it was okay.

Like it never happened.

But it’s there now, like a wound ripped open, and it—

(It hurts.)

Shi Wudu shudders, weak gasps slowly building into full blown hyperventilation as he slides down the pillar, sitting on the floor.

“Hey…”

Pei Ming kneels down in front of him, his gaze wracked with concern. They’ve been in this position before, only with the roles reversed.

It’s not often—but Pei has always had night terrors.

He’s been in too many wars not to.

Shi Wudu never said a word about it, only held him.

He’s always the calm one. Always too mature for his age. Always keeping it together.

Pei doesn’t touch him, but he stays close, a hand held out. Not impatient or demanding, simply waiting until the Water Master is able to take it.

When he does, his fingers are trembling. “Look at me.”

He can’t seem to bring himself to at first, but with slow, gentle coaxing—eventually he does.

Panicked—but more than that, ashamed.

It takes several minutes of coaching to help him settle his breathing—and even then, the trembling doesn’t stop.

Quietly, Pei asks him again: “What happened?”

There’s a hard edge under the gentleness of his tone—not directed at him, but it’s there.

Anger.

Because clearly, something did happen.

Something serious.

“…Nothing,” Shi Wudu croaks, his voice raw. “Nothing happened.”

There’s no point in pressing him. No matter how angry and worried he might feel— Pei knows that.

Trying to force it out would only bring back the panic attack—and he wouldn’t get an answer.

Still, he makes one more attempt. “If you tell me, I’ll take care of it.” But he can’t.

Not just because of who it is.

Not only because the mere act of knowing would get the General killed.

There are just some things you can’t fix.

(It hurts.)

The Water Master is starting to wonder if he’s one of them.

(And that really, really hurts.)

Pei doesn’t leave.

It’s the first time Shi Wudu has had someone in his bed like this—just to be held.

It’s fees safe.

And as sleep starts to tug him in, his eyes drift towards the window, watching the fireworks.

Wondering if he could be saved—and wondering if he wants to be.

In the city below, someone else is watching the same lights.

Eyes deep and dark, like frozen eyes beneath the sea. Remembering a time when he was a child, sitting on a city roof. Back then, it felt like looking down on the entire world.

‘Gege, these are the best seats ever!’

Back when He Sheng thought he could do anything.

Back when he thought that he was good at fixing things.

She's a few feet away from him, leaning against the railing, looking up at the lanterns, the fireworks, and the stars.

So much beauty, but her gaze is dim.

And he doesn't understand it.

Staring at chestnut curls. The vulnerable hunch of her shoulders. Freckles faintly spattered across the back of her neck.

He doesn't know how he could feel like this, when she's the reason he lost everything. So, he tells himself that he doesn't.

He reminds himself of the day his heart died.

Feeling it fracture and break and wither away.

He reminds himself that He Sheng is long gone. A weak child with nothing left to protect.

Surrounded by the broken things he couldn't fix.

Still, when she looks back over her shoulder, her curls stirring in the wind, his lips can't help but curve up slightly.

"...You're usually the life of the party," he comments.

Shi Qingxuan looks away with a shrug.

"You and gege both act like that's all I am," she mutters.

"...Nah," Ming Yi disagrees, his tone always marked with carefully tailored disinterest. "I just thought you had something to celebrate."

She frowns, rubbing the cold out of her arms.

"You were in the top ten," her friend points out, reminding her of how excited she was before.

"..." her eyes narrow slightly, determined. "I'll do better next year," She mutters.

After all, people aren't going to take her seriously if she doesn't start working harder. And her brother...

...Maybe he wouldn't be so worried about his calamity, if he knew she could take care of herself.

Ming Yi is quiet as he watches her, his gaze far away–unreadable.

"...Who gives a damn about next year," he mutters, reaching out. "You were eighth this year."

Shi Qingxuan stares at his hand for a moment, glancing up at him with a surprised smile, her eyes lighting up for the first time since the lanterns were counted.

"...Ming-xiong," she whispers, bouncing with excitement, "...are you actually offering to dance with me?"

He doesn't smile back–but there's the tiniest bit of warmth in his eyes, and it makes her own smile even wider.

"Don't push your luck."

"Okay, okay!" She agrees quickly, snatching his hand, "Not take backs!"

"How old are you, five?"

"And a HALF!" She laughs.

"Hey, Ming-Xiong–you're pretty good at this. Just who else have you been dancing with?"

"Lots of people."

"Hah?!" She protests, only to dissolve into laughter when he spins her around, "Then why did it take you so long to ask me?!"

"You make it hard to get a word in."

"I do not!" She cries. "Besides, what else are mouths good for, besides talking? I–!"

Luckily, they're alone–because then, Ming Yi shows her exactly what else mouths are good for, sparks of light showering in the skies overhead.

Refusing to think about next year.

Who knows what next year will look like.

This year – this year is all he needs to think about.

And this year, for the first time in many years, the Crown Prince of Xianle hasn't found the Mid-Autumn festival to be a depressing affair.

Not entirely.

There were moments of pain, remorse, and sadness.

But...it was also beautiful.

Enough so that, in spite of the encounter with Mu Qing and Feng Xin, he still smiles during the walk back to Puqi Shrine, reaching down to fiddle with the chain around his neck.

Of all of the belongings Xie Lian has had in his life, this has been with him the longest —longer than Ruoye, even, even if the ashes were in a different form back then.

And after tonight, he can't help but wonder... The prince stops, coming to a halt on the steps.

"...Ren Song?" He calls out cautiously, hearing some rattling and footsteps in the distance before he gets an answer.

"Welcome back, your highness! Did you enjoy the festival?"

"Yes," He replies, reaching over to touch one of the posts supporting the porch in front of the shrine

"What did you two get up to?"

"Oh..." Ren Song shrugs, leaning against the doorframe, twiddling his thumbs. "Nothing much. Just chatting, and all that..."

Guzi is already sleeping peacefully, Qi Qi tucked around his head like a fluffy red pillow.

"Did you get the lanterns?"

"...I thought that much would have been obvious," Xie Lian mumbles, glancing up at the lights floating in the sky overhead.

"..." The demon grins, "Oh, I guess so! You know, it's hard to tell, what with so many of them going up in the same night, all that..."

"...Shuo?"

"Yes?"

"The shrine didn't have steps when I left."

Not on the front part of the building, anyway—there are steps leading out back that San Lang built during his first week here, but the front is a simple step off, a foot and a half off the ground.

"Oh...I made them!" The teenager bobs his head, his tone ever eager, ever helpful. "I thought they'd be better then the step off, y'know? So Guzi won't trip!"

"That was kind of you," Xie Lian murmurs, all while the demon beams in response. "...I don't remember the porch being this stable, either."

"Ah, well..." Shuo shrugs, waving it off with a sheepish snort, "I know, I know, it's generous of me, but what can I say? I'm a thoughtful person."

"Yes..." Xie Lian agrees, lifting his hand from the post to press it against the shrine wall. "There's just one other thing."

"Hmm?"

"The shrine was made from balsa wood," the god murmurs, "this is cedar." There's a long, awkward silence—and the ghost finally grumbles—

"How the hell were you able to tell?!"

"Different smell," Xie Lian shrugs, lifting his palm off of the wall. "And texture."

"...Okay, well, first of all, balsa wood is terrible," Shuo grumbles, crossing his arms. "It's not structurally stable at all. And it doesn't even grow around here! What kind of bad luck—!"

"Shuo..."

"And cedar, y'know, that's rot resistant, it's sturdy—!"

"What happened?"

"Second of all," Shuo holds up his hands pointedly, as if the god could even see the gesture to begin with, "I'm not the trouble maker in this situation, got it? I'm the problem solver! You even have a second story now! That's an improvement!"

"Oh." Xie Lian blinks. "Really? Thank you."

That actually is a rather helpful improvement. What with all of the extra guests he's had recently, it's been somewhat cramped.

"You're welcome, your highness. It's like I said, I'm a generous—"

"What happened?"

"Okay, okay, thirdly," Shuo fiddles with the end of his ponytail nervously, "If you think about it, this is kinda your fault—no offense—"

Xie Lian's eyebrows shoot up, and he explains.

"I mean, I knew letting the prince stay was a bad idea, but you insisted..."

"What—?"

"And you know, if you think about it," Shuo tilts his head to the side, twisting his hair around his fingers a little faster, "You blew up my house first. And I didn't complain! I just rebuilt my house!"

"...The shrine was blown up?"

"No! Don't be dramatic!"

"And is paradise manor your home too?" Xie Lian questions, now feeling even more guilty about that than he did before. "San Lang wasn't clear on the subject..."

"Uh," Shuo wrinkles his nose (as he always does, when he's in intense thought), "yes, but also no."

Xie Lian stares at him, waiting, and the forest demon sighs.

"Well, obviously I'm high up enough that I have my own lair and all of that, but Yi—" He stops, frowning. "...The Waning Moon Officer isn't there."

"Is that a big problem?"

"Yeah," Shuo stares, like it's obvious. "He makes my snacks."

Xie Lian doesn't know whether to laugh, or cry.

"For the purposes of this argument, it's my house."

The prince blinks. “Are we arguing?”

“You’re practically interrogating me!” The ghost whines. “And I built you steps!”

“I’m just asking what happened…?”

“Okay, okay!” He cries, as though Xie Lian was shaking him by the front of his shirt and berating him.

(Rather than asking in a calm, very gentle tone.)

“So, you know, I’m feeding Guzi and the creepy fuck—”

“—Lang Ying—?”

“Yeah, whatever, I’m feeding them dinner, and Qi Rong picks that moment to be, y’know, himself.”

Xie Lian winces, not needing him to elaborate on why his cousin being ‘himself’ is a bad thing.

“He insists that he’s not gonna eat his food unless Lang Qianqiu feeds him.”

Oh—

Oh dear.

“And y’know,” Shuo makes a face, throwing his hands up, “I called him a pervert, thinking it would discourage him—”

Xie Lian sighs, immediately seeing how it went downhill.

The more outrageous a situation, the more excited Qi Rong tends to get.

“Well then, Lang Qianqiu did feed him, but kind of aggressively, y’know? And Qi Rong starts moaning every time he shoves the food in his mouth.”

Xie Lian’s face falls in his hands, and Shuo shrugs, “And y’know what? I laughed. The look on his face was hilarious! It was!”

Xie Lian has no idea what Lang Qianqiu actually looks like, so he can only imagine his expression.

“Then he’s yelling at ME, like ‘How can you laugh?! He murdered your brother!’”

(When Shuo impersonates him, he drops his voice, using an intentionally idiotic tone.)

“And then I was offended, because hey, just because Qi Rong and I have a DYNAMIC, that doesn’t mean I don’t HATE him! But fuck, he has a sense of humor, okay?! He’s FUNNY sometimes!”

Xie Lian is reluctant to admit that, but Shuo isn’t wrong.

“So, I kinda lost my temper—which isn’t my fault, he pushed me to it—and I said he was just mad because Qi Rong has gotten laid, and he hasn’t,” Shuo shrugs, his eyes wide. “I wasn’t expecting to be RIGHT, okay?! Then HE got angrier—”

Xie Lian pinches the bridge of his nose.

The idea of his cousin being sexually active with anyone at any point isn’t an image he ever needed, and now he has to live with that knowledge.

“Then—did you know he has a tiger?!”

“Yeah,” Xie Lian mutters, not looking up. “He has a tiger.”

“Did you know they were stupid matching hats?”

That draws a surprised snort from the prince, and Shuo continues.

“Anyways, I didn’t know—because how was I supposed to know?!—but Dian Dian HATES tigers, apparently.”

Now, Xie Lian can see where this is going.

“So, they start fighting, and I was worried about Dian Dian, so I started to break it up, then Lang Qianqiu thinks I’m going after his tiger, so he tackles ME, and—well—like I said, balsa is shitty wood, so…”

So, most of the shrine was knocked down. “But…I fixed it!”

Shuo points out. “I made it better, actually, if you think about it. I figured you and the kids could sleep down here, I could be in your newly installed attic—”

“And what about Lang Qianqiu?”

“Oh,” the demon waves that off. “I made a dog house out back, it should suit him.”

No, no—Qi Rong can stay there. Lang Qianqiu will just have to share with Shuo, if that’s how it’s going to be, but…

“…Where are they now?”

“Ah, well…” Shuo sighs. “While we were fighting, Qi Rong ran off—so Lang Qianqiu went after him while I rebuilt the shrine.”

Xie Lian’s expression pinches with concern, and Shuo is quick to reassure him. “He’s got him dianxia, don’t worry—they’ll be back relatively soon.”

“…How can you be sure?”

Shuo grimaces, crossing his arms. “I had to give him my private communication array password. Gross…”

The prince lets out a quiet sigh of relief.

Good, then—he doesn’t have to waste his time going off and finding Qi Rong himself.

“…You’re not gonna tell him, are you?” Shuo asks in a small voice, and Xie Lian pauses, confused.

“What, you mean San Lang?” He nods.

Xie Lian rubs his chin, glancing around the room. “There’s no harm done, so I don’t see a reason to…”

Shuo lets out a quiet breath of relief, and the prince raises an eyebrow. “But you did insist that he’s not in charge of you, so I’m not sure why you’re worried.”

“Okay, okay, look!” Shuo holds up a finger, “He’s the ghost king! Everyone listens to him! I’m just not like, an employee or a kid or something!”

“Do you take commands from black water too, then?”

“Huh?!” He gawks. “Hell no!”

Xie Lian crosses his arms, and Shuo falters.

“But…that’s completely different!” “It is?”

“Blackwater doesn’t take being a supreme seriously,” the demon explains, his arms crossed. “He and Hua Chengzhu are on decent terms, but he disappears for years at a time, and he only cares about…”

He stops himself, frowning. “Only cares about…?”

“…Himself,” Shuo concludes. “The point is—he doesn’t care enough to try to boss anyone around anyway.”

It’s interesting, because Xie Lian never would have guessed, based on Hua Cheng’s carefree demeanor, that he would take being a supreme so seriously.

“…Well,” the prince murmurs, placing his hand against the shrine wall once more, “I won’t tell him.”

Then, after a pause—

“…And thank you for the second floor.”

“You’re welcome! It’s like I said—I’m a thoughtful person!”

Yes, very.

(Even if the new addition is entirely for Shuo’s use, but Xie Lian opts not to focus on that.)

It’s not long before the demon retreats to the newly built attic, leaving the prince standing on the porch.

Watching the lights, still.

His fingers drift back down to the chain around his neck, and he finds himself contemplating—just as he was before.

He’s met so many people over the last eight centuries. Some good, some bad. In all of that time, few of them have stood out.

Jiang Chi. Lang Qianqiu. Banyue. Xiong Li. Lan An. And now, Hua Cheng and Shi Qingxuan.

The last two being unique in the sense that—Xie Lian doesn’t get close to people that quickly. It isn't easy for him to form attachments...not anymore.

And yet—Shi Qingxuan has already become a dear friend in so short a time. And Hua Cheng...

...Is also a friend, but not in a way that Xie Lian is accustomed to, or even has a word for.

And when he does form new attachments, he can't help but wonder... What Hong'er would think.

Even after all this time, Xie Lian always finds himself imagining what it would be like, if he was still here.

Because in the prince's mind, he should be.

He would have liked Shi Qingxuan, Xie Lian is sure of that much. The Wind Master is considerate, kind—and very supportive.

He can't say the same thing about Hua Cheng.

Hong'er wouldn't have liked him at all, and the thought of that makes Xie Lian smile.

After all—the boy was always respectful and deferential to him—but he loathed any other form of authority.

He would have found Hua Cheng's...assertive personality to be abrasive.

Even more so than that—Hong'er would practically bite anyone that tried to lay a finger on him—even casually.

Xie Lian can still remember an occasion when a man from the village was slightly too familiar, attempting to take advantage of the god's blindness to touch his face—

Hong'er didn't hesitate before breaking his nose.

And if he had seen Hua Cheng...well...healing Xie Lian's arm...

He would have certainly tried to rip his head off, ghost king or not.

The thought makes Xie Lian smile, lifting the ring up to his lips as he leans against the doorframe.

“…You always took such good care of me,” he whispers, squeezing his eyes shut. Xie Lian just wishes he could have given him the same.

And it’s hard, remembering that, standing here.

The shrine has changed so much over time—but the foundations are the same. The path before him is the one they walked together.

“I know you think I’m too trusting,” the prince whispers, stroking his fingers over the diamonds and rubies in the ring’s face.

“…But I like him,” he holds on tighter, his shoulders hunching slightly inward. He doesn’t know why he feels guilty, admitting that.

He’s had friends before. Plenty that Hong’er probably wouldn’t have approved of. But for some reason, this feels different.

“Give him a chance?” He mumbles, knowing he won’t get an answer.

He never does. Not from the one person he’s always wanted to talk to.

But when he looks to the sky overhead—

The lights are still there. Beaming down at him, a makeshift blanket of stars, drifting through the night.

And Xie Lian can’t help but smile, pressing Hong’er close to his heart.

“…Thank you,” he whispers, knowing that no one can hear.

Not knowing, of course, that someone can.

Miles away, leaning against a crimson column, a silver butterfly standing gracefully on his knuckles, his lips turned up into a soft smile as he looks up at the very same lights overhead.

Lanterns, drifting along the path to heaven.

He doesn’t need thanks.

That has never, not since he was a child, been the reason that Hua Cheng has prayed. He prays for the same reason his mother did.

Because someone gave him a reason to.

Silver wings flap delicately in the night, warm against his palm.

'It's always for you.'

That's what he wishes he could say.

'All of it—it's always for you.'

But Xie Lian—

Hua Cheng isn't the one he wants to hear that from.

His fingers curl inward, and the butterfly drifts away.

Soon.

He had to find a reason to return to his side soon.

There's trouble brewing overhead.

The heavens are stirring with unease—and when things begin to spill over, he needs— He needs Xie Lian to trust him, the way he did before.

Things aren't the same now, as they were back then.

Hua Cheng isn't a child, or a mere savage ghost.

He won't be helpless, in the conflict that lies ahead.

Regardless of what the cost might be—he'll be able to protect his god.

The question, in the end, is whether or not Xie Lian will allow him to.

Some people struggle with allowing themselves to be protected. Or comforted.

Especially when they need it.

And when someone is upset, and alone—they often fall into old habits.

For Xie Lian, that used to mean practicing his calligraphy. These days, he takes to his loom.

For Feng Xin, it was beating practice dummies on the training ring to a pulp. In close to a thousand years, he hasn't changed.

And neither has Mu Qing. Not really.

When he's scared, he'll hide somewhere small and closed off, like he's a child. But when he's upset...

Really upset, so distraught that he's almost sick with himself—

Mu Qing cleans.

That's what he's doing now.

His deputies have long since been ordered away—and the floor, he's been on his hands and knees, scrubbing it for hours, but—

But it doesn't feel clean.

Even though he can see his reflection in the tiles beneath his hands, it's always warped.

Like if he just scrubs harder, it'll go away. He'll feel better. It'll—

It'll get better, at some point.

It has to.

There's another knock at his door, and he glares, shoulders hunched.

"Go away, Feng Xin!"

His voice is thick and raw from crying for several hours on end—and —

That idiot is fucking persistent, Mu Qing will give him that. Pounding at the door for god knows how long, threatening to kick it down until Mu Qing re-enforced it with magic.

Of course, that was when the moron threatened to go get his bow and shoot the thing open. It's been quiet since then, and Mu Qing honestly thought he'd been caught up in other business, until—

Until he hears the door swing open.

"…" He slams the rag down on the floor, wiping at his nose irritably with the back of his hands as he whips around, his lips pulled back into a snarl.

"I said to GO THE FUCK AWAY!" He screams, his voice breaking. "WHY WON'T YOU JUST—!"

Mu Qing freezes, his face growing pale.

"Your…your m-majesty," he mutters, instinctively bowing his head low, then realizing how pitiful he must look—so, he scrambles to his feet, but still…

He can't meet the emperor's eyes.

"I—I thought you were—"

"Nan Yang?" The emperor questions softly.

"…" Mu Qing nods, still wiping at his eyes, his posture radiating shame.

"I thought so." Jun Wu sighs, glancing back over his shoulder. "I saw your argument, and…decided it would be best if I ordered him to help take the documentation of the festival to the archives."

Such a thing would normally be left to Ling Wen—but he's still off…enjoying the celebration. In his preferred form of company.

Mu Qing lets out a soft exhale of relief, swallowing hard. "…Thank you, your majesty."

"It was an emotional evening, I'm sure." Jun Wu murmurs.

The martial god's lips tremble—and now, he seems to remember that he still has the cleaning rag clutched in his hands, biting back a sniffle as he tosses it aside.

"Not for me," he croaks hoarsely. "I'm fine."

It's a pitiful attempt, but maybe they can both just pretend…

"…Of course you aren't," the words make Mu Qing wince, but…

Jun Wu's tone is…gentle.

"Seeing something like that would upset anyone, and…"

Silver eyes watch him closely.

"...I know how deeply you care about Xianle."

Mu Qing swallows thickly, his throat tight.

"I..."

"...I had my own guilt, you know. Watching that." Jun Wu shakes his head, his gaze far away.

Mu Qing's tears slow as he finally looks up, his eyes wide—swollen and red. "You...did?"

"How could I not?" The emperor smiles—but it's pained. "I was the one who banished him."

Of course, Xie Lian hadn't given Jun Wu much of a choice—everyone knows that, and no one blames him.

Mu Qing, however...

He just made a mistake.

A horrible fucking mistake. One he had no excuse for.

"...I don't know why he didn't pray for help," the emperor admits quietly. "I don't know how I couldn't have known."

"..." Mu Qing wraps his arms around himself, leaning back against the wall. "That's not your fault," he mutters. "Xie Lian doesn't like showing weakness."

(And neither does he.)

"...And it isn't your fault, either."

Mu Qing flinches away from the words of comfort, his eyes welling up with tears. "You don't..."

His voice wobbles, and Jun Wu's gaze softens. "You were so young, Xuan Zhen..."

He was. The youngest of the three of them—but everyone always forgot that. "When I was that age, I made far worse mistakes than being cruel to a friend."

"..."

He knows, then.

Xie Lian must have told him, at one point or another.

And Mu Qing knows, given what he did—he has no right to secrecy.

Still, it hurts.

"...You did?" Mu Qing whispers.

"..." Jun Wu tilts his head, glancing around the inside of Mu Qing's palace. He's never visited before. Not personally.

"I was under...an incredible amount of pressure, when I was young," Jun Wu explains. "Everyone relied on me, but, at the same time..."

His next words...strike an unexpected chord with Mu Qing.

"...No one ever put me first."

The martial god has always been pretty good at sniffing out a liar.

"Not even the ones who were supposed to protect me."

It...

"...It was lonely."

It doesn't feel like the emperor is lying.

"So many people admired me, but...the minute I failed, even in the smallest way..."

Crack!

Jun Wu snaps his fingers.

"That admiration turned to disappointment and anger. No matter how human the failure was—"

Mu Qing's stomach sinks.

"Because I wasn't allowed to fail."

It's hard hearing Jun Wu explain it. Because on some level—

When someone is born to wealth and privilege, it's easy to resent them for all of the things they have.

It's even easier to resent them for failing, or feeling sadness. Because where do they get the right?

"And I always thought—if I could fix it, if I could impress them again—save them, again—they would believe in me the way they did before."

Two tears slip down Mu Qing's cheeks, and he wipes at them irritably.

"...Make them love me again, the way they did before."

The ache in his voice is undeniable, and Mu Qing—he shakes his head.

"That doesn't...sound like a mistake, your majesty."

Jun Wu smiles faintly.

"...I did make one though," he looks down the halls of Mu Qing's palace, examining the paintings on the walls.

"I made a horrible mistake."

He's facing away from Mu Qing now, his hands folded inside his robes.

"And it did help the greater good, in the short run, but..."

His expression remains hidden.

"It destroyed so many of the people I loved. Even if that was never what I intended."

...And, of course, Mu Qing is more than familiar with that feeling.

So often, he's ended up hurting the people he loves, even if he never meant to.

He was only angry, hurt, and scared.

"...And I couldn't admit it was my fault, either," the emperor mutters.

"Because if I did, then that would mean I failed, and..."

…And they wouldn't love him anymore.

It's a cycle that's so easy to get trapped in. So impossible to escape.

"And I just blamed everyone else," Jun Wu lets out a heavy sigh, refusing to look at his own reflection.

"I was in a hole. And I dug deeper, and deeper, and deeper. Until I didn't know how to get out."

The only thing to do then, was lie.

Because if you've done something you can't be forgiven for, even if your intentions in the beginning were good—

You'll do anything to hide it.

"Eventually…I was alone."

There's such misery in his voice…such vulnerability, that Mu Qing can't help but feel slightly…

Uneasy.

"…And why are you telling me all of this?" He questions, surprised.

Because he certainly hasn't told anyone else.

"…I suppose it's because I see potential in you, Mu Qing," the emperor admits—and the martial god stiffens.

There are only two people left who call him that.

Xie Lian and Feng Xin.

It's been so long since anyone else called him his birth name—he's startled by it.

"After all, you've done rather well for yourself," Jun Wu turns his head, looking him over. "Most Martial Gods are unambitious, relying on only physical prowess, but…"

He eyes silver locks of hair closely.

It's too bad the change isn't permanent. It suits him.

"…You're well rounded, compared to them."

He undoubtedly has the potential to rise higher. The only thing that ever seems to get in his way are his emotions.

Mu Qing sniffs again, pressing the heels of his hands against his eyes for a moment, trying to soothe the burning.

“...they’ve never stopped seeing me as a servant,” he mutters. And he shouldn’t be surprised by that.

After all—the Heavens is filled with royalty. War heroes. Great scholars. Wealthy merchants...compared to them, he’s...

“It doesn’t matter where you start out.”

Mu Qing glances up, surprised.

That Jun Wu—presumably born of royal blood himself, and now higher above anyone else—would say that.

“My wife was born a commoner, you know.”

“...I never knew you were married at all,” Mu Qing admits. It’s never been mentioned before. Not once.

Jun Wu smiles faintly, his gaze unreadable.

“She knew me better than anyone.” His voice is undeniably fond. “...And she would have put any god in the Heavens to shame. And...I suppose that’s another thing we have in common.”

Mu Qing stares back at him, confused.

And Jun Wu’s explanation—it makes him go still, his eyes widening as his stomach plummets.

Because it was hard enough, being alone in that knowledge.

It feels painful—exposed, even, to have someone else drag the truth to light;

“She was in love with my best friend, too.”

Parenthood

Chapter Summary

> “My wife was FINE yesterday! You SAID SO!”
>
> …And he has a wife?
>
> Goodness, that’s rather shameless.
>
> “She was! She really was!”
>
> “Then HOW DO YOU EXPLAIN THIS?!”

Chapter Notes

> tw// similar to events in the book, this chapter depicts the loss of a pregnancy and mentions of abortion.

See the end of the chapter for more notes

The next morning, Xie Lian awakes to a mild crisis:

There’s no food left in Puqi shrine.

“Don’t look at me,” Ren Song grumbles, his arms crossed as he leans back in his chair. “I’m the only one here that doesn’t actually need to eat.”

From where he’s dangling from one of the rafters, slowly revolving from Ruoye’s grip, Qi Rong rolls his eyes, flexing his bound hands. “It was obviously me…”

Ren Song glances up, flicking a small pebble at his head.

“As the cannibal in the room, I’d keep quiet if I were you.”

“Oi! You eat people TOO you smug fucking BR—!”

Shuo manages to flick the next pebble directly into his mouth, making him choke and flail overhead.

“I eat other ghosts. Not live humans. Big difference.”

Xie Lian finds both options disturbing, but as someone…alive…he supposes he can’t really reflect on whether or not it’s ‘normal’ for a ghost to do that.

He'll have to ask Hua Cheng about it, the next time he sees him.

Hopefully soon.

Xie Lian had been hoping to pay a visit to Ghost City today, to thank him, but...

Well, given that he's currently responsible for a living, human child that could theoretically starve, the food shortage will have to be sorted out first.

"I think we're ignoring the obvious."

Ren Song turns his head to stare pointedly in Lang Qianqiu's direction, and the martial god huffs, immediately riled by the silent accusation.

"I only eat my fair share!" He cries.

"Which happens to be more than everyone else here!"

"Well, I'm bigger than the rest of you!"

"Dianxia is a grown man too, and he eats like HALF as much!" Shuo glares. And sure, Xie Lian is shorter with a slightly less bulky frame, but the difference shouldn't be that much!

"Ah, well..." The prince smiles, feeling somewhat awkward. "I've always had a poor appetite..."

(Not to mention the fact that, over the last eight hundred years, he...didn't do the best job feeding himself.)

It's not nearly as bad as it used to be, however. There was a brief stint (a few decades or so) where he was nearly skeletal.

But, you know, these things happen.

By comparison, Xie Lian would say that he's acceptably healthy.

"Maybe you should be saying he doesn't eat enough instead of saying I eat TOO MUCH!" Lang Qianqiu grouses. "Besides, you're dead! You don't know what it's like to NEED to eat!"

"HEY—!"

“Technically you don’t.”

Both of them stop, slowly looking over at Xie Lian, who shrugs. “Practically speaking, the only ones here who need food are Qi Rong and Guzi.”

“...” Lang Qianqiu stares, his brows furrowed. “...Sure, there are gods who can sustain themselves on pure spiritual energy alone— but I’m not one of them.”

“Oh, me neither,” Xie Lian agrees with a nod. “But even without it, you can go without food indefinitely. Even if your body enters the starvation stages—you won’t die.”

“...Indefinitely?” Lang Qianqiu questions slowly, and Xie Lian stops, thinking about it.

“Well, I suppose I can’t say for sure—but a very long time, at least.”

After all—Xie Lian went over a hundred years without a single ounce of food or water. He would know.

Since then, it isn’t often that he feels actual hunger anymore, either. The same goes for thirst.

Usually, he only eats when he starts to feel physically weak—that’s the only way he can tell.

“Either way, assigning blame doesn’t help solve the problem at hand.”

Ren Song nods, his gaze still remaining on Lang Qianqiu. “Aren’t you rich, anyway? Just go buy some food!”

The martial god glares right back at him. “Coming from Crimson Rain’s kid? Your boots probably cost more than a small palace!”

“HEY! He is NOT my dad!”

“That doesn’t change the fact that you’re loaded! Probably even more so than I am!”

Xie Lian sighs, pushing back from the table, turning around to pick up his hat, pulling it over his head.

“ YOU go and buy food!”

Next come his boots, and his outer robes.

“Why SHOULD I?!”

Of course he tells Guzi to be good, patting him on the head—

And by the time Lang Qianqiu and Ren Song finish arguing…

…He’s already gone.

“…Where’d he go?”

Guzi glances up from where he’s been playing tag, chasing Qi Qi around the floor. “Scrap-gege went to get food!”

“…”

“…”

Naturally, Xie Lian couldn’t bother the people of Puqi village. Most of them are poor farmers with little to spare, and they already help him enough, when and where they can.

The natural next step was to walk to the larger, wealthier town at the foot of the mountain.

Wherein Xie Lian manages to find an empty street corner, spreading an old, worn carpet beneath his feet before taking a seat, setting up a small, neatly written sign:

‘Clothing, tapestries, and other cloth wares for sale!’ With the addendum:

‘Tricks available upon request!’

Thankfully, if Xie Lian lays his wares out, he usually doesn’t need to be much of a salesman, people will approach him on their own.

Today is no different!

A finely dressed young woman stops in front of him, snapping her parasol shut as she bends over to take a look.

She smiles, reaching down to touch one of the robes delicately.

“Say, gege…” the young woman glances up at him, painted nails grasping the handle of her parasol delicately. “These are really nice.”

The god jumps, glancing in her direction with a friendly smile. “Thank you, miss! Very reasonably priced, too!”

Her lips twitch at the mention of price, but before she can say more, another voice pipes up.

“Say, I don’t think I’ve seen you here before!” This young lady is shorter, curly haired, and dressed in far more vibrant colors. “What’s your name, mister?”

“H—” Xie Lian starts, then stops himself.

(Not seeing the way the original young lady’s lips curve into a pointed frown.)

“The name is Xie,” he smiles again. “Anything catching your eye?”

“Hmmm…” she rubs her chin, leaning close.

“This pink dress is very nice, actually…”

“I was just thinking the same thing!” A third girl speaks up, this one taller, a slightly nasal tint to her voice. “I’ll take it!”

The shorter young lady straightens up with a glare. “Well if it isn’t Cui Ya!”

The newcomer, clearly some sort of rival, crosses her arms. “Ma Jian,” she sniffs. “I’m sorry I didn’t notice you before, I don’t usually look at the ground when I walk.”

Oh.

Xie Lian blinks, surprised.

They really don’t like one another, do they?

“What are you doing here, anyway?”

Ma Jian sniffs, balling her hands up into fists. “If you MUST know, I’m having tea with Mr. Mo on Sunday, so I thought I’d get a new dress!”

Cui Ya raises an eyebrow, staring down at her imperiously. “Is that so?”

The more she speaks, the more Ma Jian’s face reddens with fury. “Well, I happen to be going riding with Mr. Mo on Saturday…”

Xie Lian winces, and Cui Ya smirks.

“I’d invite you to come along, but your short little legs probably couldn’t reach the stirrups...”

Ma Jian’s nostrils flare, and Xie Lian can’t help but feel a little sorry for her.

“But if he’s not too exhausted the next day...I’m sure he’ll enjoy having tea with you.”

Is riding really that tiresome? Xie Lian never found it to be so.

“Well, good for Mr. Mo.” Ma Jian huffs, adjusting her sleeves delicately. “It’s kind of him to take BOTH of his horses out for a ride.”

Xie Lian makes a choked sound, and Cui Ya squawks with indignation.

“Listen here, you little bitch—!”

In the middle of their arguing, Xie Lian can’t help but notice that the third young woman, the first to arrive—has disappeared.

And with her, a simple black brocade Xie Lian has set out for sale—two gold pieces left in its place.

The prince frowns.

That’s three—no, five times more than what he normally charges for a garment like that, and more than enough to buy food for the shrine for a week or two.

He lifts them up, trying to call out to her to correct the mistake, but... She’s long gone.

In the background, Ma Jian and Cui Ya are still arguing.

“Look!” Ma Jian snaps, clapping her hands together. “Pretty dresses are for pretty young ladies! And YOU are a COW!”

Without thinking, Xie Lian comments—

“I thought you said she was a horse?”

“HEY!”

“She can be BOTH!”

Before any of them can say more, there's a loud crash as the doors of a nearby mansion crash open.

"STUPID DOCTOR!" A middle aged man's voice rages. "GET OUT!"

"Mr. Mo!" Someone cries in protest. "There really isn't anything he can do!"

...This is the "Mr. Mo" these two young women are fighting over?

He sounds too old for either one of them, if you ask Xie Lian.

"My wife was FINE yesterday! You SAID SO!"

...And he has a wife?

Goodness, that's rather shameless.

"She was! She really was!"

"Then HOW DO YOU EXPLAIN THIS?!"

"Well...!" The doctor and his assistant stumble back down the steps. "There's clearly some dark magic at work here! You'd be better off with a cultivator than a doctor!"

And suddenly, that's Xie Lian's cue.

"Ah!" He leaps to his feet, cutting off the two young women arguing in front of him. "I'm a cultivator, sir!"

The wealthy merchant stops shaking his fist in the doctor's face, slowly turning to look at...

A simply dressed—clearly blind—weaver.

"...I thought you made clothes!" Ma Jian frowns, and Xie Lian waves her off, picking up his hat and the gold pieces as he straightens up.

"That was a side gig," he explains casually. "I'm a cultivator by trade!"

A few of the locals stop to stare at the garments he's rather carelessly abandoned on the street—some of which are the finest they've ever seen.

A...side gig?

"Whatever the issue is, I'm sure I can help!" He smiles brightly, and his confidence is so clear that, well…

Even if Mr. Mo has his doubts, due to the blindness—it seems like the very best option that he has.

"…Very well, Mr…?"

"Xie," Xie Lian exclaims again, crossing the road, following the sound of his voice with ease. "The name is Xie!"

"…Mr. Xie, it's my wife!"

He's ushered inside the house quickly, the courtyard gates slamming shut behind him as Mr. Mo explains.

"She's expecting a son, my first son! And when the doctors came to check her yesterday, she was fine, but today…" He trails off fretfully.

The moment Xie Lian is led into the lady of the house's bedroom, he understands.

He can't see her—the way her complexion has gone pale and sweaty, her expression drawn with pain. But he can hear her pained cries, and more importantly—

The dark aura. Coming directly from…

"EVERYBODY, QUIET!" Xie Lian cries out, holding his hands up.

The merchant is so startled, he nearly falls over, the doctor and his assistant cowering near the door.

"There's something wrong with the mistress's belly!"

Mr. Mo braces himself against a dresser, turning pale. "Is she about to give birth?! It's too soon!"

No, Xie Lian very much doubts the poor woman will be giving birth any time soon. Maybe never.

He reaches onto his back, where he's kept Fangxin sheathed up until now—and when he pulls out the sword, gleaming like black jade, the merchant grows even more gaunt.

"Hey! What are you doing with that thing—?!"

“Everyone, stay back!”

After all—Fangxin is no ordinary blade, it’s a spiritual device.

It hovers in the air the moment Xie Lian brings it out, trembling, before finally moving towards the pregnant woman in her bed—drawing out her husband’s panic.

“WHAT—?”

“Don’t interfere!” Xie Lian warns.

Fangxin won’t harm the mother, that much is certain.

The prince holds Mr. Mo back firmly as the blade hovers over her stomach—and after a tense moment, broken only by the father’s protests, Mrs. Mo begins to hunch over, hacking and coughing.

“STAY CALM!”

“How cAN YOU SAY THAT WHEN MY WIFE IS ABOUT TO BE—?!” The merchant falls silent, trembling with fright when black smoke begins to pour out of Mrs. Mo’s mouth, filling the air around her in a cloud, swirling menacingly.

Waiting for this moment, Fangxin finally attacks.

Plunging down towards the cloud, piercing through it—but only doing a minor level of damage before it slips out the open window, leaving Mrs. Mo to collapse against the sheets, breathing hard with relief.

Xie Lian lets go of her husband, hurrying forward to check on her.

After a moment of inspection, he hangs his head, his expression grim. “...it’s gone,” he mutters.

“GOOD!” Mr. Mo stumbles over, trembling with relief. “I don’t know what you did, but thank goodness you were here! How is my wife?! And my son?!”

“Your wife will recover, but...” Xie Lian sighs, leaning back. “Your son is gone.”

Mrs. Mo is groaning, clearly not conscious or aware of what has happened—and Mr. Mo—

He just stares at the cultivator, his jaw hanging open with shock.

“W…What do you mean?! Did th—did that thing make her miscarry?!”

Xie Lian supposes the end result might be the same—but the process is actually radically different.

“No, that…” He turns his head, following the direction of evil aura with his eyes. “That cloud of black smoke…it devoured the unborn child.”

The merchant stares at his wife’s stomach, his expression grief stricken. “H…how could that be? My…my first son, and now, he’s…”

“…Well, to get to the bottom of it, I have to ask—and I hope you understand, sir, I mean no offense—”

“Of course, Daozhang! What is it?”

He seemed rather doubtful of Xie Lian initially, but now that the prince has proven some qualifications—he’s rather deferential.

“First—are there any other women in your life that might have been jealous of your wife’s pregnancy?”

“Well…” Mr. Mo hesitates.

Xie Lian already knows the answer—and he strongly disapproves—but he waits.

“I, ah…have several wives…and concubines…”

…On top of the women outside?!

“…and has your wife ever terminated a pregnancy?”

“Ah, well…” Mr. Mo scratches his beard. “When you have so many women in one house…they get competitive, you know.”

He can’t see Xie Lian’s eyes—they’re covered by the hood of his robes—but the cultivator crosses his arms, unimpressed.

“…Well, the last time she was pregnant, she found out it was a girl, and…”

The answer is obvious, if not somewhat grim.

Mrs. Mo found out she was having a girl—and proceeded to terminate the pregnancy, rather than lose status compared to the other women in the house.

“Is it...possible that this was the vengeance of the unborn girl?”

“...Maybe...” Xie Lian admits with a frown. “It’s difficult to tell. But in this case, you were clearly dealing with a fetus spirit. Given that your wife is no longer pregnant, it has no reason to linger.”

As he’s saying this, he’s making his way to leave, but... Mr. Mo stops him.

“...But if there was a pregnant woman in the house...the child be in danger?” He questions slowly, and...

Xie Lian fights the urge to press a palm to his forehead with exasperation. “Is there?”

“Well...” the merchant swallows thickly, his forehead beading with stress. “...One of my concubines is pregnant as well!”

Two pregnant women in one house?!

The merchant is repugnant, but...

It makes sense that a fetus spirit was drawn here.

“...Alright,” Xie Lian sighs. “I can help her, but you’re going to need to do exactly as I say.”

The merchant nods eagerly, his hands clasped in front of him in a pleasing gesture. “Anything you say, Daozhang! If it’s at my disposal, you have it!”

“Have the mistress sleep in a different room tonight. Actually—it’s better to have her stay awake if she can.”

Xie Lian knows that’s no small task. Pregnancy often makes women rather tired— surprisingly early in the process, too.

Despite what one might think, he’s actually spent quite a bit of time in the presence of pregnant women over the last eight centuries.

He’s been told he has a comforting presence, and he can’t feel pain when someone squeezes the life out of his hands, so he’s often helped with deliveries in the towns he’s found himself passing through.

“It’s not a problem, daozhang!”

"And if someone calls out for her, calling her mother—she absolutely must not answer, or open her mouth at all. Understand?"

"Yes!" Mr. Mo bobs his head quickly in agreement. "Absolutely!"

"I'll also need a dress—one loose enough to be worn by a man—and a lock of her hair."

No matter how strange Xie Lian's directions become, Mr. Mo agrees.

"Oh! And take this," Xie Lian mutters, fumbling around in his sleeve. After a moment, he retrieves a protection charm, handing it over.

"...What is it?"

"A protection talisman," The cultivator explains. "When all of this is over—hold that up and say 'please protect me, crown prince!'" Xie Lian concludes. "That way, all of this can be counted under my shrine."

"..."

"Good," He claps his hands, assuming that the merchant nodded in agreement. "Let's get started!"

As it turns out, wearing women's clothes is easier after the first time around. The dress they bring out for him is plenty big enough for what he has in mind—and even the makeup is easier this time around.

After all, Xie Lian paid close attention when Xiao Ying applied it back on Mount Yu Jun. He's slow and careful, keeping in mind the feel on his skin, the placement of the product—and when he has one of the maids check his work, she even compliments him on the end result.

After that, he goes about working his hair into a more feminine style—braiding the sides, using the piece Hua Cheng gifted him to clasp it at the back of his head.

(Though Xie Lian can't imagine this is how the Ghost King intended his gift to be used when he gave it to him.)

Finally, he's left with the final task:

To make himself a convincing pregnant woman.

Of course, therein lies two obvious problems:

It wasn't so difficult, pretending to simply be a small chested bride on Mount Yu Jun.

Pretending to be a flat chested pregnant woman, however…

That's harder to do. It's not that women like that don't exist—they do—but not often.

Of course, now that Xie Lian thinks about it…

…It wouldn't be such a terrible idea to use his female form, in a situation like this.

It's like Shi Qingxuan said, when he was trying to convince Xie Lian to do it in the first place.

Xie Lian isn't worshiped as a god, or a goddess these days. Regardless of his gender, his power stays the same. And the…Crown 'Princess' of Xianle, she…

…Isn't flat chested. So, in this case…

Xie Lian scrunches his nose, concentrating, trying to grasp whatever spiritual power he has remaining from his mission in Ghost City…

…And when he reaches up to grasp at his chest, it's still flat. "…Oh," he mutters, surprised to feel…disappointed.

He must not have had enough left over, then.

It's not as if he had his heart set on it—but he hardly got to be in that form for very long at all last time—and it would have been a nice chance to sate any remaining curiosity.

Ah, well.

He'll just have to be an expectant mother with a smaller chest, and hope the fetus spirit doesn't notice—there's not really much else he can do on short notice.

(Besides ringing up Nan Feng or Fu Yao to ask them to lend spiritual power—but he'd be too embarrassed to explain.)

And the second issue at hand, of course, is his belly.

In that case, it doesn't matter what gender he's in—he'll have to rectify it.

He feels around the mistress's bedroom, eventually finding a small, round pillow, pushing it up under his skirt.

It takes a minute of shimmying and adjusting to get it in place, but once it's wedged under the bust area, situated over his ribs...

Xie Lian rubs his hands over it, testing.

It's not exactly the same shape as a pregnant woman's stomach—but it's certainly close enough.

Of course, the only problem is that Xie Lian has to keep one hand over the pillow to keep it in place—which he does, carefully waddling sideways as he crawls into the mistress's bed, pulling the blankets up over him.

It's early in the night to be going to sleep—and maybe it's a little optimistic to assume that the fetus spirit would strike again so soon—but Xie Lian would prefer to finish this quickly.

"..." The god sighs, laying on his back, his hands on his stomach. ...He isn't sleepy.

Xie Lian has a lot of skills. Forcing himself to sleep when he isn't actually tired isn't one of them.

Particularly because the more he thinks about how he needs to sleep, the more anxious he becomes, and then he's even more awake, and—

You get the picture.

And normally, when this happens, Xie Lian has one strategy:

"...Ruoye," he starts—then realizes that he left his spiritual device guarding the actual pregnant woman downstairs—and he sighs.

(Xie Lian usually talks himself to sleep.)

He could try talking to Fangxin—but he feels weird about that.

Xie Lian carried the blade for five centuries, before losing it to Lang Qianqiu, but...he never developed much of a bond with it.

It's hard to forget where it came from.

Instead, he pulls at the chain around his neck, twisting the ring between his fingers thoughtfully.

"Hong'er," he starts again, feeling a little silly.

He talks to him every single day, but the circumstances this time are a little strange.

"...You know, we never talked about it," he muses, stretching his legs out, sinking down into the mattress.

It's far more plush than what he's used to, though not as comfortable in the bed in Paradise Manor. Not Hua Cheng's bed, obviously. The one in the guest room.

Xie Lian didn't even get around to sleeping in it actually, which feels like a shame.

...Anyway.

"We never talked about it, and I...don't really know why we would have, actually—but I...always wanted to be a parent, when I was young." The prince explains quietly.

When he was little—not even ten years old, he would strong arm Feng Xin into playing pretend with him. And of course, being so young, with little exposure to anything but what they had been raised with, they couldn't conceive a parenting set other than a mother and a father.

Feng Xin would have done whatever Xie Lian told him to do—but watching him attempting to act motherly was a little too out of character, even for a seven year old's suspension of disbelief—so, Xie Lian always took that up for himself.

The Queen was confused, watching Xie Lian carrying around one of their puppies, swaddled in a blanket, and Feng Xin marching behind him—grumbling about the economy, and being up past his bedtime.

(In Feng Xin's mind, that was the epitome of fatherhood.)

When she eventually found out what they were doing, she thought it was hilarious. The king, however, found Xie Lian's willingness and seeming ease with pretending to be a mother... 'inappropriate.'

Which resulted in a very awkward, confusing discussion with his father.

With the king waxing on and on about how, one day, Xie Lian was going to have a wife. That she would be the mother of his children. And that Xie Lian would be a husband, and father.

These were the things that were expected of the prince, someday.

But that was always the key word: someday.

Even if Xie Lian didn't feel anything when he held a girl's hand—he told himself that he would, someday.

Whenever he tried to imagine himself with a wife, her having his children—it felt like someone else's future. Not his.

And as he got older...

It felt like there was something wrong with him.

Because he didn't understand why, as he was entering puberty, Xie Lian didn't want those things.

Xie Lian was supposed to want those things.

But he didn't.

And then, he started to feel...other things.

First, there was denial. Then, fear. A slow process of coming to terms with what had always been framed to him as an abnormality. A moral failing.

"...But when I got older, and I realized I was never going to love a woman in that way..." Xie Lian bites his lip. "It didn't feel right to pretend to love someone, just so I could have a family." Not just to the potential wife in that situation, but to the children too.

Children deserve to be raised by parents who love each other. Xie Lian was lucky—his own parents loved one another deeply

"So...I decided to be a cultivator," Xie Lian explains. "And that seemed...like I was giving something up, but I was getting something else."

Sure, he'd never marry or have children—but he'd be a god, instead. When he was a child, it seemed like a fair trade.

Now, however...

He remembers how it felt, holding Banyue some nights. Singing her to sleep, keeping her safe.

When Xie Lian was young, he was too immature himself to be much good with children. He was well intentioned—but he had to learn how to make himself a safe place for them.

It's one thing, to be able to protect someone. It's another to be able to make them feel protected. Like they have a solid foundation underneath their feet.

It wasn't until Banyue that he felt like he could actually give that to a child. That Xie Lian could actually...

And, well...remembering how he failed in that case, it doesn't make Xie Lian feel like he could actually succeed at that now.

Actually—when he considers the weight of the shackles on him now—all three of them —

Xie Lian doesn't even feel like he has the right to try.

His life has never been easy—that isn't likely to change any time soon.

And he doesn't have the right to drag a child into that.

"...I think you would have been good at it, though," he mumbles, turning his cheek into the pillow.

Back then, Xie Lian never imagined it.

Hong'er died so young...in many ways, Xie Lian didn't realize that the mortal had actually grown up.

Not until he was gone.

(Which was, in large part, why Xie Lian didn't come to terms with the fact that his feelings had started to become romantic until after he died.)

And now, it feels especially unfair, because there were so many things that Hong'er never got the chance to do.

To fall in love for the first time. To get married. Having children of his own. And he was so protective by instinct, so caring and gentle—

He would have been a natural. Xie Lian knows.

But when Xie Lian tries to picture the two of them, having children together—

He struggles with that part.

Not only because Xie Lian struggles with seeing himself as a parent, but…

That requires thinking of Hong'er in a context that feels somewhat disrespectful to the dead.

And when Xie Lian tries to picture any other possibility of someone he could envision himself having children with, the only thing that comes to his mind is…

"…" Suddenly, the god's cheeks become rather hot, and he shoves all thoughts of that out of his mind.

"…You…" he repeats himself, swallowing down the butterflies in his stomach. "You would have been pretty good at it."

The prince squeezes his eyes shut, biting his lip.

Instead of talking, he tries to opt for rubbing his hands over his faux-belly, humming a song his own mother used to sing to him when he was small.

That, paired with deep breaths, and the warmth of the ring against his chest, slowly makes his mind begin to drift…

He doesn't actually realize he's fallen asleep at first—not until he opens his eyes. Because when he does—he can see.

Xie Lian can only see clearly like this under two conditions:

First, when he's dreaming.

Second, when he's under the effect of an illusionary spell.

This is more than likely the latter. First, because Xie Lian has no memory of this place. He never saw anything like it, back when he had his sight—and it's completely different from the layout of the room he fell asleep in.

And second—

The shackle in his eye is hurting.

The pressure of the demonic energy in the room is enough to cause strain—but once his eyes adjust...

It’s very clearly the room of a young woman.

Flowers sitting in a vase by the vanity.

Fine dresses hung in the wardrobe.

And when Xie Lian glances towards the chest of drawers against the wall...it’s clear from the baby clothes inside that the woman who once lived here was expecting.

Which means...this is likely the room of the fetal spirit’s mother.

“...” Still clutching the pillow under his ribs, Xie Lian sits up, slipping out of bed as he walks through the room, examining it for any further clues.

(All the while, keeping an eye out for a black cloud of smoke.)

But he does catch sight of something...surprising.

A protection talisman.

Not only that—but one of Xie Lian’s protection talismans.

Unlike the one he gave Mr. Mo, just a few hours before...this one isn’t simple at all.

No, this one is expensive—intricately designed, just like they used to be, during...Xie Lian’s first ascension.

He lifts up the charm, startled, finding himself wondering...

...How old is this fetus spirit, anyway? Could it’s mother have actually been a woman from Xianle?

And if so—?

Then, there’s a sound— Giggling.

And this laughter...

...It's familiar.

Xie Lian is left standing there for a moment, wondering just where he could have heard it before, and then—it hits him.

‘New bride…New bride…’

It was that night. Back on Mount Yu Jun.

‘Smile not under the bridal veil…’

…This fetus spirit was the one singing back then?

Startling from his thoughts, a voice cries out—

“Mom!”

Xie Lian doesn’t answer, knowing that’s part of the trick.

“Mom, hug me!”

His mouth remains firmly shut, and in a way, he almost feels bad for the spirit.

After all—Xie Lian isn’t exactly actual prey.

If this spirit tried to crawl into his ‘womb,’ it would be in for a disappointing surprise.

“MOM!”

Still, Xie Lian doesn’t open his mouth—but he does notice something else—

The child’s voice…is coming from underneath his dress.

It would seem the fetus spirit—falling for Xie Lian’s little charade—snuck up under his robes. But instead of devouring his ‘unborn child,’ well…

It ended up with a mouth full of pillow stuffing, instead. “BLEGH!”

‘Well, that’s what you get,’ Xie Lian thinks to himself.

The illusion is already starting to flicker—Xie Lian’s vision beginning to go black with it—but just before it does, he catches sight of one other detail—

The bed he had been laying in, before… It’s absolutely soaked with blood.

He...

“MOM!” The child shrieks again.

Certain pieces of the mystery are certainly beginning to come together—but then, the illusion dissolves entirely, and Xie Lian is left in the darkened bedroom, eyeing the swirling cloud of black smoke as it flies out from beneath his dress.

But it doesn’t flee.

No—it thinks it’s been cheated out of a meal, and that, if it can get inside Xie Lian’s mouth, a baby will be waiting in his belly for it to devour.

(And, given the fact that Xie Lian’s closest brush with motherhood was a swaddled puppy—it’s going to be disappointed.)

But in the meantime—that gives Xie Lian the chance to wound and capture it.

It isn’t easy to pinpoint it. After all, catching sight of a black cloud when his vision is already dark isn’t easy. But he can catch faint glimpses of it, tracking it’s movements.

And when he steps forward—he feels something that catches him off guard. A sharp prick on his right foot.

It doesn’t hurt, of course—nothing ever does—but it goes pretty deep. Enough so to catch his attention.

A needle, left standing upright. Probably a trick to try and get Xie Lian to cry out, opening his mouth so the spirit can fly inside.

Well, the joke is on it—because Xie Lian hardly noticed it enough to even be aware of the needle’s existence.

Honestly, short of amputating the limb, it has little chance of getting the prince to cry out in pain.

In any case, Xie Lian takes that chance to strike out with Fangxin—and this time, he does manage to hit the cloud’s form a second time, earning a pained cry.

It begins to retreat again, like it did earlier in the day—but not towards the window, like Xie Lian expected, overlooking a small lake.

No—instead, it moves towards the doorway, where the other occupants of the house are waiting downstairs, many still awake.

Talking and laughing, their mouths wide open.

It's a surprisingly manipulative trick, for a spirit of this nature.

(To be expected, given that it's supposedly old enough for it's mother to have been from Xianle.)

XIe Lian is forced to make a quick decision:

"...THE SPIRIT IS HERE!" He shouts as loudly as he can. "COVER YOUR MOUTHS!"

As soon as he's said it, he shuts his own mouth tightly, but...

It's too late.

He can already feel cold air running down his throat, into his chest—

Meaning he has to act fast.

If it was as simple as forcing himself to vomit, that would be easy.

See, Xie Lian has accidentally eaten quite a few poisonous things in his day. He's turned the act of regurgitating into somewhat of a learned skill.

(As unpleasant as that skill might be.)

This is different.

This is something that absolutely doesn't want to come up—meaning he'll have to purge it out.

The god reaches into his sleeve, performing a few quick hand signs before pressing a protection talisman against his stomach—forcibly cleansing his body of evil.

Which ejects the spirit from him, sure—rather forcibly.

The result is Xie Lian gagging and coughing, his eyes pricking with tears as he stumbles away from the door, practically throwing the spirit up and out of him as he leans back against the window, thinking.

It’s going to keep on attacking him now—and at this rate, it’ll keep on using the humans downstairs as a means of manipulation, too…

Which means Xie Lian needs two things: to lure the spirit away from them—and to think.

The solution is impulsive, but rather straightforward.

To reach up behind him, pushing the window open, leaping up onto the ledge—and when Xie Lian hears the spirit whip around, he knows he has it’s attention.

Just in time for it to watch the prince leap out the window, crashing down into the lake below.

SPLASH!

It’s cold.

It’s the middle of autumn, after all—and as a result, the water is unpleasantly cool around him, jarring him the rest of the way out of his grogginess as the prince allows himself to drift down to the bottom of the lake, thinking.

He glances up, struggling to find the shape of the black cloud again—but Xie Lian knows it must be hovering over the lake, waiting for him to resurface.

In which case, when Xie Lian takes his first gasp of air, the spirit will jump right back into his stomach.

What a mess…

It’s rare to encounter a fetal spirit with this much resentment. Is it because of its age, or simply the violent nature of its demise? And why was it on Mount Yu Jun? Would Qi Rong know anything about it?

In any case, that just means Xie Lian has to capture it, but…

Without spiritual power, that’s easier said than done. If Xie Lian could just catch a hold of it, he could…

Then—it occurs to him.

The easiest way to catch it would just be giving it exactly what it wants. Let it jump in Xie Lian’s stomach.

He can just pierce it with fangxin immediately after.

It’s not a big deal for him to do that, anyway. Xie Lian knows he’ll heal from it—and he’s used to the feeling, as it is.

But, just as he comes to that conclusion…

SPLASH!

Something plunges into the lake with him.

…Did the fetus spirit actually jump into the water with him?! Xie Lian had assumed it would be too cautious to do that much, but before he can open his eyes to look for it’s aura—

A set of arms wrap around his waist…

Far stronger than that of a fetal spirit, and—

There’s something soft against Xie Lian’s lips.

Soft, but giving, and slightly cold.

And maybe it’s been a very long time, but—

The prince knows what someone else’s mouth feels like.

But…who…why…is it…?

Chapter End Notes

> you waited 500k words for...the SECOND kiss! And you'll see it in action next chapter. <3
>
> Also, if you look in the related works section of this fic, you'll see there is a new Ukrainian translation available. Only one chapter is up, and I do not know if the translator has internet connection at the moment due to current events, but if you want to go and leave some love on the translation, every gesture of support, big and small, can mean a lot to people who are going through dangerous times. To any readers who are currently being impacted, my heart is with you.
>
> Stay safe,
> Evie.

Haven

Chapter Summary

> Initially, all that comes to Xie Lian’s mind is a wave of confusion.
>
> Then, as the initial shock starts to lose its charm—it’s followed by a rush of indignation.
>
> Going from a simple—
>
> ‘Who is kissing me?’
>
> To—
>
> ‘WHO the is kissing ME?!’

Chapter Notes

See the end of the chapter for notes

Initially, all that comes to Xie Lian’s mind is a wave of confusion.

Then, as the initial shock starts to lose its charm—it’s followed by a rush of indignation.

Going from a simple—

‘Who is kissing me?’

To—

‘WHO the is kissing ME?!’

Flustered, he finds himself beginning to thrash, pushing against his captor’s shoulder, but the grip around his waist is like iron—even stronger than he is which—

Xie Lian’s never exactly been physically overpowered before.

Well actually, he has—but under far more unpleasant circumstances than this. And— honestly, it’s probably a fluke, he’s just surprised, he—!

The prince tries to twist his head, water flooding his mouth, making him choke as air bubbles pour out around him and—

There's a hand gripping his jaw firmly—startling the god to the point where he wrenches his eyelids open, cool water stinging against his flesh—

When Xie Lian sees the aura in front of him, he stops struggling. All around him, rather than endless darkness, is a sea of crimson. It—

It's Hua Cheng.

Hua Cheng is kissing him.

... Ba-bump.

What is he doing here—?

Just as he starts to wonder, the ghost king's thumb presses down firmly on his jaw, forcing the prince's mouth open.

Xie Lian's eyes practically bulge out of his head, his legs jerking, but—

When a cold stream of air is sent down his throat, soothing his burning throat and aching lungs, Xie Lian's confusion clears—and all that's left behind is absolute mortification.

O-Oh.

...Oh.

...It was just...

...Mouth to mouth...

And Xie Lian just...assumed...it was...

He's caught between two parallel trains of thought:

It's kind of hilarious that ghosts, who don't need to breathe, can give mouth to mouth resuscitation.

And;

'...Why did I assume he was kissing me? Why would he jump into a lake just to kiss me? ...Why would he kiss me at all?!'

And this doesn't necessarily compare to the other two kisses Xie Lian has had in his life, anyway.

The first was so horrific, violating, and traumatic—he refuses to count it. Refuses to even think about it.

The second was gentle, perfect, and laden with guilt. And this...

This isn't unpleasant. Not at all. And Xie Lian isn't frightened. How could he be? It's Hua Cheng, and—

And it isn't a kiss! Why is he caught up on that—?

In the middle of his panicked, disorganized thinking, Hua Cheng begins to swim for the surface, pulling Xie Lian with him.

When they break into the open air, Xie Lian leans back, expecting Hua Cheng to let him go, but—

The hand on his jaw locks in, holding him firmly in place—and Xie Lian is somewhat embarrassed of the high pitched, shocked sound that comes out of his mouth.

While he's left there, flailing like a fish, steam practically pouring out of his ears—

Hua Cheng's eye opens, narrowing in on the fetus spirit. Sharply focus on the task at hand.

Suddenly, through the haze of Hua Cheng's aura, Xie lian sees them—hundreds of Wraith butterflies.

Their wings as sharp as razor blades as they whip through the air, surrounding the spirit like a net, shrinking in as it screams in protest—throwing itself against them trying to escape—but unable to break free.

Xie Lian feels the hand on his jaw let go as Hu Cheng reaches into his pocket, pulling out a set of dice—but he's simply too stunned to try pulling away, half expecting to be stopped again.

Clack, clack!

The air around them shifts—and it's only when Hua Cheng starts pulling Xie Lian ashore that he understands the Ghost King's intentions—

He was stopping the fetus spirit from flying into Xie Lian's mouth again once they broke the surface, while still allowing him to breathe.

That being said, knowing all of that, he's still in a daze when they reach the shore—his mouth swollen and numb when their lips part, eyes wide.

Hua Cheng sets him down carefully, looking the prince over with a tense expression.

"...Your highness?"

Xie Lian remains perfectly still at first, eyes wide, his mouth hanging open.

"I...um..." he swallows thickly, all while Hua Cheng is staring at him rather expectantly. "I..."

(Part of Xie Lian desperately wishes to be as disconnected and uncaring as he was when he asked for a kiss from Wu Ming all those years ago.)

He has no idea how he did that now. Because—

That wasn't even a real kiss, and he still...

"...Thank you!" He blurts out suddenly.

Hua Cheng passed, his lips parted, and Xie Lian frantically explains—

"For the—air!" He croaks, pressing his hands against his face. "I...uh..."

"What—?"

"My hat!" He cries, feeling around on the ground. "Where did I—?"

He didn't lose it, did he?

"You still have it..."

What does he mean?! Xie Lian doesn't—!

...Oh.

Right.

It's hanging from a cord around his neck, sitting against his shoulders —like it always is.

The prince falls silent, clutching it between his hands, facing away from him.

"...Your—?"

"...It's cold..."

Hua Cheng falls silent, clearly taken off guard by Xie Lian's admission, the god's voice having become rather small, uncertain.

And of course—it's not surprising that Xie Lian would be cold. He just jumped into a lake—he's soaked to the bone.

What's surprising, in the end, is that Xie Lian admitted it.

Or that he's visibly shivering now.

Hua Cheng frowns, opening his mouth—

"...And I'm hungry!" Xie Lian mumbles, bobbing his head, like he's come to some sort of important inclusion. "So, I should just, um..."

Go somewhere else, and proceed to never think about the fact that he immediately assumed Hua Cheng kissing him was the most obvious reason for why the man would have jumped to the bottom of a lake ever again.

It seems like a solid plan.

"I'm just gonna go...get some...Oh!"

He tries to stand up, twists his foot around a rock in the process—and of course, Hua Cheng catches him before he falls to the ground—

(Which makes Xie Lian even more embarrassed, somehow.) —but in the process, he notices something else.

Blood trailing from Xie Lian's boot, onto the ground.

Naturally, the Ghost King reaches down, grasping him lightly by the calf as he examines the sole of Xie Lian's boot, and the prince feels somewhat lightheaded.

He forgot!

He'd been so focused on chasing after the fetus spirit, he'd forgotten about the needle in his foot.

“...What happened?”

Hua Cheng’s voice is calm when he asks, but there’s an undeniable tension in the air —

Like something’s upset him. Is that...Xie Lian’s fault?

“I...” The prince swallows thickly, trying to pull his leg back—but Hua Cheng shows no indication of letting him go—even if his grip is rather gentle. “I...stepped on something sharp,” he concludes.

“...” Hua Cheng falls silent, staring at the blood on the ground. Xie Lian can’t see it, but...

His expression is dark.

“...San L—?”

Before Xie Lian can ask, he feels himself being pulled forward by that grip on his leg, his heart suddenly kicking into overdrive.

“Wh—?”

And just like that—he’s scooped up in the calamity’s arms.

“W...What are you—?”

Xie Lian feels silent when he hears a din of voices, realizing what Hua Cheng must have been doing, when he was rolling the dice before.

He brought them to Ghost City.

Normally, Xie Lian isn’t easily embarrassed.

He’s been in plenty of humiliating situations before. He’s often the punchline of the joke.

But he’s never been carried down the street by a ghost king, soaked, wearing women’s clothing, with his lips swollen.

It’s that combination of factors that leads him to hide his face in Hua Cheng’s chest, his shoulders shrinking in.

“Say, say! Hua Chengzhu!” One of the ghosts crows. “Ya kidnapping someone?”

“Do you need any help??” Someone in the crowd offers. “We can tie them up for you —!”

The ghost king doesn’t seem particularly flattered by the offer—

“Get lost,” he growls, his arms tightening around the prince. Which leads Xie Lian to another question:

Why does Hua Cheng seem slightly older this time?

It’s barely noticeable—but still.

The last time Xie Lian saw him—that was his ‘true form,’ and it felt like he was in his early to mid twenties. Now—he feels mostly the same, but his voice is slightly rougher —and he isn’t exactly bigger than he was before—but there’s something more firm about him.

The ghosts part quickly after that, giving them quite a wide berth—but some of them whisper the same question under their breath—

‘Is that the lady that was looking for him before?’

Xie Lian’s cheeks might just spark into flames at this point.

‘The night Paradise Manor caught on fire?’

‘...But wasn’t that just the prince in disguise?!’

Xie Lian let’s out a soft groan of mortification, and Hua Cheng’s lips twitch. Even in his displeasure, he’s slightly amused.

“What’s wrong, your highness?”

“...People are going to start thinking I have strange habits,” he mumbles, somewhat pathetically.

“And so what if you did?” The ghost king shrugs, but Xie Lian remains quiet—not seeming particularly comforted. “...Dianxia thinks highly of the wind master.”

“That’s different.”

Xie Lian feels somewhat like a sulking child—and Hua Cheng smiles.

“What about me, then?”

It takes Xie Lian a moment to understand what the Ghost King is getting at—at first, he’s too distracted by the fact that Hua Cheng’s voice—

It’s changed.

The calamity’s arms feel somewhat slimmer around him too—but just as strong, and —

Before, Hua Cheng’s chest was firm, and now...

Xie Lian lifts his head quickly, actually finding himself dizzy with embarrassment.

“I’m sorry!” He chokes, only for Hua Cheng to throw her head back with a soft laugh.

“For what?”

She’s still rather tall, which Xie Lian finds surprising—though maybe he shouldn’t— and the prince doesn’t know why he’s reacting like this.

He’s never been affected by a woman’s presence before, not even remotely, and now— Xie Lian realizes something else.

‘Say, gege—these are really nice.’

“...That was you?!” He gasps, clapping a hand over his mouth.

Hua Cheng’s smile is half mischievous, half sheepish.

“I thought dianxia might insist on not letting me buy something.”

Well—she’s right. And Hua Cheng has already approached him in his older and younger forms—so switching into that of a young lady was actually rather clever—

Because Xie Lian never would have guessed.

“...You overpaid,” Xie Lian mumbles meekly, staring up into her face (and even though he can’t see it, he presumes she must be beautiful.)

Hua Cheng’s lips, painted the color of blood, curve into a soft smile.

“I could never,” she murmurs.

And there’s something else strange about this—

Hua Cheng just turned into a woman in the middle of the street, surrounded by other ghosts—and no one has said a word.

Not even out of politeness, fear, or respect—they just don't seem to find it particularly shocking.

"...Do you...do this very often?" Xie Lian questions, pressing his hands against his cheeks—trying to use the coolness of his skin to calm them down.

"I change form so often, nothing surprises them anymore," The ghost king drawls, then pauses. "Well, I suppose the dragon did."

"A—a dragon?" Xie Lian mumbles, unable to hide the shock from his voice—and Hua Cheng shrugs that off, her arms holding him a little more firmly as she ascends the steps to paradise manor, heels clicking quietly.

Ironically enough, her clothes are still that of a man. They must make quite the pair.

A man, wearing women's clothing, makeup, with his hair done—being carried by a woman in a man's clothes.

"Oh, that was centuries ago. I rarely have a fight that interesting." Xie Lian struggles to conceive a battle that might challenge her.

"...I didn't know you could change your appearance so drastically," He admits, swallowing dryly.

Hua Cheng seems to take mercy on him then, shifting back into the form he originally appeared in—his voice—and chest—returning back to that of a man's.

Xie Lian also realizes, now that he's back to normal—Hua Cheng's height didn't change at all.

Xie Lian has never encountered a woman that tall before. And, while he has no idea why—trying to imagine it makes his face hot.

"All powerful ghosts are shape shifters, your highness."

"Does...Blackwater change his appearance as often as you?"

"...He rarely wears his own face," Hua Cheng replies carefully. "But he doesn't use as many different forms as me."

No one does.

“Doesn’t it ever feel…strange? Seeing your own face so rarely?”

Hua Cheng shrugs, his expression becoming distant.

“…I’ve never felt particularly attached to it,” he mutters.

And why should he, when the only person he’s ever cared about showing himself to… can’t see it?

“…” Xie Lian frowns, reaching up to press his palm against the Ghost King’s cheek without thinking.

His skin is soft—but the jaw lying beneath is sharp.

Hua Cheng falls silent—watching him intently, his footsteps stopping, and Xie Lian…

Slowly lowers his hand, looking away.

“…That’s a shame,” the god mutters, slowly—cautiously—leaning his head back against Hua Cheng’s chest.

He thinks the ghost king’s face is in no need of any false skins or disguises. He’s already perfect, just as he is.

Hua Cheng’s gaze softens.

“I’m glad dianxia thinks so.”

As he’s carried through the halls of Paradise Manor, Xie Lian almost asks Hua Cheng to put him down, but…

When he remembers the Sinner’s Pit, that seems like a somewhat futile request. Hua Cheng will put him down when he’s ready, not before.

So, instead…

“…Can you change your form into anything you want?” Xie Lian questions, feeling sorry for the water dripping from his clothes, leaving a wet trail on the floor—but Hua Cheng doesn’t seem to mind.

“To the limits of my own imagination,” Hua Cheng shrugs.

“Can Blackwater do the same?”

The calamity quirks an eyebrow. “You seem pretty curious about him.”

Whenever he asks if Hua Cheng can do something—the question ‘can Blackwater do it too?’ Always seems to follow.

Xie Lian pauses, having only just realized he was doing that.

“...Well...he’s the only other ghost king,” Xie Lian explains. “I suppose I was just wondering if some talents were exclusive to calamities, or...”

Well, come to think of it—Ren Song can shape shift as well, and he’s only a savage ranked ghost.

Not as frequently or with the same level of ease as Hua Cheng—but he can.

“...We each have our own talents,” the calamity shrugs, and instead of offering up any information about Blackwater, he adds—

“I’m better at changing my shape than him.”

Xie Lian bites back a smile, his face pressed against Hua Cheng’s robes. “Oh?”

Hua Cheng doesn’t expand on it further.

Personally, he finds He Xuan’s female form unconvincing, and more oriented around what Blackwater himself likes in a woman, rather than something believable. After all—disguises aren’t meant to be designed around what you’re attracted to. It’s more about what others want to see, getting what you want out of them.

He’d never considered showing his female form to his god before—only intending to make Xie Lian less self conscious.

...But that reaction wasn’t bad.

“He almost always remains in a human form, anyway.” Hua Cheng shrugs. “That isn’t difficult.”

“But you don’t?”

“When I want to go unnoticed? It’s rare that I pose as a human.”

It’s the simplest means of hiding in plain sight.

He Xuan prefers digging into things, ingratiating himself in the lives of his targets, getting to know them inside and out.

Hua Cheng has always found getting that close to be a double edged blade. He'd much rather be a cat, listening as he lazes on a street corner instead.

Or a fox, hiding beneath the bushes as travelers walk by. A hawk, sitting on the roof eaves overhead.

Part of the background—but rarely an active participant.

Of course, those aren't the only reasons he'll take an inhuman form—he's done such things in battle before.

Actually—during his early days in Mount Tonglu, before he became completely accustomed to fighting with E'Ming, he often opted to simply change into the form of a beast, tearing his enemies apart with claws and fangs.

As a wolf, a tiger, and the like.

Xie Lian is curious—simply because he's never heard of anything like that before, but...

There's the sound of a door swinging open as he's carried into a private room, then the sound of it sliding shut behind them.

Hua Cheng pauses briefly, considering. "...San Lang?"

Finally, the prince feels himself being set down—this time upon a cushioned stool. (Hua Cheng doesn't seem keen on the idea of allowing him to walk or stand just yet.)

Before Xie Lian can question what they're doing—or why they're here—something is placed into his hands.

...Clothes.

A changing screen appears between them rather suddenly—and even still, Hua Cheng turns around, crossing his arms.

"Wh—?"

"You're cold."

Xie Lian holds the garments between his hands, his heart warming slightly in his chest.

Always so thoughtful and considerate.

Honestly—Xie Lian is cold, but not enough to be truly bothered by it. He only blurted that out beside the lake, because…well, he hadn't known what else to say.

Still, he's grateful.

The act of peeling off his wet dress is slightly difficult on his own—which no doubt occurred to Hua Cheng, but when warring with the need to be helpful and the desire to be respectful, he seemed to submit to the latter.

But, for once, thinking of how intent Hua Cheng was that Xie Lian not aggravate his foot any further…

…The prince is actually careful with one of his own injuries, not wanting to waste the ghost king's efforts.

He leans against the stool when he slips out of the dress, wincing when it lands on the floor with a wet thud—feeling sorry for the mess, but Hua Cheng genuinely doesn't seem to care…

He hops on his good foot to step out of it, using the stool for support—and a towel awaits.

Xie Lian's skin is mostly just damp at this point—but he still uses it to pat the remaining moisture from his limbs and stomach, squeezing it out of his hair as best as he can.

Unlike his last visit—these clothes don't fit perfectly.

The sleeves and pant legs are overlong, and wide in the shoulders.

In short, they're too big. Which is surprising, since Hua Cheng's clothes for guests had been perfectly fitted before, and Xie Lian had assumed the size magically adjusted to the wearer, but—

Sensing the prince's confusion, Hua Cheng frowns, seeming somewhat torn.

"I'll have something more suitable brought for his highness. But it seemed like anything would be preferable to wet clothes."

Meaning—

Oh.

Hua Cheng, in a hurry, probably just gave Xie Lian...his own clothes.

“It...um...” Xie Lian swallows hard, his fingers suddenly unsteady as he tries to work the belt on the pants, which seem to slip down each time he tries to lean over to cuff the legs. “I...I see...”

“...Have I offended dianxia?” The calamity questions, concerned.

“No!”

Now, Xie Lian is silently cursing his eating habits.

He used to feel an odd level of pride in how little food he could live off of, considering it ‘economical.’ Now, struggling to keep another man’s pants up over his hips...

...Maybe he really should eat more...

...If only to avoid situations like this...

To be fair, they don’t fall down completely. But they won’t sit over his waist—the decent place for them to be—rather falling past his hips, only to be caught by the wider area of his thighs and backside, which even now, are still...

...The point is, they don’t sit at an appropriate place on his body, no matter how much he tightens the strings at the waist, and even still, they’re long enough that his feet just won’t...

Xie Lian’s face is hot, feeling the cool air against his hips and navel.

...This isn’t decent, not decent at all...

“S...San Lang doesn’t need to worry about that,” he mumbles, fumbling for the rest of the inner robes. “I can just make something for myself, after this...and give these back, of course!” He adds frantically, feeling silly.

It’s not like Hua Cheng would have been worried about Xie Lian stealing them. What is he thinking?

“Dianxia doesn’t have to—”

“I-I know!” He agrees, finding the rest of the inner robes less of a headache. “I just like making my own, if that’s alright!”

They're too long, yes—and they keep slipping off of one shoulder—but he's not fighting to keep them on his body. And with the heavier outer robes overtop of it— he's very warm, at least.

Part of him contemplates forgoing the pants underneath entirely, given how long the outer robes are, it's not like anyone would really be able to tell, and it would be easier to walk, but…

Xie Lian hasn't ever been in a state of undress around…well…

Pretty much anyone, aside from Mu Qing—and that was different. It was perfectly businesslike, and it was something they did every day and every night. Part of the routine.

This isn't like that, and he…well…

Xie Lian keeps the pants on, awkward as holding them up might be.

Once he's finished, he grasps the edge of the stool, hopping on one foot (feeling somewhat ridiculous, but trying to be respectful of Hua Cheng's concern) to move back around the changing screen, but…

The minute the ghost king realizes Xie Lian is decent, he's picked back up.

And when he's set back down again, Xie Lian realizes he's been set at the foot of a bed.

A very comfortable one, giving gently under his weight, silk sheets beneath his palms.

And Hua Cheng wastes no time kneeling in front of him, making Xie Lian stiffen once again.

"Wh—?"

Then, when long, cool fingers envelop the prince's ankle—Xie Lian lets out a surprised yelp, his eyes widening.

"S-San Lang—?!"

He jerks slightly with protest, but Hua Cheng holds him firmly, lifting his foot up for inspection.

"Apologies, your highness…" He murmurs.

Xie Lian tilts his chin back, feeling slightly lightheaded—

And suddenly, desperately relieved that he didn't choose to forgo the pants, because that would have left Hua Cheng right in the middle of his...uh...

"This might be uncomfortable."

Xie Lian is caught between two different spheres of thought.

First: Hua Cheng's fingers easily wrap all the way around the bones of his ankle, overlapping in places. Xie Lian has no idea why, but there's something exceedingly distracting about that fact.

Second...

"...W...What are you going to—?"

Then, the answer becomes clear.

Hua Cheng's fingers hover over the arch of his foot, claws slightly extended, using them for the careful precision required to draw the needle out of his foot.

T...the...

Xie Lian smacks a hand over his mouth so hard, he inadvertently slaps himself, falling backwards, his shoulders bouncing slightly when they hit the bed.

Hua Cheng doesn't let go—but his voice is filled with concern. "Is it too painful?"

"..."

Xie Lian swallows thickly, shaking his head.

"...No..." He croaks between his fingers, his voice cracking slightly—but not from pain. "It...doesn't hurt..."

(In truth, he was so startled when he felt Hua Cheng's claw against his foot—he couldn't help but thrash slightly.)

"..." Hua Cheng frowns, his gaze filled with concern—but he draws the needle the rest of the way out. It hovers above the ghost king's palm for a moment, sparking with dark energy—and he glares.

"...That's a nasty spirit you were hunting," he mutters. "The poison was potent."

Oh, was it poisoned? That explains why Xie Lian's foot went somewhat numb, after. He had just assumed it was because of the cold from the—

Something else presses against the arch of his foot now. Soft, gentle. It's—

Xie Lian's eyes snap wide open.

He just—

The prince sucks in a startled gasp, his leg jerking. "S-San Lang—!"

The Ghost King leans back, letting his ankle go. "There," he murmurs, rising to his feet. "Better?"

Xie Lian is frozen in place, his hands covering his face. "..."

Right.

...Right.

Xie Lian's mind races back to the tunnel, after Hua Cheng swept him away from the heavens.

That—

That was medical, just healing Xie Lian's arm faster than he could have otherwise.

...The prince wiggles his toes cautiously, hearing an affectionate snort in the background.

Regardless—his foot isn't numb anymore, and feels relatively back to normal, so...

Hua Cheng was just being helpful.

Xie Lian swallows thickly, clearing his throat.

"...It's...It's much better, San Lang..." He mumbles, waiting for the heat in his face to go down. "...Thank you..."

"You're very welcome, dianxia." The ghost king replies easily—then pauses with a slight frown. "...Excuse me for just one moment—I'll be right back."

"…Is something wrong?"

"No," Hua Cheng quickly assures him. "Just an insignificant matter, rest a minute."

Xie Lian falls silent, listening as the door opens and shuts once more, still laying back on top of the bed. It must be massive, just from the feel of it. Far more so than the guest bed he was placed in before.

As a matter of fact, the entire room is larger.

Not that the space Hua Cheng placed Xie Lian in before was drab or small at all—it certainly wasn't.

But this room has several adjoining areas. A slightly more…lived in feel. And when Xie Lian places his hand on the bedside cabinet—there are reports under his fingertips.

Xie Lian immediately shrinks his hand back up on feeling them.

He's already snuck through Hua Cheng's things before once—he doesn't want to violate the ghost king's trust like that again. Especially not without good reason, but…

…Is this…

…Is this Hua Cheng's bedroom?

That seems like the most logical conclusion…which means…

…Xie Lian is in Hua Cheng's bedroom…wearing his clothes…in…

His fingers bunch up in the sheets underneath him, his heart skipping a beat.

…In Hua Cheng's bed.

Which—that shouldn't be a big deal.

They've shared a bed before, in Puqi shrine. For several nights, in fact.

But…that was before…and…

…They never wore each other's clothes…or…healed one another's injured feet, with their…In Xie Lian's…

He rolls over onto his side, pulling his feet up against his chest. He's never been in a situation like this before. He doesn't know...

Only a few minutes after leaving, the door opens again—and Xie Lian sits straight up, damp hair slightly askew.

"S-San Lang—was everything alright?" He mumbles, trying his best to sound... unaffected by everything

"Oh," The Ghost King leans against the doorframe, one eye fixed on the sight of the crown prince. "It was fine. Some fool was in the gambler's den, causing a fuss."

"...A fuss?" Xie Lian's eyebrows raise.

"Insisting on a meeting with me," Hua Cheng shrugs. "Very annoying."

But Hua Cheng obviously came back instead of dealing with him, so...

Xie Lian frowns, feeling somewhat...guilty.

"I don't want to get in the way of your business..." He mutters, fiddling with his hair— which is slightly tangled now—and Hua Cheng shakes his head.

"No."

Xie Lian glances up, startled—and the calamity explains:

"I didn't want to deal with him. Dianxia hasn't done anything but give me something better to do. He can wait."

Xie Lian's lips twitch up from their frown, reluctantly soothed. "For how long?"

Hua Cheng shrugs.

"Until I feel like it."

That's fair—after all, it's his territory. And for someone to approach the gambler's den of all things, demanding an audience with Hua Cheng...

Thinking of that—Xie Lian realizes something.

Or, more like—he remembers something—and his brow creases.

Hua Cheng is quick to notice the change in the prince's expression, tilting his head. "...Is something wrong?"

"No," Xie Lian mutters, shaking his head. "No, it's just..."

"Just...?"

"..." His frown deepens as he struggles to formulate his question.

"...San Lang..."

"...Yes?"

"Before, ah...In the water..." Xie Lian squeezes his eyes shut, forcing himself to just spit the words out—

"You were just trying to help me, right? Making sure the fetus spirit wouldn't..."

The Ghost King stiffens, his expression suddenly guarded—and that tension is back. "...if your highness already thinks so, why ask?"

"Well..." Xie Lian swallows hard. "Technically speaking...I still owe you one."

Hua Cheng's eyebrows raise sharply.

"From when I lost back then. And I wasn't sure if that was...well..."

Slowly, as he recovers from the shock...

...The ghost king smiles.

"I wouldn't want to presume what his highness would count as a kiss."

Xie Lian pauses, his expression slightly vexed as Hua Cheng's eye flashes.

"Does dianxia think it counts?"

"..."

Xie Lian swallows—

No, he gulps.

"I...don't...I'm not really..."

He’s practically squirming, trying to wrap his mind around the correct answer.

“I don’t really have enough experience to…”

Somehow, Hua Cheng’s eyebrows raise even higher.

“But his highness has kissed someone before, he told this San Lang.”

“…”

…Heavens, he did say that…

Hua Cheng’s lips quirk up into a smile so wide, so amused, it’s almost painful.

(It’s moments like this when he’s glad he doesn’t have to manage his expressions around the prince.)

“…With a man,” he adds innocently, just as Xie Lian had in the gambler’s den, weeks before.

Xie Lian’s pallor is rapidly beginning to resemble that of a tomato.

“San Lang!” He chokes, burying his face in his hands. “You’re making fun of me—I’m being serious!”

“So am I,” Hua Cheng presses a hand over his heart, eyes wide. “I’m referring to gege’s expertise.”

…It’s the first time he’s called Xie Lian gege since they reunited, and that alone eases the god’s anxiety somewhat.

(He really was worried that Hua Cheng was upset with him, but too polite to say so.) “…Hua Cheng almost certainly has more experience than me,” he mutters.

The ghost king doesn’t seem particularly embarrassed either way. “What makes gege so certain?”

“Um…” Xie Lian glances in his direction, then looks away, staring down at the bed blindly. “I don’t know…just…um…a feeling…”

Hua Cheng tilts his head to the side, seeming content to watch him flail.

“I…ah…” Xie Lian bows his head, feeling somewhat pitiful. “San Lang…you do have experience, yes?”

After a pause, Hua Cheng finally takes mercy on him.

“I do, dianxia.”

“Then…you know…”

Hua Cheng twists at the end of his braid lightly, rolling something between his fingertips.

“My intention was to protect gege from the fetus spirit,” he explains, watching Xie Lian’s expression. “That…isn’t the way I kiss a person.”

For those who would like to continue reading on twitter, you can start from HERE.

Chapter End Notes

see you next chapter <3

xoxo,
Evie

A Settled Debt

Chapter Summary

> “I don’t think it counts.”
>
> Hua Cheng stops, biting back a smile as his eyebrows raise. “Oh?”
>
> Xie Lian shakes his head, refusing to look up—even if he couldn’t make eye contact with Hua Cheng anyway.
>
> “It’s all about...intention, right?”

Xie Lian pauses, eyes wide.

“But, if gege thinks it counts...”

“I don’t think it counts.”

Hua Cheng stops, biting back a smile as his eyebrows raise. “Oh?”

Xie Lian shakes his head, refusing to look up—even if he couldn’t make eye contact with Hua Cheng anyway.

“It’s all about...intention, right?”

“...I agree,” The ghost king agrees, and Xie Lian could practically cry with relief, but... “...Still, I won’t collect the debt unless gege says it’s alright.”

The prince desperately wishes the ghost king would stop putting the ball so firmly on his side of the court.

It...

Xie Lian feels...awkward...he just...

He doesn’t know whether to laugh, or cry.

He clears his throat, lifting his chin. “It’s fine!”

Hua Cheng watches him closely.

“I already told San Lang back then...I’m really...”

The mattress sinks slightly in front of him, and Xie Lian gulps.

It's really fine.

It's better this way, actually.

He'll feel better, when he doesn't have this hanging over his—

Cold fingertips brush over his cheek, delicately pushing a lock of hair behind the prince's ear.

Such a small, gentle touch. The god shivers.

Those fingers drift down, ever so carefully. Caressing the shape of his jaw, before finally grasping his chin.

He's close, he must be—and when he speaks, the sound of his voice is a confirmation, making Xie Lian jump slightly, surprised.

"You're sure?"

Xie Lian feels like his heart is in his throat, and he's fighting to swallow it down. "Yes," he whispers, trying to sound more firm than he feels. "Yes, I—"

His voice cuts off with a surprised sound as lips press against his jaw, drifting higher in such a gentle, familiar way.

Just like...

The fingers on his chin grasp him slightly more firmly, and Xie Lian's breath hitches.

Like...

Then, those lips are on his, and there's no thinking at all.

No shyness. No anxiety or second guessing.

Just the gentle press of another mouth against his own.

It is different.

Not only because it isn't so sudden, forcing Xie Lian's mouth open so he can push air down his throat, but—

Because Xie Lian saw it coming.

Because the prince reaffirmed it, each step of the way before he felt

Hua Cheng's lips on his.

And each time he died that—

It built anticipation. To the point where he was silently wondering what it would feel like. Aching. Wishing he would just get it over with, and now—

Now, Hua Cheng's lower lip slides between his, and it's like Xie Lian can't breathe. Xie Lian hasn't been kissed very many times in his life.

The first—he refuses to think about. Refuses to count.

The second was perfect, but his motivations were wrong.

(After all, Xie Lian had simply wanted to reclaim his first kiss as his own.) But this—this is different.

Because it was entirely up to him. And in the end, he could have easily saved face and said that the mouth to mouth counted, but—

'That isn't the way I kiss someone.'

That made Xie Lian...curious. Because...

...How did Hua Cheng kiss someone?

The answer is...

Sweetly.

Slowly, and...Intimately.

His hand cups the back of Xie Lian's neck again, stroking gently, holding him in place.

The prince can't resist another shiver. But it doesn't stay that way.

Eventually, the ghost king moves like he's about to lean back, and Xie Lian's stomach sinks.

Already? But—

Then, Xie Lian realizes it's probably because he hasn't done more than sit limply in Hua Cheng's hold, and—

The prince's arms lift up from where they've been stiff as a board, braced behind him on the bed—instead wrapping around the Ghost King's neck.

And he's struck again by a familiar thought. Bittersweet, swelling in his chest: Just a little longer.

He mumbles those words—not even realizing it, or meaning to—and Hua Cheng's hand tightens on the back of his neck.

Just...a little bit longer.

Hua Cheng is frozen for a moment, his mind far away. Thoughts so far beyond the prince's imagining, he couldn't even guess.

But he does as his god wishes.

The hand on the back of Xie Lian's neck slides up into his hair, cradling the base of his skull, guiding him to tilt his head further back.

When he does, their lips part—and the kiss deepens.

Xie Lian takes a shuddering breath, his eyelashes fluttering.

Oh.

It's alien at first, tasting someone else for the first time. And Xie Lian realizes—

Hua Cheng must have had something to drink, when he went to check on the gambler's den—there's a faint hint of whiskey. Not unpleasant—just—

...It feels odd, describing someone that way, but Hua Cheng...

...He tastes expensive.

And Xie Lian can't help but chase it, his arms tightening around the ghost king's neck, pulling himself closer, and closer, until...

They tip backwards.

Whether it was because Xie Lian forgot his own strength, or because Hua Cheng simply wasn't expecting the prince to pull on him so tightly, it's hard to say.

Either way, he catches himself with one hand on the bed, braced next to Xie Lian's head.

His other arm is around the prince's waist, and his knee...

Well, to keep himself properly lifted away from Xie Lian's body, it's braced against the bed...between the god's thighs.

This...

Xie Lian's hands flutter unsurely, grasping at his shoulders, clutching onto him.

It's so...

There's something about the feeling of Hua Cheng's form hovering over him, practically enveloping him. His arm around him. His mouth on Xie Lian's—

Having someone on top of him.

There's something about it that flips a switch in the prince's mind.

And it shifts his focus.

Before, he was really only thinking about curiosity. Wondering what Hua Cheng meant. And, of course, what his intentions were, pulling him out of that lake.

Right now, Xie Lian isn't thinking about curiosity. He isn't thinking about what Hua Cheng meant

He isn't thinking about wagers, debts, or anything like that. He isn't thinking about the fetal spirit—or even his original task, buying food for the shrine.

All he's thinking of, at that moment—is that he does not want Hua Cheng to stop.

If he does, Xie Lian might die.

Just then, the ghost king gives his lower lip a gentle suck—and Xie Lian feels his soul float away from him, drifting somewhere in the rafters, aimless.

The sound that rips out of the back of his throat is quiet, and— Weird.

Xie Lian's never made a sound like that before.

But it pulls a reaction out of Hua Cheng, because—

He growls.

Xie Lian's heard him do that before. Always at other people, and mostly when he was angry.

But he certainly doesn't seem angry right now, and—

There's a difference between hearing Hua Cheng growl at someone else, and feeling Hua Cheng growling against his lips.

It goes straight into him, reverberating straight down to the bone, settling in the pit of the prince's stomach until it does backflips, and he...

Xie Lian finds himself melting under every touch, completely pliant, his fingers loosely gripping the ghost king's robes—and he wonders;

...What happens if they don't stop? What happens then?

Does Hua Cheng keep kissing him until he simply can't anymore? What comes after that?

Tragically, Xie Lian doesn't think about it further than that—doesn't get the chance to —because Hua Cheng pulls back.

The first time their lips part, he's panting for air, shivering all over—just to find his mouth covered once more by one last kiss, this one chaste and sweet.

Xie Lian's eyes blink open, staring ahead blankly—lips parted and swollen, his face flushed—and Hua Cheng whispers something to him, such a simple question, but it takes Xie Lian's brain a moment to catch up—

"Are you still cold, gege?"

He—Oh—

"...N...no," the prince whispers.

The calamity smiles softly, leaning up to press another kiss against his god's forehead —taking advantage of the fact that Xie Lian is far too dazed to take much note of it.

"Dianxia wasn't lying before..." He murmurs, sitting up. Xie Lian blinks hazily. "A...about what?"

Hua Cheng's smile hasn't faded as he leans back, carefully pushing Xie Lian's hair from his face.

"Gege really does have experience—I was barely keeping up."

"..." The prince throws an arm over his face with a sheepish groan. "San Lang, don't tease me."

"I wouldn't dare."

Oh, but he would.

Still—

Xie Lian can't really seem to bring himself to mind.

So—that's what it's like, when Hua Cheng intends to kiss someone. It's... Xie Lian doesn't lift his arm from his face, biting his lip.

"...gege?" Hua Cheng questions, and Xie Lian—

"...I'm hungry," he mumbles, his voice unsteady.

Hua Cheng stares at him for a moment, stunned—and that was exactly what Xie Lian said before, when he pulled him ashore.

The prince hears the ghost let out a soft laugh, and he bites his lip.

"I really am, this time!"

"Alright, alright..." Hua Cheng shakes his head, still chuckling as he leans back.

Xie Lian half expects the calamity to insist on having an entire feast laid out again— but instead, Hua Cheng simply has several plates brought directly to his room.

By the same officer Xie Lian saw during his first visit to ghost city—the one Ren Song called the "Waning Moon officer."

Xie Lian takes a bite of mantou, chewing thoughtfully.

Hua Cheng watches a bare sliver of shoulder before the prince seems to notice his outer robe is slipping down again, adjusting it.

"...So, these are the snacks," he mumbles, swallowing another bite.

Hua Cheng arches an eyebrow, intrigued. “Hmm?”

“Well...” The god smiles. “Ren Song said he has a place of his own—but that the waning moon officer isn’t there,” he explains, chewing carefully. “And he makes his snacks.”

“...” The ghost king snorts, shaking his head. “Gege’s guess is correct, as usual. Has he been causing you any trouble?”

“Who?” Xie Lian blinks. “Ren Song? No...” He shakes his head. “He’s actually been very helpful.”

Hua Cheng raises an eyebrow. “Has he?”

“Mmhm...” The prince hums, popping a slice of pear into his mouth. “...He built me an attic.”

“How generous.”

“He’s a very generous person...” Xie Lian mumbles, repeating Shuo’s words.

Hua Cheng might have had several plates brought, but Xie Lian only eats one mantou, along with half of a pear before he leans back, full.

Part of him can’t help but wonder if he’s supposed to feel... Different. Given what they just did.

But...

Hua Cheng is behaving normally. He doesn’t seem bothered, so...

...Why should he?

After all—that was just...squaring a gambling debt. Obviously.

Still, there’s a relaxed air between them. A sense of ease that Xie Lian...isn’t used to.

Even when Hua Cheng carries the plates off, and Xie Lian expects him to return and discuss the fetal spirit, but...

Instead, the ghost king sits on the bed behind him, a comb in hand...And he begins to brush Xie Lian’s hair.

The prince pauses, startled, because...

He really can't remember the last time someone did that for him. Mu Qing did, when he was posing as a bride—but those circumstances were so different.

"Oh, San Lang—you don't have to—"

"I want to." Hua Cheng shakes his head.

"After all, it was my fault gege got soaked..."

Xie Lian frowns at the implication—but leans back into the comb nonetheless. "I was the one who jumped in a lake, San Lang..."

"Yes," he agrees with a hum, delicately working at the ends of Xie Lian's hair.

"But I should have intervened before it reached that point."

Xie Lian opens his mouth to argue, because it certainly wasn't Hua Cheng's responsibility to deal with that—and how could he have? But...

He was already in the area.

'Say, gege...'

(Suddenly, his ears are hot.)

And if Xie Lian had been nearby, and a friend had been in a difficult situation...well, he would have felt guilty about it too. So, he can't completely fault Hua Cheng for that.

Still.

"Well...you did help me, though," Xie Lian mumbles.

"Besides, I've been in more difficult situations than that—and I had a plan for dealing with the spirit, so..."

"I imagine you did." Hua Cheng agrees, his voice...distinctly disapproving. Xie Lian sits a little straighter, staring straight ahead innocently, but...

"...Did that plan have anything to do with hurting yourself while the fetal spirit was trapped inside of you?"

Xie Lian's silence is equivalent to an admission, and Hua Cheng sighs deeply.

“Dianxia.”

The prince remains quiet, his lips pressing into a thin line.

“...You shouldn’t harm yourself unnecessarily,” the ghost king mutters, staring down at his fingers as they work through his god’s hair, silently self loathing.

Still, Xie Lian doesn’t respond, his shoulders hunched.

Hua Cheng stares at his back. How slumped and vulnerable Xie Lian looks at this moment.

“...What are you thinking about?”

Oddly enough—

No one has ever asked Xie Lian that before, and it leaves him feeling...

Almost self conscious.

“...You don’t want to know, San Lang.”

No one ever really wants to know what Xie Lian is actually thinking.

Even in the very beginning, when he had everything—people only wanted him to say what they wanted to hear. The uglier things—those went unsaid.

And aside from that—

No one wants to listen to Xie Lian anymore.

“...What makes you think I don’t, your highness?”

His voice is gentle, his eye focused on the task at hand, even if he occasionally sneaks glances at Xie Lian’s posture.

Still so tense and guarded.

“...It isn’t exactly...a pleasant topic,” the god mutters.

Hua Cheng is quiet for a moment, and at first—Xie Lian thinks he might have successfully steered him away from the subject. But...

“...I’m sure you’ve heard things...about how ghost kings are born.”

From Jun Wu, yes.

About the incredible level of pain and torment it takes.

“Do you really think there’s a subject too unpleasant for me?”

No, he supposes not.

And there’s something…oddly comforting about that.

Xie Lian’s most painful memories are his, and his alone. There is no one left alive to share them with.

No one that could…understand.

“…During the festival,” Xie Lian’s expression is hidden from view like this—and his voice is low, calm. “Did you…hear about the plays that took place in the Heavens?”

There’s a pause before the Ghost King answers.

Xie Lian doesn’t doubt that he knows.

Hua Cheng has spies in the heavens—Jun Wu told him as much.

“I did.”

“And did you…hear about mine?” The god asks quietly.

“…Yes.”

Xie Lian couldn’t stand to admit it to Shi Qingxuan, Feng Xin, or Mu Qing, but…

“…That really did happen.”

With Hua Cheng…it comes easily.

The ghost king doesn’t react strongly, like he’s surprised—if anything, he just sounds…

“…Is dianxia trying to say…compared to that, being stabbed is nothing?”

Hua Cheng sounds just as guarded as Xie Lian feels, but the prince doesn’t know why. “No, I mean…yes, but…”

Xie Lian closes his eyes, biting his lip—his hands balling up into fists in his laps.

“…Nothing hurt, after that. Not even when I tried to…”

“Tried to what?”

Xie Lian swallows hard.

“When I tried to die.”

It feels a little…different, admitting something like that to a ghost. Maybe somewhat self centered. After all, if given the choice, he’d most likely rather be alive.

And here Xie Lian is, remembering how badly he wanted to be… Not even dead—just…gone.

“…Do you still want to?”

It’s a reasonable question, even if Hua Cheng asks it calmly. “Not anymore,” Xie Lian replies quietly.

It’s only half true.

Unlike other times in his life, he doesn’t actively crave oblivion.

But there are always passing moments of temptation.

That’s the thing about it that no one tells you. The ugliness to suicide that never makes it into the pages of books or the lines of poems.

Because sometimes, you don’t die.

And living with the fact that you wanted to isn’t so simple that it could be slipped into the pages of a book, or a few lines of verse.

Something cracks open, in your mind, when you admit to the possibility of just… giving up.

Just…stopping everything. And you’re so tired.

It’s like a dark hole that opens up in the corner of any room that you’re in, one that has a gravity of its own.

And if you just don’t look at it, you’re alright, and it isn’t there. But if you do look, it drags you back in.

For Xie Lian, that's enduring:

Not looking at it.

But he did look, during the festival.

He looked, and he looked, and if he hadn't been with Shi Qingxuan, or Feng Xin, and Mu Qing—or Shuo after that—

Xie Lian doesn't think he would have looked away from it so easily.

"...Nothing hurts, anymore." He explains quietly.

Except that isn't exactly true.

Now, Xie Lian often finds himself hurting when he should be happy, and feeling nothing at all when he should be in pain.

Like those wires were severed by Bai Wuxiang, then reconnected to the wrong parts.

"But sometimes, I...need it to," he admits, feeling somewhat ashamed. "Just to know that I..."

That he's still capable of feeling it.

"...I must sound so ridiculous," the prince shrinks, finally seeming to remember to be self aware of how...horrible it all must sound. "I'm sorry—"

"You don't." Hua Cheng hasn't spoken, not since Xie Lian used the words, 'When I tried to die.'

"Remember what I said before?"

About ghost kings, and how they're made.

About how nothing is too terrible for him to hear. Xie Lian nods quietly, his shoulders still slumped.

"I used to feel that way, too."

Now, that—

That leaves Xie Lian surprised, turning his chin slightly—even if he can't see Hua Cheng when he looks back at him.

The ghost king reaches out, stroking his fingertips over the prince’s cheek. “...You did?”

"When I was very, very young," Hua Cheng explains. "I never craved the ability to feel pain, but I was subjected to it so often, I..."

The mind finds ways of protecting itself.

Hong'er knew it hurt, when he was being beaten--but the feeling was removed from him.

The night he died–he felt it, each time Qi Rong cut him. It was more painful than anything he had ever experienced. Only to be surpassed by when his soul was dispersed, as Wu Ming.

But Hong'er didn't scream. Even in a frail, mortal body.

He suspects that's why he thrived on Mount Tonglu.

After all–it takes more than mere grit, to claw out your own eye.

"...Do you feel it now?" Xie Lian whispers, biting his lip.

Searching for some reassurance that, at some point–that numbness begins to fade.

"...I do," Hua Cheng answers slowly, thoughtfully. "My tolerance will always be high, but...that doesn't mean I don't feel it."

Which makes Xie Lian wonder.

Is it simply that...he can't feel pain, or...that his mind has simply learned to ignore it?

Some things do hurt, after all. And when they do, it's almost a relief.

The cursed iron shackle Wen Jiao placed upon him in Gusu--that hurt. More than anything in nearly eight centuries.

And now, upon contemplation...

"...How did it get better?"

Hua Cheng's answer is refreshing in it's simplicity:

"I became so strong, nothing could hurt me anymore."

Yes, that is rather believable.

It's difficult, trying to imagine someone powerful enough to wound Hua Cheng. Certainly Jun Wu, but anything short of that...

"It came slowly, but...once I started to believe that I was safe, and the pain wasn't coming...I started feeling things again."

"..." Xie Lian's lips turn up at the corners, but his eyes...are saddened. "I wish I could do that."

The comb pauses in his hair. "Why couldn't you?"

The prince remains silent for a moment, pulling his legs up against his chest, wrapping his arms around them.

Feeling rather small, and hopeless at that moment. Like a child he once knew.

"I'm not like you, San Lang," he whispers.

The ghost king sets the comb aside.

"Not like me?"

"...I'm not strong."

That admission feels terrifying, because physically speaking–Xie Lian knows that he isn't weak. He never has been. HIs body has always faithfully done what he needed it to do.

His mind, however...

A palm presses against his back. So gentle, rubbing smooth circles into Xie Lian’s skin.

“You have always been strong, your highness.”

Far, far stronger than Hua Cheng.

Every single moment of pain the ghost king endured—he did so with a purpose.

Knowing his god was waiting.

If he hadn’t...

He wouldn't have made it very far.

Without Xie Lian, he wouldn't have even made it past that day, when he fell from the city walls.

But the prince has endured so much with no hope of relief.

And that sort of strength is beyond Hua Cheng's imagination.

Still, Xie Lian doesn't seem to believe it, slumped forward, shrinking in on himself.

"...And until you start to believe that..."

(I'll keep you safe.)

"...You can feel other things, besides pain."

Xie Lian almost asks what he means, until he feels Hua Cheng take his hand.

Xie Lian's palms, being that of a god, heal from every scrape and callous—leaving them as soft and delicate as when he was a sheltered prince.

Even if everything else about him has changed.

Hua Cheng's are rougher, with long, slender fingers—gently squeezing his own.

"...Thank you, San Lang," he mumbles. It doesn't feel...like he deserves any comfort. Not after putting the ghost king through so much trouble, or taking up so much of his time, but...

Hua Cheng certainly doesn't seem to mind.

At some point, he starts combing Xie Lian's hair again

And now...it's hard not to lean into it. To relax under Hua Cheng's touch—taking comfort in it.

Even if Xie Lian struggles to justify allowing himself to do so.

There's something inherently soothing about it, and without realizing it at all...

He's being held.

Only a few hours before, he was struggling to force himself to fall asleep—and now, he can barely manage to keep his eyes open.

...When has anything ever been this easy?

“I forgot...” he mumbles, his words broken by a yawn.

He doesn’t see it, but the ghost king smiles.

“Forgot what?”

“To thank you...” Xie Lian sighs, his eyes sliding shut.

“Dianxia doesn’t need to thank me.”

But he does, he does...for...

There’s faint humming in his ear. So, so familiar, but Xie Lian can’t put his finger on when he’s heard the melody before, but...

And of course, if Xie Lian could remember his dreams, he would know.

Because the minute he drifts off, he's in a very different scene, from so long ago.

Sleeping beside the fire, his cheek pressed against a bamboo sleeping mat.

So comfortable.

So safe.

"...Hong'er?" He mumbles, pushing himself up, rubbing his eyes. "I don't think I've heard that one before."

The teenager is stoking the fire, keeping it burning bright. He should be sleeping, but he's always off doing chores by the time Xie Lian wakes up.

"...It's just some song my mother used to sing, dianxia, I didn't mean to wake you." He says it so offhandedly, but...

Hong'er has almost never spoken about his mother before.

"Did she sing to you often?"

The boy pauses, considering it.

"I think so. Most nights."

His tone is half apologetic, half mischievous. "I was terrible about going to sleep."

The thought of that makes Xie Lian smile.

The song is beautiful. Wistful. Simple lyrics, but with a satisfying melody, rising and falling like the tides, the sound gently rocking him.

It's a perfect lullaby.

"Sleep a little longer, dianxia."

A hand reaches for his, squeezing in quiet reassurance.

"You're tired."

And he is.

Xie Lian is so, so tired.

But he doesn't want to go yet.

He wants to hear that song...just a little longer.

He...

(Please, just a little longer.)

Xie Lian never gets to see him anymore, and he just wants to see his...

"...Stay with me?" He whispers, curling up on the floor, basking in the warmth from the fire.

For just a little longer?

"I won't leave you, your highness."

That's right.

Hong'er would never, ever leave him.

Just...

That didn't mean that someone else wouldn't take him away.

The Ghost King watches his prince sleep, tucked between his arms, stroking his fingers through his hair.

For so long, this was all Hua Cheng ever wanted. To know that the crown prince was safe.

To hold him.

To protect him.

But now, they're here. Xie Lian is right here, and...

Hua Cheng presses his face into his god's hair, squeezing his eye shut.

'When I tried to die.'

Dying isn't so hard, actually.

Dying was among the easiest things that Hua Cheng has ever done.

Choices are harder.

Hua Cheng could make the choice to keep him here. Locked away from the world, where nothing could ever hurt him again.

Here, within Paradise Manor, nothing ever could. But he can't do that.

There's a line between love and possession. The division between being that of free will.

Hua Cheng would never rob Xie Lian of the ability to make his own choices. To walk his own path.

Just as he knows his god would do the same for him. But it's hard, sometimes, to watch.

And he knows he should be grateful, because now, he has the chance to walk that path beside him.

But Hua Cheng was an awful child. A difficult teenager. Now, he's a selfish man.

His arms tighten around the prince, holding him closer. And he wants so much more.

His past, everything that he was, everything that Xie Lian remembers–all of it is locked away, as though sealed beneath an impenetrable layer of glass.

Hua Cheng can see it, but he cannot touch.

And he...

He wants his name.

He wants Xie Lian to call him, and he wants to answer.

He wants Xie Lian to know that, never once, has he ever been truly alone. The ghost king wants, and he wants, and he wants.

But for now, this...

He doesn't say 'I love you.'

His lips form the words, but he doesn't give them sound.

Because the crown prince wouldn't want to hear those words from him.

They're for Hong'er, not him.

For now, holding him will have to be enough.

Walking beside him will have to be enough.

Even if, in the not so far future, that means walking straight into hell.

When Xie Lian awakes several hours later, he sits up with a gasp, his eyes blinking groggily.

"The lanterns!" He exclaims, only half awake, pressing his fist into his palm as he remembers.

There's a soft rumble against his back, and that's when Xie Lian realizes—

"What about them?"

He's practically lying on top of Hua Cheng.

The prince scrambles to the side, clearing his throat. "I forgot to thank you," he explains, hiding his expression. "...For the lanterns!"

And then, something else occurs to him–the missing piece of information that everyone had been wondering that night, watching the lanterns pour into the sky.

"...San Lang?"

"Yes?"

"...Where is Qiandeng temple?" The ghost king's silence is... Somewhat sheepish.

"...Here, in the city."

Xie Lian sits there for a moment in quiet shock.

...He has a temple...an entire temple...in Ghost City?

"...Could I see it?"

There's a pause, and Xie Lian wonders if, perhaps, he wasn't supposed to ask, but...

"That would be for the best, actually."

Xie Lian is curious about what that's supposed to mean–and why Hua Cheng seems...almost embarrassed, but before he can ask, he's being lifted up again.

"...San Lang," he mutters, lightly reprimanding him, "there's nothing wrong with my foot anymore..."

"I know, dianxia."

"Then why...?"

His answer comes in the form of rattling dice.

Clack, clack!

"I thought, until his highness changed clothes, he might want to avoid walking through the street like this."

Like...as in...

Right.

Xie Lian remembers now, his face hot.

He's still wearing what are very obviously Hua Cheng's robes.

Parading through the streets of Ghost City like that...would be pretty embarrassing, actually.

(Given the prior exposure the ghosts have had to him, especially.)

"Right," he clears his throat. "That makes sense."

The Ghost King steps through a small portal, though Xie Lian can only tell by the shift of the air, and the soft clinking of the bells on his boots.

When he sets him down again, he's careful, holding Xie Lian's hand until both of his feet are firmly planted on the ground.

The prince smiles gratefully, thanking him before he steps away, carefully feeling around.

There's a stillness to the air–and yet, even the softest sounds of his bare feet against polished marble manage to echo, conveying the size of the place, and it's method of construction.

Unlike most temples, there aren't sharply hewn steps leading to the entrances or the altar, only gently sloping inclines that feel natural under one's feet.

"...Was this place built...just for the festival?" Xie Lian questions, thinking certainly not.

How could it have been?

Hua Cheng is leaning against a pillar behind him, watching, his fingers twisting the end of his braid restlessly.

"...It was built many centuries ago," he explains softly. "It went unused until recently, but..."

Xie Lian lets out a sigh of relief. Oh, good, it was already...

"...I'm sorry." Hua Cheng blurts out, and the god pauses, his fingertips outstretched towards the altar.

"...What?"

"It's not entirely suitable, dedicating a temple to his highness in a place as chaotic as this..."

"You mean Ghost City?" Xie Lian questions.

The Ghost King usually remembers to give a verbal answer, but in this case, he can barely do more than bow his head in shame.

After everything he's done, he's sorry for building Xie Lian three thousand lanterns, and dedicating an entire temple to him...

...Because of location?

"...San Lang," Xie Lian tilts his head to the side, staring in his direction blindly. "I really like Ghost City."

One eye snaps up to look at him, watching his face intently.

"...You do?"

The prince smiles, nodding. "I was surprised at first, but...it's an exciting place."

'Exciting,' is one way of phrasing it, but...

"And I've been to lots of places," Xie Lian adds. "Most of them didn't leave much of an impression on me, one way or the other. So..." He places a hand on the altar, his lips curving up into a small smile.

"I'm happy."

Obviously, Hua Cheng will probably rededicate it to another purpose eventually. Xie Lian hardly expects such a temple to be permanently dedicated to him, but...

A shrine in Puqi, a shrine in Gusu, and...a temple in Ghost City.

Xie Lian's three favorite places.

The calamity stands behind him, wide eyed and breathless.

(He's always breathless, but this time he couldn't take a breath, even if he wanted to.)

"...It's also good that you don't have any cushions for kneeling," Xie Lian adds, turning away, scratching his head bashfully.

He's never agreed with that sort of thing, anyway.

"Really, this place is amazing San Lang, I'm really..." Xie Lian pauses as a thought crosses his mind–something Shuo said before.

That Hua Cheng was attending to 'renovations,' in Ghost City during their weeks apart.

...Was he...?

"It's not perfect, though." Hua Cheng speaks up. "It still needs an establishment plaque."

"...Oh," Xie Lian tilts his head, surprised. After all, that's one of the first things to include in a temple, but...

"Well, you said yourself, it was unused until recently! I'm sure San Lang will get around to it eventually when he–"

"Actually, I was hoping that gege could make one."

"...Me?" Xie Lian questions, surprised, then...somewhat hesitant. "Oh, San Lang...it's been ages since..."

Xie Lian can get by, his handwriting is still somewhat precise, but...

It's far, far less impressive than it used to be. If any of his calligraphy masters could see him now, they would faint with shame.

And in Xie Lian's defense, it's far more difficult when you can't...well...

"Gege's would be better than anything else," Hua Cheng states firmly, and Xie Lian can't help but raise an eyebrow.

"...What makes you so sure?"

"..."

"...San Lang–?"

"...I have poor handwriting."

Xie Lian pauses, open mouthed, and Hua Cheng grimaces. "I know, it's —"

"It's really not such a big deal, San Lang..." Xie Lian shakes his head, "I'm just...surprised."

After all, Hua Cheng seems to be good and just about, well...

Everything.

"I'm told it's more difficult if you don't learn when you're young," he shrugs.

Xie Lian remembers hearing something like that, actually.

Back when Mu Qing first started going to lessons with him, his instructors always insisted it would be impossible for the servant to catch up, but...

That didn't stop him, or even slow him down. The prince smiles.

"Well, I'd be no good at it right now, but...if I ever lose the shackles, I'd be happy to teach you what I know."

Of course, that's a big 'if,' because Xie Lian doubts he'll ever lose them. But...

Hua Cheng smiles. "When you do, I'll be happy to be in your care, your highness."

"..." Xie Lian's expression softens, and he nods.

The prince isn't accustomed to someone having such faith in him anymore. So readily, at that.

"...And I had another reason for bringing you here," Hua Cheng admits, prompting Xie Lian to arch an eyebrow.

"Oh? What?"

"Gege insisted on making his own clothes to return back, so..." Xie Lian is carefully led to an adjoining room in the temple, more private than the main hall, and awaiting him...

Is a loom.

A rather fine one, actually. Far more elegant than any the god has ever used.

"Oh, San Lang...thank you," Xie Lian has said that so many times today, the ghost king might just tire of hearing it, but...

He never seems to.

And, of course, there are countless options for thread, neatly organized and labeled by color for the god's choosing.

Of course, for most weavers, just making the appropriate amount of cloth would be a task that might take days, sometimes even weeks.

But for a god—one with eight centuries of practice, no less—Xie Lian can finish such a task in the span of an hour.

All with Hua Cheng sitting beside him, one leg propped up, chatting lazily. At one point, when Xie Lian needs to switch colors, he feels around for a knob to tie one thread to (so as not to lose track of which color he was working with) Hua Cheng reaches out, offering a finger.

He repeats the gesture several different times, with several different threads, until the bolt of fabric is complete, and Xie Lian is simply cutting and sewing the new garments together.

And he finds himself thinking, as he completes his work, and later, when Hua Cheng steps out of the chamber, giving him privacy to change...

It felt so natural, tying that thread off on his finger. There was an ease between them, as he worked.

Almost like they'd done it before—

"FIRE!!!" The voices are shrieking in the distance, but even here, through the thick stone walls of the temple, Xie Lian can hear them clearly. "THERE'S A FIRE IN PARADISE MANOR!"

Xie Lian's stomach drops.

"...Another one?!" He exclaims, hurrying to finish getting dressed.

He hurries out into the main hall, adjusting his sleeves, and Hua Cheng, seeming completely unconcerned by the situation, stops to admire him.

This time, he opted for white inner robes with a deep blue outer layer, simple detailing—but rather elegant, like the rest of his work.

Normally, he doesn't work with such rich colors. Not only out of a feeling that airs of luxury no longer suit him—but also because he simply couldn't afford them.

Hua Cheng, however, didn't provide inexpensive thread—and all of the colors available were rather vivid.

"Oh, San Lang, I'm so sorry," the prince frets, hurrying towards the exit.

"...What are you sorry for?" He questions, seeming absolutely puzzled as he follows his god into the street.

Xie Lian wipes a hand down his face with a groan. "Every time I visit, there's a fire!"

The calamity waves that off, seeming entirely unconcerned. "Nah, that isn't gege's fault. Besides, what's a little fire to me? But really, you don't even have any shoes--"

"I DON'T NEED ANY!"

Not when Hua Cheng's home is about to burn down for the second time in the same month!

Xie Lian proceeds to hurry through the streets, following the shouts of, 'Fire, fire!' and 'Hurry, come quick!'

But even as he approaches the front gates of Paradise Manor, such screams are already beginning to calm down, a crowd gathered around the entrance.

Xie Lian stops among them, sniffing the smoke in the air, whipping his head around with concern. "Is anyone hurt?!"

"Huh?" One of the ghosts pauses, stretching his arms over his head. "Ah, if it ain't the crown prince!"

There's a few respectful cries of greeting in response. Which is...surprising.

Xie Lian doesn't usually get a warm response when he arrives on the scene of an unlucky situation. Especially not when people recognize him, well...

A god of misfortune.

"No need to worry your highness, it wasn't a big fire! We put it out already!"

Xie Lian lets out a low breath of relief, because from the sound of it—there wasn't too much damage.

He presses a hand against his chest, shoulders slumping for a moment as he catches his breath.

(Not that he was exhausted—but he'd been holding it with anxiety.)

"Oh, thank goodness!" He straightens up, clapping his hands together as he turns to face the crowd, bowing his head gratefully. "Good work, everyone!"

The crowd of ghosts pauses, not seeming...to know what to do with themselves, receiving praise and thanks.

A couple of them adjust rather quickly though, the first among them sniffing, rubbing his mustache, looking rather pleased with himself.

"It was NO TROUBLE, your highness, NO TROUBLE AT ALL!" "SIMPLY DOIN' OUR DUTY!"

"..." Xie Lian smiles widely in return.

...Yes, of all places, Xie Lian is happy to have a temple here—in Ghost City. But there's a different problem at hand now, with the fire out.

"...Do we know how it started?" He frowns, glancing in the direction of Paradise Manor with worry."

"Mmm! Seems like someone set it!"

"...Set it?" Xie Lian questions, rubbing his chin.

In that case, the motivation seems somewhat obvious—and all the more concerning.

To create a distraction.

...But what for?

Suddenly, another voice speaks up, this one familiar.

"My lord, the fetal spirit is missing."

...And there's the motivation. But who would want to steal a fetal spirit, and why?

Xie Lian turns his head at the familiar sound of Hua Cheng's footsteps, boots jingling as he walks.

"...San Lang, we should ask the guards what they saw."

The ghost king raises an eyebrow.

"What guards?"

Such a casual response gives Xie Lian pause, because...

...Is he really trying to imply that a place the size and scale of Paradise Manor is just...?

"...You don't have any?"

Hua Cheng shrugs, coming to a halt by the prince's side, crossing his arms.

"It isn't necessary." Xie Lian blinks, trying to wrap his head around the concept, and Hua Cheng seems to take mercy on him by explaining:

"You wouldn't have seen, dianxia—but every door on Paradise Manor has a seal on the inside."

He's right—Xie Lian had no idea.

"If anyone tries to leave with something that's mine," Hua Cheng shrugs, "they'll be locked inside automatically."

Xie Lian thinks that over, rubbing his chin. "...And you were the one who caught the fetal spirit, so technically..."

"It would have been in my possession, yes."

"That's...a very unique enchantment, San Lang."

Honestly, Xie Lian's never heard of something quite like it. Actually, it seems quite economical! An excellent way to save on secu—

"Ghosts are territorial by nature, your highness. Even so—" Hua Cheng's gaze settles upon him. "I've never allowed people to touch what's mine."

...security.

It's not as though it's out of character for Hua Cheng to say something like that. In fact, he said something along similar lines to Lang Qianqiu in the gambler's den, but...

Xie Lian's ears burn, all the same.

"So, ah..." Xie Lian clears his throat, trying to focus on the matter at hand. "That would mean the thief is, ah..."

"Still here, yes, likely hiding among the group who came to help with the fire." Hua Cheng turns his head, surveying them.

"Whichever one of you it was—step forward now."

No one does—and Xie Lian isn't surprised. He wouldn't eagerly admit to stealing from a ghost king either.

Hua Cheng has never seemed menacing to him, but...

To others, he can (apparently) seem rather frightening.

After giving it a moment, the calamity shrugs, looking towards the Waning Moon Officer. "Have them line up."

Because, little does the thief know—they were doomed to be caught from the start. Once they're spread out, single file, one person can see the truth quite clearly.

Xie Lian's condition rarely, if ever comes in handy.

In this situation, however, he can see the cloud of dark, malicious energy, swirling malignantly among the other ghosts. And when he points--a familiar voice cries out in response.

"What?! You're pointin' the finger at me cause I yelled at you for cross dressing last time?!"

Hua Cheng's eye narrows, all while Xie Lian's widen with recognition.

Ah, Lan Chang.

"...Well, technically I wasn't cross dressing," Xie Lian corrects her, albeit awkwardly.

"I was actually a woman at that point in time, so..." Maybe that wasn't his usual form, but he wasn't cross dressing, no.

Lan Chang shrinks away from them both, her arms wrapped around her middle, hiding something beneath her dress.

"E-Either way, I'm sorry for what I said, I didn't mean any harm in it!" She protests, hunching over as she attempts to keep her hands tight around herself. "Would ya—would ya quit it?! Stop—stop messin' around!"

It's hard for Xie Lian to understand at first, but...

When he sees the dark cloud swirling and sparking irritably in her direction, he quickly begins to put it together.

First: that Lan Chang isn't hiding the child under her dress, but rather... Well, like Xie Lian before, it's inside her.

And second...

"Lan Chang..."

The prince steps forward, his tone sympathetic, but...she doesn't seem particularly comforted by it. "Are you the child's mother?"

Lan Chang glares, trying to stumble backwards—but bumping into the ghost officer before she can get very far, glaring at his mask before giving up.

"...I know he might've caused trouble, but he just hadn't had anyone to help him!" She exclaims, holding her middle tightly. "I'll raise him better, I promise—he won't bother anyone again!"

Xie Lian frowns, his expression turning sympathetic.

He doesn't doubt that she means it.

That being said...

"Lan Chang, you need to let the child leave your body..."

It's clear that she means to try to carry the child to term—something she wasn't originally able to do, clearly—but it's fruitless.

Hua Cheng even says as much.

"That thing is way stronger than you."

Even as he explains, his tone is detached—all together uncaring, as though her decision means very little to him.

“Leave it that way, and it’ll rip you apart and escape on it’s own.”

Even with that warning, Lan Chang holds onto her stomach stubbornly—and Xie Lian is fretful.

“San Lang...”

Of course, while he is somewhat ambivalent to the woman’s fate—it only takes one concerned word from Xie Lian for him to intervene.

“Don’t worry, your highness.”

And of course, the calamity snaps his fingers—with every intention of forcing the spirit out.

Which he does—but his magic has another, unintended result.

There’s a flash of light. So sudden, so bright—even Xie Lian starts, prompting Hua Cheng to step in front of him protectively, but...

The god isn’t frightened, no—just confused.

Because that might...wasn’t demonic.

No, the aura of it...is clearly from the Heavens.

Hua Cheng stares, watching as that light fades—and once it does...he sees.

“...Your highness, it would seem that she’s in possession of a golden belt.” Xie Lian’s eyes widen.

“Ah.”

Most gods in the upper court have them.

Golden belts are often viewed as a symbol of prestige and status. Just to have one is an accomplishment. At the height of his power, Xie Lian had somewhere north of twenty, but he lost count.

They can’t be stolen, either. If not willingly given—they always return to the owner.

And to be gifted with such an item by a martial god...that really only has one meaning.

Xie Lian’s eyes widen with understanding, and the other ghosts don’t seem to be far behind him.

“Lan Chang, did some Heavenly Official leave you and your kid high and dry?!”

“SHUT UP!”

Lan Chang glares, clutching the squirming, screeching fetal spirit against her side—but before she can try to push him back into her body once again, Hua Cheng snaps his fingers, sealing the spirit inside of a jar.

The female ghost turns to him, pleading.

"M-My lord!"

She drops to her knees, her tone changing drastically.

Before, she was loud—combative, clearly not caring who she was speaking to.

Lan Chang doesn’t keep up that persona around Hua Cheng.

“Please, he—he’s just a child, and I’ve been looking for him for centuries, I—!”

There’s little sympathy to be found in his eyes.

“I’ve given you shelter in this city for many centuries, Lan Chang.”

Slowly, the ghost bows her head.

“You know what the rules are.”

She does, of course, like everyone else.

No one steals from a Ghost King without consequence.

Still, Hua Cheng doesn’t seem angry at the moment, no.

His gaze is focused on that golden belt, his expression unreadable—but clearly, he’s deep in thought.

Xie Lian, in any case, takes pity on her.

“...San Lang,” he murmurs, turning to the calamity. “I should take her."

Hua Cheng grunts for a moment, so far away that he doesn't even seem to process the request—which is startling, because he's always listening to Xie Lian rather intently, but...

"...To the Heavens?"

The prince nods. "If the father is a god, then..." He should take responsibility.

For Lan Chang and her child—there's no excuse that either one of them should be left to suffer if the father has the means to help.

"And...you were the one who got the fetal spirit, but could I—?"

"You would have caught it eventually without my interference, dianxia."

Hua Cheng shrugs, seeming to come out of whatever stupor he was momentarily pulled into. "You don't need my permission—go on and take them both, if you'd like."

Xie Lian nods gratefully, opening his mouth to order Ruoye to— The prince pauses, his expression falling.

"...Your highness?" Hua Cheng looks at him, raising an eyebrow. "Is something wrong?"

Xie Lian groans, pressing his hand against the side of his neck, remembering now that...

"...I left Ruoye protecting the mistress in Mr. Mo's house," he admits, mortified. "I can't believe I did that..."

After all, leaving one's own spiritual device lying around is horribly irresponsible. And it's true, Xie Lian hadn't planned on being swept off to Ghost City, but...

"I see," Hua Cheng murmurs.

Crack!

With a snap of his fingers, a set of manacles appear around Lan Chang's wrists, not so different from what he used on Lang Qianqiu in the gambler's den, many nights before.

"That should hold her for dianxia in the meantime."

Xie Lian nods gratefully. After all, she isn't particularly powerful, he could have simply carried her—but this is far more convenient, and leaves Lan Chang a little dignity.

Not only that, but—

Crack!

There's another snap of his fingers, and this time—something lands around Xie Lian's neck.

The prince reaches up, surprised—to feel a choker sitting around his throat, covering his shackle.

(Without Ruoye or his usual bandages, it was left exposed.)

"..." Xie Lian smiles, his hands grasping his throat lightly for a moment before he lets go. "Thank you, San Lang."

After all—Hua Cheng has expressed disagreement with the idea that Xie Lian should have to hide his shackles in the past, even if he did so subversively, but...

...He's also seen that Xie Lian, as unbothered as he may seem...even in situations where it's allowed, he prefers, for the most part, to keep them private.

"I'll be sure to return it—"

"Don't worry about it, diaxia," he waves him off. "It's nothing."

Considering how expensive most of the items Hua Cheng owns are—Xie Lian finds himself very much doubting that. Still, he doesn't protest for now.

"I'll be going then," Xie LIan sighs, turning to collect Lan Chang.

"Next time, I'll be sure to host you properly."

Host him properly?

He rescued Xie Lian from a lake, allowed the god to wear his clothes, fed him a meal, he even slept in Hua Cheng's bed—

How much more hospitable could he have been?

“No, no—I’m the one who owes you,” Xie Lian shakes his head.

“The next time you come to Puqi shine, I’ll be sure to make you a proper meal!”

After all, he’s been observing Shuo in the kitchen for weeks now…he thinks he’s learned a thing or two.

Anyone else would look horrified by the prospect—but Hua Cheng smiles. “I would be honored.”

The god and his newfound captives leave shortly thereafter, and Hua Cheng turns back in the direction of Paradise Manor, only…

To find Yin Yu standing before him, his expression…fretful.

“…Hua Chengzhu, there’s something that requires your attention.”

The ghost king arches an eyebrow.

“Yin Yu.”

“…Yes, sir?”

“You’ve worked for me for a long time.” Hua Cheng points out evenly.

“…I have,” the former official agrees quietly.

“Do you think, at this very moment, that I am willing to deal with whatever that might be?”

“No,” Yin Yu agrees. “I wouldn’t be bothering you with it, not unless —”

That’s when Hua Cheng hears it.

The faint commotion filtering down the street. Not the bad kind, like before, with people running and shouting for help from a fire.

No, this…is certainly excitement.

“Did you see him?!”

“In the gambler’s den!”

“I can’t believe he’s here!”

And all of these exclamations are paired with a name: one belonging to a ghost who hasn't been seen in decades.

Not in public, anyway.

"Blackwater..."

Hua Cheng's eye narrows.

"...He's in Ghost City!"

"...He couldn't wait?" Hua Cheng growls under his breath, his expression darkening.

After all, he was the one who showed up in the middle of the night demanding an audience—which Crimson Rain firmly denied.

The Ghost King's god was in his bed, after all.

But apparently, the moment Xie Lian was no longer in the city—Blackwater seemed to decide that Hua Cheng had suddenly become 'available.'

"...I could try to tell him—"

"No," Hua Cheng mutters rolling his shoulders as he walks towards the gambler's den. "I'll deal with it."

Of course, for obvious reasons, He Xuan hasn't been seen in one of his publicly recognized forms in a significant amount of time.

When infiltrating the heavens, of course, his making the decision to lay low with his true identity became necessary.

Which makes his decision to resurface publicly...

Not a good sign.

The gambler's den is as loud as ever, with ghosts and every other array of creature cackling as the struggle to capture a win—but it takes the mere sound of Crimson Rain's footsteps to quiet the room.

Clink!

Clink!

The doors for the gambler's den part for him without question, and at the head of the highest table...

Is He Xuan.

The skin he wears for ‘Ming Yi’ is youthful—handsome, in an almost boyish sort of way.

Not so different in age from the form Hua Cheng took when he appeared before Xie Lian on the ox cart near Puqi shrine.

But this form—

It’s as far removed from ‘Ming Yi’ as ‘San Lang’s’ appearance from his true form.

Far taller, broader, equal in height and build to Crimson Rain himself.

And still, this isn’t He Xuan’s true form.

Hua Cheng, even among ghosts, is lucky. After all—

Before he became a Ghost King, he ascended as a god. However briefly, even if he cast himself down immediately.

As a result, even in his true form—only the paleness of his pallor and other minor features point to his transformation into a ghost.

That, and the scar that hides beneath his robes. As a drowning victim, however...

He Xuan’s true form remains in such a state. But not this one.

In this form, he still has dark hair, and golden eyes—but he’s older, in his late twenties. Square jawed, with a dangerous set to his smile as he leans back in his chair, clapping his hands slowly.

“Well, well...Crimson Rain Sought Flower finally has the time.”

Hua Cheng quirks an eyebrow, crossing his arms.

“I wouldn’t say I have the time,” he drawls. “Simply that you’ve made a public nuisance of yourself.”

The Water Demon shrugs, unbothered, rolling a glass of liquor against his palm.

“What do you want, He Xuan?”

“No need for the hostile tone,” the other ghost king smirks, setting his glass down. “I simply wanted to do a little sightseeing with a brother in arms.”

If one were to simply assume He Xuan’s personality was exactly that of his persona as ‘Ming Yi,’ they would be incorrect.

He Xuan is cold, yes. But not completely unsociable.

Ironically enough, it makes him even more compatible with his supposed enemy than he pretends to be.

“Sightseeing?” Hua Cheng questions flatly.

“I couldn’t help but notice how many ghost fires are around…”

He Xuan nods in the direction of paradise manor, where an entire courtyard full of them is waiting. “It’s been a long time since you made a trip, hasn’t it?”

In truth, Hua Cheng hasn’t ferried anyone since his god ascended to the Heavens for a third time.

“I thought so.”

The Water Demon rises from his seat, dark robes drifting around him as he walks.

“I’ll go with you, this time.”

Hua Cheng eyes him, wary.

He’s never asked him for such a thing before, but there can only be one reason: and a rather simple one.

There are very few places in the three realms where one can speak openly—without risk of being overheard by spies.

The Heavenly Emperor enjoys privacy in his private palace, of course. Even He Xuan hasn’t managed to penetrate so deep into their security.

Then, there’s the Kiln.

But that place has an effect on them both—and, if possible, they avoid returning.

Which leaves one final option: a place between.

A realm from which only one being has ever come and gone from as he pleases: Hua Cheng.

And He Xuan has never asked to be brought there.

Which means, whatever he wants to discuss with the ghost king...

Hua Cheng very much doubts that it's something he actually wants to hear.

Still.

"..." The Ghost King turns on his heel, walking back towards the exit, his shoulders squared.

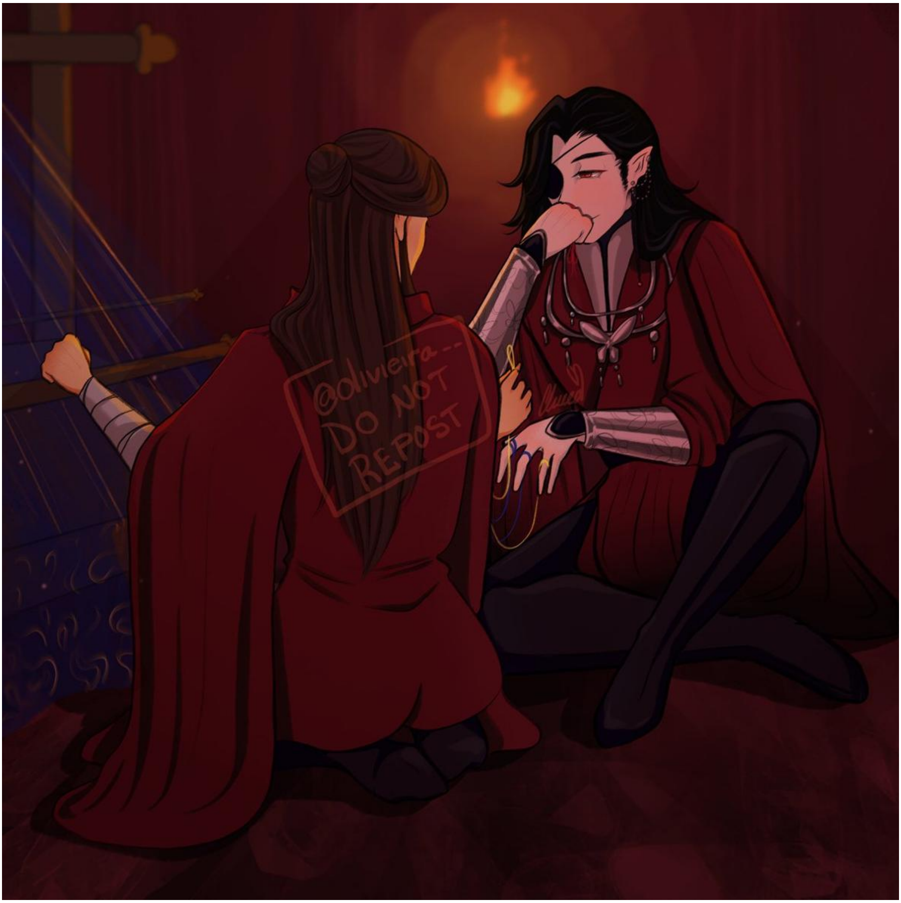
"Come on, then."

ARTWORK INSPIRED BY THIS STORY

Do not repost or use without permission from the artist.

CREDIT: PANICKING ARTIST

CREDIT: LEA



@oliviera_
DO NOT REPOST

CREDIT: OLIVIERA

The Tipping Point

Chapter Summary

> "It's...uh..." Everyone waits, expectant—
>
> "...YOU!"
>
> Dead silence follows, and Xie Lian glances around, waiting for someone to respond to the accusation, after all, it's rather shocking, but...
>
> No one does.
>
> "Uh..." Shi Qingxuan clears her throat. "Your highness..."
>
> Xie Lian blinks, looking in the direction of her voice. "Yes?"
>
> "She's...pointing at..." The Wind Master trails off, glaring at the others, who seem to be biting back laughter.
>
> Slowly, after a moment—it begins to dawn on him, and he feels a little faint from the shock.
>
> "...ME?!"

Chapter Notes

> content warnings for this chapter: mentions of sexual assault, torture, and references to PTSD symptoms

See the end of the chapter for more notes

Upon his arrival to the heavens, Xie Lian wastes little time, leading Lan Chang with one hand, holding the jar containing her child's malicious spirit in the other, calling out in the general communication array—

'I'm sorry everyone, but something serious has happened!'

Now, when Xie Lian first returned to the Heavens—very few people listened to what he had to say when he suddenly spoke up in the array.

After the cases on Mount Yu Jun, Banyue, and then Ghost City, however…

It's guaranteed entertainment when the Crown Prince is involved.

'Please, make your way to the Great Martial Hall!'

Drawn by either curiosity or a sense of duty, there are already several gods gathered by the time Xie Lian leads Lan Chang through the doors.

"Your highness!" Shi Qingxuan is the first to greet him.

'Oh,' Xie Lian thinks to himself, slightly surprised. 'She's still in her female form.'

Xie Lian isn't disapproving of it—not in the way that her brother is—but he's surprised by how often the Wind Master uses this shape.

"Where have you been? And—is that a ghost?!"

Lan Chang shrinks away, moving to stand behind Xie Lian as more and more of the gods present in the heavens filter into the room.

Jun Wu's voice rings out next, and…

"…Ah, Xianle."

He sounds…slightly odd. Unlike himself.

In Xie Lian's experience, the emperor always sounds…relaxed. Like the calm surface of a lake.

he doesn't necessarily sound upset now, but…

There's an underlying tension, and Xie Lian can't determine the source of it.

"What's going on here?"

"Well…" Xie Lian scratches the side of his head, trying to decide how much he can (or should) explain about the incident, but…

"I was helping a group of locals with, ah…"

"…Your highness?" Mu Qing steps into the room, with the Water Master not far behind him, clearly looking to see where his sister rushed off to. “Who is that woman?”

“Well…” Xie Lian is still scratching his head. “I was tracking a…”

“Say,” Shi Qingxuan leans forward. “Is there something going on with her stomach? It almost looks like…”

(Of course, it hasn’t completely flattened since Hua Cheng expelled the spirit from her body, there hasn’t been enough time.)

Just as she reaches over, the jar in Xie Lian’s hands rattles menacingly—as if angry to have someone approaching it’s mother—

And The Water Master’s fan closes with an irritated snap. “QINGXUAN!” He barks, “What on earth are you doing?!” Shi Qingxuan jumps back, startled.

“I was just—!”

“If a martial god drags a ghost into the great martial hall stating there’s an emergency, don’t just run up to her and try to touch her stomach!” Shi Wudu glares, gesturing for his sister to return to his side. “Use some common sense!”

“She’s clearly chained up, gege…” The Wind Master grumbles. Still, she walks over to stand beside her brother, her arms crossed. “I’m not a child.”

“And you still haven’t outgrown the urge to touch everything you find interesting.” Ah, Pei has arrived.

Xie Lian clears his throat, speaking up—

“This is Lan Chang. I was tasked with tracking down a fetal spirit attacking pregnant mortals…and, as it turns out, she’s the mother.”

“Even so,” Ling Wen speaks up, entering the room—still in his male form. “Why bring her here?”

“Well…” Xie Lian reaches into his sleeve, procuring the golden belt—and with it, he hears several gasps of shock from around the room. “She had this.”

Naturally, it doesn’t take long for everyone else to come to the same conclusion that Xie Lian did.

It’s not a crime for a god to be intimate with a mortal woman. It’s not even unheard of for gods to sire children with mortals. On even rarer occasions, goddesses have made similar mishaps.

But for it to escalate to a situation like this… That would be a first.

“…In that case, she should just point out who the father is,” Feng Xin shrugs, stopping to stand beside Mu Qing, who…

Isn’t looking at him, staring straight ahead.

Across the room, Lan Chang grits her teeth, her face downturned.

“…I agree,” Jun Wu murmurs, slowly pulling his gaze from the Crown Prince of Xianle, turning it to the woman he brought with him. “Go on and point him out.”

In the face of an order from the emperor, Lan Chang can hardly refuse. She sucks in a deep breath, squirming.

“It’s…uh…” Everyone waits, expectant—

“…YOU!”

Dead silence follows, and Xie Lian glances around, waiting for someone to respond to the accusation, after all, it’s rather shocking, but…

No one does.

“Uh…” Shi Qingxuan clears her throat. “Your highness…”

Xie Lian blinks, looking in the direction of her voice. “Yes?”

“She’s…pointing at…” The Wind Master trails off, glaring at the others, who seem to be biting back laughter.

Slowly, after a moment—it begins to dawn on him, and he feels a little faint from the shock.

“…ME?!” Xie Lian flinches away, shocked. “That’s not even possible!”

“Sure it is!” Lan Chang glares, pointing her finger at him stubbornly. “It’s YOU! It’s definitely you!”

“Then I think we’re witnessing a miracle,” Shi Wudu rolls his eyes, fanning himself.

"The first virgin to father a son. What a sight."

(Xie Lian can't even speak, swaying on his feet from the shock.)

"...Virgin?!" Lan Chang scoffs, crossing her arms. "How would ya even know?! He could be faking!"

"He was tested with magic not even two days ago!"

Shi Qingxuan huffs, placing her hands on her hips as she speaks up in his defense.

"Why—I bet his highness hasn't even held someone's hand before!"

Xie Lian opens his mouth to agree with her, but...ah...

Actually, he's held Hua Cheng's hand several times by now.

"..." The prince bows his head, fiddling with his fingers, and Shi Qingxuan...

She clears her throat, standing a little taller.

"Well! He's CERTAINLY NEVER KISSED ANYONE BEF—" She stops, noticing Xie Lian quickly making an 'X' motion with his arms, pleading with her to stop.

"...Oh...uh...he's probably never shared a b—no? Uh..." She rounds back on Lan Chang, pointing. "Well—YOU DON'T SEEM LIKE HIS TYPE!"

On that, Xie Lian nods weakly with agreement.

Lan Chang balks—but she's not as offended by that as she probably should be, given the implication.

"...Fine, fine, I got it mixed up—it's—it's HIM!" This time, her finger points directly at...

Ling Wen.

"..." Pei barks out a laugh, clapping a hand over his rips. "LING WEN! You sly dog!"

"...It's not funny," The civil god glares, crossing his arms.

Even Shi Wudu is snickering, hiding it behind his fan. "Such a heartbreaker…”

Ling Wen’s gaze snaps to him, clearly betrayed. “Shui-Xiong, even you?!”

“I can’t believe you won’t take responsibility, aiyah…”

“You—!”

Lan Chang looks around, confused, and Xie Lian takes pity.

“…That’s the Civil Goddess, Ling Wen. He’s just in his male form for the mid autumn festival.”

“…” Lan Chang’s finger slowly curls inward. “…Oh.” She mutters, shaking herself out of it, and—

Naturally, she points to the man right beside him.

“YOU!”

Now, no one immediately laughs or calls it unrealistic—but still.

“See,” Ling Wen crosses his arms with a sigh, “If you had accused him first, everyone would have believed it.”

Pei gawks in his friend’s direction, aghast. “HAH?!”

“I don’t know…” The Water Master shrugs. “I still kind of believe it.”

Pei rounds on him, “No you DON’T!”

“I mean…you have a past…”

“Yes,” the emperor speaks up, and Shi Wudu’s amused smile immediately disappears. Something that Pei notices, his eyebrow raising. “Pei does have quite a history, to be sure.”

“…It wasn’t me, your majesty,” the general clears his throat, turning around to face him. “Regardless of how many women I’ve been with—I do keep track of them. If I had fathered a child, and a thing such as this happened…I would know.”

His tone has become somewhat…distant.

Jun Wu arches an eyebrow. “…You mean to say you’ve never given a golden belt to a mortal, then?”

"...I have," Pei admits, and whatever may have remained of the Water Master's amused expression completely fades. "Which is how I know she's lying—because it wasn't her."

It's clear from the atmosphere in the room that most people don't know whether or not to believe him, and...

"...He's telling the truth," Xie Lian, the last person anyone expected, speaks up quietly.

"...Your highness?" Feng Xin pauses, surprised. "How would you know that?"

"The woman in question," Xie Lian explains. "Ming Guang was looking for her during the war in Xianle—he mentioned it to me before entering my territory." He turns towards Pei, "Am I guessing correctly?"

"...Yes," Pei agrees, his expression guarded. "It was her."

Xie Lian looks to Mu Qing, who has been uncharacteristically quiet—

(And the prince knows, it's because of the way they left things the night before.) "She's the woman I asked you about, back then. The one who..."

The Martial God's eye widens, remembering.

"...Oh," Mu Qing frowns, looking away. His hair is back to it's normal color—jet black, trailing down his shoulders. "...I suppose it is true, then."

Feng Xin glances over at him, raising an eyebrow, but...he seems relieved, just to see Mu Qing here, speaking normally.

He never was able to get Mu Qing to let him in that night. And even the day after, the martial god wouldn't let Feng Xin anywhere near him.

"..." Lan Chang looks back and forth between the two, and when she looks at Mu Qing...

She grits her teeth. "It was YOU, then!"

"..." Mu Qing stares her down, crossing his arms, and Xie Lian sighs, shaking his head.

"That can't be right either, Lan Chang—but why not just be honest? I'm sure, whoever it is, he'll..."

"It IS him!" She claims, stomping her foot stubbornly. "You can't prove it isn't!"

"...Mu Qing's cultivation method is the same as mine," Xie Lian explains. "It forbids any kind of...carnal pleasures, and we've both been cultivating continuously since we were teenagers."

Meaning in Mu Qing's case—there's simply no window of opportunity.

Of course—Xie Lian, having the demeanor that he does, can pull off such a statement rather well. Old rumors from very long ago tainted his image for years—but once they were dispelled, people quickly adjusted.

After all, the crown prince acts like someone with few indulgences. However, Mu Qing...

People are aware of his cultivation method, certainly—but few actually believe he's still practicing it. Most assume he's switched to something else entirely.

(Mu Qing and Feng Xin have both always been baffled as to why everyone assumes that.)

"...This is ridiculous," the Water Master groans, seeming to be in a foul mood now, compared to when he was teasing Ling Wen and Pei Ming over their potential fatherhood. "Qingxuan, let's go."

His sister frowns, her lower lip jutting out. "But I wanna see who it is!"

Shi Wudu rolls his eyes, throwing his hands up. "She isn't going to say, and I doubt the father is even in this room, anyway."

"How can you know?!"

"Because she's accused just about everyone aside from you, me, Nan Yang, and the emperor."

He doesn't have to explain why it isn't Jun Wu, that goes without saying. If Jun Wu wished to have someone in his bed, he has royalty, scholars, and gods and goddesses at his disposal.

And, given that he's near omniscient, if he was the father—he would know.

“If Nan Yang recognized her and there was a possibility of his being the father—he would have said so.”

Absolutely no one can argue with that logic, and Feng Xin nods, seeming to agree.

“It can’t be you, because if this woman knew you for any amount of time—she would have recognized you in this form.”

(After all, Shi Qingxuan uses it so often—anyone close to the Wind Master knows it.)

“Wait—is she not a goddess?!”

“See? And it obviously wasn’t me.”

“How is that obvious?!”

Shi Wudu shrugs, holding his fan aloft with one hand, examining his nails with the other.

“I have standards.”

That finally manages to draw a squawk of indignation from Lan Chang, and Ling Wen speaks over her.

“If it’s no one here, then who is it?”

The Water Master doesn’t look up from his cuticles.

“Ming Yi isn’t here.”

Shi Qingxuan glares, her hands on her hips. “It ISN’T Ming Yi!”

“Oh, and how do you know?!”

“I just DO!” She huffs. “I’d sooner believe it was Mu Qing!”

The Martial God jumps, sending a frown Shi Qingxuan’s way. “Don’t drag me back into it!”

“Well she hasn’t pointed the finger at anyone else since you, has she?!”

“It should be easy enough to disprove,” Ling Wen cuts the Shi brothers off. “The Emperor simply has to bring out Yan Zhen again.”

The mere mention of that sword makes Mu Qing stiffen, his expression growing slightly pale—

“Enough,” Jun Wu murmurs, holding up a hand. “The Water Master is right, this is clearly going nowhere.”

He looks over at Lan Chang, who shrinks slightly under his gaze. “If she isn’t going to be forthcoming, and the child is a danger...we’ll simply have to keep her here until the truth can be determined.”

Of course, Lan Chang has committed no crime—but the child has.

Keeping her here while they determine what to do seems far less cruel than separating the two again.

And now, with the debate dying down, Shi Qingxuan leans close to whisper in Xie Lian’s ear, green eyes bright with curiosity.

“Your highness—where did you get that choker?”

“Oh?” Xie Lian blinks, tilting his chin down. “Well—it’s actually a little embarrassing —I left Ruoye behind when I was chasing the fetal spirit, and I had nothing to cover my shackle with, so...San Lang gave this to me.”

Shi Qingxuan leans closer with a nod— “I thought so.”

Xie Lian raises an eyebrow. “You did?”

Just as they’re discussing it, Feng Xin finally glances over, seeming to notice the choker for the first time.

“Your highness! You should take that off!”

The prince glances over at him, baffled. “What are you talking about?”

His former guard glares at the necklace, his brow pinching with suspicion. “It’s probably cursed! Or maybe he’ll use it to track you!”

“Huh?” Xie Lian frowns, reaching up to brush his fingertips over the jewelry. “San Lang wouldn’t give me anything dangerous.”

And when he does—he understands how Shi Qingxuan realized rather quickly where the choker came from.

The choker itself is made from black ribbon—but dangling from the front, just at the base of his throat...

It's a butterfly.

A silver one, from the feel of the metal.

And, to Xie Lian's chagrin, there are clearly gemstones set into the details along the wings.

What was the ghost king thinking, saying this was nothing?

The prince is going to have to give it back, it really is too much...

"And San Lang can see me whenever he likes." Xie Lian concludes with a shrug. "There's no need to track me."

"...Well, I think it's beautiful, your highness!" The Wind Master Shrugs. "It's wonderful that you have such a generous friend!"

Feng Xin chokes at the words 'generous' and 'friend,' but Xie Lian smiles.

"Thank you!"

From the other end of the room, the Water Master rolls his eyes—tired of all the spectacle.

Instead, he turns his attentions.

"Xuan Zhen."

Mu Qing glances in his direction, surprised. "Yes, Lord Water Master?"

Shi Wudu turns to leave. "I need to speak with you."

Of course, he clearly means privately—and with the way he exits the room, there's the clear presumption that Mu Qing will follow.

Which the Martial God does. After all—after Jun Wu, few are higher in the Heavenly Court than Shi Wudu.

His requests are given a certain weight.

Xie Lian chats with Shi Qingxuan amicably, offering small details about his trip to ghost city.

(Not the embarrassing ones, anyway.)

Part of him wishes he'd had the chance to speak with Mu Qing and Feng Xin, given how they left things, but…

It isn't the right time.

Lan Chang watched the scene unfolding before her, averting her eyes from the only truly familiar face, clutching the jar containing her son against her chest.

"…It's alright," she whispers, following the guards as they escort her from the martial hall.

They don't drag her or treat her roughly. The cage she is being escorted to is a comfortable one. And still…

When Heavenly Officials watch her from the streets, it's with only one thought—

'Monster.'

Lan Chang bows her head, holding her son close.

He isn't a monster.

To be a beautiful woman is to learn cruelty from a young age.

Lan Chang has seen many, many monsters over the course of her existence. Mortal and undead.

They wear many shapes and disguises.

Her son is not a monster—he never had the chance to be one thing or the other.

You can't be a monster, in the end, if you never had a choice.

CLACK! CLACK!

Each rattle of the dice clicks loudly against the emptiness of the space, echo spiraling upward, higher, higher, disappearing into the endless heights of the ceiling above.

Two Ghost Kings stand in a hall of the Dead, surrounded only by the soft flickers of light from the ghost fires around them.

“So, when your soul dispersed…” Blackwater glances around, his arms crossed. “This is where you ended up.”

Hua Cheng doesn’t reply.

He stares at a stone table. One that has gone unused for centuries, accompanying benches unoccupied.

A set of black dice sitting on the surface, identical to his own.

He remembers waking up here, as Wu Ming—to a rattle that would become so familiar.

CLACK!

CLACK!

‘…Oh, the little pup is finally waking up.’

‘Which way do you think he’s gonna go, Xiang?!’

The ghost king tears his gaze away, finally, his tone unfeeling. “You don’t remember? We saw it on the…”

The Kiln.

When they used Mount Tonglu to look forward—most of those memories, Hua Cheng lost when they left the confines of the Kiln itself, but…

His eyes turn toward the black door, looming at the far end of the hall.

He remembers seeing that door swinging wide open.

That memory is crystal clear.

A gaunt young man, broken and bleeding. A cultivator, claiming to go by the name ‘Lan.’

“…I lost most of it,” He Xuan admits.

But it isn’t the black door that draws his attention, no.

No, he looks to the other end of the hall.

He walks to the red door, standing in stark contrast to the darkness.

Hands clasped behind his back, his chin tilted up.

"...What are we doing here, He Xuan?" Hua Cheng questions, crossing his arms.

Blackwater doesn't look back at him, staring at that door.

"I came to make my final report on the Heavenly Court," the calamity murmurs, his eyes unmoving.

Hua Cheng raises an eyebrow at the word 'final.'

"...What is it?"

"It's as we originally suspected," He Xuan explains. "A group of lazy, privileged, incompetent individuals."

One ghost fire lands lazily against Hua Cheng's shoulder. The ghost king does little to disturb it, allowing it to rest there.

"That isn't surprising."

"No," He Xuan agrees. "...But it's by design."

No one can control who does or does not ascend. That is up to fate.

But one can certainly exert influence over who lasts in the heavenly court. Over who stays on for years, and who fades on into memory.

"The three most powerful among them—known as the three tumors—by and large perform most of the critical work involved in running the Heavens."

That much isn't new. The three tumors aren't particularly popular among their peers —but the adoration they receive from mortals has been well earned.

"For whatever reason, the emperor has been systematically undermining Ming Guang for the better part of a century."

Even Hua Cheng has noticed.

Ming Guang is among the only gods the calamity can remember from his childhood that remains in power—but recently, cracks have appeared in his foundations.

"Ling Wen has always been regarded for her efficiency," Blackwater's voice is low, recounting details like they're something distant, far removed from him. "But she's been given such a volume of work, even she is beginning to make mistakes."

Mistakes that prompt hints of doubt.

"But there's more." He Xuan braces himself, "When it comes to the crown prince of Xianle."

Hua Cheng's attention is a heavy thing–suddenly sharpening, all of it settling on the Water Demon's shoulders at ounce.

"...What about him?"

"In your honest estimation--just how powerful was he, during his first ascension?"

The Calamity falls silent, thinking.

Of course, from his perspective back then—Xie Lian had been omnipotent. And with his own biases, it takes a moment to truly consider it.

"...About as powerful as Pei is now," the Ghost King finally replies. After only seventeen years of cultivation, compared to Pei's centuries.

"The emperor clearly desires to keep a friendship with the prince," He Xuan murmurs. "But he remains in shackles."

Using Yin Yu, the two of them have done quite a bit of research on Cursed Shackles in the last century.

To the best of their knowledge, they can only be removed through two methods:

First, the spell caster removes them.

Second, being exposed to high levels of spiritual power.

And even through their experimentation, they were never even able to place a crack in Yin Yu's shackle–implying that the amount of energy required must be enormous.

"...The shackle in his eyes was fractured," Hua Cheng murmurs, his eyes narrowing with thought.

"In Gusu, yes."

Fighting the demon Wen Jiao.

"...In all honesty," He Xuan tilts his head back, peering into the endless darkness of the ceiling, trying to find a light at the end—and finding none. "Do you think a savage ranked demon could crack a cursed shackle?"

No.

Hua Cheng doesn't.

And if he was that powerful—Xie Lian, with all of his spiritual powers sealed, would not have been able to kill him with physical prowess alone.

"Which leaves two possibilities," Blackwater holds up his hand. "First," he lifts a finger, "there's a powerful entity in the ghost realm that neither one of us is aware of, and they were the one behind Wen Jiao."

Which seems unlikely.

"Or second, it was the emperor. Holding Pei's oldest stronghold captive, and whittling away at his power."

Which, if Jun Wu was already targeting Pei...

Hua Cheng's eye widens with understanding.

...It makes sense.

"Jun Wu's targeting of Pei has only worsened since Gusu. And after the mid autumn festival...it's become clear: something is coming."

Naturally, after hearing something so ominous—Hua Cheng stiffens. "...What?"

"I don't know," Blackwater admits. "But he's consolidating his power. And if it's enough to make Jun Wu worry--you should be preparing as well."

"...If you haven't figured it out, why are you telling me now?" Hua

Cheng raises an eyebrow. "Why here? ...And why would this be your final report?"

He Xuan's shoulders square themselves, his posture becoming firm.

"Consider the warning a matter of professional courtesy," the calamity mutters. "Because the prince will become a target, sooner or later. I'm letting you know in advance."

It's no small favor.

After all—Hua Cheng has been tracking him, but...

What He Xuan is implying—that kind of threat means that Crimson Rain will have to remain by or very close to the prince’s side for the foreseeable future.

“And, with Ming Yi dead...” He Xuan grits his teeth, his tone prickling with anger. The other ghost king glares.

“That wasn’t Shuo’s fault.”

If anything, he spared He Xuan from being exposed immediately.

“I didn’t say I blamed him,” Blackwater mutters, his shoulders hunching. “But I can’t keep up the charade for much longer with him gone.”

Once again—that’s the difference between them.

If Hua Cheng desired to pose as a Heavenly Official—as someone who has actually ascended—it wouldn’t be difficult for him. He’s capable of wielding Heavenly power.

(Hence why he’s able to hear prayers, and gain strength from them.) He Xuan, however, never ascended.

His ability to pose convincingly as a god was based on his holding the real Ming Yi prisoner. Using his spiritual power—and his worshippers—to shroud himself in a heavenly glow.

And now...

“I can keep it up for a few more weeks, at most.”

At which point, he’ll be left with two choices:

To reveal the truth behind ‘Ming Yi,’ or fake his own demise.

“...You couldn’t just take up another disguise?” Hua Cheng questions.

After all—He Xuan is a far better actor than anyone else Hua Cheng has ever met.

Man or woman, young or old. Whatever role he needs to be—he’s never struggled with playing it off.

Still, Blackwater shakes his head.

“...No,” he mutters, his voice...

...Empty.

“It will be too late for that.”

Hua Cheng’s stomach begins to sink.

Of all places, He Xuan asked to be brought here.

The younger ghost king reaches out, pressing his palm flat against the red door, staring down at ancient, worn carvings in the wood.

“...No more games, Hua Cheng,” his voice carries through the dark—chilling. “It’s time.”

There’s no need for explanation or specification.

With He Xuan, there has only ever been one thing on his mind. One goal.

One end to this story, a narrative he never asked to be written into.

Hua Cheng stares.

“...Isn’t that playing right into the emperor’s hands?”

He Xuan’s fingers dig into the wood, finding it harsh and unforgiving under his touch.

Maybe.

“...I don’t care,” he mutters, lowering his hand. “If I wait longer, I won’t have a chance.”

“How could you know that?”

“...He received over seven hundred lanterns, Hua Cheng.”

Barely short of the emperor's count. All from individual temples and worshippers, scattered throughout the continent.

Not simply because Hua Cheng was feeling affectionate, and wanted to make a grand gesture.

That's power.

"He's facing a third calamity soon."

Meaning that—absent interference, Shi Wudu is about to become even more powerful than he was before.

So powerful that, if He Xuan doesn't kill him now—he won't be able to afterwards. "...If that's true, then won't Jun Wu—?"

"Attack him?! Yes!" He Xuan slams his fist against the door. "But if he's going to be struck down, why shouldn't it be me?! Haven't I earned that?!"

Crimson Rain proposes no argument, falling silent in the face of a rare show of emotion from the other calamity.

He Xuan has been facing away from him for the entirety of the conversation, never turning his eyes away from the door that lies before him.

"...And what about the Wind Master, then?" Hua Cheng asks quietly, watching as Blackwater finally flinches.

"What will become of her?"

He Xuan takes a moment to respond—and when he does, his voice is low. Tightly controlled.

"...I know I made a mistake with Shi Qingxuan," he mutters. That's more than he could admit a month ago, anyway.

"I won't kill her."

In fact, he'll even give her a chance.

To make amends for her part in it. To make the right choice, once she knows the truth.

It's more of an opportunity than anyone has ever spared him. "And what about after?"

He Xuan squeezes his eyes shut.

It's always that question.

That stupid, inescapable fucking question.

'What's left of you after, He Sheng?'

"...I don't care," he mutters, his eyes narrowed into slits, the redness of the door blurring in front of him. "Maybe I'll walk through this door when it's finished. After I fight your war with you—I haven't forgotten my promise."

Hua Cheng knows that, in the end, if Blackwater is set on this—he can't stop him.

And it won't interfere with Hua Cheng's own plans. He has no compelling reason to stop him.

But still.

"...It won't bring them back, He Xuan."

Blackwater's shoulders hunch sharply.

He knows.

There are some moments when he still can't understand it.

That, after everything He Zhong and Qin Meirong suffered through—when they came to this door, they walked straight in.

They moved on. They're at peace. But He Xuan can't. He can't move on. He can't rest.

He can't live.

"Well," Blackwater's voice lowers down to a snarl—and when he finally turns his head to look back at Hua Cheng...

His eyes burn hatefully.

"...Aren't you a fucking hypocrite."

Crimson Rain narrows his gaze in response.

"When you were Wu Ming, you felt it all the time, didn't you? The blade in your heart." He Xuan turns around, his hands balled into fists.

Of course, he did.

When you die, all wounds heal.

Except, that is, for the blow that killed you.

Hong'er felt it, drifting behind his god in the dark, a ghost fire flickering in the night.

Felt it in that temple, screaming with rage and agony as he watched Bai Wuxiang rip his love apart.

That blade was still in Wu Ming's heart when he watched Qi Rong suffer the same fate.

It was cutting him when he stood on the streets of Lang-er Bay, turning Fangxin on himself, and with it, the curse of ten thousand souls.

Even when Hua Cheng woke up here, to the rattling of dice and the crows of two gamblers, he still felt that wound.

It didn't go away until he forged E'Ming.

Until the sky filled with light, and Hua Cheng stood at a point where two paths diverged, forced to choose.

"...I still feel it." He Xuan glares, pressing a clawed hand against his chest. "Every second of every day."

His form flickers, and for just a moment--Hua Cheng sees the truth beneath a handsome mask.

The bloodshot eyes, ruptured blood vessels in the cheeks and throat, spidery dark veins stretched over pale, waxen skin.

"Not just in my lungs," the calamity rasps. "But the weight."

The weight of all of that water at the bottom of the sea, crushing down on him.

Dragging him down. Squeezing every breath, every passing glimpse of happiness away from him.

He still feels the fatigue.

The endless exhaustion.

And oh god, then there's the emptiness.

A ravenous, stripping sort of hunger. One that robs a man of his senses, with only one thought:

To feel something, anything, other than that void.

He Xuan has spent four centuries desperately struggling to fill it.

With food. Liquor. Women.

Nothing ever satisfies.

"...And I won't ascend, even if I get my fate back." He Xuan mutters, staring ahead, his eyes somewhere between rage and numbness.

Shi Qingxuan already ascended, after all.

That opportunity has been used up.

"So, I will always feel it." He spits out the words.

"What is dying, compared to that?!" He shakes his head vehemently, golden earrings clinking together. "What is ANYTHING I could do to them, compared to what they've taken from me?!"

Nothing. It's comparable.

Everything is, when a person is faced with four centuries of drowning.

"And you sit here, and you preach to me like some paragon of forgiveness," He Xuan sneers, "When you're called the bane of the heavens—and for what?! Because they INSULTED the prince?! They told rumors about him?!"

"Careful," Hua Cheng cautions him coldly.

"NO!" He Xuan swats a ghost fire away from him, his eyes burning in the dark. "My sister—she took her own life to escape being raped."

Hua Cheng's expression remains unchanged.

Unreadable.

"My fiancé was beaten to death before she could suffer the same fate."

That's the face he sees every night, when he manages to steal even an ounce of sleep. Qin Meirong, blood bubbling past her lips, fading away in his arms.

Trying to reassure He Sheng, rather than being afraid for herself.

Telling him it would be alright.

"...But you cut every single one of those gods down in battle, didn't you? Burned their temples to the ground. All because they called the crown prince false names."

He Xuan shakes his head.

"I would never call you wrong for that. So don't you DARE preach FORGIVENESS to me!"

"I'm not asking you to forgive him, He Xuan." Hua Cheng shakes his head. "But there's a cost to what you plan to do."

Hua Cheng didn't kill those officials out of revenge. He killed them because they broke their end of a bargain.

Revenge, in its purest form, only breeds more resentment. And with that, comes curses.

Fai and Xiang had every right to feel hatred, even in death. But it was their inability to let it go that spurred on a curse.

One that Hua Cheng inadvertently made worse, lengthening their lives the way he did. Even if he only had good intentions.

And that's the thing about curses.

You never know where they'll land, or who will get hurt.

In the end, it's rarely the person you were aiming for.

"I don't care," He Xuan shakes his head. "I have nothing left to lose, Hua Cheng. Even if I get dispersed—I don't care."

Hua Cheng actually believes that. But still.

"I wouldn't assume that you have nothing to lose," he mutters.

And oh, Blackwater finds that laughable.

"That's easy for you to say," he mutters, looking Hua Cheng over. "It's so easy for you, to play the charade."

And everyone calls He Xuan a talented actor.

"After all, I wasn't as lucky as you," Blackwater sneers. "To fall in love with someone who can't die."

Hua Cheng couldn't call that a blessing—and he knows Xie Lian wouldn't either. He's glad to have his god alive and breathing, but...

It would actually be far easier to protect Xie Lian, if the prince was a ghost.

"I'm sure having that—having ONE thing to hold onto, helped."

He Xuan bows his head, his shoulders trembling.

Grief gnaws at him like a starving dog, trying to get at the bit of marrow left inside a bone.

Persistent, stinging. Slowly breaking him down.

"But he took EVERYTHING FROM ME!"

His roar rattles the walls in it's ferocity.

The break in concentration hits him then, and with it—comes that weight. The crushing, ever present weight of black waters, dragging him down.

It forces He Xuan down to his hands and knees, taking desperate gasps of air—and they don't help.

He shouldn't need to breathe.

But still, he always tries. Desperately tries to cough that water up and out of his lungs. It always remains.

"...You can think I'm a monster," he rasps, clutching at his throat. "I don't care."

He doesn't care.

He doesn't care.

He doesn't care .

"If it makes you feel better to pretend you're not, then fine," he shakes his head.

After all, he wants to be loved by his god. To be seen as something better than what they both are. He Xuan can't fault him for that.

"...But I don't have a choice."

That was taken from him.

"..." Gently, Hua Cheng nudges the ghost fire from his shoulder, kneeling down before his fellow calamity, elbows resting on his knees.

"No," he murmurs, his tone even. "You aren't a monster, He Sheng."

The mention of his childhood name makes Blackwater tremble.

Hua Cheng's eye has grown impossibly dark, glimmering under the lights from the fires around.

"But I am."

Blackwater's gaze flickers up, and when he makes eye contact with the older ghost...

Hua Cheng's gaze seems bottomless.

A wide, gaping void. Vast in its frigidity.

"That's the difference between you, and me." He explains calmly. "You say you don't have a choice. But that isn't true. If you didn't, you would be an animal. You're not."

He Xuan was a good man, once. Warped now by pain and hopelessness. But beneath, there's human decency.

Hua Cheng possesses no such thing.

"You talk as though we're the same, or our suffering can be weighed against one other on a scale, and the winner gets to determine what justice means." Hua Cheng arches an eyebrow. "Is that what you want to do?"

He Xuan clenches his teeth.

"That conversation won't go well for you."

They both know one another's lives, to a certain extent.

How He Xuan was born into a relatively poor family, but a loving one. Up until his fate was switched, life was kind to him.

Life has never been kind to Hua Cheng.

"I've seen—"

"No," Hua Cheng cuts him off, shaking his head. "You haven't seen it all."

Blackwater's eyes widen slightly at the implication.

In the Kiln, their very souls blurred, tearing through each other's memories. But...

Could Hua Cheng have kept something hidden?

"No one gets to see what happened to my mother," Crimson Rain explains with such detachment. His voice calm, his gaze remote. "Not you. Not even Zhao Beitong."

That memory remains locked in the very pits of his soul.

"But you guessed, I remember."

It's difficult to explain the feeling that goes through one's mind, in the Kiln.

Having someone walking through the halls of your memories, putting moments together like broken shards of glass.

Hua Cheng's earliest memories were like a crime scene. Scattered, hidden.

One moment, his mother was alive—and Hong'er was a normal, if not slightly ill behaved child.

In the next, she was gone, and the boy who remained...

Was utterly unrecognizable.

"It was her husband," Hua Cheng explains. "She ran, to hide me from him."

But not Hong'er's father.

His father was a soldier, and he loved his mother very much.

Up until this morning, those were the only two things Hua Cheng knew about the man.

Until he saw the golden belt hidden underneath Lan Chang's robes.

As for how that confrontation is going in the Heavens—he wouldn't know. He's been too preoccupied with He Xuan to watch.

"And just as the light was fading from her eyes," he continues, "he grabbed me by the chin, and he made me watch."

'You did this.'

That was what he said.

'This is what happens to anyone who protects a little mongrel like you.'

And he wasn't wrong.

That was all Hong'er could think, watching his god endure the same thing, sacrificed upon his own altar.

"...I stopped feeling certain things, after that." Hua Cheng admits. "I still don't."

And in the years that followed—even if he never hurt anyone, simply because he was too weak to do so much as even defend himself—

That didn't mean that Hua Cheng wasn't a monster.

That didn't mean he wouldn't have done horrible things, if he could.

"And after I became Hua Cheng..." The Ghost King explains, never breaking eye contact, "I found him."

Old, miserable, ill-contented. Married twice over since then, with one daughter.

"The things I did to him are beyond your imagination, even now."

Because there are certain things that only monsters do. Things that other people just don't think about.

"His wife fainted. His daughter fled to the room, and I let her." Hua Cheng tilts his head. "That seemed fair. But not his parents."

Hua Cheng made them watch.

He allowed them to beg for their son's life, and he pretended to consider. Just to watch that last glimmer of hope in his eyes.

And then, he laughed.

All the while, they never understood why the ghost king was torturing him. Because Hua Cheng couldn't say his name.

"You've been speaking as though there's some layer of human cruelty beyond my understanding. That I'm telling you these things because I simply can't comprehend the scope of your pain."

The ghost king shrugs.

"I understood those things centuries before you were born."

And once you allow yourself to take joy in someone else's suffering, you gain a taste for it.

For most people, a nasty temper is like an angry dog lurking underneath one's patience, waiting to bite.

Hua Cheng's wrath is like a tiger—and it's always there.

It's always hungry.

Lurking in the corner of every room, watching him with an opportunistic gaze. It won't ever leave.

Hua Cheng had to learn to stop looking at it.

To stop feeding it.

"...I know you," Hua Cheng mutters. "There are limits to the things that you are willing to do."

And it is those very limits that will haunt He Xuan, when he inevitably takes this too far.

When he does something that he can't take back.

Because He Xuan was a good man, once.

But Hua Cheng isn't.

Hua Cheng has never once, in all of his life, been a good man. He was a miserable child. A vengeful teenager.

"...The only things I won't do are the things I can't justify to the god I pray to."

Not because of some moral judgment he's made, no.

Simply because, above all else—

Hua Cheng is a selfish man.

He cannot allow himself to become something Xie Lian wouldn't forgive him for. Hua Cheng was a monster. Every moment of every day, he could become one. And each time, he makes the choice not to.

In the end, monsters don't exist.

Only humans who make monstrous choices.

He Xuan finally breaks away from Hua Cheng's gaze, bowing his head.

"...I have done everything you ever asked of me," the calamity whispers, his shoulders trembling. "Everything I promised I would do—I've delivered."

He isn't wrong.

"You made me a promise, Hua Cheng."

The older calamity sighs, rising to his feet.

He knows he did.

Centuries ago. A bargain struck, bound by blood and fate.

Hua Cheng won't break it now.

"...I won't get in your way," he mutters, swallowing down the bitter taste in his mouth.

"But if he gets involved..."

If Xie Lian gets involved, Hua Cheng will assist him. He Xuan knows that.

"...Just don't actively work against me," He Xuan replies. "I think that's fair."

Oh, Hua Cheng doubts that.

They have ventured beyond fairness, at this point—wandering deep into muddled, black waters.

In the heavens, things remain similarly unclear.

“...So,” Mu Qing steps into the Water Master’s sitting room, arching an eyebrow. “You wanted to speak to me?”

Shi Wudu takes a seat on one of the sofas, setting his fan aside. “I did.”

“About what, exactly?”

“...” The water god pushes his hair behind his ears, glancing away from him. “... Something’s wrong with me,” he mutters.

Mu Qing stares, baffled. “What?”

“I have my third heavenly calamity coming up, and something is wrong with me. Medically.” Shi Wudu repeats, irritated.

“Isn’t that your area of expertise?”

“It is.” Mu Qing agrees slowly, confused, because...

Physically, the water master looks absolutely fine.

“Then are you going to examine me, or not?”

“Alright, alright...” the martial god grumbles, rolling his sleeves up to the elbow.

“Undress from the waist up.”

Shi Wudu complies, shrugging out of the sleeves of his robes, allowing them to pool around his waist, pushing his hair behind his neck.

“Have you encountered anything strange lately?” After all, he’s a god.

Unlike mortals, he isn’t susceptible to the same illnesses and injuries. Not in a way that could seriously harm him.

When a god takes ill, it’s usually because of exposure to demonic energy.

Shi Wudu shakes his head.

“Not at all.”

Mu Qing performs a basic exam initially, and...

There really isn’t anything immediately concerning.

His color is good—along with his lungs and his pulse. The only thing worth noting is weight loss, since the last time Mu Qing examined the Water Master.

He still isn’t underweight—his body is toned, visibly healthy, so...

“...What are your symptoms, exactly?” Mu Qing questions, leaning back to glance over the water god’s shoulder.

“My appetite is gone,” Shi Wudu mutters with a shrug.

That explains the weight loss, then.

“I get these terrible headaches, I can barely sleep, and when I do...”

Mu Qing waits, expecting him to say something about horrible nightmares or anything of the like, but—

“...I can’t remember any of it.”

“Any of what?”

“Dreaming.”

Which is bizarre—for him, at least.

Shi Wudu has always been able to remember his dreams. Often in vivid detail—and sometimes, to his own detriment.

"Is there anything else?"

The Water Master falls silent, hesitant, and Mu Qing leans back, crossing his arms.

"All of this is confidential, Lord Water Master."

"..." Shi Wudu crosses his arms, looking pointedly in the opposite direction—as proud as ever. To the point where Mu Qing assumes that he isn't going to answer—

"I get these...attacks." He mutters, his shoulders hunching in. Well. That's wonderfully vague.

"...Attacks?"

The water master nods, keeping his face turned away.

"I used to get them back when I was mortal, but recently...they've come back."

Which explains why Shi Wudu assumes the issue is medical, Mu Qing supposes.

"...What are these attacks like?"

There's still hesitation on Shi Wudu's end, but...

He sighs.

"They always come out of nowhere—and when they do, I can't breathe," he mutters. "My heart beats rapidly. If it gets bad enough, I'll get sick to my stomach."

The more Mu Qing listens, the more he...

"...Lord Water Master," he isn't usually so tactful—but that's a choice. "Has anything...upsetting happened to you recently?"

Mu Qing is capable of handling a conversation delicately, when he desires to.

"...What?" Shi Wudu asks flatly, finally looking back at him.

"Well..." The martial god thinks it over, struggling to phrase this in a way that won't conflict with the Water Master's pride. "I was a soldier, as you know—and sometimes, after the war...many of my comrades experienced attacks very similar to that."

"...No," Shi Wudu finally answers, shaking his head. "I'm not a soldier, and I've never been in any war. Especially not recently."

"It can happen to people who aren't soldiers." Mu Qing disagrees quietly.

His own mother had them when he was young.

His little sister, too.

Feng Xin got them after his father died. There would be days when Xie Lian was off, arguing with the heavens, and Feng Xin...there was no battle, no present danger—

But he couldn't stop shaking.

Holding Mu Qing so tightly, the young general had felt like his ribs would break.

When Mu Qing said as much, Feng Xin would whisper that he was sorry.

He would apologize, and hold Mu Qing even tighter. Like he was worried that, if he let Mu Qing go for even a moment—the world might end.

"...So, if something's happened, even if you might not think it was serious enough to warrant that—"

"No," the water master mutters, looking away. "There's been nothing like that."

Somehow, Mu Qing...

He doesn't believe him.

"But..." Shi Wudu pulls his robes back up. "...If my attacks were like theirs—is there a treatment for that?" Of course, therein lies the problem.

"Not that I know of," Mu Qing admits. "Most of the guys I served with would self medicate. Alcohol. Gambling. Women. That sort of thing. Whether or not that works..."

Then it occurs to him.

"Honestly, Pei has more experience with this sort of thing than I do," Mu Qing offers, standing up. "You might want to ask—"

"Thank you," Shi Wudu cuts him off coldly. "I'll remember that. I apologize for wasting your time."

He did no such thing, but...

"...Oh, and by the way," The Water Master glances up in the middle of adjusting his hair, carefully working each strand back into a perfectly placed style. "The emperor seems to have taken an interest in you recently."

Mu Qing shrugs, looking away "I think he was just concerned."

"...Be careful with that," the Water Master advises, checking his appearance in the mirror.

Mu Qing glances back at him, adjusting his sleeves. "What?"

"The emperor's attention," Shi Wudu shrugs, his tone blasé. "His concern. People tend to forget what he is."

"...What he is?"

The Water Master levels him with a pointed stare.

"A man." He explains flatly. "If he's being kind to you—or anyone—it's not out of the kindness of his heart. He wants something." Shi Wudu looks him up and down. "I thought you were cynical enough to understand that."

It isn't exactly a glowing review of Jun Wu's character. Particularly not coming from his...

Mu Qing's eyes drift back down to the Water Master, widening slightly. ...His favorite among all of the Heavenly Court.

"...I am," the martial god finally replies.

"But thank you for the warning, Lord Water Master."

He leaves not long after that—but now, he finds himself...

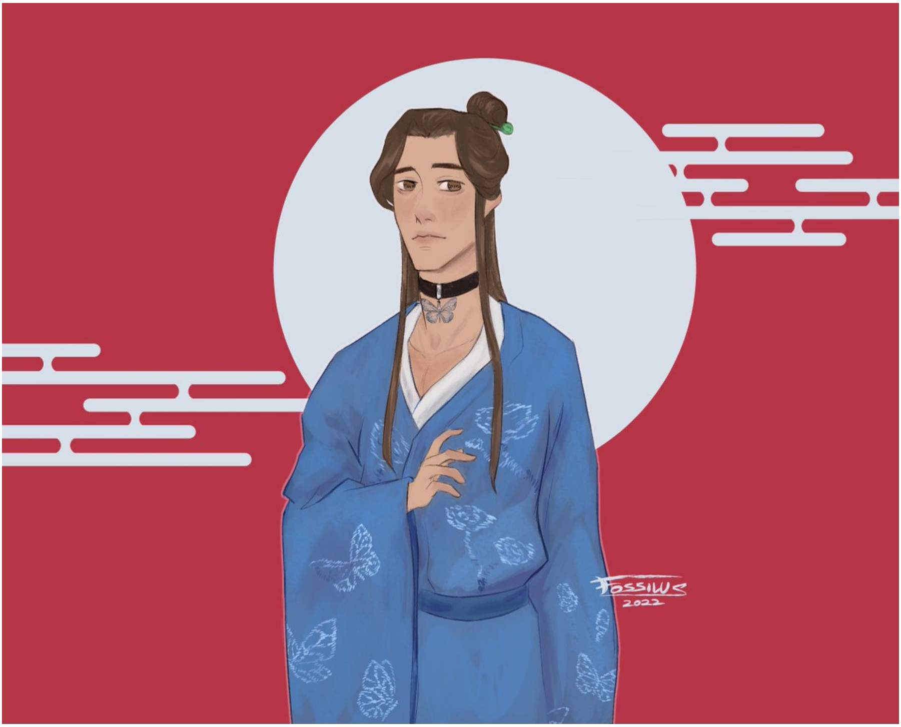
Wondering if the relationship between the Emperor and The Water Master was... something far different from what he originally understood.

And what that means, if true.

ARTWORK INSPIRED BY THIS STORY

Included with permission from artists, do not repost or reuse.

CREDIT: LAKI



Fossilus
2022

CREDIT: FOSSIL

Chapter End Notes

> thank you to laki and fossil for their amazing artwork, and allowing me to share it!
>
> xoxo, Evie

Educational Purposes

Chapter Summary

> A slow smile spreads across the prince's face as he stands back up.
>
> He hurries back up the path, far more eager than he was before, calling out—
>
> "San Lang?"
>
> After a moment, a lazy voice comes back in response—
>
> "Welcome back, dianxia."

Chapter Notes

> this chapter is very long, but NOT angsty, so consider it a nice little interlude before the blackwater arc !

See the end of the chapter for more notes

Xie Lian descends from the Heavens, feeling no worse for wear—which is a first, after his first three missions since his third ascension. Each one left him more exhausted than the last.

But, well…

(He slept very well, the night before.)

Still, he can't help but feel guilty.

Xie Lian left to get food for the shrine—and now, he's returning empty handed.

He has no doubt that Lang Qianqiu and Ren Song wouldn't have allowed Guzi and Lang Ying to starve in the meantime, but still.

The children are in his care—it's his responsibility.

Xie Lian still has the gold pieces that Hua Cheng gave him in exchange for the garment he took—but he hasn't actually bought any food yet.

Which he feels even worse about, considering how he spent the evening stuffing his face with mantou and…

Being pampered by a ghost king.

He silently chides himself, walking up the path to Puqi shrine. It's difficult to remember sometimes—he's so accustomed to being alone, he forgets about other people.

He has to be more mindful of that.

The prince is so lost in thought—he really doesn't hear it coming.

Not until something slams into his chest—hard enough to knock him over, sending him sprawling in the grass.

And of course, being the trained warrior that he is—Xie Lian sits up immediately, prepared to fight back, but...

"...Ruoye?"

The spiritual device trembles, rubbing underneath Xie Lian's chin, and the prince sighs sympathetically, reaching down to pet the silk bandage.

"I'm so sorry," he mutters. "I didn't mean to leave you behind back there. But...how did you make it back?"

Just as he asks that, Xie Lian hears faint wailing in the distance, his ears perking.

"...C'mon, gege, stop!"

Coming from a rather familiar voice.

"I'm gonna DIE! I don't deserve this! I DIDN'T EVEN START IT!"

A slow smile spreads across the prince's face as he stands back up.

He hurries back up the path, far more eager than he was before, calling out—

"San Lang?"

After a moment, a lazy voice comes back in response—

"Welcome back, dianxia."

And then there's Shuo's voice, whining. "Your highness! Tell him I didn't do anything! I...I HELPED!"

A soft laugh slips from Xie Lian's lips, and his eyebrows raise. "...Are you alright? You make it sound like he's torturing you."

"Oh," Hua Cheng's voice is distinctly sarcastic. "I really am, gege. He's suffering."

"I AM!" Shuo flails his arms. "All the blood is in my HEAD!"

He's being held upside down, the back of his head bumping against the small of Hua Cheng's back, his legs held mercilessly over the Ghost King's shoulders.

"Stop acting like you're going to have a stroke."

"Maybe I AM!"

"You're dead."

"SO?!"

Hua Cheng rolls his eyes, leaning against the doorframe of the shrine.

He's still in his older form—eyepatch in place—but his hair is pulled up into a lopsided ponytail, not so different from when he appeared in the beginning, calling himself 'San Lang.'

His clothes are the same as back then too—with his red outer robes tied around his waist.

"San Lang, are you bullying him?"

The ghost king's eyebrows raise innocently.

"Oh, no, dianxia. I never bully."

(Even Xie Lian knows that not to be true, he's been Hua Cheng's victim.)

"Gege, Hua Chengzhu—c'mon, this is SO embarrassing, PUT ME DOWN! I MADE HIM AN ATTIC!"

"You made yourself a bedroom," Hua Cheng shrugs, a piece of weed grass between his teeth. "You know how to get down."

Shuo slams his head against Hua Cheng's back, incensed. "I'm not FIVE!"

“Could’ve fooled me,” The ghost king counters lazily. One of the farmers glances over at the scene, walking down the road leading past the shrine—and Hua Cheng shrugs, calling over.

“He’s at that age, y’know?” Xie Lian bites back a snort.

After all—Hua Cheng does look very much like a young father, disciplining an unruly son.

“Oh, I understand!” The farmer calls back with an easy going smile. Shuo glares at the interior of the shrine, his hair dangling in his face. “My oldest was a handful during that phase!”

“I’m almost eight centuries old!” Shuo whispers furiously.

Hua Cheng just smiles, nodding his head politely as the villager disappears down the path.

Xie Lian bites his lip, his expression brimming with amusement as he leans against the railing of the steps.

“Does he do this to you a lot?”

Shuo glares, crossing his arms over his chest. “It’s his way of bullying me into doing whatever he wants.”

“I don’t bully,” Hua Cheng corrects him easily, watching Xie Lian with a lopsided smile, repeating:

“He knows how to get down.”

“Meaning?” Xie Lian questions, raising an eyebrow.

“...WISDOM!” Shuo shouts, leaving the prince absolutely baffled, but Hua Cheng just snickers, rolling the piece of wheat grass between his teeth.

“You’ve already tried that one.”

“HOW AM I SUPPOSED TO REMEMBER?!”

“Is it...uh...that one poem you like?! The one with the mountain?!” Xie Lian perks up.

Hua Cheng likes poetry?

“Nope.”

“…What is he trying to guess?”

Shuo sulks, blowing his hair out of his face. “He’ll only put me down if I do what he wants, or…”

He groans, frustrated.

“I have to guess what his tattoo says!”

Xie Lian’s eyebrows raise. “…San Lang, you have a tattoo?”

“Mmhm,” The ghost king hums in agreement, letting go of one of Shuo’s ankles, reaching out so the prince can feel it.

His sleeves have both been rolled up to the elbow, revealing toned, muscular forearms—and when Xie Lian brushes his fingertips over the ghost king’s skin, he can feel the raised points where it’s been marked with ink.

“These…are characters?” He mutters, raising an eyebrow. Only in the point of view of an insane person, surely.

Thankfully, neither one of them can see just how sheepish Hua Cheng’s expression has become.

“…I got it when I was very young,” he explains with a shrug.

“Well, uh…I like it!” Xie Lian smiles up at him.

“It’s got style!”

“I’ve been trying to guess what it says for eight hundred years,” Shuo grumbles. “And I’ve NEVER gotten it!”

(Implying that Hua Cheng does this to him quite often.)

Xie Lian can’t blame him—the characters are completely illegible.

“You say this as if you don’t have another option,” Hua Cheng muses, the bells on his boots clinking softly as he crosses his legs, easily holding the ghost upside down with one hand around his ankle.

“…” Shuo huffs, clearing his throat. “…Your highness?” Xie Lian looks up.

“…I’m really sorry for messing up your shrine,” he mumbles, his tone low and sulking. “Even if was made out of balsa wood—OW!” He whines when Hua Cheng bounces him sharply, his head thunking against his back again.

“Good apologies don’t have qualifiers attached, brat.”

"Alright, ALRIGHT!" Shuo grumbles, rubbing the back of his head. "I'm just SORRY, okay?!"

"And?"

Xie Lian really wants to say it's enough, that the poor demon as already suffered enough, but–

"...Are there any improvements I can help with that aren't self-serving?"

"Oh...I don't know if the attic was self-serving..." Xie Lian smiles, tilting his head. "I can make use of it, even when you aren't staying here!"

"Please dianxia," he mumbles, going limp in Hua Cheng's hold in surrender. "He won't let me go until you come up with something..."

"San Lang..."

"Don't take pity on him, gege," Hua Cheng shakes his head. "He's playing on your sympathies."

"Am not!"

"Ah..." Xie Lian rubs his chin, thinking. "Well, he already built a second level, and unless the foundations were built out, there really isn't..."

"Don't worry about that," the ghost king assures him. "He can handle whatever you need."

Ah, well…in that case…

"...A separate sleeping area on the lower floor might be nice?" Xie Lian offers. "But if that's too much work—""It's not," Hua Cheng glances over his shoulder."Isn't that right?"

"...No..." Shuo grumbles. "It's no trouble at all..." With that, he's dropped back down—landing on his palms, performing a brief handstand before rolling to his feet, rubbing his back.

"Tyrant..." He grumbles, to which Hua Cheng smirks.

"What was that?"

Shuo clears his throat, clasping his hands in front of him innocently, "Thank you Hua Chengzhu, for this AMAZING lesson in personal accountability! I'm so grateful!" He adds a sarcastic little spin, for good measure.

"You're welcome."

"Die..." He grumbles, walking off.

"Hmm?" Xie Lian turns his head in Shuo's direction, frowning slightly. "Where are you going?"

He just got back, after all.

"To get some stone, I'll be back..."

He can conjure the wood out of thin air, but the other building materials...require heavy lifting.

And Hua Cheng wasn't offering, implying that Shuo has to go and get it himself.

"...You're a bit hard on him, San Lang," Xie Lian murmurs—but there's little bite to it. "Did you come all the way here just to discipline him?"

"Mmm..." The calamity shrugs. "And to bring Ruoye."

That draws out the smile Xie Lian's been biting back since he arrived. "Thank you for doing that," he reaches over, squeezing Hua Cheng's forearm again. "I still can't believe I left him..."

"I'm the one who stole you away," the ghost king shrugs. "I didn't mind."

There's something about the way he says 'stole you away' that makes Xie Lian's train of thought go sideways, though he couldn't say why.

"Did you just come for those reasons, or...?"

Hua Cheng raises an eyebrow. "Am I being a nuisance?"

"No!" Xie Lian exclaims immediately. Then, realizing how vehemently he denied it, his ears grow slightly pink. "No, I was very happy to find you here," he admits. "I was only wondering how long San Lang planned on staying."

"Hmm..." Hua Cheng thinks it over, rubbing his chin. "I thought I might like some time away from Ghost City, and gege offered to host me—so, I thought I would stay here a while."

(Hua Cheng's heart leaps slightly, when he watches the way Xie Lian's expression brightens.)

"Would that be alright with you, your highness?"

Xie Lian smiles—widely and honestly, nodding quickly with agreement.

"Mmhm!" Then, for the first time since he arrived—he remembers. "Oh—where are Qi Rong and Lang Qianqiu?"

The children are exactly where they're supposed to be, playing inside, but those two... "Ah," Hua Cheng waves that off. "You think I only disciplined Shuo?"

"..." Xie Lian's smile doesn't fade—he's too pleased to be upset, really, but…

"...Are they here?"

"Yes, dianxia."

"Are they daruma dolls?"

"As always, his highness is excellent at guessing."

Xie Lian knows he should probably demand that Hua Cheng let them both go right now, but…

The ghost king seems to be having the same thought, tilting his head to the side. "Gege isn't bothered by it?"

"Well..." The prince scratches his head.

"...They're both a bit of a handful, and I've been away from the village for a little while, so I have a few errands to run. I couldn't ask you to deal with them while I'm gone..." Xie Lian explains.

Clink!

Hua Cheng's boots jingle softly as he steps away from the doorframe.

There's such an ease to him as he approaches the prince, reaching out and carefully tucking a lock of hair behind Xie Lian's ear. A touch Xie Lian enjoys, until he remembers…

Hua Cheng did that last night...right before he…

'That isn't the way I kiss a person.'

Ba-bump.

...Why is he thinking of that right now? That was just—

Hua Cheng pulls his hand back, flicking away a leaf that had been caught in the god's hair.

"Can I accompany gege on these errands?"

A leaf! Just a leaf, that's all. He…

Xie Lian clears his throat.

"Ah...of course, San Lang—if you want to. I can't imagine it'll be very interesting, but—"

"Then gege can lead the way."

When he speaks again, it's in the same voice he used when he first appeared on the ox cart—and, Xie Lian suspects, the same younger form.

Hua Cheng did say he should 'lead the way, ' but the moment Xie Lian picks up his bag, the Ghost King insists on carrying it for him—and on Xie Lian holding his elbow, using Hua Cheng to steady himself when he encounters an unexpected dip in the road.

The villagers recognize him as they pass by, and a few call over, delighted. "Well, if it ain't Xiao Hua!"

"You finally came back from your parents house, huh?"

"What a strapping young man!"

A smile tugs at Xie Lian's lips, his hand tightening slightly on Hua Cheng's arm.

It reminds him of, years ago, in the very same village, doing this with Hong'er. How fond the local farmers were of him.

For being so diligent, looking after the local blind taoist.

Usually, remembering something like that makes him ache, but…

Not when he's with San Lang.

When he's with him, the memory feels...more sweet than it is bitter, even if there's always a hint of both. But there's something else now, tugging at his mind. A memory so old, so far back in his recollection, he struggles to bring it back, but…

There was something the farmers in the village said back then, about Hong'er...and it feels important--but Xie Lian can only remember his response.

'No.'

'My Hong'er was a soldier.'

But...what were they asking him? And why is Xie Lian thinking about that now? He—?

"Gege..." Hua Cheng speaks up when they're in the market, holding a basket as Xie Lian begins to buy food, along with other odds and ends for the shrine. "I've been wondering about something."

"Oh?" Xie Lian turns his chin in Hua Cheng's direction, tilting his head back.

"Back when I took you from the Heavens, and Lang Qianqiu chased after us..."

Ah, yes. The memory of Lang Qianqiu walking in on them in a...easily misunderstood position is still a little embarrassing, but Xie Lian doesn't react to that.

"Yes?"

"Did he actually propose to you?"

Xie Lian's smile freezes in place, the wind knocking out of his chest.

"I...what?"

"He said...right before everything happened...that he proposed," Hua Cheng shrugs. "And you didn't deny that was the case."

"Ah, well..." Xie Lian quickly looks away, rubbing his neck. "I mean...he didn't explicitly...say anything like that," The prince mutters, suddenly feeling...very sheepish. "But it was pretty clearly a confession of sorts..."

"But then An Le's men attacked the banquet, and you had to leave in the middle of the conversation."

"Exactly," Xie Lian nods, relieved that there's really nothing else to say about it—

"But how did he say it?"

The prince nearly drops the potatoes in his hands, just choosing randomly before hurriedly dropping one of them in the basket.

"What do you mean?"

"Well," Hua Cheng walks beside him as they move to the next stall, "he clearly seemed to think of it as a proposal, but you found it less so. I'm simply wondering exactly what he said."

"Ah..." Xie Lian purses his lips. "To tease him, or me?"

“I would never.”

Maybe both, then.

Xie Lian sighs, rolling the chain around his neck between his fingers.

“...Well, he gave me flowers,” the prince starts, adding— “No one in the palace knew I was blind, so he thought I could see them—San Lang, are you laughing?!”

“No,” Hua Cheng lies smoothly, even as his shoulders are trembling with amusement.

It’s just so easy to see the scene unfolding in his mind’s eye—because, knowing Xie Lian, even if he had no idea what the flowers looked like, he would still say—

“I’m sure they were beautiful!”

“I’m sure, I’m sure...” Hua Cheng agrees lightly, waiting for Xie Lian to continue.

"..." The prince swallows hard, turning his attention to a display of fresh onions, making sure the ones he selects are fresh. "Well...then he went on about how I should stay with him, in Yong'an..."

Hua Cheng seems to have gotten his fill of laughing now, at least, listening to Xie Lian quietly.

"...And about how he would protect me, and never let anyone hurt me..."

"...Gege..." Hua Cheng shakes his head, wiping a hand down his forehead. "What?"

"...That couldn't more clearly be a proposal."

Xie Lian stops, an onion in each hand, his jaw going slack. "Huh? Just because of the 'protecting me' part? By that standard, Feng Xin proposed to me when I was seven."

Hua Cheng doesn't seem amused by the comparison.

Seeming to conclude that the onions in his hands are up to par—Xie Lian pays for them, dropping them both in the basket.

"Besides, most of the proposals I've received have been far more direct," he adds offhandedly, not seeing the way the ghost king does a full blown doubletake.

"...Just how many proposals have you received?"

Xie Lian scrunches up his nose, thinking. "Oh...I'm not sure I kept track. Most of them were when I was mortal, or during my first ascension. At least once a week back then...maybe more."

Hua Cheng is slightly more pale than usual.

"Oh!" Xie Lian recalls, holding up a finger. "There was actually an interesting one. See, after the war between Xuli and Yushi, followed by Ming Guang's ascension— there were a lot of petty warlords trying to follow his example."

Though none matched Pei in his conquests.

"Well—there was one—I don't remember his name anymore, but he was causing a bit of trouble in Xianle. Raiding villages, stealing horses, that sort of thing."

Xie Lian's father had been aware—but simply hadn't thought him more than a local nuisance.

"Well, eventually he got a pretty big ego—and eventually, he got the idea in his head that my parents were lying about my gender."

Hua Cheng's eyebrows shoot up. "Really? I've never heard of such an accusation against his highness."

"Well, he was the only one who ever made it." Xie Lian explains. "He thought that no one would ever speak of a man's beauty the way everyone spoke of mine."

(He does feel a little sheepish, recounting that detail.)

"And he thought, given the fact that my mother couldn't bear more children after me, they simply lied."

It wasn't entirely unheard of, particularly not then, for families without a male heir to raise their eldest daughter as a son—in order to avoid losing political face.

"So, he rode upon the capital, planning to take the city hostage and demand my hand in marriage."

There are many surprising things about the story—but the first of them to Hua Cheng is the fact that he hasn't heard it before.

"...I'm assuming he wasn't successful?"

"Oh, no—father was furious, he wanted to unleash the entire army on him and his men—but I didn't want that."

Xie Lian had felt it would be unfair for the warlord's men to die because of their master's arrogance—so he came up with another proposal.

"See, back in the old days—maybe you remember—you could win someone's hand in marriage through combat."

"...So you made him such an offer?"

Xie Lian nods. "I sent a messenger to tell him that, if he could defeat my champion in single combat, I would marry him. After he agreed, he was escorted to the palace. I think my father was expecting me to appoint Feng Xin, but…”

Hua Cheng glances his way. “But?”

The prince shrugs. “I fought him myself.”

And obviously, the man lost—rather badly, too.

“I’m sure it was a crushing defeat for him.”

“Yes,” Xie Lian agrees. “I actually felt sorry for him at the time, but looking back on it…I feel like I let him off too easily.”

Hua Cheng tilts his head to the side, surprised. “That isn’t like you to say, your highness.”

“…I know,” Xie Lian frowns, stepping back from the vegetable stall. “But while that man might have doubted my gender—he knew very well that I was fourteen, and he was a grown man.”

Hua Cheng’s expression immediately darkens. “…I see. What did you end up doing with him, then?”

“During the battle, I cut off his sword wielding hand,” Xie Lian shrugs. “After that, he couldn’t be much of a threat to anyone else. Then, he was imprisoned.”

But still.

It disturbs Xie Lian at times, having lived so long, remembering the things that were treated as…normal, back then.

Now, eight centuries after the fact—the thought that a grown man had viewed him that way—as many other adults did, to be honest—is disturbing.

But at the time…

Xie Lian was the ‘illustrious crown prince.’ A national treasure of Xianle. One moment, he was a child—and the next, he was an adored public figure.

But now, when he remembers the stories of his beauty, the poems and songs that were written in his name…

Those accounts largely came from poets and bards. Grown men, in most cases— speaking of Xie Lian’s looks from the ages of fourteen to seventeen.

Now, part of him knows that it wasn't appropriate. And still…it's difficult to completely condemn it.

Those years were the height of his power and popularity. And it's a heady thing, to have the entire world adore you.

To discount all of that as inappropriate attention towards a child would cast one of the few happy times of his life in a…less than favorable light.

"The point is—compared to what I had seen before…Lang Qianqiu's proposal wasn't as direct." He concludes.

But all of this talk of the old days, crossing blades with an old warlord—it brings something else to Xie Lian's mind. Something he meant to ask about.

Well, actually, Xie Lian meant to ask the question ages ago, though not necessarily to Hua Cheng—but he seems knowledgeable enough.

"Can I ask you about something, San Lang?"

"Dianxia can ask me about anything he likes," the ghost king replies easily.

"…What's missionary?"

Xie Lian nearly stumbles when Hua Cheng comes to a sudden halt, his back ramrod stiff.

"San Lang? Are you alright?"

It takes him so long to answer, Xie Lian is becoming genuinely worried, until… "Where did you come across that term, your highness?"

His voice is a little odd—Xie Lian has never heard him use that tone before. Slightly hoarse.

"…Well, back on Mount Yu Jun, Feng Xin and Mu Qing were arguing…I think it had something to do with Feng Xin punching trees…" the prince muses, rubbing his chin. Then he catches himself, clearing his throat. "I mean—Nan Feng and Fu Yao, their deputies. Slip of the tongue—"

“Yes, yes,” Hua Cheng waves off Xie Lian’s meager attempts at protecting his friend’s dignity. “And that term came up?”

“...” Xie Lian nods, wondering why Hua Cheng is reacting so...sharply. “Well, Fu Yao said Nan Feng acted like a man who only knew how to do ‘missionary,’ but I had never heard of that fighting style before.”

And he never got the chance to ask either of his friends about it either.

“...It’s not...” Hua Cheng starts, then stops, struggling to formulate his answer—all while Xie Lian stares up at him blindly, his gaze trusting.

“Not what?”

“...Not...A fighting style, gege,” Hu Cheng explains carefully.

Xie Lian blinks, baffled.

“Then what could it be?”

Hua Cheng is quiet for several moments, weighing his options.

"It's intimate by nature," the Ghost King explains quietly, and Xie Lian's eyebrows knit together, wondering what to make of that.

Intimate.

"...As in?"

Hua Cheng bites back a sigh.

"It's sexual, your highness."

Oh.

Xie Lian's eyes widen.

Oh.

"...It...it is?" He frowns, his face slowly heating up. "...But why would Mu—Fu Yao be saying something like that to Nan Feng? Surely in that context, it must mean..."

Hua Cheng looks at the sky, long suffering.

"I'm fairly sure that's what he meant, your highness." Xie Lian stares, and Hua Cheng takes a deep breath. "He was saying that he was boring."

The prince stops walking, rubbing his chin thoughtfully. "Boring?" He repeats, tapping his chin.

"But isn't that sort of thing...the opposite of boring?"

Xie Lian's never been interested in it, not really. But on the two occasions that he has thought about that kind of intimacy...

It wasn't boring.

"If you're with someone who is good at it, it isn't." Hua Cheng agrees.

'Oh,' Xie Lian thinks to himself with a frown, 'I'd probably be very boring, then.'

And it's not that the prince actually wants to know—after all, he isn't going to be in that sort of situation any time soon—but—

He doesn't like coming off as ignorant.

Especially not when Mu Qing and Feng Xin are apparently talking about...

Besides, Hua Cheng is his friend. A dear friend. If Xie Lian can't ask him, then who else?

"So, when he said Nan Feng was like a man who 'only does missionary,' how did that mean he was boring?"

"..."

Xie Lian waits patiently, knowing that Hua Cheng wouldn't laugh at him for asking something like that.

And he doesn't, but...it does take him a moment to reply.

"...It's the most common position used during love making, your highness," he explains carefully.

Is 'love making' the word that Hua Cheng would typically use? No. Absolutely not. Is he going to say any other moniker in his god's presence?

No.

Absolutely fucking not.

"It refers to the partners being face to face."

"Ah..." Xie Lian nods, taking that in.

As one might expect, the prince has somewhat of a nuanced view of the concept of sexual intimacy.

Xie Lian is aware of the existence of sex, obviously. He doesn't find the concept of other people being intimate with one another upsetting or embarrassing.

It's only when he conceptualizes himself in such situations that he feels ashamed, or wrong.

His cultivation creates a wonderful excuse, but in reality—it wasn't that Xie Lian never wanted to be with someone.

Rather, he was taught to be ashamed of what and who he wanted.

So, in this situation, discussing the details as they would relate to two other people—that isn't embarrassing, or uncomfortable for him.

Actually, it creates a rare opportunity in which he doesn't mind discussing the subject.

And poor Hua Cheng, in this case, is knowledgeable.

“...And face to face is boring?”

“Ah...” Hua Cheng clears his throat, helping Xie Lian step up and over a small footbridge on their trek back to the shrine. “Every position has upsides and downsides. I think that one is just considered boring because it’s standard.”

And because of the issue with the angle, particularly with two men—but Hua Cheng would rather be suspended upside down in a pit of burning tar than explain that to the prince.

"But there are other positions that are more exciting, so saying that someone only does missionary..."

Makes them boring.

Xie Lian nods, thinking. In that sense, that actually does sound a little bit like Feng Xin.

But in that case, how would Mu Qing know?

Unless...

...Was that why he got so nervous at the mention of Yan Zhen in the martial hall?

The mere gravity of that revelation leaves the prince rather shaken, and he struggles to force his mind from that train of thought.

"...I really don't understand how it could make so much of a difference," he mutters.

Hua Cheng glances around with a small sigh.

"There's an easier way to explain this."

Xie Lian feels the ghost king stop walking, then hears the sound of the basket hitting the ground with a low thud.

"Gege?"

His voice is slightly strained, and Xie Lian looks up with wide eyes, looking in his direction.

"Yes, San Lang?"

"You understand that never do anything untoward, don't you?"

Well, that's not exactly true. He's been forward, but his desires to be physically close to his god have always been limited by his respect.

But he really never would do something...truly inappropriate.

Not without his god's permission, and Hua Cheng isn't sure that he could ever pluck up the courage to ask.

If Xie Lian requested it, however...

"..." The god raises an eyebrow, confused. "Yes?"

"And you trust me?"

"Of course I do, San Lang." Xie Lian frowns.

Isn't that obvious? He—

Before Xie Lian can contemplate the matter further, there are hands on his shoulders, pushing him back.

In any other situation, Xie Lian would immediately defend himself—and he almost does.

But this is Hua Cheng, and the prince trusts him.

He feels his back press against the trunk of a tree—not roughly at all, but—

Hua Cheng's hands land on the bark above his head, his arms caging him in, and the prince can't help but swallow thickly, his voice cracking as he asks—

"What are you—?"

The prince falls silent when Hua Cheng's forehead presses against his, his flesh perfectly cool against Xie Lian's burning skin.

Xie Lian's heart stutters in his chest as he bites his lip, fighting the urge to breathe. There's nothing to worry about. This is just...just...

"For the sake of demonstration," the ghost king explains, his voice far more even than what his own flushed expression might convey, "this is missionary."

...An explanation. A demonstration.

Hua Cheng already said—he wouldn't do anything inappropriate.

This—this is fine.

"...People do it standing up?" The prince whispers hoarsely, and he can actually feel the lopsided smile on Hua Cheng's face, with the ghost king's mouth so close.

"No, your highness." The ghost king murmurs. "But I would never put you on the ground."

Xie Lian's lips tremble slightly.

"It's dirty."

Similar to what he said in the Sinner's Pit, but it takes on an entirely new meaning now.

"Just imagine it like this, but laying down." As in laying down on a bed.

Like…like…

Oh.

Suddenly, all of the blood in Xie Lian's body seems to go rushing into his cheeks, making his face burn so hot, he feels like he might melt into a puddle.

"…Like last night?" He blurts out the words without thinking, because —

It was very similar to this. And in a bed. And…

They were…

He can't see it, but Hua Cheng's eyes are as wide as they could possibly be. And in his form, as the young man the villagers know as 'Xiao Hua,' he's visually less intimidating. Far more like…

A young man, nervous but excited, with his first love in his arms.

"Very similar to that, your highness, yes." Hua Cheng nods, his voice low. "With only a few minor differences."

Xie Lian fights the urge to cover his face with his hands. He's too old to react in such a way, really. And he wishes that he could force himself to be quiet, but…

"…Differences?"

Hua Cheng would argue, despite appearances, that he is a man with excellent self control.

He just has one minor vice. A failing, if you will.

Something that Yin Yu picked up about him very early on, as a matter of fact.

At his core, Crimson Rain Sought Flower is somewhat like a cat.

A jaguar that lives in the house, so those close often just treat him like a house cat— when, in reality, he could rip you limb from limb.

The point being…

When someone in his clutches makes some attempt at fleeing or flailing, he has this tendency to…

Play with his food, as one might say.

And he can sometimes get so caught up in that playfulness, a slightly sadistic form of amusement, that he forgets himself.

So, in that moment, forgetting all forms of pretense or nervousness—the ghost king turns his head, whispering in the prince's ear.

"They would be between your legs, dianxia."

Xie Lian's eyes couldn't possibly get any wider, his breaths coming to a complete halt.

"Or you between theirs," the ghost king amends, his breath brushing lightly against the sensitive skin of Xie Lian's ear as he speaks, prompting a slow shiver.

Xie Lian honestly doesn't know how he's managing to form thoughts, much less words.

"I…never thought of it like…"

He falls silent, and Hua Cheng's smile widens, a hint of a sharpened canine glinting at the corner of his mouth.

"Oh? How did you think about it, gege?"

Xie Lian falls silent, swallowing hard. He's never actually imagined…being with someone. It was only ever a distant concept.

Even when he considered asking Wu Ming to take his first time—that was only because he was afraid…that Bai Wuxiang, after what he had done wearing Feng Xin's face, might intend to take it by force.

It's the only reason Xie Lian could think of, for why he stopped those men in the temple for trying to…well…

Xie Lian doesn't want to think about that. Especially not right now.

The point is, he never actually envisioned what being intimate with Wu Ming would have been like.

Xie Lian struggles now, to imagine what would have happened.

Certainly, Wu Ming would have said yes. He wouldn't have denied Xie Lian anything.

And the mere thought of the fact that Xie Lian nearly took advantage of that wracks him with guilt.

But...then what?

Wu Ming certainly must have had experience, even if he was young. He had his beloved that he was working so hard to get back to. Surely, when he was alive, they must have been...

Still, with the way Xie Lian was back then, he doubts he would have been comfortable with someone...

'Between his legs,' as Hua Cheng so delicately phrased it.

Still, that was likely exactly what Bai Wuxiang intended to do to him, so Xie Lian can't say what they would have done, or how they would have done it.

The only thing he does know, in the end, is that Wu Ming would have been kind. He would have taken care of him.

That was exactly why Xie Lian almost asked.

Because even then, in his most broken, distrustful state—

The prince felt safe, with Wu Ming.

He hadn't felt that since.

It never occurred to him to be intimate with Kuo, for example—not even once, despite the fact that the founder of the Jiang sect had always been kind and respectful to him.

(And he made Xie Lian very, very aware of his keen interest in being lovers.)

Actually, looking back on that incident in the bath house— Kuo wasn't always respectful.

But he was kind, and absolutely harmless, so Xie Lian forgives him for being a little too shameless in his advances at times.

And of course, others made advances over the years. Men, women. Big and small, young and old.

Of course, even if Xie Lian had been open to such things—he wouldn't have been attracted to the women. But still, he knew what impact his attentions could have on the self esteem of a young lady.

Sometimes, especially when he was the Guoshi of Yong'an—he would find a young woman who was dejected and alone, and he would ask her to dance.

Not out of attraction, but simply out of the desire to make her feel beautiful, because no one deserves to feel so unwanted.

Even if Xie Lian isn't attracted to women, he knows they feel safer around him. Perhaps subconsciously aware of his lack of interest.

He has always treasured that.

The ability to make someone feel safe. To make them feel wanted, and worthwhile.

He adored that feeling, when he was with Hong'er.

Slowly making the boy believe that Xie Lian cared for him. That the prince wasn't going to become disgusted or cast him out.

Xie Lian has never forgotten the way the teenager began to tremble, when he called Hong'er 'handsome.'

He hasn't been able to bring himself to call a man handsome since, even when encountering someone who would be objectively viewed as more 'attractive' by societal standards.

If Xie Lian said that to anyone else, it would feel less sincere.

Because they wouldn't be his Hong'er.

His handsome, brave, Hong'er.

But he never imagined himself with Hong'er like that, either. He died too young, and Xie Lian was so focused on his own worthlessness, he didn't consider things like intimacy, or having a future with anyone.

He supposes, in the eight centuries that followed, the one who came the closest as an actual 'option' was Lang Qianqiu.

Not at the time of the Gilded Banquet, no. Xie Lian simply viewed him as a naive teenager at that time.

But if Qi Rong and An Le's attack had never happened...

'I promise—I won't let anyone hurt you. Not ever again.'

Xie Lian can't deny that he would have been tempted by that, if Lang Qianqiu had kept the same attitudes as he grew into a man. A king.

The prince isn't weak, even with his shackles. He can protect himself quite easily. But still...

There's some small part of him that craves the feeling of being protected, the way that he used to be.

If Xie Lian has any weakness, it's to the sensation of being so honestly and sincerely cared for.

Even if he knows that he doesn't deserve it.

So, if he had remained by Lang Qianqiu's side as the prince of Yong'an grew older...

He might have said yes, eventually.

But when Xie Lian tries to imagine how that would have transpired, he really can't do it.

The idea of Lang Qianqiu on top of him, between his legs...

It doesn't really make him feel much beyond the concept of sparring, which they often did. Even so, that always ended with Lang Qianqiu disarmed on the ground, with his Guoshi standing several feet away, calmly sheathing his own blade.

And the other way around isn't any better.

Then, it just feels like taking advantage of a former student.

And in part, that might have something to do with the fact that, while he's sure that Lang Qianqiu is good looking, Xie Lian has never been attracted to him in that sense.

Actually, come to think of it—the number of men Xie Lian has found attractive in... that sense is very small.

The first is the most obvious, and the most embarrassing: Feng Xin.

If Xie Lian was sixteen, and you asked him to imagine sexual intimacy and how it would go…

His first thought probably would have gone to his guard—and, even more mortifying —exactly the way Hua Cheng had initially described it:

Between his legs.

(Apparently that's the only way Feng Xin knows how to do it, anyway.)

Hong'er can't be included in that category—because even now, trying to imagine the teenager in a sexual way feels inappropriate.

Sure, he would be eight centuries old by now, had he lived as long as Xie Lian—but he didn't.

He's tried to imagine the man Hong'er might have grown into plenty of times—but anything more than that feels wrong.

And of course, Xie Lian found Wu Ming attractive, even if he was only vaguely familiar with what the savage ghost looked like.

He was tall, and broad. Xie Lian remembers that. With long, soft hair…gentle hands.

But the thing Xie Lian remembers most vividly about him, oddly enough, is such a small detail. One that isn't even related to what Wu Ming looked like.

Wu Ming's clothes.

Xie Lian knows, from the briefest of glimpses before the ghost was dispersed, that Wu Ming wore all black—but that isn't what sticks out in his memory.

It's far more tactile than that.

When they were outside the palace of Yong'an, and Wu Ming was holding him… kissing him, before, and after…

They were that of a soldier. Scaled armor on the chest and forearms—but with gaps around the elbows and biceps, where Xie Lian held onto him.

The fabric was layered and padded underneath, creating a soft, giving feel—almost like a thick coat.

And when Xie Lian rested his cheek on Wu Ming's shoulder, even if only for a moment—it smelled like campfire smoke in a forest after the rain.

It's those details that built into attraction, and Xie Lian can't explain why.

Even if he'll never know what Wu Ming's face looked like, beneath that mask—just remembering the smell of him, the feel of him, makes Xie Lian's chest ache with an inexplicable amount of yearning.

Since then, he can't say he's been firmly attracted to a man since.

Pei, he supposes, is attractive. But Xie Lian only assumes as much from the sound of his voice, and with how many people the general has had in his bed. But he's never imagined being intimate with him, either.

Even now, if he tried—Xie Lian isn't excited by the prospect. And then, very, very recently, things changed.

Because Hua Cheng...on an objective level, is very attractive. That isn't unusual. Everyone seems to think so.

But it's odd that Xie Lian does, as well.

It's difficult, especially now, in this position, resolving himself to that fact.

Because it isn't about the ghost king's physical appearance. After all—he has the same effect on the prince, regardless of what form he's in.

(Even his female form, which was the most surprising.)

It's a number of factors pulled together. Some tactile, others not.

It's how tall he is. How broad his shoulders are. The size of his hands, and how they feel on Xie Lian's waist.

It's the way his voice sounds when he smiles.

Or, how it rumbles and snarls when he's angry. The way his laugh can be cocky and arrogant, or soft with fondness.

It's the way he smells so familiar, even if Xie Lian knows it isn't the same, not after the humiliating spectacle he made on Mount Yu Jun.

It’s how strong he is—the only person who has ever been able to physically overpower Xie Lian.

(Aside from Bai Wuxiang, but the prince refuses to take that into account right now.)

How surprised Xie Lian was at the fact that being overpowered by Hua Cheng didn’t frighten him.

Actually, it did the opposite.

It’s in the way that just the sound of the bells on Hua Cheng’s boots can bring a smile to Xie Lian’s face, his heart warming with the knowledge that he’s here.

(San Lang is here.)

All of those things—they build into attraction.

Xie Lian hasn’t been silent for that long, his mind moving at a mile a minute, but he’s slowly coming to that dawning realization, the truth cresting over him like a wave, slamming into his psyche with force.

He’s attracted to Hua Cheng.

Not because he’s objectively attractive.

He is, but that’s not why.

It’s because Xie Lian finds him attractive.

‘How did you imagine it then, your highness?’

And when Xie Lian imagines being with him …

His mind goes back to the night before.

How his thoughts seemed to go sideways, with Hua Cheng on top of him.

The way his heart lurched when he felt Hua Cheng’s knee between his thighs.

Oh.

“I…” Xie Lian swallows thickly, squeezing his eyes shut. “I…”

And when he tries to imagine it the other way around, with the ghost king's long, strong legs around his hips, he…

That image is far more intimidating, because Xie Lian would have no idea what to do, and Hua Cheng…

He makes every aspect of intimacy seem so easy, the thought of being in that position makes the prince feel somewhat insecure.

But he can certainly imagine it.

And the idea of it—while all of this is a stretch for Xie Lian, because any image of sexual intimacy conjures up instincts of repression and shame—it certainly isn't unappealing.

But right now, when they're like this, with Hua Cheng looming over him…

The thought of having the ghost king underneath him makes Xie Lian excited. Nervous, embarrassed—but excited.

But at this very moment, the thought of having Hua Cheng between his legs?

That sets him on fire, and Xie Lian isn't sure what to make of it.

"I'm…"

"Yes?"

"…I don't think I would be picky," the prince answers, mortified by how meek his voice sounds.

Hua Cheng's smile only widens. "I would expect no less, gege has never been self centered."

His eyes slide down, watching Xie Lian's pulse, throbbing beneath his skin.

The way his Adam's apple bobs up and down each time he swallows—making the choker around his neck move with it.

As though the ruby encrusted butterfly wings adorning it are about to burst into flight.

"But that isn't the same as what you imagined."

"…I wouldn't know what to imagine, San Lang," Xie Lian mutters—and that's half true.

He knows the vague mechanics of sex, but he can't conceive much more beyond something highly rudimentary.

"It's very simple, your highness," the ghost king—

Oh good heavens, he's purring .

"If you were with someone, in this position—how would you imagine it?"

At first, Xie Lian can't understand why Hua Cheng is asking. After all, it's not like Xie Lian is ever going to be intimate with anyone, but…slowly, the logic behind the question clicks into place.

This is a demonstration.

Hua Cheng even stated beforehand—this was just the easiest way for him to explain the position. Making it very clear—he would never do something untoward.

The only one making this…more than that, is Xie Lian.

(Because he's attracted to Hua Cheng.)

That realization is still slamming into him over and over again, spiraling behind every thought.

But you can still be friends with someone, and be attracted to them. Xie Lian handled that with Feng Xin very well. And eventually, he got over it.

Xie Lian doesn't see Feng Xin that way now. He can't imagine being…intimate with him now, not anymore.

So, eventually, he'll get over this…physical reaction to Hua Cheng, too. And everything will be fine, just like it was before.

In the meantime, however, that doesn't make answering Hua Cheng's question any less embarrassing.

Still—he's trying to be helpful, so…

Xie Lian mumbles something unintelligible under his breath, and the ghost king leans closer, his nose brushing the hollow beneath his ear.

"What was that, your highness?"

Xie Lian's lips tremble.

"...On top of me," he croaks.

It's probably for the best that he doesn't see how Hua Cheng's pupils dilate sharply in response.

To say that the calamity has imagined every feasible scenario would be an understatement.

And he would be eager—honored, beyond words, in fact—to live out any one of them. But hearing his god say that, like that...

Then, Xie Lian realizes that his answer doesn't entirely line up with what Hua Cheng said—so he struggles to correct himself.

"I...I mean...between my..." Hua Cheng's knee bumps against his, and Xie Lian finally surrenders to the urge to cover his face with one hand, his cheeks burning.

"...Legs..." He concludes in a small voice, worried if he speaks any louder, it might crack.

A mortifying sound does slip out of him, however, when one of Hua Cheng's hands grasps the prince's wrist, pulling it away from his face, pinning it against the tree overhead.

Xie Lian's eyes snap wide open as he breathes in sharply through his nose, and...

Hua Cheng's forehead is pressed against his own once more—the coolness of it almost soothing.

If not for the fact that their noses are bumping together, and their mouths are so close, Xie Lian can almost feel it.

"Apologies, dianxia," the ghost king murmurs.

(He says this, not sounding sorry at all.)

"But the benefit of this position comes from being face to face, remember?"

The prince presses his lips together so tightly, they feel almost numb.

Right.

For once, Xie Lian is relieved by the fact that he can't see.

If he could, making eye contact in a position like this...

That would be too much.

(He's relieved now, that Hua Cheng decided to push him against a tree to demonstrate. Otherwise, the prince's knees would have buckled long ago.)

"...I don't know if this demonstration has been very helpful," the prince swallows thickly, his wrist limp in Hua Cheng's grip, and the Ghost King raises an eyebrow, his expression briefly coloring with concern.

"Oh?"

Xie Lian bites his lip.

"...This isn't boring, San Lang."

And, according to Hua Cheng's description, that's exactly what this position—or the position similar to this, Xie Lian supposes, is supposed to feel like.

But Xie Lian doesn't think he's ever been less bored in his entire life.

"..."

The calamity smiles.

"But I already explained, your highness."

Did he? Explain what—?

"If you're with someone who is good at it, it's never boring." Oh.

Xie Lian's throat feels dry all of the sudden, his tongue latching to the roof of his mouth.

Hua Cheng did say that, didn't he?

And...it seems almost obvious that Hua Cheng would be good at this.

A natural aspect of life, actually.

"Is this too much, gege?"

It's a sudden question, and if Xie Lian is being honest—maybe it is.

Not because he's uncomfortable, but simply because he's so...overwhelmed. But admitting to that seems far worse, so he simply shakes his head.

"No," he whispers, taking deep, steadying breaths, like he does when he's meditating. "I'm alright."

He is, that isn't a lie—he's just worried that his sudden feelings of attraction might become too obvious.

"You're sure?"

The prince nods again, and— It happens quickly.

Hands grip his waist, spinning Xie Lian around until he's facing the tree, his hands scrambling for purchase—only for Hua Cheng to gather both of the prince's wrists up in one hand, pinning them over his head.

Before, it felt like Hua Cheng's arms were caging him in.

Now, it feels like the ghost king's entire body is surrounding him.

His chest against Xie Lian's shoulders, a hand wrapped around his hip—his knee pressed against the back of the prince's thighs.

Oh.

/Ba-bump./

He—

Now, it feels like Xie Lian really couldn't breathe, even if he wanted to.

His heart is hammering in his chest—which is mortifying, because he knows Hua Cheng must be able to hear it, and—

The ghost king leans down, his mouth hovering just over the nape of Xie Lian's neck.

"Every position is enjoyable, if you're with someone who is good at it," the ghost king explains calmly, watching goosebumps rise across the prince's skin.

"Some of them are just a little more exciting."

"..."

Well, Xie Lian was wrong.

Almost comically incorrect.

Hua Cheng was actually giving an absolutely helpful demonstration. Perhaps the most accurate illustration of a concept that Xie Lian has ever experienced.

"...I get it..." He mumbles, his voice cracking in two places.

"Do you?" Hua Cheng smiles, leaning closer, until his lips are just a hair's breadth away from the skin of his nape. "Does gege have any more questions?"

After this, Xie Lian doesn't know if he'll be able to ask them without...hoping for another demonstration.

Which is wrong.

Xie Lian shouldn't take advantage of Hua Cheng's willingness to help.

"...No," the prince rasps, shrinking slightly, shuddering when the calamity leans in after him, his chest pressed against Xie Lian's back. "T-thank you, San Lang, this was a...very enlightening demonstration..."

Hua Cheng seems to take the hint that Xie Lian is becoming quite overwhelmed, letting go of his wrists as he leans back, giving the god a moment to compose himself.

Which Xie Lian endeavors to do, pressing his face against the tree bark, catching his breath.

"You're welcome."

Hua Cheng sounds sly—but gentle, and Xie Lian...

His lips tighten at the corners as his hands grip either side of the tree trunk, more than aware of how ridiculous this must seem.

After all, the ghost king barely touched him—and certainly not inappropriately, just as he promised—

But here the prince is, practically hugging a tree, weak in the knees.

And that realization is still ringing in Xie Lian's head:

(He's attracted to Hua Cheng.)

The Ghost King watches the back of Xie Lian's head, his arms crossed over his chest. Comparatively, he might seem more composed, but...

(That certainly isn't the reality inside Hua Cheng's head.)

"Are you alright, your highness?"

"Yes," Xie Lian agrees quickly, his voice much more composed than it was before— even if it's still slightly unsteady. "Yes, I'm sorry—I was just surprised."

Hua Cheng arches one eyebrow. "By what?"

'Oh, just the fact that I'm attracted to you. No big deal, really.'

Honestly, what is he supposed to say?

"Oh...just that Fu Yao would say something like that to Nan Feng," he mutters, clearing his throat. "I really never thought they'd discuss that sort of thing with one another."

Hua Cheng tilts his head, rocking back on his heels. "Maybe they do more than discuss it."

Xie Lian chokes, whipping his head around in Hua Cheng's direction—still braced against the tree. "San Lang, you don't mean that they...?"

His companion shrugs, kneeling down to pick up the baskets from their shopping trip once more.

"Who can say, gege," he replies airily, "they're strange. But there are rumors."

Xie Lian doubts he should put much stock in those—after all, there were so many rumors about him over the centuries—and nearly all of them were wrong.

Ironically enough, the only story he heard about himself that was actually true (in the heavens, at least) was that horrible play.

Better not to assume, then.

When they make it back to the shrine, Shuo has already returned. And, to Xie Lian's surprise—like Hua Cheng, he works fast.

Most of the actual construction on the new addition to the shrine is already finished, and while he adds the final touches, Xie Lian prepares a meal for himself and Hua Cheng.

Not for the children, of course—Xie Lian still entrusts Shuo with that. He does offer the forest demon a serving, however—which is politely declined.

Now, the prince could choke down just about anything—he's had to learn that skill. As such, his own cooking doesn't bother him.

But still…it's for Hua Cheng, and it's intended to be a thank you, for everything the ghost king has done for him recently—so the prince does his best, applying what he's learned from following Shuo around in the kitchen for the last few weeks, and…

It has to be better, right?

Even E'Ming helped, to Xie Lian's surprise. Despite being such an infamously 'dangerous' spiritual device, in the prince's experience…

There's something endearing about the scimitar, like an overeager puppy as it rushes forward to assist him with tasks.

"Is it in the way, gege?" Hua Cheng questions, leaning against the counter, sending E'Ming a harsh look—but Xie Lian shakes his head.

"Oh, no—E'Ming is being helpful, honest!"

Just the smallest compliment makes the blade shiver with delight, its eye spinning wildly in it's hilt.

It seems so unused to receiving praise—Xie Lian almost feels sorry for the blade. After all—he and Ruoye got off to a difficult start…

(For completely obvious reasons.)

But it's important to get on well with one's spiritual devices.

Xie Lian can't say he completely lives up to that belief. Not when it comes to Fangxin, anyway.

He's known the weapon for just as long as Ruoye, and still...

It's never felt like his own. Not even now, centuries after the fact.

But Hua Cheng doesn't seem to have a negative history with E'Ming. He's already told Xie Lian that E'Ming was the first weapon he ever forged.

Shouldn't that be a fond memory?

Before long, the stew is finished (and hopefully, edible.)

Rather than eating it inside, at the table—Hua Cheng opts to sit on the porch, his legs dangling over the ledge. Lazily swallowing mouthfuls of soup as he enjoys the breeze.

Xie Lian waits, almost fretfully, and the ghost king speaks up— "It's good."

His face brightens.

"Really?"

Honestly, he can't taste that much of a difference from usual—but after their conversation the other night, Xie Lian wonders if he's just learned not to notice the way things taste.

After all, he used to be a picky eater, and now—he'll eat anything.

He used to be a child who would weep and cry for his mother over the smallest scrape on his knee, only to be consoled when she would kiss it better.

"Mmm..." Hua Cheng hums in agreement, swallowing down another bite. "A little thick, but it's got flavor."

The fact that he doesn't claim the dish is perfect makes Xie Lian find the praise somewhat more sincere, and he smiles, sitting on the porch beside him, picking at his own serving.

"Dianxia seems to be in a good mood this evening,"

Hua Cheng is watching him from the corner of his eye, rolling his spoon between his fingers.

Xie Lian shrugs, a persistent smile still tugging at his lips.

It’s a silly thought—Hua Cheng wouldn’t tease him if he shared it, but still.

He just...

He never would have thought that, eight centuries later, someone would still be kissing his cuts and bruises better.

Hua Cheng seems tempted to pry him for an answer, but before he can ask, a group of villagers come down the path, returning from the fields.

“Say...” One of the villagers stops, glancing in Hua Cheng’s direction curiously. He’s back in his form from before—the slightly older version of his true form that pulled Xie Lian from the lake. “Doesn’t he look a bit like Xiao Hua, to you?”

“It’s a pretty strong resemblance!”

Xie Lian’s smile turns from one of quiet fondness to that of awkwardness as he struggles to fumble for an explanation.

“Ah, well...you see...!”

Hua Cheng smiles, stretching his legs out in front of him, leaning back on his elbows lazily.

“He gets the good looks from me.”

“...Ah, you’re the boy’s father?” One of the women in the group raises an eyebrow, surprised. “You don’t look old enough to have a son that age!”

Xie Lian expects Hua Cheng to correct them with some other explanation, but he simply shrugs.

“I’m older than I look.”

Xie Lian has to bite back the sudden urge to laugh.

Hundreds of years older, as a matter of fact.

“You know the parents of that other lad that’s been around? Shuo, wasn’t it?” This reply comes as easily as the last—

“He’s one of mine, too.”

That directly undermines everything Shuo has said on the matter—even if it's just a tall tale that Hua Cheng is telling the villagers.

"Really? You two don't look very much alike."

After all—Shuo's hair has a different shade and texture—and his eyes are lighter.

Hua Cheng tilts his head to the side, unbothered.

"He gets his looks from the wife, actually."

At first, Xie Lian doesn't think very much of that statement—after all, it's just a few easy little white lies to sate their curiosity.

And Hua Cheng obviously isn't married.

He wouldn't be going around offering a kiss as a means to settle a gambling debt if he was. Other men might—but Hua Cheng isn't that sort of person.

"Ah, is she in town with you?"

"Back home, I'm afraid," the ghost king murmurs, just as Xie Lian lifts his spoon to his lips.

"She's a bit under the weather." "Oh, is it serious?"

"Nothing too bad—" The corner of his mouth curves upwards. "She just took a swim in some cold water recently, and it didn't sit right with her."

To which Xie Lian promptly chokes, covering his mouth and coughing.

"Ah, you gotta be careful!" One of the farmers frowns, shaking his head. "That sort of thing will knock you down real quick!"

"I know," Hua Cheng sighs, disapproving. "What am I going to do with her?" Xie Lian stares into his bowl blindly, warmth slowly creeping up his face.

"Are you sure she'll be alright back home by herself?" The farmer's wife frets. Hua Cheng smiles, shaking his head.

"Oh, there's always someone looking after her—don't worry."

"Are you sure?"

"Mmm," the ghost king hums, setting his empty bowl aside. "Like a proper princess."

Poor Xie Lian hasn't even had the chance to clear his airway before he's sent coughing again, his shoulders hunched.

"You alright, daozhang?"

"Ah, he's fine," Hua Cheng answers for him as Xie Lian chugs down some weather. "Just a long day."

One of the villagers in the group glances at the sun, slipping down beneath the horizon. "...It's getting pretty late boss, don't you think we should...?"

"Yeah, yeah," the farmer rocks back on his heels, adjusting his belt. "We should get going. It was nice meeting you, Mr...?"

"Hua," the ghost king confirms with an easy going smile. "It was nice meeting you, as well."

Xie Lian can't help but notice that there seems to be an ease to Hua Cheng when he's here. Quite unlike anywhere else.

Even in ghost city—he has a gravity to him. One of authority. But here...

Hua Cheng seems younger, relaxed. Like he's...

Like he's happy, in Puqi Shrine.

The thought of that makes Xie Lian smile, even as his tone turns scolding. "San Lang..."

The ghost king glances up, a picture of innocence.

"Yes, gege?"

"Shuo was right."

"Oh?" Hua Cheng turns to face him, raising an eyebrow. "About what?"

Xie Lian just as soon turns away, picking up their empty bowls as he rises to his feet.

"You are a bully."

The ghost king gasps, clasping a hand over his heart as though he’s been gravely wounded.

“Me?!”

“You.”

Cool fingers grasp his wrist as Xie Lian steps towards the door, Hua Cheng stretched out on the porch to reach for him.

“You don’t mean that...”

And of course he sounds oh so pitiful.

Xie Lian turns his head away. He’s almost forgotten how to be haughty, but he manages a small sniff, tilting his chin up.

“I think I do.”

Briefly, Hua Cheng is just caught staring at him, and while Xie Lian can’t know his expression—

His eyes are wide, openly endeared.

After a moment he shakes himself out of it, his voice sly.

“Gege doesn’t think I’m a bully...” He whines, tugging at the prince’s wrist gently. “He thinks I’m boyish and charming.”

Xie Lian lowers his chin, working so hard not to smile, the corners of his mouth ache.

He’s become so accustomed to faking smiles, he forgot what it was like to try to hide one. Or to even need to.

“Boyish and charming?”

Hua Cheng bobs his head in agreement, “Yes, that’s exactly what gege thinks.”

The corner of Xie Lian's mouth stubbornly tugs upwards, no matter how hard he tries to stop it.

"And what else do I think?"

Hua Cheng's grip on his wrist has loosened now, but the prince doesn't make an effort to pull away.

"...I wish I knew," the ghost king admits softly.

Xie Lian falls silent for a moment, his heart thumping unsteadily, eyes averted.

"...About you?" He questions—his voice shifting from playful to unsure.

And if he could see the yearning in the calamity's eyes--he would take mercy on him.

But he can't.

"About everything."

That draws a disbelieving snort.

"San Lang would get sick of the sound of my voice if he wanted to know everything I ever thought," Xie Lian mutters, trying to laugh it off, but...

Hua Cheng's thumb strokes the inside of his wrist. A small movement, but…

Intimate.

"Never."

Xie Lian swallows hard.

It's difficult, sometimes, how being around Hua Cheng can go from moments of almost blissful ease to that of sudden intensity.

Having become so unaccustomed to the weight of another person's attention...Xie Lian can't help but shrink back from it.

He moves to pull his wrist from Hua Cheng's grip with a small smile, shaking his head.

"You're so insincere..."

But before he can, the ghost king's hold on him tightens.

"I swear," he murmurs, his eyes never leaving Xie Lian's face, even as he tries to duck his head.

"You'll never find anyone on heaven and earth more sincere than me."

It's the same line he said that night after they returned from the Half Moon Kingdom, and he still...

Xie Lian bites his lip, breathing in deeply through his nose—wishing his heart would settle down.

There's a question lingering in the back of the prince's mind. Maybe it was always there—but it's a seed that has taken root.

And every moment he spends with San Lang, it pushes deeper into the forefront of his mind, becoming more and more difficult to ignore:

'Why do I feel this way when I'm around you?'

The chain around his neck has never felt heavier.

Suddenly, a voice calls out from inside the shrine—

"Are you gonna stop messing with dianxia or not? I'm finished."

Xie Lian jumps, finally pulling his wrist away.

"What?"

He whips around, clutching the bowls from their dinner in both hands.

Shuo stretches his arms over his head, shaking the sawdust from his hair. "With the new room? It's all done."

The prince arches an eyebrow, all while Hua Cheng stares sharply over his shoulder. "Already?"

"Mmmmhm," the demon nods, rolling a small wooden doll in the palm of his hand. "Once the foundation was in place, the rest was easy."

"Oh," Xie Lian blinks, then smiles. "Well, thank you! That was very—"

"It's the least he could do," Hua Cheng interrupts, brushing himself off as he stands up. "No need to thank him."

The forest demon sticks his tongue out at him, rolling his eyes. "At least his highness thinks you're a bully too."

"A huge bully," Xie Lian agrees, still smiling.

Hua Cheng practically drops to the ground, clutching at his chest as though mortally wounded by Xie Lian’s betrayal.

“I was only following gege’s lead, if you think about it.”

Xie Lian opens his mouth to say he doesn’t know what he means, but—

Then, he remembers.

Not very long ago, he was in ghost city. Appearing as a woman. Claiming to be looking for her husband. Calling herself...

Well. Hua Cheng actually does have a point, mortifying as it might be.

“...Better not to dwell on it,” the prince mutters quickly, turning around.

“San Lang, could you change the other two back now? Surely it’s been long enough...”

The Ghost King lets out an irritated huff, but he shrugs.

With a wave of his hand, there are two puffs of green and red smoke.

Qi Rong lays upon the floor, coughing and wheezing.

“You FUCKER!”

His hands are bound behind his back, giving him little more to do than roll around and scream out curses.

When Shuo looks down, however, instead of a doll in his hand—there’s someone else’s hand.

A man’s hand.

He and Lang Qianqiu stare at one another for a moment, shocked.

The demon recovers first, his eyes narrowing as he yanks his hand out of the god’s grip, using it to slap Lang Qianqiu upside the head—hard.

“The FUCK are you doing, creep?!”

“ME?!” The prince of Yong’an cries.

“You were the one holding me when I changed back!”

“I was TAUNTING you!” Shuo huffs, hands on his hips. “That doesn’t mean I wanna hold your sweaty ass HAND!”

"I'm not sweaty—and maybe you shouldn't have been—OW!" He clutches his head when the demon smacks his skull again.

"Don't blame the VICTIM!"

"Would you stop hitting me?! YOU aren't the one who spent the entire day as a DARUMA DOLL!"

Shuo looks away, crossing his arms with a sniff.

"I suffered in other ways."

His dignity, primarily—and even in doll form, Lang Qianqiu got to witness it.

The prince snickers, even with his ears wringing, and he adjusts his robes.

"Yeah, nice piggy-back ride..." Shuo stiffens, his shoulders hunching, and Lang Qianqiu can't resist the urge to tack on—

"Getting to that age, huh? No wonder your old man—!"

He can't even finish that sentence before he breaks off with a wheeze, falling down to his knees, clutching his throat.

Shuo shakes out his fist with a glare.

"In the next twenty minutes it takes that body of yours to reconstruct your voice box, I'd learn to watch your mouth."

"Shuo..." Xie Lian starts, exasperated, half wishing he had allowed Hua Cheng to keep the two as Daruma dolls until morning, but the ghost king speaks first.

"It's an important lesson for him to learn, dianxia."

"Is it...?" The prince questions, rubbing the back of his neck.

"Sure," Hua Cheng shrugs, placing a foot on Qi Rong's throat—if only to stop him from wailing so loudly. "Don't taunt someone stronger than you if you can't back it up."

It's a rather simplistic way of phrasing it. After all, Shuo was taunting him too, but...

Lang Qianqiu probably could stand to learn not to mention a sensitive subject. And the parental nature of Shuo's relationship with Hua Cheng, for whatever reason, is clearly one of them.

But it's even more odd to consider the fact that Hua Cheng is correct.

Perhaps it only feels counter intuitive because he's far smaller in size —

But Shuo is quite a bit stronger than Lang Qianqiu is.

"In any case…" Xie Lian sighs, looking to Qi Rong. "I suppose we can't let him starve while he's in that body."

"FINALLY!" Qi Rong snaps, rolling onto his back, thrashing with annoyance. "Did the kid finally make me some fucking FOOD?!"

Shuo's eye twitches and Xie Lian sends him a disgusted look.

"No, I did."

He has no way of knowing—but Qi Rong's undead pallor pales even further.

"…I'm not hungry."

Hua Cheng flicks his wrist, and suddenly the green ghost's body is being lifted up, slid over, and slammed down into one of the kitchen chairs.

"Don't be ungrateful, Qi Rong."

Xie Lian's cousin sends him a hateful glare. "I said I'm not FUCKIN' HUNGRY!"

"You don't want that body to starve, do you?" Xie Lian smiles serenely, filling up another bowl.

"I'd rather eat DIRT!"

"That can easily be arranged." He hums, tapping the excess soup off of his spoon. "San Lang?"

"Yes?"

"Hold him still for me."

Not the most enjoyable job, Xie Lian knows—but the ghost king doesn’t complain.

“Of course, gege.”

He steps over, wrenching Qi Rong up by the hair, forcing him to sit properly, gripping his jaw tightly until his mouth is forced open.

“HEY—YOU—MOTHERFU—!”

Xie Lian is usually slightly more graceful, blindness and all—but this time, he simply opts to ram the wooden spoon into Qi Rong’s mouth carelessly, clacking against his teeth, chipping one of them in the process.

“Don’t speak with your mouth full. It’s unsightly.”

A snarling, gagging noise escapes him with each bite that Xie Lian rams down his throat, but with Hua Cheng holding his jaw open, he doesn’t form any more coherent words until the entire bowl has been emptied.

“There,” the prince leans back, carrying the dishes to the sink.

“You can look forward to meals like that for as long as you’re in that body.”

The ghost sputters and glares, his face turning the same color as his robes. “You think you can force me out?! YOU WON’T!” He coughs and gags, thrashing in Hua Cheng’s grip. “I’LL STAY IN THIS BODY AS LONG AS I WANT!! I’ll stay until IT DIES!”

“...” Xie Lian pinches the bridge of his nose. At this rate, he’ll wake Guzi and Lang Ying up, screaming so much. “San Lang?”

“Hmm?”

“Now that he’s eaten, I’m not sure that he needs to speak anymore.”

Qi Rong squawks, struggling even more vigorously in Hua Cheng’s grip. “YOU CAN’T JUST—!”

Crack!

He disappears in a green puff of smoke, clattering to the floor woodenly.

Hua Cheng kicks the doll aside.

"Better?"

Xie Lian sends him a grateful smile, rinsing off their used dishes.

"Much, thank you."

At this point, Lang Qianqiu seems to have healed enough to speak, wheezing as he slams his hand on the kitchen table, rising to his feet.

"You—!"

Before he can protest his ill treatment—which Shuo seems eager to hear, crossing his arm with a smirk, ready to punch him in the throat at another moment's notice—

Xie Lian steps between them, cutting Lang Qianqiu off. "It's been a long day," he mutters, shaking his head.

"I'd say it's time we all got some rest."

It isn't that late, actually—but Xie Lian would rather go to bed early than have these two knock down his shrine a second time.

After all—with Hua Cheng here, he doubts the Ghost King would take so kindly to that.

Shuo brightens, seeming all too pleased with the prospect.

"Oh, perfect." He drags his gaze over to Lang Qianqiu, his eyes glinting with smug satisfaction. "I already made the perfect spot for you to sleep—"

"No," Xie Lian cuts him off, picking up the Daruma doll. "Qi Rong can sleep in the dog house, since you were kind enough to build it." Shuo raises an eyebrow, about to ask what that means for—

"And Lang Qianqiu can sleep upstairs with you."

A soft cry of indignation rips from the demon's throat, "But—!"

A sharp look from Hua Cheng makes him fall silent, and when he speaks again, his voice is far more measured.

"But...your highness, he isn't—!"

"The upper level seems plenty big enough for more than one person," Xie Lian shrugs.

The size is downright luxurious, if you ask him.

“But if it’s an issue, you could always sleep down here.”

Which doesn’t leave Shuo with any good options.

Because if he sleeps downstairs, that means sleeping with the kids.

And Shuo would rather sleep in a lava pit than anywhere near Lang Ying.

The other option would be sleeping with Hua Cheng and Xie Lian.

And that is uncomfortable for an entirely different reason. Really, it would serve Hua Cheng right if he did decide to bunk with the two of them, but—

“Fine,” the forest demon grumbles, marching towards the steps. He shoots Lang Qianqiu a nasty look before ascending. “If you get within five feet of me, I’ll skin you alive.”

To which the martial god rolls his eyes, crossing his arms. “Don’t talk to me like I’m some sort of pervert, I haven’t done anything to you!” He grumbles.

Then, as he moves to follow, his eyes drift to Hua Cheng—then, back to Xie Lian, narrowing slightly.

Clearly remembering what happened the last time he caught the two alone together.

(If only he had known what happened in the last twenty four hours, it would make Hua Cheng’s ‘medical assistance’ seem rather tame.)

“Or…I could always sleep down—”

“You can sleep upstairs,” Hua Cheng interrupts him, his voice firm.

The two stare at one another, glaring.

Xie Lian turns away from the sink—unable to see their heated expressions, but certainly able to sense the tension in the air.

“…”

And, naturally, he misinterprets Lang Qianqiu’s concern.

"Oh, you don't need to worry—I've slept with San Lang plenty of times already."

A soft wheeze, almost similar to a death rattle, wrenches itself from Lang Qianqiu's throat, his eyes bulging out of his skull.

Normally, Hua Cheng would feel obligated to correct such a presumption. For the prince's honor, if nothing else.

In this situation, however...

"He's correct," the ghost king recalls sagely. "Every night for an entire week, the last time I was here."

If Lang Qianqiu grew any paler, he might be mistaken for a ghost himself.

"For an entire week—?!"

Xie Lian tilts his head to the side, confused.

"Well, if it was okay the first time, why wouldn't it be okay all the other nights?"

Implications about Xie Lian's theoretical endurance (or prowess, depending on Lang Qianqiu's assumptions) aside, Hua Cheng can't help but pour more fuel on the fire.

"Oh, but I would always ask first, your highness. I never assume." Xie Lian smiles faintly.

That's true, isn't it? Even over something as small as sharing a bed for the evening, Hua Cheng always waits to be invited, first.

"That's true, San Lang—but you don't have to."

After all, it's a small thing—but Xie Lian has always adored sleeping beside someone he trusts. When he was a child, he loathed to sleep alone, and would often crawl into the bedroom of his parents, pleading to sleep with them until his father relented.

Even when he became old enough to feel embarrassed about sleeping in the same bed as his parents—he would often find excuses for Feng Xin to sleep in his room with him, and later Mu Qing.

And even then, when all of those who were beside him before had gone, he slept beside Hong'er. Claiming that he was cold, just so the boy would come in from sleeping on the steps outside the shrine.

For centuries after that, he slept alone. The only break in that was Banyue. Falling asleep with her in his arms beside the campfire each night.

And sharing his bed with Hua Cheng now—there's a level of comfort in it. A sense of security borne from trust.

"Really, Lang Qianqiu—there's nothing to worry yourself over," Xie Lian assures him.

"..." The prince locks his jaw, looking back towards Hua Cheng, who is positively smirking from ear to ear, looking quite like the cat that's caught the canary.

"...Alright, Guoshi...if...if you say so," he mutters, turning and skulking up the steps without another word.

Xie Lian lets out a tired sigh, reaching out to feel his way around, looking for the door leading to the new bedroom—but another hand quickly finds his own, squeezing gently as he leads the way.

A small smile spreads across Xie Lian's face as he follows. "Thank you, San Lang."

The new bedroom is plenty spacious enough for him—with sparse furnishings, given how little Xie LIan had to begin with, but with an improved sleeping mat, far more comfortable than the bamboo bedroll he had been using before.

It's different lying in bed beside Hua Cheng now, than it was his first night in the shrine. Xie Lian isn't so carefully distant, curled up on his side with his limbs folded in. Hua Cheng seems just as relaxed, his hands folded underneath his head, lying beneath the same blanket

The prince is far more quiet than usual—but Hua Cheng doesn't press him on it, seeming to attribute Xie Lian's silence to fatigue, but...

In reality, it's because the prince can't stop thinking. Turning one thought round and round in his head, over and over again.

'I'm attracted to Hua Cheng.'

Ever since he realized that a few hours ago, it's like the thought comes back to haunt him each time it even comes close to slipping his mind.

Xie Lian hasn't been in the position of being so…actively aware of something like this.

Not since he was a teenager, just becoming aware of the fact that he was attracted to men at all for the first time.

And it's not as though Xie Lian doesn't understand why he feels the way he does. There are plenty of things about Hua Cheng to feel drawn to.

But Xie Lian also understands that most people—most normal people—feel passing attraction for those around them relatively frequently, and it doesn't always mean anything significant.

For Xie Lian, it's been eight centuries.

Isn't that inherently significant? Does it mean…?

Even considering the possibility makes Xie Lian feel…guilty.

His finger finds its way to the chain around his neck, slowly winding it around his knuckle.

Grief is a complicated, selfish beast.

Making room for new people in your heart can often make it seem as though there's less space for those that you have lost. And that—that feels like a betrayal, even so many years later.

And even placing that aside—who is to say that Hua Cheng even returns those sentiments?

After all—in all of the time Xie Lian has spent with him, he seems like a rather straightforward person. Blunt, even.

If he felt that way, wouldn't it be more likely that he would just say so? But still, even as sleep begins to creep over him, his mind wonders.

And when he's finally drifted off—his back is pressed against the Ghost King's side, with Hua Cheng's fingers twisting lazily through his god's hair.

He's lost in thoughts of his own. His being of a slightly less savory nature.

'This isn't boring, San Lang.'

'On...on top of me...'

His eye squeezes shut. There's no need for air in his lungs, and still—he takes careful, even breaths through his nose.

'Between...between my legs...'

It would be dishonest of Hua Cheng to say that he had never imagined the prince in certain situations.

Even if he felt guilty for doing so, his imagination is overactive and rather...vivid.

Once, after a night of particularly sharp loneliness and self loathing, he even made a clone that looked like...well...

(And felt so ashamed, he dispersed the illusion before too much could come of it.)

It isn't the carnal desire that Hua Cheng feels ashamed of. He never had such an upbringing where he was raised to believe that desiring someone in that way was wrong.

As a matter of fact, when he was just a teenager, Xie Lian himself reassured Hong'er that there was nothing wrong about wanting someone, be it man or woman.

Of course, Hua Cheng doubts the god meant anything sexual about it at that time, and was likely referring only to emotion.

But, given the fact that Hong'er had only ever felt romantically attracted to one person in his life, and in all of the years since—he took it in a slightly different way.

He's always been a greedy, selfish creature. Coveting everything his heart desires. That is reflected by his behavior upon becoming a ghost king.

Building a palace filled to the brim with the rarest of treasures. Gorging himself (though maybe not quite so voraciously as He Xuan) on the finest meals and wines.

Hua Cheng has never once felt guilty for that.

The only thing he has ever felt guilty for desiring, in the end, is his god.

Because he knows he isn't worthy of it.

But even through the guilt, desire still lingers, eating away at him.

Remembering the soft moan Hua Cheng felt against his lips the night before.

Dissecting every single shiver that his god lets out when he's around him. The way his skin sometimes flushes pink after Hua Cheng speaks.

It makes long burning heat smolder into a spark. A desire to take more than what he's already been given.

And if his god wasn't sleeping beside him at this very moment, he...
The ghost king forces his eye shut, taking a deep breath.

They're the wrong thoughts, for the wrong time.

And who knows if there will ever be a right one.

ARTWORK INSPIRED BY THIS STORY

Included with permission from artist, do not repost or use for any reason.

GRIP
RoseNightshade.com
DO NOT REPOST

AHHHAHH
OH! OH!
AH! AHH
OHDEAROHMY HHHAH!!
GRIP
RoseNightshade.com
DO NOT REPOST

CREDIT:* *DRU

Chapter End Notes

thank you to Dru for their amazing artwork, and allowing me to share it!

xoxo, Evie

The Fire Social

Chapter Summary

> With a flick of her fingers, all of the windows and doors of the shrine are sealed as well, which makes the situation even more curious.
>
> What has Shi Qingxuan so worried about being overheard?
>
> “Your highness…have you ever heard of a Jinx Monster?”

Chapter Notes

> content warnings for this chapter: mentions of suicide

See the end of the chapter for more notes

When the next morning arrives, a tentative sort of peace falls around Puqi Shrine.

Shuo wrangles Qi Rong and the children under an annoyed but watchful eye, with Lang Qianqiu ‘helping,’ if it could even be called that. More like observing and offering unhelpful suggestions.

And each time he comes in and out of the shrine, he sees the two of them together.

Shuo has had the time in the last few weeks to observe the crown prince. To learn more about his personality and mannerisms.

But he’s never had the chance to see the way he is around Hua Cheng.

The difference is subtle, but…noticeable.

There’s a slightly more relaxed set to his shoulders. He smiles often, and laughs more.

There are moments when, as Shuo watches Hua Cheng help Xie Lian make some ‘adjustments’ to the soup from the night before, when he remembers…

‘I’d love to see him.’

That was what Xie Lian had said the afternoon before the mid autumn festival. Shuo hadn’t thought much of it at the time—after all, it’s just a phrase, but…

Watching them together now—it makes him wonder.

Morning turns into afternoon, and sometime after lunch, the other inhabitants of the shrine choose (or in Qi Rong's case, he's left outside tied to a tree) to make their way to the village to scrounge up some lunch.

The alternative, after all, would be eating Xie Lian's "improved" stew, which no one seemed to be leaping upon the opportunity to do.

In any case, Xie Lian doesn't mind—sweeping the floors of the shrine while chatting back and forth with the Ghost King—

That's when he hears it.

It's in the distance still—but with sensitive ears like Xie Lian, he can hear farmers whispering among themselves from the bottom of the hill.

"You ever seen a set of young ladies like that?"

"Lookin' mighty fine! Rich, too!"

Xie Lian stops, a basket in hand, tilting his head.

"…San Lang," he murmurs, "it sounds like someone's here."

Hua Cheng doesn't look up, working on washing the dishes from their lunch in the sink. "Does it?"

Xie Lian is too focused on the mystery to notice the hint of tension in his voice.

"Yes, I think—?"

Knock, knock!

The sudden and insistent knocking at the front door of Puqi shrine cuts him off, and the god quickly turns his attention to it, moving to answer.

It's strange, after all—who would be coming here?

The moment he answers the door, a familiar voice solves that mystery.

"Your highness!"

The prince stops, his eyebrows raising gently with surprise.

"...Lady Windmaster?"

Shi Qingxuan beams in greeting, pushing the hood of her cloak back as she steps through the threshold of Puqi Shrine.

"The one and only!"

Which means the other 'beautiful' and 'rich' young woman traveling with her is most likely...

Another dark haired figure stands on the threshold of the shrine, seeming far more hesitant.

Ming Yi.

Who, to Xie Lian's understanding, hasn't seen Hua Cheng since she was revealed to be a traitor.

The Earth Master remains frozen in the doorway, all while Hua Cheng remains in front of the sink, calmly wiping the suds of soap from his hands with a dish cloth.

Shi Qingxuan seems to notice him first, leaping backwards with surprise, nearly knocking Ming Yi over in the process.

"Crimson Rain Sought Flower!" She cries, pulling her fan out of the bodice of her dress. "What are you doing here?!"

(Ming Yi grimaces, clearly disapproving of how Shi Qingxuan chooses to deal with her female form's lack of pockets.)

"He's my guest," Xie Lian answers first, and with one quick sidestep, he's placed himself between the calamity and the wind master.

Hua Cheng smiles at Shi Qingxuan, relatively relaxed as she tosses the dish cloth aside.

"I'm surprised by the hostile tone, Lady Windmaster. I was on the impression that we last saw one another on good terms."

"I—Well—" Shi Qingxuan pauses, lowering her fan. "...I suppose we did," she admits, her expression quickly going from wary to friendly in the space of only a few moments. "It's good to see you again!"

Hua Cheng nods—but all of the warmth in his expression saps away the moment he turns his gaze to the earth master.

"Get out."

Ming Yi's eyebrows knit together as she glares, crossing her arms over her chest. "Coming here wasn't my idea!"

"Yeah!" Shi Qingxuan agrees, shifting her stance in front of the earth master, similar to what Xie Lian did when Shi Qingxuan raised her fan to Hua Cheng before. "Ming-Xiong is here to help me out! Besides, you shouldn't be mad at her for the stuff that happened before, the heavenly emperor was the one who asked Ming-Xiong to do it! What was she supposed to do, say no?!"

Hua Cheng's stare doesn't become any less frigid. "Yes."

"...Well..." Shi Qingxuan pauses, her mouth hanging open, clearly not having expected that answer. "That's just...unfair!"

Xie Lian sighs, not seeing this conversation going anywhere productive. "Lady Wind Master, what brings you and Lady Earth Master to visit?"

Shi Qingxuan looks back towards him, clearly reminded of her original purpose. "Ah, yes, I—!"

Just then, a voice from outside calls in.

"Oh, THAT'S the slutty Lady Wind Master everyone is always talking about?! HA! She really DOES have a nice rack!"

"..."

"..."

"..."

"..."

Xie Lian pales, horrified by his cousin's language, Hua Cheng's expression remains unchanged, glaring at Ming Yi, and Ming Yi, well —

She looks vaguely angry, but in a far more conflicted way than Crimson Rain. Shi Qingxuan...

Her smile remains stubbornly in place.

“Your highness, who is that?”

Before Xie Lian can answer, Qi Rong, in an obliviously self destructive effort, cries—

“Don’t you recognize me, you stupid bitch?! I’m the NIGHT TOURING GREEN LANTERN!”

Xie Lian’s face falls into his hands, and Shi Qingxuan turns around.

“Just a second,” her voice is as cheerful as ever as she steps back out the door, “I’ll be right back!”

It slams shut behind her, and before Xie Lian can say another word—
He hears the sound of several aggressive smacks.

And Qi Rong, whose only ‘talent’ seems to be having a somewhat high pain tolerance, wailing and shouting with pain.

“Haven’t you heard, the only men who call women things like that are the ones who could never get a woman in bed to begin with?!”

There’s another thud, followed by a sharp scream, implying that she just kicked the green ghost somewhere particularly painful.

“Just say you’ve never satisfied a woman before, it’ll TAKE LESS TIME!”

“Who cares if she’s satisfi—?! MOTHERFUCKER, THAT HURTS, YOU—OUCH!”

Funny, it’s not actually that different from what Pei said, during the mid autumn festival feast.

Honestly, Xie Lian finds General Pei and Shi Qingxuan similar in some respects, even if those similarities are limited.

Making the fact that the two don’t get along far more ironic

“There,” Shi Qingxuan steps back inside, brushing off her dress as she steps back inside, “Sorry about that, where were we? I—”

She stops again, and at first, Xie Lian is worried his cousin might have done some other idiotic, offensive thing, but—

“Oh, have you been cooking?”

Xie Lian pauses, rubbing the back of his neck sheepishly. “Oh, well, ah…yes, I made that.”

The pot of stew is covered, still sitting on the stove—but the smell of it is far more appealing than it was the day before. With Hua Cheng’s help, it’s almost tempting.

“Really?”

Shi Qingxuan’s eyes widen, intrigued. “I’ve never had something that was prepared by royalty! Could I try?”

“Oh,” Xie Lian blinks, somewhat hesitant. “Well, I…”

Hua Cheng lifts up his own bowl, which he hasn’t quite finished. “You should both try some.”

Ming Yi seems wary.

After all, Xie Lian seems hesitant to let them try it.

“…Is it any good?”

Hua Cheng makes a show of ladling himself a large spoonful, swallowing it with ease. “It’s delicious,” he replies calmly. “Very flavorful.”

“…San Lang’s been helping me practice,” Xie Lian offers. “It’s definitely better than what I used to make.”

Shi Qingxuan seems satisfied by Xie Lian’s word alone, hurrying over to ladle out a bowl for herself, as well as Ming Yi. “Oh, good, I’ve been starving all day! I’ve been so busy lately, it makes me work up an appetite!”

“Being busy seems to agree with you,” Hua Cheng comments, taking another bite of his soup. When Shi Qingxuan looks up at him curiously, he adds— “You’re looking very…healthy.”

Xie Lian tilts his head to the side, because it’s…an interesting way to phrase a compliment.

Ming Yi seems irritated by it, sending Hua Cheng a sharp look, but…

The ghost king did take a bite himself, right in front of them—and she's never been one to deny a meal.

So, she takes a seat beside Shi Qingxuan at the table, grabbing a spoon.

"So," Shi Qingxuan starts. "I came to see you, because—" She pauses, taking a bite at the same time as Ming Yi, swallowing quickly.

"..."

"..."

Xie Lian glances around, confused.

Why did everything get so quiet all of the sudden?

BAM!

Ming Yi collapses against the table face first.

Her bowl rolls to the side, nearly falling to the floor with a clatter—but Hua Cheng, helpful as he is, catches it before it can splatter everywhere and make a mess.

"I..." Shi Qingxuan's voice sounds very different now, rasping and choking, tears streaming down her cheeks. "I..."

"...Lady Wind Master?" Xie Lian questions, concerned.

Her pallor has turned a violent shade of green. Xie Lian can't see as much—but even her aura of spiritual power seems to be trembling from a sudden disturbance.

"...MING-XIONG!" She cries, scrambling to her feet. "YOU HAVE TO GET UP! OPEN YOUR EYES!"

"Lady Wind Master—!"

"YOU HAVE TO PULL THROUGH THIS!" Tears pour down her cheeks, dripping from her chin. "I NEED YOU! I CAN'T DO THIS ALONE!"

"Shi Qingxuan!"

"PULL YOURSELF TOGETHER! YOU'RE THE—!"

"That is a BROOM!"

The same broom that Xie Lian was using to sweep the floors only a few minutes ago, but now, Shi Qingxuan is clutching it against her chest, shaking it as though she's trying to wake the dead.

"San Lang..." Xie Lian mumbles, looking around anxiously. "What's wrong with them?!"

"Mmm..." The calamity hums, watching the other two immortal beings, one collapsed, the other flailing around with a broomstick. "Bad taste."

Xie Lian shakes his head, glancing back at the other two, shocked.

...Was the stew really that bad? But Hua Cheng had an entire bowl!

Even if the two of them each only managed to swallow one bite—it takes the better part of half an hour for the two heavenly officials to recover.

When Ming Yi eventually lifts his head, he's returned to his male form—and he's staring sourly at Hua Cheng.

"You're a sick bastard, you know that?"

Hua Cheng quirks one eyebrow, crossing his arms over his chest. "For what?"

The earth master opens his mouth to point out exactly what Crimson Rain had done, but—

He doesn't dare insult the crown prince's cooking in his presence.

Which places him in the annoying position of closing his mouth, glowering silently.

BANG!

Shi Qingxuan smacks her hand on the table, still faintly green as she rises to her feet, swaying back and forth unsteadily.

"That...that was...very rich, your highness!" She rasps. "Very flavorful, like...like Hua Cheng said! I-I think I'm full, though!"

Xie Lian almost wishes she would just say the food was horrible, that would be easier than listening to her lying through her teeth—though he supposes he appreciates the effort.

"…You were trying to say something before?" He prompts quietly, hoping to move on from the debacle entirely, and Shi Qingxuan seems relieved to do the same.

"Right!" She exclaims, sitting back down at the table. "I came to ask for your help!"

Xie Lian pauses, surprised.

"…Me?"

After all, few have ever asked him for anything of such a nature—knowing his bad luck is likely to ruin any endeavor before it begins.

"You were the first person I thought to ask!"

But still, Shi Qingxuan has helped him so often recently, he agrees without question.

"Of course, I'll help with whatever the issue is—but what seems to be the issue?"

"Oh, I'll explain everything," Shi Qingxuan bobs her head. "But why don't the two of you take a seat, first? It might take a moment to explain."

Hua Cheng and Xie Lian take their seats opposite Shi Qingxuan and Ming Yi—and the moment they do, the room suddenly goes dark, lit by only one candle in the center of the table. A cold wind blows through, thunder rumbling in the distance.

"It starts like this…"

Hua Cheng looks around, raising an eyebrow. And while Xie Lian can't see the darkening of the room, he does notice the wind and the sudden change in temperature.

"…Lady Wind Master, what are you doing?"

"Oh?" Shi Qingxuan blinks, pausing in her story. "What do you mean?"

"I mean…the wind, the thunder—what's with all of that?"

"Oh," the Wind Master shrugs, explaining earnestly— "I was trying to create some atmosphere!"

"…That really doesn't seem necessary…"

"Ah, well," Shi Qingxuan waves that off, after all, it's all details. "At least the mood is set."

With a flick of her fingers, all of the windows and doors of the shrine are sealed as well, which makes the situation even more curious.

What has Shi Qingxuan so worried about being overheard?

"Your highness…have you ever heard of a Jinx Monster?"

At the very same moment, far from the halls of Puqi Shrine, in a very different setting, a Heavenly Official is facing a very different obstacle.

Ling Wen is not particularly fond of running unnecessary errands. Much less of being a messenger, as a civil god of his rank.

He tilts his head back, using his fingers to shield his eyes as he squints at the sun overhead.

It's humid here, the air thick with moisture, cicadas buzzing obnoxiously all around. Winter hasn't come around to frost them out for another seventeen years.

"…Mister?" One of the local children stops, a basket of barley balanced on top of her head, staring up at the unfamiliar man, clad in black robes. "Are you lookin' for someone?"

Ling Wen stares down at the child, his brow pinched. He's never had to deal with children before.

Is the term 'take me to your leader' too complicated to explain?

Everything about this place is irritating him. The tall grasses are like a breeding ground for bugs, gnats and mosquitos all around, and there's sweat beading at the back of his neck—

"He's here to see me."

The woman who speaks has the voice of a young lady—high pitched and delicate, which is all together contradicted by the manner in which she carries herself.

Spine straight, shoulders thrown back, chin raised.

She's neither tall, nor short, with a slim frame and calm demeanor.

Her skin has long since been sun kissed from working in the fields—but her features are still rather refined. Full lips and clear eyes, with a dark, heavy curtain of hair falling down her back.

And, of course, a bamboo hat sits atop her head, shielding her eyes from the sun.

"…Your majesty, Lady Rain Master," Ling Wen acknowledges her calmly, bowing his head slightly with deference.

"I am no longer 'your majesty', Ling Wen." The goddess corrects him gently. She has a careful way of speaking, her words never coming out rushed.

Slowly, she looks him over—and before Ling Wen can make some droning statement explaining how royalty still retain their formal titles after the dissolution of their countries, she comments—

"I hope you aren't wearing that form on my account." The civil god pauses.

"…Pardon?"

The veil on the Rain Master's hat blows gently in the breeze. The white, transparent material does almost nothing to hide her face from view, but, as Ling Wen now understands—

It likely keeps the bugs out.

"If that is the form you prefer, I don't mind," Yushi Huang explains. "But if you are wearing it as a means of obtaining respect, or because you expect to be engaging in combat in my territory—"

(It is his more powerful form, after all.)

"—those concerns would be unnecessary."

Of course, Ling Wen has little concern about getting into a skirmish with a group of farmers.

However…when outside the heavens on official business…he does often use his male form.

For precisely the reason that Yushi Huang described.

Which, Ling Wen supposes, when dealing with a fellow goddess…

Perhaps it is unnecessary.

His eyes flicker around, uncertain—

But the Rain Master shakes her head, assuring him, “The people here have seen me change forms often. You won’t frighten them.”

Frightening them wasn’t really his concern—Ling Wen would simply rather avoid causing a scene, but he nods.

In the blink of an eye, she’s back in her original form—and even still, her stature is several inches taller than that of the Rain Master.

"There," Yushi Huang smiles, a curtain of dark hair swaying in the breeze as she turns around, gesturing for the civil goddess to follow. "Come."

Ling Wen is hesitant at first, scrolls clutched under her arms--but after another mosquito attempts to bite her, she follows.

Unlike every other heavenly official from this term (and many prior), Yushi Huang simply never made a permanent move to the Heavens after her ascension.

Rather, in the millennia since, she has spent her time among the descendants of the Kingdom of Yushi.

Having known that, and that the village in which she resided was comprised mainly of farmers, Ling Wen would have expected her to live in a small hut, or something of the like.

And nine centuries ago, that would have been true. Now…she arrives to a rather surprising sight.

The Temple of the Rain Master—her first and largest place of worship—is not nearly so ostentatious as temples for other heavenly officials, but it’s far larger than what Ling Wen anticipated, and well maintained at that.

Yushi Huang glances back over her shoulder. “You seem surprised.”

Ling Wen means to deny it at first, but quickly gives up. “I wasn’t expecting such a remote place to host such a grand temple.”

“Mmm…” The Rain Master turns her chin away, and when she lifts her skirts to climb the steps, Ling Wen notices her bare feet. “I thought it was unnecessary at first, but the mortals use it for administrative purposes, and to house refugees during times of flooding. I suppose it’s useful.”

Ling Wen arches an eyebrow, glancing around as they step inside.

Most temples are hollow places.

Vast halls of wealth and prayer, hushed and quiet.

The Temple of the Rain Master could not stand in greater contrast.

Of course, there is a divine statue—a rather fine likeness, actually—along with a recreation of her famous Ox, but any resemblance ends there.

There’s an altar, but it’s being used as lounging space by a large barn cat. Scrolls are scattered on tables all around, marking out numbers from the harvest. Song birds dart between nests among the rafters, and despite the place seeming well maintained, vines climb the walls.

Yushi Huang strides through the main hall, slipping her hat from the top of her head, allowing it to hang about her shoulders as she acknowledges the farmers and children milling about, leading Ling Wen to the entrance of the private section of the temple, through a side door.

“You’re comfortable with one of your temples being used that way?” Ling Wen questions, arching an eyebrow.

Yushi Huang’s private quarters are equally large, but far more modest than what would be expected of a goddess or princess.

“Why wouldn’t I be?”

She hangs her hat up by the door, moving over to tend to a pot of tea left to steep. "It's their temple. They built it, they keep it up. They should do with it as they will."

It's an…interesting perspective.

Ling Wen can't say she's heard anyone other than Xie Lian speak in such terms.

"Well," She clears her throat. "I suppose I should get to why I'm—"

She stops, staring at the table, where Yushi Huang has set a plate.

Steaming hot rice, vegetables, and meat.

"Have a seat."

The Civil Goddess complies, however reluctantly. "I really don't need —"

"I can tell when someone hasn't been sleeping or had a proper meal." Yushi Huang shrugs, pouring herself a cup of tea. "We can discuss why you're here while you eat."

Ling Wen stares, feeling rather...

...Ruffled.

After all, she isn't typically in the position where she's allowed to take breaks, or to feel tired. The implication that she might need rest feels almost like an existential threat.

Coming from a young woman holding a cup of tea and wearing no shoes. Still, she's a guest in someone else's house, and it feels rude to decline. As such, she takes a seat—however stiff her posture may be.

"I'm here on orders from the emperor, regarding the girl Banyue."

Yushi Huang sips her tea calmly, inhaling the aroma before she replies.

"And what business has the emperor tasked you with?"

"He's commanded that I take the young lady into my custody and return her to the heavens," Ling Wen replies easily.

The corner of the Rain Master's lips quirks up into a small, knowing smile. "May I see the order?"

Ling Wen hesitates, and the Rain Master nods, having her suspicions clearly confirmed.

"The emperor didn't send you."

The civil goddess stares at the fork in her hand, her expression unchanged. "Perhaps he hoped such an old friend would honor a simple request."

"Mmm..." Yushi Huang sets her cup of tea aside. "I admire your commitment to your story, but the emperor does not have friends. He has subjects. And I am the eldest among them."

She might physically look younger than Ling Wen, but the gaze that settles upon her feels ancient.

"He knows me enough to understand that I would not turn that girl over unless forced."

She doesn't need to say the rest—it's implied.

If Jun Wu meant to force Yushi Huang to do something, he would have sent Shi Wudu, who is far more formidable than Ling Wen in combat.

Yushi Huang might not look much like a warrior—but the sacred blade hanging on the wall behind her tells a very different story.

"Pei sent you," The Rain Master concludes. "You are a kind friend, but he has wasted your time."

Ling Wen finds herself fighting impending fatigue.

"Is there no room for negotiation?"

"No." Yushi Huang's voice is kind, it rings with sympathy—but it leaves absolutely no room for doubt that she means what she says. "If he would like to discuss the issue of Banyue, he is welcome to come and make a case whenever he likes."

Which of course means that he'll never do it. Pei might seem like a man who faces all of his battles head on--and generally, he does—but in this case, he has turned nine centuries of avoidance into somewhat of an art form.

"Why be so determined to protect her?"

"I told Shi Qingxuan that I would," the goddess replies simply. "And I understand that she has an important relationship with the Crown Prince of Xianle. These reasons are enough."

She doesn't have formal alliances with either—so Ling Wen can't fathom the point of her efforts.

"...Well, if you're waiting for Pei to come here, you might as well resolve yourself to have that girl in your care until the end of time," Ling Wen grumbles, taking a bite of her food.

And, goddamn it all, it's very good.

Tender, flavorful. The perfect temperature.

Ling Wen glowers as she takes another bite.

"Pei is uncomfortable with women who threaten his ego." She grumbles, swallowing down a particularly buttery slice of beef, her eyes rolling back into her head.

And, to her shock...

"Mmm...I don't think that's true."

Yushi Huang actually speaks up in Pei's defense.

"Pei would not be such close friends with you if he was threatened by a strong woman."

Ling Wen pauses, her eyebrows knitting together as she glances at Yushi Huang from the corner of her eye.

"That isn't the same."

After all, Pei doesn’t view Ling Wen in the same way that he does other women: As potential romantic partners.

Yushi Huang sets her tea to the side, using her palms as leverage to hop up and sit on the edge of the kitchen counter, beads in her dress clinking as she does so.

“I understand that you’re different,” she murmurs.

As she speaks, her skirts shift ever so slightly from the change in position. Exposing her right leg in part. The shape of her calf, the bend of her knee. The barest hint of delicate skin leading to her thigh.

Ling Wen finds her eye locked on that spot for the briefest of moments, unable to stop herself—and when she looks up, she meets the Rain Master’s gaze, meaning—

Yushi Huang knew exactly what she meant when she chose the word 'different.'
The civil goddess quickly looks away.

Her expression remains smooth—but her heart is beating unsteadily with self consciousness.

The Rain Master, by contrast, is completely at ease.

As should be expected, Ling Wen supposes. She's lived in the countryside for centuries, and likely has no care for propriety.

"Even so, think of Xuan Ji," Yushi Huang continues. "She isn't a meek woman in the least, and she never was—and Pei had a relationship with her anyway."

An affair that he's regretted ever since, but Ling Wen supposes there is some merit to her point.

"He still won't come here."

"I know," The Rain Master agrees. "But that doesn't mean he isn't aware of the fact that he could. You can tell him as much when you return."

And Yushi Huang is far more aware of the reason why than Ling Wen. Possibly more so than anyone.

After all, she's known Pei the longest.

The Rain Master remembers what the general was like as a young man.

A very young, very mortal soldier. One with all of the talent in the world, and the weight of it upon his shoulders.

A weight she too had to carry, however briefly, when she was far too young.

Still, she keeps her attention on Ling Wen, whose mood has rapidly soured since learning there was no hope of returning with Banyue in tow.

"General Pei isn't unfair," the Rain Master assures her quietly. "He won't blame you."

Ling Wen doesn't look at her, staring at her plate.

Whether she likes it or not, she knows that her demeanor has become somewhat similar to that of a sulking child.

“...I don’t like failing.” She admits flatly.

Even in the most seemingly minor of tasks, she takes failure to perform rather personally.

“Everyone fails sometimes.”

Ling Wen clicks her tongue against the roof of her mouth, shaking her head. “Not me.”

“Then people might understand if you come back empty handed, once or twice.”

“I’m sure that’s an easy point of view to have when you’re hiding out in the mortal realm—” She stops herself.

“...That was rude,” Ling Wen mutters, shaking her head. “I apologize.”

Yushi Huang swings her feet slightly where they dangle over the edge of the counter, tilting her head to the side.

“I don’t mind,” the Rain Master replies. “But I don’t think you see your position clearly.”

Ling Wen glances back at her, raising an eyebrow. Despite claiming not to be hungry, her plate is already half gone.

“That would be news to me.”

Yushi Huang shrugs, reaching for her cup of tea once more. “I’ve been around for quite some time.”

Of course, Ling Wen is aware.

Very few Heavenly Officials have been around as long as Pei—and Yushi Huang is the only goddess among them.

“In all that time, I’ve never seen anyone as indispensable to the Heavens as you.” The Rain Master explains. “That’s a position with few obvious disadvantages.”

Meaning that she can afford to fail every now and again, so long as her services remain unparalleled and necessary.

Ling Wen finds some small amount of comfort in that—but there's something else to Yushi Huang's statement that catches her attention.

"...Does that mean there's a disadvantage that isn't so obvious?" Ling Wen questions, looking up at her.

The Rain Master stares back at Ling Wen, her gaze unwavering.

"Being indispensable to a powerful man means he will never get rid of you, but..."

Her lips gradually curve downward into a frown—and the next words out of her mouth send chills down Ling Wen's spine.

And in the weeks and months that follow, they will haunt her.

"But a powerful man who is dependent upon you is not likely to let you go, either."

Back in Puqi Shrine, however, Xie Lian is experiencing a very different form of haunting.

"...A Jinx Monster?" He replies slowly, rubbing his chin as he wracks his mind, pouring through countless memories. "You mean...like a Venerable of Empty Words?"

"Yes!" Shi Qingxuan whispers quickly, still rather pale, even in the dark—and clearly afraid of being overheard. "You've encountered one before?!"

Xie Lian blinks, rounding up the incidents in his head. "Twice, I'm afraid."

Everyone in the room is staring at him by now, and Xie Lian can sense it—so the prince takes a deep breath.

"Many centuries ago, if I didn't have a loom or had to lay low for some reason, I would take to busking."

This isn't surprising, lots of people know that about the prince

"One day I was sword swallowing, and I heard the most peculiar story."

Shi Qingxuan is too ashamed to admit that she had heard tales of the crown prince sword swallowing, but...

She thought it had been in more of a figurative sense, though now it's obvious that wasn't possible.

"It was about a young lady in the city who was being targeted by a malicious spirit," Xie Lian recalls. "She was a renowned beauty, but her family had a poor reputation. As such, she had difficulty securing a marriage."

Shi Qingxuan frowns. "That seems horribly unfair."

"If that girl's family had done something wrong, then why should she be the one to pay for it?"

"People are unfair that way," Hua Cheng comments.

Shi Qingxuan misses the sharp look he seems in Ming Yi's direction, but the earth master seems more invested in Xie Lian's story.

"Yes," the prince agrees. "It was unfair—but she was unwilling to become a concubine. With no education to fall back upon, she decided to make her living by entering into beauty contests."

The Wind Master raises an eyebrow. "Can you really make a living that way?"

"If you're talented enough," Xie Lian agrees. "Which she was. She had managed to build quite a name for herself, and was likely on track to secure a profitable marriage —and that was when the creature attacked."

Xie Lian can still remember how terrified she was, begging for help.

"Every time she would be preparing for a pageant, a voice would suddenly call out— telling her that she would trip and fall, or that she would be doomed to lose to another contestant. At first, she blamed nerves and stress—but then, she really did begin losing."

"That doesn't seem like the worst thing in the world," Hua Cheng muses, leaning back in his chair lazily.

"For a young woman defendant on such a thing, it was," Xie Lian sighs. “And the spirit’s threats only became worse overtime. Eventually—it became violent.”

A Venerable of Empty Words thrives on misery, after all—and it will escalate its threats until its victim is robbed of all happiness, lingering in a pit of fear until… eventually…they succumb.

More often than not, they end up taking their own lives or perishing in other ways.

“She became so desperate, she ended up seeking help from a cultivator—and that’s where I came in.”

Hua Cheng smiles faintly, recalling how quickly Xie Lian offered his services when Mr. Mo took to the streets a couple of days before, complaining about the fetal spirit.

Shi Qingxuan leans forward, hopeful.

“Did you manage to help her?”

“Um…” Xie Lian wrinkles his nose, thinking about it. “Yes.”

The Wind Master brightens. “That’s—!”

“—But also no.”

Her face immediately falls. “…Huh?”

“Well…” Xie Lian scratches the side of his neck.

“In order to investigate the case, I posed under her identity and participated in the Beauty Pageant myself,” he explains, not seeing the way that Ming Yi and Shi Qingxuan’s jaws drop to the floor. “We had similar features, so I was able to pull it off on stage.”

Hua Cheng, however, doesn’t seem surprised in the least.

“…Wouldn’t your height and frame have been an issue?” Ming Yi questions, looking Xie Lian over with disbelief.

“Not necessarily,” Shi Qingxuan shakes her head. “Ling Wen is taller than him, you know.”

“She is,” Xie Lian agrees, not particularly offended by the assertion. After all, he was always shorter than Mu Qing and Feng Xin growing up—but neither of them could either beat him in a fight, either. “And

I was smaller back then."

For was more difficult to come by, after all.

The mention of that draws a frown from Hua Cheng, but Xie Lian carries on as if he's said little of note.

"I took her place in the contest—and when the creature appeared to taunt me, believing I was her, I was able to attack and capture it."

No small feat, but Xie Lian would argue that the Venerable of Empty Words in this case was particularly weak, targeting peasants rather than figures with grand destinies, its usual prey.

"But then…you did help her, right?"

Xie Lian winces.

"I did capture the spirit, but…"

It's honestly embarrassing, when he recalls his original task, but…

"Even after I revealed my identity and the original woman came to participate in the contest…the judges still chose me for first place instead."

Shi Qingxuan chokes, half from amusement, half from surprise.

"Since I had already captured the Venerable of Empty Words…the woman I was working for began to think she was permanently cursed…and she proceeded to have a breakdown," Xie Lian sighs, shaking his head. "It's very difficult to protect mortals from creatures like that."

Shi Qingxuan doesn't seem particularly comforted by that statement, but she nods. "…And…what about the second time you encountered?"

"Oh," Xie Lian blinks owlishly, his shackle gleaming in the candlelight. "That one attached itself to me."

Silence falls over the group.

"…So…they can attach themselves to heavenly officials?" Shi Qingxuan questions in a small voice, and Xie Lian nods—his expression surprisingly calm.

"Yes—but I found it much easier to deal with in that case."

“Really?” Hua Cheng questions, watching him closely. “How so?”

"Well, it first appeared after I had built myself some shelter," Xie Lian explains, leaning back and crossing his arms. "It shouted in my ear that my tent would collapse in two days."

Shi Qingxuan is biting her thumbnail anxiously. "And...what did you do?"

"Well," Xie Lian tilts his head to the side. "I was excited. I told the spirit that was twice as long as my last tent had lasted."

Ming Yi bites back a snort as Hua Cheng's expression darkens.

After all, as Xie Lian explains—his luck had been such that the Venerable of Empty Words had little means of making it worse.

More often than not, before it could even come up with something horrible to tell him, Xie Lian would end up encountering some horrible luck on his own.

At certain points, he even enjoyed the evil spirit's company. It had been months since he encountered another person, and he found its silly little predictions amusing. Sometimes before it even spoke, Xie Lian would ask if it had something new to say.

"Eventually...it gave up."

Xie Lian is a little sheepish about the fact that he was actually disappointed when the spirit left. It was a nice break to the daily monotony, however briefly it lasted.

The room is filled with silences of different kinds.

Shi Qingxuan is simply stunned, and almost...jealous.

Ming Yi's expression is carefully schooled, as if he's more than aware that he'll be punished for reacting with amusement, and Hua Cheng...

He simply watches Xie Lian, his expression silent and tense.

"But...why are you asking me about jinx monsters, Lady Wind Master?"

"Ah..." Shi Qingxuan smiles tiredly, rubbing the back of her neck. "Well, you see...I've encountered one recently, and I wasn't sure how to deal with it."

Xie Lian arches an eyebrow. "Is it harassing one of your worshipers?"

"No," she grimaces, shaking her head. "It attached itself to me."

Xie Lian's eyebrows arch sharply.

Now, it isn't out of the realm of possibility for someone like him to encounter a Venerable of Empty Words. He has three cursed shackles, leaving himself vulnerable to such things—even if he won't die.

But for a fully fledged heavenly official like Shi Qingxuan, one at full power, no less—that's a rather bold move.

"...It must be particularly strong then," Xie Lian frowns. "You might just have to wait for it to realize it can't make a meal out of you—then it'll move on."

Shi Qingxuan winces, shaking her head. “Maybe that would be true if I had first encountered it as a Heavenly official, but...”

She trails off with a sigh.

“I met this creature when I was a mortal.”

That catches Xie Lian’s attention, just as Hua Cheng grimaces.

After all, he remembers.

Meeting a little boy disguised as a girl, cheerfully promising to introduce him to the ‘Shi’ family in exchange for sweets.

The Wind Master sucks in a deep breath—and she begins to tell the story. The first story she ever knew—and the most frightening.

“When I was born—my parents gave out food to the poor, they...”

It all seems so ironic, now.

“They wanted to bring me good luck,” Shi Qingxuan mutters, her lips turning up into a tired, bittersweet ghost of a smile. “That was how they came across a cultivator.”

Ming Yi leans his elbow on the table, watching her closely, his gaze distant.

“He was among the homeless who came to take the donated food—and he offered to tell my fortune. That’s when...” Shi Qingxuan’s smile. “He told them not to throw any feasts for me.”

Of course, Shi Qingxuan’s parents had been shocked by such a request. After all—a second son to secure an ancient family line, why shouldn’t they celebrate?

But Xie Lian immediately sees the problem at stake, given the mention of a Venerable of Empty Words.

The creature must have sensed a great destiny in Shi Qingxuan’s future and staked claim over the child at birth.

“And my parents...they didn’t listen. They feasted for two days and two nights, setting off firecrackers in the city.”

The prince grimaces.

‘The higher they rise, the further they fall’ is a phrase for a reason.

To a Venerable of Empty Words, it’s like advertising a possible feast.

“But when my father began to make a toast...a voice shouted out, ‘Wretched beginning, wretched end.’”

That marked the start of it.

The story Shi Qingxuan tells from then on is something of a horror.

The cultivator advised her parents to raise her up as a girl as a means of hiding Shi Qingxuan from the creature. To never let Shi Qingxuan shine—but rather, that the child must live an unremarkable life.

Then, she might be safe.

Less than four years later, Shi Qingxuan’s parents were dead, slain by robbers—only sparing the children in the house because they didn’t know they were there.

One of her earliest memories is of her brother pulling her from a hiding spot. Telling her that it was safe now. That the scary men were gone.

He carried her from their family home with his hand covering her eyes—because he didn’t want Shi Qingxuan to see.

And she never did see her parents again. When they returned to the house later, they were gone.

Along with any sign of what had happened.

After that, it was only Shi Qingxuan and her brother.

And the new rules that they had to live by.

The new name she had to answer to. The veils she had to wear when traveling outside. Only ever allowed to play freely in their courtyard.

Shi Qingxuan had been so miserable back then. Yearning to make friends. To be as happy and loud as she wanted to be.

Ironically, looking back on it—miserable as she was, those years were among the happiest of her mortal life.

When her brother was handling the family business—he was still busy, but they were together every day. Even if Shi Qingxuan was bored—she was never alone.

All of that seemed to change after he came.

A handsome young cultivator, going by the name 'Bolin.'

Later, her brother would explain that the cultivator had told him that removing the creature from Shi Qingxuan's path was impossible. That their best option was to follow the original advice.

But Shi Wudu refused to accept that—and that was when he decided on a new path.

If he couldn't save Shi Qingxuan as a mortal—then he'd simply become a god, instead.

He made arrangements for the business—and then he took Shi Qingxuan away from Qinghe, off to study cultivation under a master on a nearby mountain.

And from then on—it was lonely.

He would train from sunrise to sunset—and Shi Qingxuan would wait in the village at the foot of the mountain, day in and day out.

But one day—everything changed.

"After we had been on the mountain for almost a year…gege lost track of time—and he was late getting back."

Which was unusual for him—after all, he'd never been late before.

"I started to bring food up the mountain for him, but..." Shi Qingxuan pauses, clearly sheepish now, recalling the incident. "I had no way of realizing something was watching me, so I...stopped to relieve myself."

Which, unfortunately, revealed to the waiting Venerable of Empty Words that Shi Qingxuan was, in fact, the second son that the spirit had claimed all those years before.

"When I continued down the mountain, someone screamed that I was going to fall, and...I did."

It asked Shi Qingxuan for her birthday, and she gave it. It asked for her name— And she gave that too.

As she recounts the details, Ming Yi's face slowly shifts into a mask of frustration. "Why would you answer it?"

Shi Qingxuan bites her lip, looking at him anxiously.

"...Do you really think my brother told me what was hunting me?" She mutters, shaking her head. "I was...maybe eleven years old when this happened. I didn't even know what a jinx monster was, and no one would ever tell me. I...just assumed it was some sort of stalker. A human one."

Xie Lian's heart aches sympathetically.

After all, while the circumstances were far different, and he was far more capable of defending himself than an eleven year old child—

He's been stalked before, too.

And in those frightening, helpless moments—you want to appease them.

Shi Qingxuan had likely thought that giving the voice what it wanted was the best means of survival.

"...And you couldn't have just lied?" Ming Yi mutters—to which Xie Lian replies—

"When you're so young and frightened—you don't always remember to lie."

Of course—Xie Lian wouldn't have recommended that Shi Qingxuan blurt out her actual name or birthday either—

But frightened children operate on reflex, not logic.

"...And after that, it started all over again," the Wind Master explains, biting her lip.

There was no end to it.

Every waking moment of every day, she was being hunted. Tortured.

The Wind Master pauses in the middle of recounting the story, her expression twisting with hesitation—because she knows what they're all thinking.

She's a heavenly official now. What does she have to fear?

"...I wasn't like my brother," She admits, lowering her head. "I've never been the strong one."

The muscles in Ming Yi's jaw work silently.

"I knew it was only a matter of time before it pushed me to the edge—and so did he. I wasn't going to make it much longer."

After all—for a spirit that feeds on terror and pain, someone easily frightened is a perfect meal. And in that time, Shi Qingxuan was being quickly consumed.

"It wasn't until my brother ascended and brought me to the heavens with him that it stopped," she recalls.

Even then, it took time for Shi Qingxuan to believe that it was really over. But when her brother placed her in the middle court, showering her with treasures, and she eventually ascended herself...

She began to feel safe again.

She began to believe that she was safe.

"I had always assumed that the Venerable of Empty Words had given up or died out, but..." Her expression turns grim—and now, the reason for the Wind Master's sudden appearance in Puqi Shrine becomes clear.

"Last night, a voice told me I would never see my brother again."

Xie Lian's stomach sinks. "And...you're sure it's—?"

"I couldn't forget that voice, your highness," Shi Qingxuan mutters, shaking her head. "Not ever."

Which presents a difficult situation all around.

"...San Lang," Xie Lian turns to him. "Have you encountered one before?"

Hua Cheng remains silent for a moment, then he turns his attention to his god, answering his question calmly;

"Not personally—but I know someone who has."

Xie Lian waits for him to offer up more details—but when the Ghost King isn't forthcoming, he asks—

"And what do you think of them?"

"..." This time, the pause doesn't seem to stem from reluctance—more so, it's as though Hua Cheng is choosing his words carefully. "They're particularly difficult to deal with—they aren't ordinary pests."

And coming from Hua Cheng...

For someone as powerful as him to say that a creature like that isn't easy to deal with —that's no small thing.

"So...will you help me, your highness?"

And naturally, if it's so dangerous—and even more difficult to deal with—

"...Of course," Xie Lian agrees.

After everything Shi Qingxuan has done to help him since he returned to the heavens —the crown prince can't leave him to deal with this on his own.

(And he doesn't see it now—but Hua Cheng's expression falls sharply.) "But...wouldn't your brother be the best person to ask?"

Shi Qingxuan's jaw locks stubbornly, and she shakes her head.

"Not right now. He's about to face his third Heavenly Calamity. It'll be more dangerous than the two he's faced before—if I allow this to distract him…"

It could end up costing her brother his life.

"…Alright," Xie Lian takes a deep breath. "They're tricky creatures to catch—but if we do get our hands on it…"

He's confident enough that he can deal with it.

"I already have a plan to draw it out," Shi Qingxuan pushes back from her chair, rising to her feet.

"I've reserved a room in the most luxurious restaurant in the capital—I'm going to host plays and set off fireworks until it shows itself."

The apple doesn't fall so far from the tree, clearly—but Xie Lian can't say it's a bad plan for drawing out the Venerable of Empty Words.

"Alright—in that case, if we're going to be gone for a while, I'll just need to make sure that someone can look after the shrine while I'm gone," Xie Lian muses, turning back to Hua Cheng once more. "I'm sorry to be leaving so soon after you arrived, San Lang."

The calamity leans back, crossing his arms. His posture is lazy, his legs stretched out, ankles crossed—it doesn't convey the tension in his eyes.

"I can have my people make sure the shrine is looked after while you're gone," he murmurs. "But do you mind if I come along?"

He rises to his feet in tandem with the crown prince, ignoring the harsh look that Ming Yi sends his way in the process. "I've never seen a Venerable of Empty Words personally—it sounds interesting."

And of course, there's Blackwater in their private array, seething.

'What happened to staying out of it?'

"Oh," Xie Lian smiles, slightly less disappointed than he was before. "If you'd like to come along—then that would be a great help."

Hua Cheng smiles, falling in behind him—but his eye turns towards Ming Yi, gaze sharpening by the second.

'That was before you brought this to my doorstep.'

Technically, Ming Yi did no such thing—and it's Xie Lian's doorstep, not Hua Cheng's —

But given how angry the elder of the two ghost king's sounds, he doesn't dare argue.

"Ming-Xiong," Shi Qingxuan reaches over, tugging him by the sleeve. "We should get going—draw the traveling array for us?"

Secret internal deliberations aside—the earth master lets out a long suffering sigh. "Fine."

He walks over towards the door—and he begins his work.

Compared to the travel array that Feng Xin drew up for them when they were traveling to the Crescent Moon Kingdom—this is a far more elegant specimen, one that Ming Yi draws with complete confidence, his fingers never pausing.

As he works, Shi Qingxuan turns to Xie Lian.

"Your highness—who was that foul mouthed little man from before?"

Xie Lian pauses in the middle of picking up his bamboo hat, tying it under his chin. "...Didn't he already tell you?"

The Wind Master's eyebrows shoot up. "...That was really the night touring green lantern?!"

He rubs the back of his head with a sheepish wince. "And my cousin."

"...Huh." Shi Qingxuan frowns, hands on her hips. "I thought he'd be taller."

A snort slips out of Hua Cheng as he covers his mouth, shaking his head.

"Most people tend to say that."

Outside, Xie Lian can hear his cousin squawking with indignation—meaning he overhead Shi Qingxuan's little comment.

"...That's not his actual body," Xie Lian comments, brushing some dust from the hem of his sleeve. "His actual form is even shorter."

That only makes the sounds of indignation from outside grow even louder—but before Qi Rong can finish screaming out his grievances, Ming Yi lifts his hands from the array.

"Let's go."

Hua Cheng steps forward first, walking over to push the door open just a crack—

And the moment he does, Xie Lian instantly becomes aware of the fact that something is wrong.

There's no sound or chatter that he would expect from a restaurant in the imperial city—only silence, cold, and the faint smells of mold and dust.

Shi Qingxuan frowns. "What—?"

Just as she speaks—the candle on the table blows out, plunging the room into darkness.

Everyone else seems to panic for a moment, scrambling to find something to grab onto, feeling around in the dark.

Xie Lian, however, remains perfectly calm—his gaze focused ahead.

On the one thing he can see—a dark aura, burning with resentment so intense, it almost stings.

Lingering just behind the door.

And now, there's a voice.

Dark, low, rattling with hatred as it echoes throughout the room. "Step through this door—and it will lead you to hell!"

Shi Qingxuan lets out a choked, petrified sound, taking a step away—but Xie Lian steps forward, lifting his foot and kicking the door open, prepared to deal with the creature on the other side.

But as soon as he does—the dark aura disappears in a cloud of smoke. Just...gone.

"..." He steps through the door, with Hua Cheng following quickly after him—and Xie Lian quickly gets the sense that something is very wrong.

It's cold and damp—drafty. Without the sound of any other humans in earshot. "...This isn't a restaurant in the imperial city."

"No," Hua Cheng agrees, falling step behind him. "It isn't."

"But…" Shi Qingxuan follows cautiously, gripping Ming Yi's sleeve. "I don't understand. It was only us four in the Shrine. How could it have gotten in without us noticing?"

It's troubling Xie Lian as well.

After all—he should have been able to detect the evil aura immediately, but he only noticed it after the array had been disrupted.

"Could it have snuck in when the candle went out?"

Shi Qingxuan frowns, holding onto Ming Yi tighter as she shakes her head.

"The array had already been tampered with before that."

And, of course—it couldn't have been waiting outside and slipped in when Hua Cheng opened the door either, given that the array was etched on the inside of the door.

"…But Crimson Rain was the one who opened the door."

Shi Qingxuan is quick to point that out, clearly floundering for some sort of explanation—and Hua Cheng raises an eyebrow.

"And Ming Yi was the one who created the array. What's your point?" He questions dryly.

"Ming-Xiong wouldn't do that!" The Wind Master protests vehemently. "He came all this way to help me, and his arrays are the best! He even handles all of the traveling arrays for the heavens!"

Xie Lian supposes that shouldn't come as a surprise. After all, he remembers something about the earth master being an engineer of sorts.

Or maybe that was the earth master before Ming Yi. Xie Lian faintly recalls the official who used to be the earth master being the same engineer who constructed the Walls of Gusu, long before even Xie Lian was born—far too old to be Ming Yi.

As a matter of fact—Xie Lian is fairly sure that he would have been alive during the time of the Royal House of Xianle's founding ancestor, Xie Bolin. Given that the Royal Capitol and Gusu were built at similar times.

Could it be the case that every earth master is selected for an engineering background?

Hua Cheng chooses that moment to speak up, startling Xie Lian from his thoughts.

“And what would I have to gain from bringing us to a place like this?” He questions, crossing his arms.

Shi Qingxuan opens her mouth, instinctively about to say that it would be to cause some sort of mischief. That’s what her brother would say, after all—coming from a ghost king.

But then she stops, her eyes sliding over to Xie Lian, who is investigating their surroundings.

She actually doesn’t doubt that Hua Cheng might send her and Ming Yi somewhere frightening as a means of practical joke, but...

He wouldn’t do that to the crown prince of Xianle, even if that’s not what he’s explicitly saying.

“...You’re right,” she mutters, relenting. “Sorry.”

Hua Cheng shrugs, not seeming to accept or decline the apology one way or the other —and Xie Lian’s palm finally finds the wall of the structure they’re standing inside of, finding the familiar texture of smooth marble underneath his palm.

“...Is this a temple?” He mutters.

It must have fallen into disrepair, if that were the case...and even if the Venerable of Empty Words has disappeared...

There’s a heavy aura of hate here. So palpable, it leaves a bitter taste on the prince’s tongue.

Shi Qingxuan finally comes to her senses enough to look, and...

All of the color drains from her face, leaving her expression ashen as she whips her head around, taking in the sight around her.

“It’s...” She wobbles, grabbing onto a nearby pillar for support, feeling slightly nauseous.

And this time, not from the prince’s cooking.

“...It’s a temple of Wind and Water, your highness.”

Xie Lian's jaw goes slack.

How could that be?

After all—Shi Qingxuan is a popular goddess in her own right. But her brother? He's the god of mortal wealth. No one hates money. So...why desecrate one of their temples?

The Wind Master almost trips over something on the floor, barely managing to catch herself—and when she looks down...

Xie Lian hears a tiny, petrified shriek—and luckily, he has good instincts, because he's able to catch Shi Qingxuan when she leaps into his arms.

"YOUR HIGHNESS!" She shrieks, clinging around his neck.

Xie Lian whips his head around blindly, looking for the aura of the Venerable of Empty Words—but he sees nothing, cradling the Wind Master in his arms.

"What is it?!"

(Ironically, it's a reversal of the position they were in back when they were looking for clues in Paradise Manor, and Xie Lian was screaming and demanding Shi Qingxuan kill a giant spider.)

"It's...It's...!" She looks down, trembling, and her eyebrows knit together. "It's...me!"

"...What?" Xie Lian blinks, moving to set her down—but Shi Qingxuan just holds on tighter, shaking her head.

From behind them, Hua Cheng frowns, eyeing their position with distaste.

"My divine statue!" She exclaims, staring down at its broken form on the ground with horror.

At first, the statues were so lifelike—she actually thought that they were corpses. Now, she realizes...

They're actually the likenesses of her and her brother.

Her own statue has been split in half in the middle, a painted smile melted into a horrified scream.

And her brother…

His is even more horrific, with a gash in it's throat cutting so deep, it's nearly been decapitated.

"…Who would hate us enough to do this?" She whispers, finally allowing Xie Lian to set her down—but sticking close to him when he does.

In all honesty—Xie Lian has seen this sort of thing with his own temples before, but that was entirely different. He was being blamed for the downfall of a kingdom, cursed as a good of misfortune—

These are two gods who are, arguably, at the peak of their power. Still, Xie Lian attempts to assuage her fears.

"As long as you have people who worship you—there will also be people who curse you. That's simply the way of things."

Shi Qingxuan frowns, her lips trembling—and Ming Yi gives a far less elegant form of comfort.

"Are you gonna be able to do this?" He questions flatly. "If you can't, we ought to go back."

Shi Qingxuan presses her lips together tightly, determined, clutching her wind master fan close to her chest.

"No," she mutters, shaking her head. "I'm not running away!" After a moment she eyes the exit to the temple, and she takes a deep breath. "It has to be around here somewhere still, right? I'm going to go and see what this thing is made of!"

She marches off towards the exit, her spine stiff, and while her sudden wave of courage isn't likely to last—Ming Yi follows her.

Hua Cheng moves to follow—but Xie Lian stops him with a hand on his arm. "San Lang?"

The Ghost King looks down at him, raising an eyebrow.

"Gege?"

"…I was just thinking," Xie Lian lowers his voice, leaning up on the balls of his feet in order to whisper close to Hua Cheng's ear—and the Ghost King is kind enough to lean down to assist in his efforts.

“Do you think we should exchange communication array passwords?”

The pause that follows is enough to leave the god feeling slightly insecure. “...Is that a strange thing to ask? If so, never mind—it’s really nothing so serious—”

“No,” Hua Cheng interrupts him, and rather than sounding uncomfortable...

Actually, he sounds quite pleased.

“It’s not strange—I’m happy you asked me.”

Xie Lian pauses, surprised—and beside him, where he’s leaned down to allow them to whisper more easily—Hua Cheng is smiling.

“...You are?”

“I was wondering when you would, but you never brought it up.”

Xie Lian has never felt put at ease so quickly or so easily.

“I began thinking you just didn’t like sharing your password with other people. And now that you’re finally asking me, you say it’s not a big deal?”

It almost sounds like he’s sulking, and Xie Lian looks away. “San Lang, don’t tease me about it...”

“I’m not,” the ghost king insists, but there’s still a smile tugging at his lips, even as he needles the prince. “I’m being perfectly serious.”

(Somehow, Xie Lian doesn’t believe him when he says that.)

“What’s your password then, gege?”

“Oh,” Xie Lian looks back at him, his eyes widening earnestly. “Just say the ethics sutra a thousand times.”

Hua Cheng’s eyebrows arch for a moment—and then, after a slight pause—

‘It’s just the phrase that you have to say three times, isn’t it?’

Xie Lian smiles, pleased.

‘No one’s ever guessed it that quickly before!’

There’s a difference in tone, when it comes to speaking inside someone’s private communication array. It’s something that Xie Lian himself does rather rarely—a necessity, when his spiritual power is so limited.

He forgot how intimate it could feel—having someone speaking directly into his mind.

Of course, he’s spoken to Ling Wen—and in the general communication array—but there’s something different about this.

(Or maybe, it’s just because it’s Hua Cheng.)

The Ghost King chuckles.

“It’s a good joke, your highness.”

Mu Qing certainly didn’t think so—as a matter of fact, he was incredibly annoyed when he figured out what the password actually was, even if it only took him a few minutes.

It took poor Feng Xin over two years, and he still forgets at times.

But when he did realize—instead of being angry, he absolutely roared with laughter, rolling around on the ground, clutching his stomach until Xie Lian thought he was going to get sick.

Naturally, it made Mu Qing even more pissed off—but it couldn’t be helped. Feng Xin will laugh at any and every joke, no matter how good or bad it is.

But hearing Hua Cheng say he finds it amusing—that makes Xie Lian smile a bit, in spite of the situation.

“And what about your password, San Lang?”

“You want to know?”

The prince nods rather eagerly.

This time, Hua Cheng leans very close, whispering the words directly into Xie Lian’s ear.

It’s not a very long password. Rather succinct, actually.

And when the prince hears, his face flushes red—all the way from his cheeks to the tips of his ears.

"...That's—San Lang, that's not really it, right?" He chokes, silently hoping that the ghost is joking, but—

"No," Hua Cheng murmurs, his lips still close to Xie Lian's ear. "Why don't you try it out and see for yourself?"

Oh—

Xie Lian can't.

He absolutely cannot.

"That...If I said that, it would sound like I wanted you...to..." Xie Lian trails off weakly, knowing that it's just a password, but still. It...

"...I couldn't say that."

It's rare that Hua Cheng lets something slip out unintentionally—but he mutters something under his breath:

"Dianxia almost said it yesterday."

Xie Lian pauses, his lips parted. What is he—?

Then, that memory hits him like a stack of bricks.

Oh.

Oh.

Being against that tree, with Hua Cheng whispering in his ear.

'What did you imagine, your highness?'

The martial god chokes.

"San L—?!"

"Your highness?"

Xie Lian nearly jumps out of his skin, whipping around in Shi Qingxuan's direction.

"Nothing!" He blurts out, pulling up the hood of his robes to hide his flushed expression.

"...What do you mean, nothing?" The Wind Master tilts her head. "All I did was call your name."

“…” Xie Lian swallows thickly, clearing his throat. “Right, right—what is it?”

“I was just wondering if you two were ever going to come along—there’s a village outside, we found a place to regroup.”

“Right,” the prince agrees, hurrying forward—glad to have an excuse to get away from that conversation. “Coming!”

Hua Cheng watches Xie Lian hurry out the door for a moment, his lips curving up into a fond smile—and he’s quick to follow after him.

As it turns out, the place Shi Qingxuan and Ming Yi found to ‘regroup’ has turned out to be a restaurant, one with large, open windows that face out onto the street—and Ming Yi is all too eager to eradicate any memory of Xie Lian’s soup from his palette, ordering the entire menu.

“I’ve been thinking,” Xie Lian pipes up, sipping from a cup of tea. “This venerable of empty words—it must be pretty old, to be so strong. Meaning it’s had targets before you—and if it’s still around, it’s devoured mortals since. Did your brother ever investigate the matter?”

“Oh—of course he did,” Shi Qingxuan nods, reaching into her sleeve to pull out a scroll. “I had the records from it pulled before I came to ask for your help. The only way they could really track it was by finding cases of other victims over the centuries.”

All of the deaths listed in the document as Shi Qingxuan reads the information out are suicides at first glance—but it’s the circumstances that set them apart.

Famous generals who watched their countries burn. Titans of industry left penniless. Scholars who ended their lives in disgrace and with little recognition for their work.

All individuals who could have achieved greatness—who even seemed set on that path, in some cases—only to crash back down to earth in sudden failure.

“…” Hua Cheng listens to the same information, crossing his arms over his chest with a frown. “This scroll isn’t much good, half of it is wrong.”

Shi Qingxuan stops in the middle of reading, whipping her head around to stare at him. “Huh? What do you mean?!”

The ghost king leans over, surveying the names on the list for a moment, nodding when he's confirmed what he already suspected.

"Several of these weren't targets of the Venerable of Empty Words."

"Huh?!" The Wind Master sputters. "How would you know?!"

Hua Cheng's reply is simple, if not slightly chilling.

"Because I was the one who killed them."

Shi Qingxuan's jaw drops open while Xie Lian turns to the ghost king, slightly confused.

"But San Lang...it says they all took their own lives."

Hua Cheng shrugs.

"I would send a messenger to inform them that I was coming, and they would usually just off themselves before I arrived." He tilts his head to the side, glancing around the table while raising an eyebrow. "Doesn't that count as my kill?"

Neither Shi Qingxuan or Ming Yi make any arguments to the contrary, and he continues—

"Did your brother even take this investigation seriously? How could the only document on the matter be so riddled with errors?"

"Of course he did!" The Wind Master cries vehemently. "He takes everything to do with my safety incredibly seriously! If there was a mistake, then it wasn't his fault!"

Even now, she's her brother's most ardent believer.

In some distant way, Hua Cheng supposes that he can sympathize. "Who prepared this document, then?"

"..."

The degree to which Shi Qingxuan deflates says enough for everyone to know the answer before she says it.

"...The Palace of Ling Wen," she mutters.

And for an investigation from her palace to have so many errors, well... It's unusual.

Still—Xie Lian doesn't find room for suspicion in that. If there's anything he's learned after spending time with Hua Cheng—it's that the Heavens don't seem to know much at all when it comes to the ghost realm.

Just then, a waiter arrives—and when he does, Xie Lian turns his head to ask him— "Excuse me sir, do you mind telling us the name of this place?"

The waiter raises an eyebrow, filling all of their glasses.

"You aren't familiar with our town of Fu Gu, sir?"

When Xie Lian shakes his head, the waiter straightens from where he's been setting several plates in front of Ming Yi, surprised.

"I assumed that you folks were in town for the fire social—it's what we're famous for."

"A fire social?" Shi Qingxuan questions.

Xie Lian smiles faintly. "You've never seen one before?"

Fire socials are rare occasions—but always enjoyable.

"They're festivals put on during folk holidays. There are parades, firework shows, and busking—local plays too. They're definitely worth watching."

He remembers going to a festival just like that when he was a teenager, sneaking out of the palace in peasant's clothes to surprise Mu Qing's little sister for her birthday.

They're beautiful affairs—and in the years since, he's regretted the fact that he can't see them now.

"...But there's not even a holiday," Shi Qingxuan mutters, fidgeting in her seat, a glass of wine in hand. "Tomorrow is the end of autumn—but that's not exactly something worth celebrating."

No one is happy when winter comes, after all.

"Fire socials are held for many reasons." Xie Lian explains, feeling around for his own cup of tea from where he set it down, only to have someone place it in his hand for him.

"...Thank you, San Lang." He murmurs. "Fire socials can be held to celebrate events, or to remember people—it depends on the place."

"Fu Gu's is pretty famous," the waiter smiles, stepping away from their table. "I hope you folks enjoy the show."

Xie Lian smiles politely, taking a sip of his tea. After all, he doubts he'll be able to enjoy the show much at all—but there's something to be had in listening.

Hua Cheng watches him wordlessly, his arm thrown over the back of his god's seat—a movement so subtle, Xie Lian hardly noticed it—and his expression has become unreadable.

And watching them both is Ming Yi, his mouth set into a grim line.

After all—the situation is complicated.

Shi Qingxuan doesn't seem focused on anyone else once the conversation dies out, her eyes flickering down to settle on the table, her fingers constantly twitching with anxiety.

Partly, for reasons that are quite obvious.

The other reason, however, isn't quite so clear.

Eventually, her eyes drift out the window—and when they do, she sits up straight in her seat from the shock.

"...What is that?!"

She almost moves to get up—but she's stopped by Ming Yi's hand on her arm, holding her down.

"Ming-Xiong, let me go!"

Lately, when Xie Lian's been in a situation like this—the one who would explain to him what was going on was Shi Qingxuan herself. Now, he leans closer to Hua Cheng, murmuring—

"San Lang—what's happening?"

Hua Cheng turns his head to look out onto the street, fingers curling ever so slightly around the edge of Xie Lian's chair, a silent display of protectiveness that goes unnoticed.

"...It would seem that there's a troupe passing through with very realistic prosthetics."

"Prosthetics?!" Shi Qingxuan shakes her head, still struggling against Ming Yi as she attempts to leave the table. "Those people are wounded!"

"No," Hua Cheng contradicts her calmly. "It's all fake."

And just like that, Xie Lian inhales sharply with understanding.

"Oh!" He leans forward, intrigued. "This is quite an occasion!"

Shi Qingxuan looks over at him, utterly baffled—still vexed about the perceived danger. "What are you talking about?!"

"This is a bloody fire social!" Xie Lian explains. "It's truly a rare opportunity to see one!"

They're a practice that has become more and more rare over time, after all—Xie Lian has never had the chance to witness one himself.

And even now, he's missing out on the most notable part.

"The performers in bloody fire socials are famous for their makeup artistry."

It's a secret technique that isn't passed down—which is why the practice is becoming so rare.

"...That's all makeup?!" Shi Qingxuan mutters, her eyes wide. "...But it looks so real!"

The group of performers trailing down the street are...

Truly grotesque.

Some of them have axes splitting their skulls open, brain matter and gore trailing down over their faces. Others have their innards spilling out through their ribs. Some are even missing limbs—groaning and screaming as they walk through the center of town.

It's truly the most horrifying sight that Shi Qingxuan has ever seen, leaving her covering her mouth, fighting back nausea all over again.

From across the table, Xie Lian sighs—wistful, wishing he could see such a rare sight. "There are some truly talented people in this world."

For a moment, she can only stare at the prince like he's completely lost his mind—but when she recovers, she manages to mutter—

"...I thought you said fire socials were supposed to be celebrations." Even now, she can see women at the front of the crowd fainting.

Children are screaming and running away the minute they see the actors coming close.

"Well—even if this one is particularly gory, it's probably still trying to tell some sort of story," Xie Lian explains with a shrug. "You should watch."

"But I already am watching!"

"But watch for the story," the prince implores her. "The Venerable of Empty Words switched the array around to bring us here intentionally—on the night of this fire social. It might have intended for you to see it."

Shi Qingxuan frowns, her brow creasing—but she watches.

All of the actors seem to be swirling and crawling around one character.

A tall, gaunt looking man, dressed in black. An ax dragging on the ground behind him, cutting a deep track in the dirt as he moves.

And there's something...odd about his movement. The way he walks.

He staggers, swaying from side to side, stumbling in an odd zig-zag pattern through the street. Almost as though he's drunk, but...

There's a deadness to his eyes—no fog that one would associate with being intoxicated, simply...

A lack of humanity. In short—

A madman.

The procession slowly makes its way to the end of the town's Main Street—and when it reaches it's destination, the man in black, the leader of the troop, stumbles into the river, leaving only the ax behind him.

He disappears into the water—all of the other actors collapse.

Like puppets with their strings cut, a pile of bodies, strewn around on the ground.

Hua Cheng quietly relays the details of the scene to Xie Lian, whispering close to his ear, and the prince frowns.

It clearly sounds like the man in black is the protagonist—and the mutilated crowd surrounding him are his enemies, villains who wronged him.

But what does this have to do with the Venerable of Empty Words—and what is Shi Qingxuan supposed to learn from it?

Just then, the waiter returns to their table, with…

Even more food for Ming Yi, who at this point is surrounded by the shredded remains of an entire roasted chicken.

"…Ming-Xiong, how can you eat after watching that?!" Shi Qingxuan grumbles, her face in her hands.

The earth master glances up, his cheeks puffing out similar to a chipmunks, crammed full with food.

"What? It's all fake."

"That doesn't make it less GROSS!"

Xie Lian overlooks their bickering, waving to get the waiter's attention.

"Excuse me, sir—do you know the story behind the performance that just took place?"

"Ah," the water smiles pleasantly, pouring the prince another cup of tea. "People from out of town don't usually know the story—but it's about the most famous man who ever lived in Fu Gu."

Once he's finished with Xie Lian's drink, he sets the teapot aside, lifting up a bottle of whiskey, filling up Hua Cheng's glass once more.

"He was a renowned scholar by the name of He—and while his family was rather poor, he was an extraordinary young man."

The tale the waiter tells is a surprisingly harrowing one.

"He was known to be brilliant in any subject or craft he happened to take part in. He was the son of a Shipyard worker, but by the time he was a teenager—he was the one engineering the ships himself."

No small accomplishment—and it sounds like a person with a bright future ahead, but—

“The only thing that ever got in his way…” The waiter sighs, shaking his head, “was a string of bad luck.”

Surely, he never knew the man in his mortal life—but he sounds deeply sympathetic.

And Xie Lian doubts it could truly be that bad—until the waiter begins listing events off like the major plot points of a book—and if this was a book, well—

It would be a horror.

“He studied to take the state exams—and despite being more than capable, his scores always came back as zero. Because the proctors—for whatever reason—switched his scrolls out for blank ones.”

Hua Cheng normally asks questions during stories like this—but now, he remains silent.

“His fiancé was a childhood friend—well known for being a kind, beautiful woman, compassionate to everyone around her. But both she and Scholar He’s little sister were abducted by a wealthy family, intending to force them into being concubines.”

The way he says it initially makes Xie Lian hope that they were unsuccessful—but that’s quickly doused by the truth:

“The sister took her own life, rather than living with the shame—and his fiancé was beaten to death when she refused to obey their wishes.”

Ming Yi’s chopsticks don’t pause, making their way to his lips in a calm, purposeful motion. There’s almost a forced, unnatural rhythm to the action.

“When Scholar He went to confront them to get his loved ones back—his fiancé died in his arms.”

Xie Lian sets his cup of tea down, a faint memory pulling at him—but so far gone, he doesn’t even know what he’s trying to recall.

“She pleaded with him not to take vengeance with her final breaths—and in that moment, he did not. But her killers imprisoned him anyway.”

Shi Qingxuan bites her lip as she listens to the story, shocked by the cruelty of it.

“His parents were old—and without another child to look after them in their later years, they pleaded for mercy—but Scholar He received none.” The waiter shakes his head, his tone grim.

“They imprisoned him for years—starving him to the point of near death. His poor mother was so sick, she passed away before he was released. And once he was, well—” The waiter looks toward the street, to where the lead actor is pulling himself from the river.

“Scholar He had a way of never staying down for long. So, when he was free again—he went into business, and he thrived. So much so that it made the other merchants in the town jealous—and they sabotaged him as a result, leaving him drowning in debts.”

“Eventually, his father passed away—and when he did, the merchants in town refused to even help Scholar He bury him, saying that it only took one man to bury a dog.”

The tale itself feels truly hopeless—not one at all worth celebrating—Until he reaches the ending.

“Scholar He picked up an ax—and one by one, he slaughtered every man in the village who had wronged him. These men had long terrorized the people of Fu Gu—so no one stood in his way, they only watched.”

Which explains the gory scene of the parade.

“He attacked them again and again—until every single one of them was slain. And the people cheered him—but in one final stroke of bad luck, the cliff side he stood upon crumbled beneath him, and he plunged into the sea.”

Xie Lian jaw drops, taking that in.

Who could have such horrible luck, other than him?! He’s never heard of such a thing!

“And...you hold this festival to honor him?”

In spite of only just recounting a truly gruesome tale, the waiter beams. “Of course! Our town has worshiped Scholar He as a god ever since!”

Shi Qingxuan pauses, tilting her head with surprise.

"...A god? The story makes no mention of him ascending."

"Aye, you're right," the waiter nods. "But the man was clearly destined for greater things—almost like a curse stole it all away from him."

The restaurant has gone somewhat quiet, the other residents of Fu Gu growing quiet to listen to the tale.

Hua Cheng glances around, surveying the room.

Qinghe—the city of his own birth—is only forty kilometers from here. But the people of Fu Gu couldn't be any more different.

They're hardened—mostly dressed in black. Hua Cheng himself switched into the skin of a young man in black robes when they stepped out of the temple in order to blend in.

Shipbuilders and fishermen. People who have spent their entire lives being worn and weathered by the sea.

One of them—an older man with a beard shot through with gray, his skin prematurely roughened from the wind and salty air, comments—

"You respect a man's destiny, young lady—whether he got the chance to live it out or not."

The waiter nods in agreement.

"Ever since, our people have worshipped him here in Fu Gu—and we throw him a fire social every year on the anniversary of his death in remembrance."

Hua Cheng hasn't ordered any food—but he flips a chopstick between his fingers, his expression pensive.

"What kind of god is he?"

After all—every god, even those who aren't real—are patrons of one thing or another.

"He's known as a god of retribution, punishing those who insult or harm others with their arrogance. We actually have another tradition," he looks out the window, pointing to the cliffs.

The very same cliffs from which Scholar He fell, centuries before.

“We throw coins into the sea from there—and it’s said if you do, you may lay a curse upon someone who has wronged you, and Scholar He will answer.”

It doesn’t sound like a very ‘godly’ thing to do.

But then again, they’ve made the point many times—

This scholar ‘he’ never ascended to begin with. Meaning, if he still lingers on...

It would be as a ghost.

A powerful one.

Just as Xie Lian begins to ponder the matter—

That voice comes back.

Louder than before—screaming.

“BEFORE THIS IS OVER—YOU’LL LOSE YOUR BROTHER AND YOUR CLOSEST FRIEND, AND IT WILL BE ALL YOUR FAULT!”

Shi Qingxuan was rattled before, when she heard the voice—screaming and hiding. But this time, when it directly threatens her loved ones—It draws out a very different reaction.

Her expression twists, her cheeks becoming flushed with anger as she launches herself out of her seat—and before Ming Yi can stop her, she leaps through the open window, charging towards the crowd.

“Show yourself you COWARD!” She shouts, shoving through the actors.

Xie Lian rises from his own seat, moving to go after her. “Lady Wind Master, wait!”

“For what?! Didn’t you hear it?! It—It’s HERE!” She whips her head around, her hair swirling around her as she examines the mortals around her, trying to find something sinister, but...

There’s nothing recognizably threatening—and that infuriates her even more. “WHAT ARE YOU HIDING FOR?! SCARED?! COME OUT!”

Xie Lian struggles through the crowd at first. He can seem spiritual energy after all— but normal mortals have very little, and it leaves him stumbling.

But just when he trips over an actor's foot, a hand wraps around his bicep, pulling him back onto his feet before he can hit the ground.

Xie Lian doesn't even have to look beside him to know that he'll find a sea of crimson there—and he nods gratefully.

"Thank you, San Lang."

It feels like that's been every other word out of his mouth lately—and now, the crowd parts for him easily, shifting out of his way like water as he hurries to Shi Qingxuan's side, grabbing her by the arm.

"It won't come out when you're expecting it!"

After all—it gains power from the fear it creates by surprising her. And for a demon this ancient and powerful, hiding itself is an easy task.

Even from Xie Lian, it would seem—because he can't see any sign of that dark aura anywhere.

Shi Qingxuan's face sinks into her hands, earrings clinking as she whips her head from side to side, utterly miserable.

"Ming-Xiong, did you hear it?! It threatened you too," she groans.

The earth master arches an eyebrow, resting one hand on his hip.

"When?"

"It said it was going to kill my best friend!" She cries, grabbing him by the sleeve. Ming Yi stares down at her, unimpressed.

"Who is that?"

Shi Qingxuan's expression falls, her eye twitching with irritation.

"MING-XIONG! CAN'T YOU BE NICE TO ME AT A TIME LIKE THIS?!"

Xie Lian sighs, rubbing a hand against his forehead, knowing at this rate—they aren't getting anywhere.

"Lady Wind Master, here," he rummages through his pockets for a moment, holding something out to her. “You should use these for now.”

Shi Qingxuan looks down at her palm.

“...Earplugs?”

“Yes,” Xie Lian nods. “We can continue speaking in our group’s communication array —but the reverend of empty words has always used its voice to taunt you. Cutting yourself off from its words ought to help.”

Unable to argue with that logic—Shi Qingxuan agrees.

Once she has them in her ears—Xie Lian speaks into the private array between the four of them:

‘See? It makes no difference, there’s nothing to be afraid of.’

Shi Qingxuan smiles, letting out a shaky breath.

‘Thank you, your highness.’

Xie Lian reaches over, patting her arm.

'And you're already in your female form because it's more powerful, right? The Venerable of Empty Words would be a fool to attack you right now.'

After all, while Shi Qingxuan does love her female form—more often than not, she chooses to appear as a man.

For her to be in this form the entire time is a testament to how frightened she must be.

"..." Shi Qingxuan nods, only seeming mildly comforted, replying into the communication array,

'Thank you, your highness.'

As they walk back towards the Temple of Wind and Water, planning to regroup, a very different conversation is unfolding.

One that Xie Lian and Shi Qingxuan have no way of knowing about--because they don't even know the private communication array in which it's occurring exists.

'Hua Cheng.'

It's a repeated call that he's been echoing since Shi Qingxuan leapt from the window of the restaurant--one that the other ghost king has been stubbornly ignoring.

'Hua Cheng.'

He stares straight ahead, arms crossed, falling into step beside Xie Lian--

'Wu Ming.'

It's an admittedly low blow, referring to him by that name--but it has the intended result, Hua Cheng's posture stiffening as his eyes flicker in Ming Yi's direction.

'He Sheng.'

Another name that the other loathes to hear, and for the very same reason.

Because they can no longer hear their names from those that they love. One by curse, the other by fate.

'That wasn't me.'

Hua Cheng rolls his eyes, turning his gaze back ahead.

'I'm sure.'

'Hua Cheng—'

'Look, I'm playing along with your stupid little freak show.' Hua Cheng grumbles into the communication array, gritting his teeth as he walks beside his god in silence. 'It's your own fault that I got dragged into this.'

'This isn't about—wait, how is that my fault?' Ming Yi frowns.

'Who did you think Shi Qingxuan was going to ask for help?'

After all—his brother wouldn't be an option. And after that, the best option would be to choose a martial god. But they aren't known for being particularly discreet.

In that case, Xie Lian, a trusted friend, was the obvious choice.

'I didn't think—'

'No, you didn't.'

Normally, unless under serious strain—or speaking about his revenge—He Xuan isn't easily ruffled, and is the type to speak calmly.

'Would you shut up and listen?!'

Hua Cheng has to fight the urge to whip his head around and bare his teeth at the use of that tone.

'What?!'

'The voice in the shrine was me.' He Xuan admits. 'The traveling array—that was me too.'

'I fucking gathered.'

'But the voice in the crowd just now—that wasn't me.'

Now, Hua Cheng falls silent, his gaze narrowing.

'I'm trying to lead her to the truth, ' Blackwater mutters. 'I'm not trying to torture her.'

Hua Cheng would argue that pretending to be the monster that hunted her for the duration for her childhood is, in fact, some form of torture—but he doesn't point that out.

'You couldn't have just had a sleepover and braided each other's hair?'

The other calamity doesn't immediately reply, but given how irritated Hua Cheng has been by the entire experience, he's happy to let the sarcasm fly.

'You could have even worn that female skin of yours, and then you could have spilled your secrets to one another.'

'Shut up.'

'I've been wondering—the rack, is that because the wind master likes them, or are you just projecting?'

'I said SHUT UP! You think I would have gone to all this trouble if I could have just told her the truth as Ming Yi? How do you think that would have gone?!'

Hua Cheng can see his point, however reluctant he is to give blackwater any credit right now.

It would require admitting that he had been lying to her for decades, all while becoming her lover at the same time.

Once that trust was broken, why would she believe him?

'You don't think she's going to be traumatized anyway when you assassinate her brother? ' Hua Cheng points out, the dryness in his tone hiding the uncertainty underneath.

After all—he has little care or sympathy for the Water Master...and yet.

Memory is a pesky thing.

The first time Hua Cheng met Shi Wudu, he wasn't a god. He wasn't even a man.

He was a teenage boy. Proud, clearly wound up tighter than a broken clock, desperate to save his little brother.

Hua Cheng has been desperate to protect someone before.

His empathy for the water master is limited—certainly not so great that Hua Cheng would intervene to save his life, but still.

He takes no joy in watching his demise unfold, either.

(Though, perhaps—if Hua Cheng had known everything, he would have stopped it.

But he didn't.)

'You don't think it'll be easier when she sees that he's a fucking monster?'

Hua Cheng can't make the argument that Shi Wudu hasn't done monstrous things—so he doesn't try to.

'Families are more complicated than that, He Xuan.'

'And how would you know?!' Blackwater snaps.

There's a beat of silence before Hua Cheng replies, his voice frigid—

'I certainly hope you're speaking about having siblings, because while I may have been an only child, I had a mother.'

A mother who loved him fiercely, and fought to protect him until her very last breath.

And maybe Hua Cheng lost her far too young. Maybe most of his memories of her have faded.

But he remembers having a mother. He remembers being loved by one.

It was a small, broken family—but it was still his family, and he remembers being a part of one.

'...I'm just trying to give her a chance,' He Xuan finally replies, his tone significantly less combative. 'I know she'll hate me after it's over with. But she'll have a chance at understanding.'

Hua Cheng doesn't reply, waiting for the rest in frigid silence.

'...I wasn't the one who screamed out in the crowd,' He Xuan repeats. 'Which means someone or something else is following us.'

Which is baffling.

The obvious explanation, of course, would be for the culprit to be the real Venerable of Empty Words from all those years ago, but...

He Xuan devoured it shortly after becoming a calamity, absorbing its power—which is why he's able to impersonate it so effectively to begin with.

Which begs the question: what could be interfering here, and why? Who else would even know about this situation?

'...Then I suggest you figure it out,' Hua Cheng replies flatly, placing a hand on Xie Lian's elbow as he helps him up the temple steps. 'I'm here to look after dianxia. I already told you—I won't get involved.'

Which means he won't help He Xuan, either.

'San Lang,' Xie Lian speaks up in their private communication array, and Hua Cheng cuts off Blackwater without another thought.

'Yes, gege?'

'I need your help with something.'

He tilts his head, curious. 'And what would that be?'

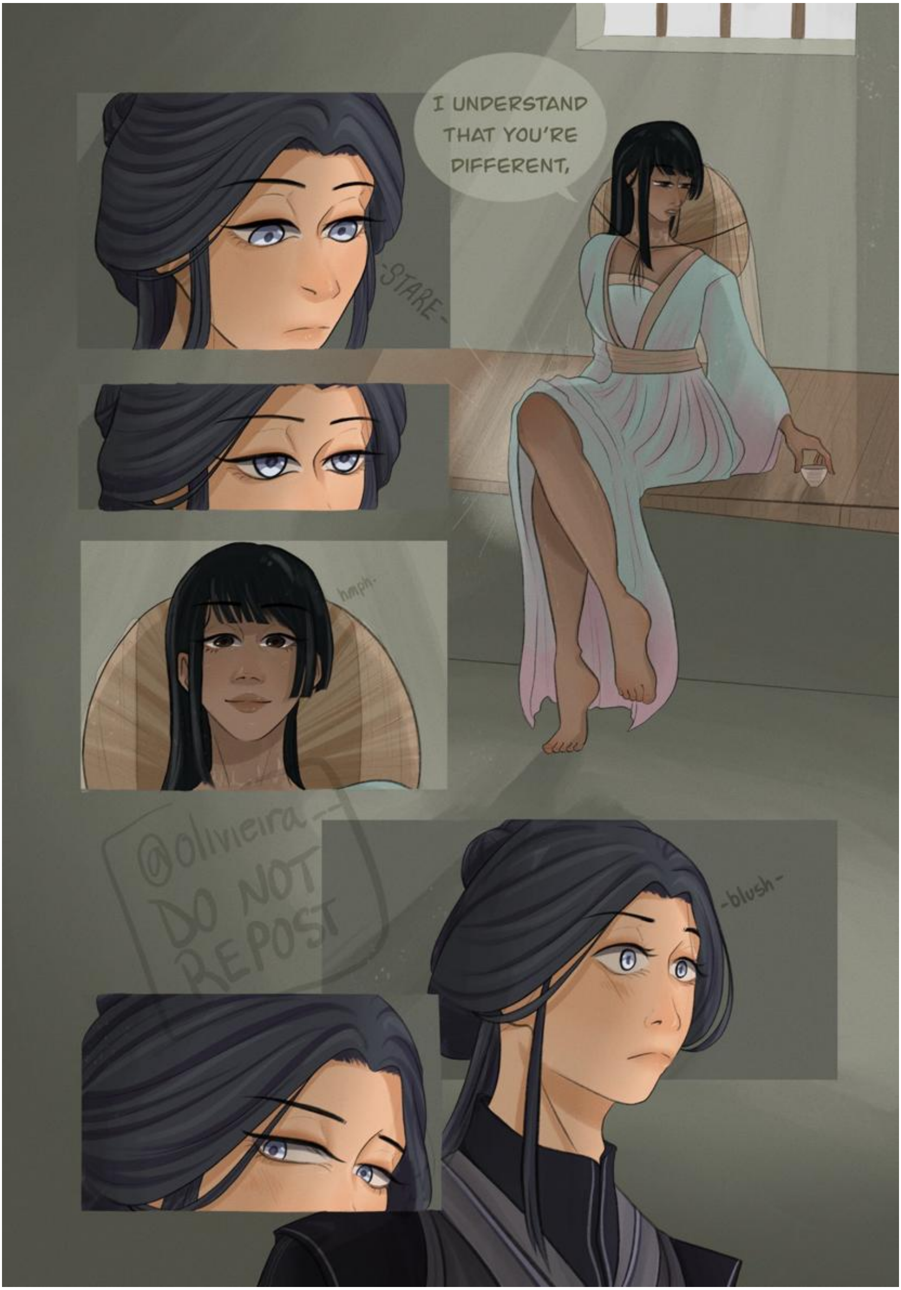
‘I have a plan to test and see if someone is the Venerable of Empty Words.’

ARTWORK INSPIRED BY THIS STORY

Included with permission from artist, do not repost or use for any reason.



I UNDERSTAND THAT YOU'RE DIFFERENT,
-STARE-
hmph.
@olivieira DO NOT REPOST
-blush-

CREDIT: OLIVIEIRA

Chapter End Notes

thank you so much to Olivieira for your amazing artwork, and allowing me to share it!

xoxo, Evie

The Reverend of Empty Words

Chapter Summary

> ‘...Alright—I have an idea to get you away, but I need your permission.’
>
> Beside him, Hua Cheng stiffens—and Shi Qingxuan agrees immediately, not even asking what it is.
>
> ‘You have my permission, your highness!’
>
> Hua Cheng suddenly grips his hand firmly, his eyes locked on Xie Lian’s face. “...The soul shifting spell?”
>
> It’s exactly what it sounds like—allowing the two people involved to switch souls. The cost of using it is enormous—and most aren’t willing to allow their body to be inhabited by someone else anyway, but Xie Lian doesn’t see another way.
>
> “That’s right.”

Chapter Notes

> content warnings: this chapter contains horror elements, be warned!
>
> also, check the end of the chapter for an exciting announcement!

See the end of the chapter for more notes

Ah.

Oh dear.

Hua Cheng bites back the urge to grimace.

Of course, his god is clever. Which is why him being involved in this situation is such a complication.

‘Whatever his highness needs, I’ll do.’

They exchange words quietly in Xie Lian’s private array, and all the while, Shi Qingxuan paces inside the temple of Wind and Water, fiddling with the earplugs.

'…Can't we do something to pass the time?' She grumbles in the array with the four of them, irritated. 'Something fun!'

Ming Yi doesn't look the least bit impressed.

'You're really trying to mess around right now ?'

The Wind Master huffs, pacing even faster. 'Well, why shouldn't I?! This monster wants me to be miserable?! Well I WON'T! I'll have the time of my LIFE!"

She turns towards the exit, puffing her chest out. 'I hope that makes it so angry, it DROPS DEAD!'

Xie Lian speaks up over their bickering, trying to make use of her suggestion: '…Why don't we play dice?'

Shi Qingxuan stops, looking over at him curiously.

'Dice? You'd think after last time, you'd have sworn off of it.' Before Xie Lian can respond, she throws up her hands, sitting down. 'I'm up for it! What should it be, highs and lows?'

'That's what I was thinking,' Xie Lian agrees. 'And why don't we play on teams?'

When he says this, Hua Cheng automatically moves to sit beside him—and Shi Qingxuan frowns.

'Isn't it unfair if you and Crimson Rain match up? After all—his luck is insanely good, right?'

'That's true,' Xie Lian shrugs, pointing out , 'But mine is phenomenally bad, remember? It evens out.'

That explanation seems to satisfy Shi Qingxuan—and Ming Yi makes no protest of his own, but he continuously glances in Hua Cheng's direction from the corner of his eye.

The dice are passed out—and the first roll goes about as one would expect.

Hua Cheng rolls a six, Xie Lian rolls a one, and Shi Qingxuan and Ming Yi roll a five and four respectively.

'HA!' Shi Qingxuan laughs, the tension in her shoulders easing slightly, glad to have something to focus on other than her fear.

'HAHAHAHA! Your luck really is SO BAD!'

Xie Lian isn't offended—he's relieved that she's no longer in distress, but he pretends to grumble. ' Do you have to be so happy about it, Lady Wind Master?'

'...Ahem, right, sorry,' She moves on, 'What do we get for winning? Can we make the other team do something?'

'I don't see why not,' Xie Lian smiles, 'what would you like us to do?'

'Hmmm...' Shi Qingxuan leans back on the heels of her palms, looking back and forth between the two of them. 'You should...'

Then, her smile turns mischievous.

'Take off each other's clothes!'

Xie Lian chokes, his face immediately going red as he leans back from the group, flailing his hands in front of him nervously.

'W-What?!'

'You said I could have you guys do something!' Shi Qingxuan shrugs, waggling her eyebrows in Ming Yi's direction. 'Right?'

The earth master doesn't respond one way or the other, but he doesn't offer a new suggestion either.

Xie Lian frowns, clearly dismayed—and Hua Cheng speaks into his private array once again.

'Apologies gege—but if you want your plan to work, we'll have to go along with it.' Xie Lian frowns deeply—but Hua Cheng is right, and he doesn't see another way.

'...How much should we take off?' He questions reluctantly, to which Shi Qingxuan grins even wider.

'Just one layer for now! We can save the rest for later, hahahaha!'

The prince grimaces, turning to Hua Cheng—and he feels a little silly, but since he can't really see what the ghost king is doing, he simply holds his arms up, half in an act of surrender, half in order to make it easier for Hua Cheng to remove his outer robe for him.

Which he does—rather quickly and efficiently, his fingers never lingering inappropriately, or adding enough pressure that Xie Lian really feels his touch at all. The only sign of its presence is the way Xie Lian's outer robe slips down his shoulders, so he can set it aside.

It's chilly outside—but even in only his inner robes, Xie Lian doesn't complain.

His own hands are a little uncertain as he reaches for Hua Cheng, fumbling slightly as he looks for the latches in his robes—but when he senses Xie Lian's difficulties, the ghost king assists him.

His fingers wrap around Xie Lian's wrists, gently guiding them to the correct place along his robes, allowing his god to gently undo the clasps before slipping his arms out of the sleeves, allowing his outer robes to fall to the floor in a heap.

And of course—Xie Lian remains calm, not showing any strong reaction to the situation one way or the other, but internally...

The prince swallows hard, pulling his hands back when the work is finished, willing the heat out of his face.

'Is that good enough?'

'It's perfect!'

They roll again—and this time, Xie Lian and Hua Cheng roll the same results: a one and a six. And as for Shi Qingxuan and Ming Yi—

It's two fours.

Xie Lian frowns when Shi Qingxuan erupts into cheers, speaking in the private array.

'San Lang—?'

'Sorry gege—' The Ghost King replies, his tone markedly apologetic. 'That one was my bad. But didn't you say we should let them lose a couple of rounds first?'

Yes, but that was BEFORE Shi Qingxuan started making them strip!

'HA—!' She starts, but Xie Lian interrupts.

'No more stripping this time! ...Why don't you ask us questions? Any question will do, and we have to answer honestly!'

'Oh?' Shi Qingxuan tilts her head curiously . 'That's fine—Crimson Rain, you go first— what's the worst kind of suffering in the world?'

The smile on Hua Cheng's face quickly fades, and his expression darkens.

'...I mean, don't get me wrong, I don't mean anything bad by it!' Shi Qingxuan clarifies, holding her hands up in a neutral gesture. 'I'm just wondering what a ghost king would call 'painful,' you know?'

'What do you think that would be?' Hua Cheng replies quietly—not necessarily sounding upset, only pensive.

Shi Qingxuan falls silent, thinking it over, and eventually she guesses —

'The Kiln in Mount Tonglu?'

That actually draws a small smile.

It's the obvious choice.

'The Kiln has never frightened me. I think of it as the place where I was born.'

And it is the one place on earth where he can speak his name.

'...Then what is it?'

Hua Cheng's smile fades once more, his eyes growing dark as he watches the fire Ming Yi built before.

'...Seeing the person you love be insulted and cast down before your eyes, and being unable to do anything.' He answers conclusively, the flames reflecting in his eyes. 'That's the worst suffering in the world.'

Hearing this, Xie Lian goes still, his stomach slowly sinking.

...The person he loves?

'Ah,' Shi Qingxuan finally replies—not seeming to know what to say about that. Instead, she turns to Ming Yi. 'That's all I had—what about you?'

That could mean so many different things. There are so many different ways to love someone, but—

But just one person? The person he loves? Who—?

'Your highness,' Ming Yi's eyes drift over to him, and Xie Lian straightens up, pulled free from his thoughts.

'Yes?'

'What is the greatest regret of your life?'

Xie Lian falls silent, surprised.

After all—given the silliness of Shi Qingxuan's first request, he wasn't expecting either of the questions the two of them asked to be so serious in nature.

And for Xie Lian—there are so many options for what his greatest regret might be. After all, he's made so many mistakes.

Some of them stand out more brightly than others.

The fall of Xianle. The way he sent Feng Xin away. His last conversation with his father. His treatment of Wu Ming. The guided banquet. His failure to protect Banyue.

The most recent addition to his list of regrets—but by no means a small one—is his admission after the mid-autumn festival.

That the events in the temple—they transpired after the last argument he had with Feng Xin and Mu Qing.

He still hasn't gotten that sound out of his head.

The pained, broken sound that wrenched from Mu Qing's lips when he realized what had happened.

The sound of him beginning to blame himself.

Out of all of those things, the most obvious candidate for his greatest 'regret' would be his second ascension.

What he almost did to the people of Yong'an. The creature he nearly became. The way that Wu Ming paid the price for it.

Of all of the things he has done in his life, that's the choice that he thinks of the most. The thing he's the most ashamed of.

Still.

'...I used to be a deep sleeper.'

The answer is shockingly succinct, given the complexity of the question. Ming Yi's eyebrows quirk, his head tilting.

'That's your deepest regret?'

Xie Lian offers no further explanation.

'Yes, it is.'

But when his fingers grasp the chain around his neck, Hua Cheng's eyes darken with understanding.

Ironically enough, the fact that Xie Lian was a deep sleeper back then was his greatest source of comfort.

Wu Ming had to experience the alternative. Watching.

In a strange way, Hua Cheng's idea of the most profound suffering and his god's deepest regrets are parallel to one another.

Watching the greatest love of his life being cut into over and over again, trapped within the palm of Bai Wuxiang's hand.

Just as he watched his mother suffer.

And Xie Lian's deepest regret—

Not being able to spare Hong-er from the same fate.

But in that state, Hua Cheng knows—his god would have tried with all his might, but he couldn't have saved him from that.

He only would have suffered more.

Staying silent was a final act of sacrifice.

Of protecting the Crown Prince from the most painful experience there is.

(But, even after eight centuries of trying—Hong'er cannot spare his god from that forever.)

'...Are you finished?' He mutters, sending one harsh stare in Ming Yi's direction.

When the earth master doesn’t reply one way or another, the dice are rolled once more—and when they land, Xie Lian lets out an exhale of relief as the numbers are read out.

He rolled a one again, Hua Cheng a six—

And both Shi Qingxuan and Ming Yi have each rolled a two.

By heaven official’s blessings—they won!

‘ HA!’ The Wind Master’s response is the same in defeat as it was in victory, crossing her arms defiantly. ‘Give me your WORST!’

‘I will,’ Xie Lian agrees. ‘But Ming Yi can go first—I need you to answer these questions for me, and you must be honest.’

Shi Qingxuan grins, chuckling as she slaps her friend on the back.

‘That’s easy! Ming-Xiong is the sort of person who doesn’t even know how to lie!’

Hua Cheng coughs, covering his mouth with his hand, and Xie Lian continues— ‘First—who am I?’

Ming Yi sends him an odd look, his expression impossible to read.

‘The Crown Prince of Xianle, Xie Lian.’

Xie Lian reaches over, placing a hand on Hua Cheng’s arm. ‘ And who is sitting beside me?’

There’s a brief pause, one that Xie Lian wasn’t expecting—and Ming Yi reaches up, pressing one hand to his temple with a wince.

‘Ming-Xiong?’ Shi Qingxuan frowns, reaching up to touch his cheek. ‘Are you alright?’

Ming Yi leans away sharply.

‘I’m fine,’ he mutters, shaking his head. ‘Just a headache.’ Slowly, he turns his gaze to Hua Cheng—and he replies evenly. ‘The Lord of Ghost City, Crimson Rain Sought Flower.’

Xie Lian is slightly baffled by the response—but they’re still on track.

Finally, he lifts his finger in Shi Qingxuan’s direction, asking his final question firmly —

'And who is sitting beside you, Earth Master Ming Yi?'

Once again the dark haired official falls silent, watching Xie Lian with an intent, narrowed gaze.

That's the one benefit of spending nearly six months with a Venerable of Empty Words following him—Xie Lian learned quite a bit about the spirits.

Including the fact that, for every three sentences out of a Venerable of Empty Words' mouth—at least one of them must be a lie.

He's answered the first two questions truthfully—and now, it's just about seeing what he does with the third.

Ming Yi's silence stretches even longer this time, and Shi Qingxuan rolls her eyes, elbowing him in the side. 'What are you holding up the round for?! Just answer!'

Of course, it might be easy for someone else to hide such a trait—but for someone as soft spoken as Ming Yi, who is monosyllabic most of the time, always curt—

It's impossible to disguise a lie when he speaks so plainly.

'...He is one of the five elemental masters. The Younger brother of Water Master Shi Wudu. The Wind Master, Shi Qingxuan.'

Well.

Xie Lian fights back the urge to frown, back to being completely stumped.

That answers his question.

But while Xie Lian might have achieved his goal—discerning whether or not the jinx monster was among them—he's also drawn the earth master's suspicion.

"We only asked one question before."

The Crown Prince smiles.

"Ah, but I never said you could only ask one."

That might be true—and maybe Shi Qingxuan would be willing to laugh that off and prattle on about how Xie Lian was being a sneak, but…

Ming Yi has just as much reason to be suspicious of them as they do of him, doesn't he?

"…Crimson Rain, what are you playing at?"

He stares at Hua Cheng, whom he hasn't addressed directly since they used the traveling array. "What does a Ghost King gain from meddling with a game of dice?"

"…" Hua Cheng raises an eyebrow—and his response is subtle, but resoundingly clear.

He stretches one leg out in front of him, the other pulled up against his chest, leaning back on one palm—and his stance might seem lazy, but in reality…it leaves him leaning far closer to the prince than he was before.

A casual show of intent.

"I'll do whatever amuses me."

He drawls the words, his tone dripping with cocksure arrogance.

'…Why did you all start talking out loud and not in the communication array?' Shi Qingxuan speaks up, with a frown, looking around the group and crossing her arms. 'I'm this close to taking these out!'

By that, of course, she means the earplugs.

'Let's not be hasty!' Xie Lian interrupts her quickly, holding his hands up—and when he does, Hua Cheng's eyes drift to the side, taking in a startling sight.

The divine statues in the temple of Wind and Water…have begun to bleed. Well, that wouldn't be entirely accurate.

In truth, they've started to cry tears of blood, rivers of red dripping down white marble cheeks.

'That's pretty fucking theatrical.'

He Xuan's reply, sharp, anxious, makes his skin prickle with a chill.

'That wasn't me either.'

The smirk slowly fades from Hua Cheng's face.

And if it isn't He Xuan—he has no reason not to interfere.

He leans over, whispering in Xie Lian's ear to let him know what's happening—and the crown prince straightens, turning to Shi Qingxuan.

'Lady Wind Master—cover your eyes!'

He shouts that in the array all of the sudden, and Shi Qingxuan's first instinct is to panic, whipping her head around until she sees the blood—and when she does, she chokes with terror.

'What—?!'

'The Venerable of Empty Words must have realized you can't hear!' So, it's decided to find another way to get its message through.

The blood is streaming across the floor, crawling up the wall at an unnatural angle— beginning to write something, and Shi Qingxuan scrambles behind Ming Yi, her breathing speeding up.

'W-Wha—I-I don't—!'

She's clearly not listening—and Xie Lian takes matters into his own hands, his expression turning grim.

"Rouye!" He orders, his spiritual device unfurling from around his neck, flying over to wrap itself around Shi Qingxuan's head.

'Oh!' She gasps, 'What—?'

'It's for your own good,' Xie Lian explains, 'If you can't see it or hear it—it can't do anything to you.'

Then, out loud, he speaks to Hua Cheng and Ming Yi, "We should all get out of here. Having her in this place is clearly only agitating things further."

They hurry down the steps, and while Xie Lian is more than used to navigating without his sight, poor Shi Qingxuan is stumbling every other step, grabbing Ming Yi by the arm.

'M-Ming-Xiong?' She mumbles into the private array, trying to distract herself.

'What now?'

'Before, when you were answering t-the prince's questions—'

Ming Yi stiffens, absolutely certain that she's about to ask him what was going on, but —

'Why didn't you just say 'my best friend' instead of all of that other stuff?! ' The earth master pauses, looking down at her.

Even with her eyes hidden behind Rouye and her ears plugged, she manages to look slightly indignant—her lower lip jutting out, hands on her hips.

And now, when she can't see, for the briefest of moments— His gaze softens.

'Who is that?' He asks flatly.

'...MING-XIONG!'

'That's what you get for worrying about something like that at a time like this.'

'A time like this?! You should be NICE to me at a time like this!'

Xie Lian reaches up to rub his temples, wondering if they're going to get anywhere at this rate, and then...

It becomes clear that leaving the temple was a mistake.

At first, Xie Lian just hears the rush of a crowd moving toward them—mortals, and from the disgusted sounds of onlookers nearby, the prince can guess as to what's going on:

The night march of the Bloody Fire Social.

The same troupe of actors painted in gore, all dressed in black cloaks—but this time, the four of them are standing directly in the troupe's path—

And they quickly become surrounded.

"Say, say! What do we have here?"

"Guests in our town of Fu Gu?"

One actor leers close to Xie Lian, not seeming to realize that the prince can't see him —or the gaping wound of his throat, slit ear to ear.

"Won't you spare a lowly offer some change, kind sir?" He reaches out with a blood soaked grin.

Ming Yi doesn't speak or react, his eyes locked on the wound painted into the actor's neck—but Hua Cheng is quick as a flash, slapping the actor's hand away.

"Who do you think you're speaking to?" He questions coldly.

The man stops, looking up at him—and quickly grows pale, even beneath the deathly pallor of his makeup.

Because the young man standing before him is tall, slender—by all means simply a well dressed youth.

But the moment the actor reached out for the white robed priest beside him, his eyes burned bright red, like two points of hellfire within his skull.

The actor staggers back, and Hua Cheng grips Xie Lian's elbow firmly, keeping the prince by his side.

Xie Lian isn't about to complain, disoriented by the crowd of actors milling around them—and that's when he feels it.

This sharp, cold, prickling feeling rushing down his spine as a breeze rushes by, and with it...

Xie Lian sees that dark aura once more. "IT'S HERE!"

It rushes past him in a dark cloud—and this time, the prince isn't too stunned to react. He reaches out, striking with the flat of his palm—and when he does—

He feels that dark, resentful energy coalesce into something solid. An arm.

But it darts back into the crowd.

Xie Lian grits his teeth in frustration—and in a moment of desperation, he does something that he hasn't resorted to before, looking up at his companion. "San Lang —I need some spiritual power, I'll pay you back later!"

Hua Cheng's response is instantaneous. "Alright."

The hand on Xie Lian's elbow slips down to grasp his own, and with it, Xie Lian feels a rush of soft warmth.

Then, without hesitating, he lifts his palm—firing off a bolt of light in the direction of the dark figure.

When Xie Lian borrowed spiritual energy before—whether it was from Shi Qingxuan or Nan Feng, they always gave him as much as he needed.

But not like this.

The amount of power that leaves Xie Lian's body is so great, it even startles him—and when it crashes into the building they just left—the temple of wind and water—the entire structure collapses into a pit of rubble.

"..."

"Was that enough?" Hua Cheng questions innocently, still holding Xie Lian's hand. "You can have as much as you like."

The prince fights the urge to turn his head and gawk at him, after all —

Perhaps Xie Lian is accustomed to having no spiritual energy—but this is immense.

Nothing compared to what it felt like without his shackles, certainly—but far more power than any normal god would be able to give out on a limb, much less a ghost.

Hua Cheng doesn't even sound winded.

"...No, no," Xie Lian shakes his head, his voice faint. "That was plenty."

The ghost king shrugs, not seeming troubled either way, and Xie Lian speaks out into the communication array.

'Lady Wind Master, where are you? We should find a different place to regroup and make a new plan.'

There's faint groaning, and Xie Lian hears her mutter in reply;

'Do you have to shout your highness? Ming-Xiong led me through the crowd with all of you, I'm right here!'

Slowly, Hua Cheng turns his head to see Ming Yi standing beside them, and Xie Lian hears the earth master speak sharply into the communication array—

'That wasn't me!'

Xie Lian's stomach sinks, his expression going strained as he looks around, trying to find the familiar green cloud of Shi Qingxuan's aura —but it's nowhere to be seen.

Nor is the dark shape of the Venerable of Empty Words.

'Lady Wind Master—what's going on? Where are you?'

When there's no immediate reply, Xie Lian directs his words at Ming Yi— "Why didn't you hold onto her when we came into the street?"

After all—two of her senses were sealed, and she isn't like Xie Lian— she wouldn't have been able to see the spiritual power of her abductor.

"I did!" Ming Yi retorts, seeming oddly agitated. "But there was a panic after you fired on the spirit, and people were being trampled."

Xie Lian pauses, sheepish—because it was a rational choice. After all —Shi Qingxuan's immortal body wouldn't have been harmed.

Ming Yi simply made the choice to save the mortals first—but in doing so, he lost Shi Qingxuan.

But that would have been only moments ago—surely, not even more than a minute's time.

"...She couldn't have made it far," Xie Lian mutters. "We should split up and look."

Just as he begins to say this—laughter echoes throughout the communication array, boisterous as ever.

But Xie Lian has known the Wind Master long enough to learn one thing: She laughs when she's nervous.

'Lady Wind Master?' He replies fretfully. 'Are you alright?'

The reply he receives is…well…

'HAHAHAHA…WHY WOULDN'T I BE ALRIGHT? HAHAHA…I WAS ONLY TRYINGTOSCAREYOUGUYSIT'SFINE! MING-XIONG, HOWDAREYOUFUCKINGLETGO OFMYHANDIFIDIE I'M COMINGBACKTOHAUNTYOU AS A CALAMITY…HAHAHAHA!'

Instead of apologizing however, Ming Yi interrupts her—abandoning his usual tone of boredom. Instead…

He sounds genuinely concerned.

'Would you stop babbling nonsense and tell us what's going on?!' Xie Lian is quiet for a moment.

He has harbored mild suspicions about the friendship between Shi Qingxuan since the Mid Autumn Festival—and while he couldn't say whether or not the two are actually intimate…

It's obvious that Ming Yi cares for the Wind Master deeply.

In which case—the Crown Prince trusts himself more to remain levelheaded, so he interrupts.

'Have you said anything since it led you away? Does it know that it isn't Ming Yi?'

'…I don't think so.'

Xie Lian's tone becomes gentle—trying to soothe her.

'That's good. Stay calm, pretend you have no idea what's happening. Remember—it can only feed off of your fear if you react. Try spreading a spiritual barrier around your body—that should protect you if you trip and fall, and you'll sense any attacks coming.'

'…Okay,' Shi Qingxuan croaks, her voice thick with emotion, cracking slightly. 'Then what?'

Hua Cheng's eyes flicker to the left, taking in the way Ming Yi's hands are balled into tight fists at his sides, his knuckles a stark shade of white.

He's a good actor—he always has been.

But this doesn't seem like part of the charade—or whatever plans Ming Yi would have had.

'Take a few deep breaths, nice and slow.' Xie Lian advises, his voice soft and gentle.

He's always been good at soothing people when they're frightened—and his presence has always been a comforting one.

(To everyone, of course, except himself.)

'Do you feel any better?'

'...A little,' Shi Qingxuan replies shakily. 'Thank you.'

She sounds a little less frantic than she did before—so, Xie Lian decides to try his luck.

'Do you think you could move Rouye and see who is with you?'

Xie Lian is trying to make the order himself, of course—but the spiritual device isn't responding.

' If I do, I'll probably die.'

No frantic giggling follows this time.

Xie Lian pinches the bridge of his nose with a sigh.

It makes sense. The moment she opens her eyes and sees the creature—her terror would likely spike to a point where it could devour her entirely.

'After they took you from the temple of wind and water—what direction did you go in? How many steps have you taken?' Ming Yi inquires, and Xie Lian finds himself feeling even more hopeless.

If he can't command Rouye—she isn't close, not at all.

'...I don't know.'

'What do you mean, you don't know?!'

'Why would I keep track of that if I thought I was with you?! I just felt a flash of energy, and I thought you carried me out of the way!'

'Is it still carrying you now?' Xie Lian interrupts.

'No...no,' Shi Qingxuan's voice trembles. 'It set me down a little while ago.'

And if it had picked her up and rushed off with her rather suddenly, the moment Xie Lian threw that bolt of energy...

The prince goes still, gripping Hua Cheng's hand even more tightly, not realizing that he was still holding onto it.

"...The travel array," Xie Lian mutters, turning toward Hua Cheng and Ming Yi. "It must have taken her through the travel array before the building was destroyed."

Meaning she could be anywhere by now, and they have no way of knowing how to find her.

'...I'm going to report this to the Heavens,' Xie Lian starts, preparing to ascend that instance, but Shi Qingxuan pleads in the communication array—

'You can't! My brother—his calamity is coming soon, and the third is supposed to be the worst of them all! Don't tell him!'

'If you don't stop being so fucking ridiculous, I'll put you through a calamity right now,' Ming Yi growls—but Shi Qingxuan, in spite of her obvious terror, remains absolutely firm.

'I said NO! Do you have any idea how much pressure he's under? How many people are watching him?!"

Shi Qingxuan is absolutely vehement, and it's almost admirable.

Xie Lian was always an only child, but even among siblings, the Shi brothers seem to share a deeper bond of loyalty than most.

'You think I'm stupid?! I KNOW this thing chose to attack me now on purpose!'

And while Shi Qingxuan might not be as strong as her brother—or as brave as someone like Xie Lian—the prince has come to recognize the level of devotion that the Wind Master has to those close to her, a rare thing.

'I don't care if it chews me up and spits me out, no one else is going to know about it until AFTER the trial, you hear me?! Even if it KILLS ME!'

Xie Lian is almost startled by the level of anger he senses from Ming Yi—so sudden, so intense, it seems to weigh down the very air.

'Fine. ' He replies coldly, 'If that's what you want.'

This is getting them absolutely nowhere, but—

There is one way to deal with this that they haven't tried, and it seems to be the only thing left to do.

'...Alright—I have an idea to get you away, but I need your permission.'

Beside him, Hua Cheng stiffens—and Shi Qingxuan agrees immediately, not even asking what it is.

'You have my permission, your highness!'

Hua Cheng suddenly grips his hand firmly, his eyes locked on Xie Lian's face. "...The soul shifting spell?"

It's exactly what it sounds like—allowing the two people involved to switch souls. The cost of using it is enormous—and most aren't willing to allow their body to be inhabited by someone else anyway, but Xie Lian doesn't see another way.

"That's right."

"...Gege—"

'What are you gonna do when you have to face it? ' Shi Qingxuan frets, worried for him.

Xie Lian is rarely sure of anything, particularly with regards to himself—but now, he sounds entirely sure.

"It can't frighten me, so it's fine."

After all—he's faced a Venerable of Empty Words twice by now—and each time, he was the worst sort of enemy for creatures like that to face.

Because in all of these years—what has frightened him, other than his own nightmares?

Maybe when San Lang leapt into the Sinner's Pit, and Xie Lian hadn't known if he would be alright, but...

Ming Yi stares at the Crown Prince of Xianle, his expression conflicted—but he seems to move past that quickly.

"Do it."

Hua Cheng sends him a deathly glare.

“Your highness, please reconsider.”

Xie Lian shakes his head—knowing that there isn’t a better option available. Still— before he opens his mouth to activate the spell...

He stops himself.

“...Gege?”

There’s a long pause—a heavy one, with Xie Lian’s expression becoming torn.

Slowly, he reaches up and around his neck, lifting the chain sitting there, carefully gathering it up with the ring in his palm.

He’s only taken it off once, eight centuries ago.

And back then, it was Wu Ming’s ghost fire that he left to guard the ashes.

But Shi Qingxuan likely won’t be able to do much while she’s in his body— unaccustomed to the blindness or the shackles. So, the best thing to do...

Xie Lian curls his fingers around the ring tightly, biting his lip—and he turns to Hua Cheng.

“San Lang—could you please keep this safe for me until I get my body back?” The prince murmurs, holding his hand up.

Hua Cheng hesitates, but when he reaches out to take it—Xie Lian grips one of his vambraces tightly, anxiety etched across his face.

“It’s the most important thing I have,” he emphasizes—knowing that Hua Cheng would be careful with any of his possessions—

But this is different.

“...” Hua Cheng’s expression is impossible to read—countless emotions flickering through his eyes.

But his gaze softens.

“It’s safe with me, dianxia.” The ghost king reassures him quietly.

Ironically, it's the first time he's actually managed to touch his own ashes—much less hold them in the palm of his hand.

They feel heavier than he expected, sitting solidly on top of his skin.

Xie Lian nods—and as difficult as it is, he lets go of Hua Cheng's hand, leaning back.

His neck feels painfully bare without the chain hanging around there.

But this won't take long.

Hua Cheng frowns, disapproving. "Your highness, we should think of something else."

Xie Lian shakes his head, stubbornly resolved. "There isn't enough time." "Gege—"

'Lady Wind Master, are you ready?'

'Yes, your highness!'

In an instant, Xie Lian's body becomes feather light—almost like he might float away —and then, he comes crashing down to earth.

The first thing he notices is the softness of the grass beneath his feet. The sounds of the forest in the air—and just from the smell of the earth, the prince knows that he's much further north than he was before.

And back in the village of Fu Gu—his real body collapses.

Hua Cheng catches Xie Lian's form before it hits the ground, cradling it in his arms— and when the first noise he hears nearly makes the calamity become frantic.

A broken, pained moan.

"Gege?!"

In the early days of Xie Lian's banishment, he always wore bandages around his eyes —simply because he wasn't in the habit of always keeping them shut and couldn't afford to reveal his cursed shackle.

In the years since, however—he's forgeone such a measure.

His other shackles on his throat and ankle are covered with bandages

—but now, Xie Lian typically just keeps his eyes shut, or covers them with a hood pulled low over his head.

But now—the prince's eyes are wide open, pained, and terrified.

"I—your highness, I can't—!"

Xie Lian's voice echoes through the array, sympathetic, but soothing.

'It's alright, Lady Wind Master—take deep breaths.'

"But I—!" Shi Qingxuan reaches up to clutch at her throat, trembling violently in Hua Cheng's arms, and finally—he begins to understand what's happening.

"I can't breathe!" She whispers.

As a matter of fact—the moment she was dropped into the crown prince's body, that was the first thing she felt.

Aches in every part of her body—a blinding headache, overwhelming exhaustion— And like something was squeezing around her neck.

'Yes, you can,' Xie Lian assures her. 'Just inhale slowly through your nose, out through your mouth. It won't be for too long.'

That's when Shi Qingxuan notices that the pain seems to be concentrated around her eyes, her throat, and her ankle.

Not only is the weight immense—but it feels like needles pickling through her skin, grinding down sharply until they hit the bone.

And that sensation is the most painful in her eyes, making her clutch at them while curled in on herself, shrinking in Hua Cheng's arms.

Ming Yi kneels down beside them, reaching for her shoulder—but the wrath of Hua Cheng's glare is so intense, his hand freezes in mid air.

After all—it might be Shi Qingxuan's soul in there at the moment, but it's still the Crown Prince of Xianle's body.

Shi Qingxuan isn't complaining, despite the fact that she's being cradled by a deadly calamity, the most feared creature in the Heavens.

If anything, she's shocked to discover that Crimson Rain Sought Flower's arms are surprisingly gentle—

And that he smells nice.

Faintly of smoke and iron—but also like the forest, just after the rain.

That thought almost makes her smile through the discomfort, and Ming Yi glares fitfully, frustrated by the fact that he can't get any closer.

"What are you smiling about at a time like this?"

"...You smell like your name," She mumbles under her breath—and Hua Cheng levels her with an utterly baffled look, until she speaks again into the array—

'Your highness, is this what it feels like for you all the time?' There's a beat of silence, and he finally answers:

'You get used to it.'

Hua Cheng's becomes stone-faced.

'Gege, can you see where you are?'

After another beat, he replies again.

'I'm about to.'

Then, there's nothing else—and the ghost king speaks into the array again, agitated.

'Your highness?'

Silence follows.

Xie Lian, similarly to Shi Qingxuan, is experiencing an array of new sensations— mainly the lack of pain, and even more so how light and limber his body feels.

...Is it truly that easy to walk?

Do breaths come so naturally to others?

It feels like walking on clouds.

It makes him remember how much he loved to run as a child, flitting from place to place, how light he felt.

He thought he had simply grown out of such things—but now, he finds himself filled with doubt.

And aside from that—there's a hand gripping his arm, pulling him along.

Xie Lian reaches up with his free hand, giving Rouye a gentle tap where it sits over his eyes—and while the spiritual device is startled, it recognizes a signal that Xie Lian has given many times before, slithering away.

The hand starts to jerk back, noticing the movement from Rouye—

But Xie Lian is faster, flipping his wrist around, dainty, perfectly manicured fingers catching the figure's wrist in a death grip.

His lips curve up into a faint smile. "Hello there."

It's nighttime, so it takes his eyes a couple of moments to adjust to the darkness, but —

He can see.

The shapes of the leaves on the trees around him. The slope on the mountain trail beneath their feet.

And he can see the dark color of the sleeve that he's holding.

Connected to someone tall, broad shouldered, his face turned away.

"You aren't Shi Qingxuan," the voice comments slowly.

"No," Xie Lian agrees, digging his fingers in tightly. "Should we introduce ourselves?"

"...Yes," the figure replies quietly. "I think we should."

But when it turns its head, Xie Lian's smile drops from his face, all of the color in his cheeks retreating.

"W..." He starts to take a step back, letting go of its sleeve, but it reverses their grip again, gripping Xie Lian's arm before he can flee.

"What's wrong, your highness?"

A white, smiling mask stares back at him, and Xie Lian feels his heart begin to pound in his chest.

Remembering that mask, among the last things he ever saw, devoured by a swirling fog of hate.

“Who are you?” The prince whispers, lips trembling.

“You know who I am,” it replies gently, in a voice that sounds so familiar—like a hunter imitating a bird’s call, enticing it to swoop back to its nest.

To protect its young, or a mate.

The Wind Master has a kind face, soft and delicate. Now, it twists into a snarl.

CRACK!

The creature is forced to retreat when a strike lands on its arm—so brutal, it’s broken on impact, bent at an impossible angle.

Xie Lian snaps the Wind Master’s fan shut, his eyes narrowed—and when he speaks, his voice—

“You are not Wu Ming.”

It’s murderous.

The white ceramic mask gleams in the moonlight, and Xie Lian watches as the surface begins to change in shape and texture—until it almost looks like a human face, covered in wet, white paint.

And it cracks open, revealing rows of needle-like teeth.

“You don’t recognize me?”

Its arm cracks and twists, slowly returning itself back to its original state.

“Why don’t you just go ahead and tell me who you are?” Xie Lian glares, building a spiritual barrier around Shi Qingxuan’s fan, sharp as a blade.

‘Your highness!’ She protests in their array. ‘What are you doing with my fan?! That’s a sacred spiritual device! It’s a GIFT FROM THE EMPEROR!’

That’s something any martial god will do—turn an unrelated weapon into a sword. Old habits die hard.

'Gege, what's going on?!'

Xie Lian shuts the array out, and that jagged gaping scar of a grin widens.

"You will."

Before it can say more, Xie Lian loses patience, launching himself forward, striking out with the fan—

But this creature is quick, and it dodged the first blow, then the second.

But the third—the third blow hits, and with it, Xie Lian is able to slice off its right hand with sheer sharpened spiritual power alone, tackling it to the ground.

"Who are you?!" He snaps, one hand holding the blade to the creature's throat, while his other claws at that mask.

The material is almost wet under his fingers, like mud—but slowly, it begins to smear away as he scrapes his fingernails against the skin underneath, and slowly, a familiar face is revealed.

One not so different from his own, but time has rendered it nearly unfamiliar.

Still, Xie Lian flinches back, wrenching Shi Qingxuan's fan away from the monster's throat as he falls back on the ground, scrambling back.

The figure sits up slowly, white fragments of the mask dripping from its face, clattering to the forest floor.

"What's wrong, Xie Lian?"

The King of Xianle's face doesn't look the way it did when he died.

Not the old, broken man that he became, a preview of what his son would be worn into over the centuries.

Fractured, hopeless, and alone.

No.

This is Xie Lian's father from when he was just a child.

Not a streak of gray in sight. Young, strong, his smile gentle as he turns to look at Xie Lian—but it's not right.

Xie Lian's father had expressive eyes. He could never hide what he was feeling. This creature—

It's eyes are like dead pits in its face.

It repeats itself.

"What's wrong, Xie Lian?"

It lurches forward in sharp, quick movements—almost like a spider, never moving at a natural pace—

And it approaches Xie Lian on all fours, crawling like a beast, a deranged smile stretching across his face.

"Did you have a nightmare?"

It finds its severed hand on the way, reaching down to grab the abandoned piece of flash, pressing it against the stump of his wrist until the two knit back together, reattaching.

Xie Lian grits his teeth, kicking out with his foot when it gets too close.

The blow lands directly on its neck, caving it in—but that doesn't seem to stop the creature, it's hands still clawing forward in the dirt, his father's face smiling up at him.

"Don't be scared," It rasps, smiling wider and wider, eyes vacant and bulging. "Don't be scared, Xie Lian, don't be scared."

He kicks out again, this time snapping the creature's neck, making it fall limp, its head lolling around.

"Don't be scared!" It wheezes, its voice breaking up with laughter.

"DON'T BE—"

CRACK!

The next kick is so violent, it sends its head flying from its shoulders, rolling away into the grass—and as the creature scrambles over to pick it up, Xie Lian attempts to address Shi Qingxuan's form.

After all—Lady Wind Master's legs are rather short, and she doesn't have as much muscle as Xie Lian does in his male form. But Shi Qingxuan's male form is taller, and slightly more suited for battle.

Still, when he tries to perform the spell to switch genders—

Nothing happens.

'...Lady Wind Master, are you stopping me from changing your form?' He asks in the communication array, ignoring Hua Cheng's repeated calls of his name in his private one. 'I tried, but nothing's happening.'

'Oh?' Shi Qingxuan replies, sounding genuinely surprised. 'That's strange. Maybe it's a side effect of the soul switching spell?'

Xie Lian hasn't used the spell before, so he wouldn't know.

'In any case, it's fine! I'm stronger in my female form, you know! I—!' Xie Lian cuts off the communication array again.

Well.

He clutches Shi Qingxuan's fan tighter, surveying the trees around him.

Her body might not be as suited to combat—but she isn't that much smaller—and Xie Lian can make up for the lack of muscle with spiritual power.

"Don't be scared..." That voice hisses again.

"Why would I be?" Xie Lian replies calmly. "What's there to be afraid of?"

There's a sour feeling in the air—almost as though he's offended the creature from wherever it's hiding in the underbrush, skulking like a rodent in the sewers below.

"Because you're so sure Crimson Rain Sought Flower will save you?" It sneers. "He doesn't even know where you are."

Xie Lian raises an eyebrow, surprised by the animosity towards Hua Cheng—who has the least to do with any of this.

"I don't need him to save me," he shrugs. "But if he was here, this would be going far worse for you."

After all—Xie Lian might have broken its arm and decapitated it, but

Hua Cheng…

If Hua Cheng had seen the way it had been crawling towards Xie Lian—the god is fairly sure that it would have been incinerated.

“Such faith in a ghost…” The voice echoes from different points in the trees, as though the creature is disappearing and reappearing at different locations in the forest. “Not the first time, hmm?”

The vague reference to Wu Ming makes him grit his teeth, his eyes flashing.

But…how does he even know about that?

And how does this creature know what Xie Lian’s father looked like?

“…Imagine having such faith in a man…when you don’t even know what he looks like…”

Xie Lian hears scuttling across the ground, almost like an insect.

“…Aren’t you curious?” The voice purrs, appearing behind his ear. Black painted fingernails appear on his shoulder, a large hand gripping him there as lips whisper next to his ear. “I could show you…”

The prince doesn’t jump—or even flinch.

Instead, he calmly turns his head—and when he sees the face before him, the rotting flesh, bone poking through, fangs and a slithering forked tongue, he smiles.

“San Lang doesn’t look like that, silly.”

“How would you know?” The creature looms over him. “That man is always changing his face.”

As it says this, its form flickers constantly before Xie Lian’s eyes, from one horror to the next.

“Because he showed me his true form already,” the crown prince replies. “I think I’ll take his word over yours.”

Of course—he hasn’t actually seen Hua Cheng’s face—but he’s felt it beneath his hands before. Enough to know that he isn’t deformed or mangled, not in the way that this creature is trying to present.

"You think you're so clever don't you, child?" The creature sneers. "You think I don't know how much power that spell requires?"

Xie Lian's smile slowly begins to fade.

"I just have to wait," It purrs, its fingers curling tighter and tighter around Xie Lian's shoulders, bruising them. "Then, it'll be just me and the wind master."

It's not wrong. All it has to do is dodge and stall. Even with how much energy Hua Cheng lent him—Xie Lian has no stores of his own, and no means of producing more.

He'll run out before the end of the hour, at best.

'Gege, ' Hua Cheng is still speaking into their private array. 'Gege, just use the Wind Master's fan to send up a whirlwind—I'll see it, and I'll come to you.'

Xie Lian nods faintly—because that's a good idea. It means that the Wind Master's body won't be left alone with this creature, even when the spell runs out.

But when he lifts up the Wind Master's fan, preparing to do as he asks —

Arms wrap around his middle from behind, pulling him back against an unfamiliar chest, and lips whisper next to his ear,

"Are you calling him? That's good."

The prince ignores him, until—

"I'll hang him, too."

Xie Lian's hand goes still—and for the first time in so long, he experiences an unfamiliar feeling.

Hairs on the back of his neck standing up, his blood turning to ice.

'Gege,' Hua Cheng calls him again, and for the first time— 'Please, talk to me.'

He doesn't know if he's ever heard Hua Cheng say 'Please' before, or anything of the sort. He's not the pleading type.

But it's that last part of the creature's sentence that slips under his defenses, and in those cracks—

There's fear.

I'll hang him, too. Too.

'Don't.'

Xie Lian's voice speaks up suddenly in the communication array, and Hua Cheng replies frantically—

'Don't what? Gege, I—!'

'Don't come!' Xie Lian replies sharply. 'Whatever you do, do NOT come!'

'What's going on?!'

The prince cuts out the array again, his fan still aloft.

Behind him, the creature waits for a response. For the terror it's looking for, but—

When Xie Lian turns his head around, his eyes burn brightly in the dark, flashing green with rage.

"You're going to fucking what , now?" He asks coldly, his voice gaining an echoing quality.

Before it can respond—Xie Lian strikes out. Not with the fan, but with his bare hand.

Shi Qingxuan's hand might be small—but it's plenty big enough to grab the creature by the front of the throat, squeezing until the airway crunches under his fingertips.

"Say it again."

Xie Lian lifts him up, staring up at him coldly, watching that face flicker over and over again, changing into countless monstrous versions of one beast.

"Do you think you'll survive long enough for any of that?"

But there's something even more infuriating about it.

The creature is smiling.

Smiling down at him like Xie Lian has said the funniest thing in the world—it just can't laugh about it right now, not without its voice box intact.

And just as Xie Lian is about to snap its neck a second time—it turns into a cloud of smoke.

It swirls around in the air for a moment before flickering back towards the safety of the tree line, clearly meaning to make a break for it—

But Xie Lian has no such plans of allowing it to get away. "Rouye." His steps forward are slow, methodical.

The silk bandage is actually hesitant to return to him. After all, it recognizes that tone very well.

The same tone Xie Lian used in the Sinner's Pit, when he commanded the device to hang Ke Mo.

The same voice he used in the fallen kingdom of Xianle, ordering Rouye to kill. But this situation is different.

Because in both of those instances, Xie Lian was operating the device without any spiritual power.

And that's the thing about Rouye. The thing that no one else quite knows. Xie Lian brings Shi Qingxuan's hand up to his lips.

Normally, he wouldn't resort to using his own teeth—but the Wind Master is not a martial god, and doesn't have any blades on her person.

But his canines do the trick—breaking skin until blood streams past his fingertips— and Rouye is quick to wrap around his palm, drinking it up.

And when it does—it begins to glow brightly in the dark.

No one knows how Rouye was born. Nearly everyone assumes the bandage was a gift from Jun Wu—a means for Xie Lian to protect himself during his banishment.

But even Jun Wu doesn't understand what the device truly is.

A demon.

Born from the blood and suffering of a god. From the death of a king and queen.

And in those rare moments when Xie Lian can offer it spiritual energy…well.

It becomes a different weapon entirely.

“Hunt it.”

The bandage whips around like a snake with a rattling tail

And when it disappears into the tree line, Xie Lian kicks aside Shi Qingxuan’s shoes, finding the delicate material of the slippers to be a hindrance.

It can’t stay in a non-solid state for long. Xie Lian has gleaned that much from watching it.

And it won’t be able to escape Rouye. Not in a situation like this. Then, Xie Lian can bind it. Then, Xie Lian can piece it apart until he isn’t terrified of that word anymore.

Too.

I’ll hang him, too.

Why did it say that?

Hua Cheng is still calling out in the array.

Xie Lian can’t bring himself to listen.

He’s a ghost king. A calamity born from the Kilns of Mount Tonglu. Xie Lian knows that.

He knows that, and—

I’ll hang him, too .

Those words filled him with instant, irrational terror.

Followed by a rage beyond his control.

But it’s different this time.

This time, he has spiritual power.

This time, he can see.

This time, he has Rouye—

But when Xie Lian catches himself in that train of thought...

He stops chasing after it.

'This time. '

He keeps saying 'this time, ' in his thoughts.

For there to be a 'this time, ' that implies the existence of a 'last time,' and now, Xie Lian realizes.

He's been in this position before. This exact situation.

Antagonized by the loss of a loved one. Chasing a ghost down a mountainside, enraged.

And back then, it was a trap.

The wind blows through his hair, gently making it sway around him as he looks up towards the sky, the harvest moon almost sinister as it bears down upon the land with a golden glow.

It isn't his first time chasing a ghost down a mountain path. Or even his second. Once, he found an enemy.

The second time, a friend.

In Xie Lian's experience, most things in his life tend to come in threes.

Too.

I'll hang him, too.

He presses one hand against the side of his head, goosebumps rising down the back of his spine, trailing through his limbs.

This thing could only be after one of two things:

Luring Xie Lian further and further away, wasting time until his spiritual power runs out, and taking Shi Qingxuan captive.

That, or it's true goal is something far more sinister: Xie Lian himself.

If the latter were the case, Xie Lian isn't sure why the Venerable of Empty Words would want him, but...

"Rouye," he takes a firm step back, holding the fan in an attack stance. "Return."

It brings very little comfort when the bandage returns from the trees nearly immediately.

Which means that the creature, wherever it is—is close. '...San Lang.'

'Dianxia.' Hua Cheng's voice isn't gentle or pleading anymore, but brimming with barely contained frustration. 'Where are you?'

'I don't know, but I need to ask you something,' the prince replies. 'What?'

'Some Venerable of Empty Words are stronger than others, right? ' He keeps his eyes focused on the tree line, Rouye circling around him in a defensive position, forming a gleaming white ring.

'...Yes, like any other form of ghost,' Hua Cheng agrees. 'Which is why you should tell me where you are, now.'

Xie Lian doesn't reply immediately, his mind moving faster and faster by the minute.

'Ren Song told me something.'

Hua Cheng seems startled to hear Xie's Lian bring the forest demon up now, of all times.

'What?'

'That if...he got someone inside his array...' Xie Lian glances around, turning his head to make sure he can keep an eye on every vantage point, almost becoming dizzy from how quickly he's checking.

'...He could access their memories...'

'What does that have to do with this?'

Because there's only two ways it could know what Wu Ming looked like. What Xie Lian's father looked like.

That it could have known the words 'I'll hang him, too,' would draw such a reaction from the god.

First, if he had access to Xie Lian's memories via some sort of spell. And second...

'San Lang,' Xie Lian's voice grows quiet as he turns his head once more. There's a shape in the darkness.

Only the lower half of a face can be seen.

A mouth, twisted into an overly wide smile—and the whites of its eyes can be seen flashing under the moonlight.

It would know those things if it was there when they happened.

'San Lang,' The prince repeats, but this time—his voice comes out as more of a croak. 'I think it knows.'

' Knows what?! Gege, just—!'

Creak…

Xie Lian's heart leaps into his throat—and it never stops smiling.

Creak...

"Don't you recognize me yet, your highness?" That mouth inquires, leaves rustling in the trees.

Creak...

With each repetition, that sound gets even louder—and Xie Lian's stomach plummets further and further down, until it feels like a stone in free fall.

He knows that sound.

"No..." He chokes, stumbling backward, Rouye shrinking closer to him, forming a tighter protective coil.

That smile in the darkness widens—and Xie Lian sees blood dripping from its jaws, black underneath the moonlight.

"You asked me to say it again..."

It whispers, drinking in the meal it's been waiting for.

Fear.

Xie Lian's fear, dripping from every part of his body as his limbs begin to tremble. "I'll hang him..."

Creak…

Something is lowered into the clearing, dangling from the end of a long rope.

And Xie Lian—

He knows those boots.

Even with blood dripping from the soles, pooling on the ground. He—

He made them.

"I'll hang him," the voice croons, watching with delight as green eyes flood with tears. "…Just like I hung Hong'er."

CREAK…

The body drops down.

Xie Lian whips his head to the side, unable to bring himself to look at it. He doesn't want to see—

Xie Lian doesn't want to see him. Not like that.

Instead, he looks back towards that face in the trees—and he sees it. The thing from all of the nightmares he never remembers.

The moonlight slowly expands over him, exposing long, jet black hair, a solitary streak of gray shooting through his right temple.

Long white sleeves flutter in the wind—that of a mourning robe. Now, Xie Lian doesn't see a face at all. It's—

A mask.

Half smiling, half crying.

Xie Lian stumbles to the side, barely catching himself by grabbing onto Rouye. He must have twisted his ankle slightly, but he doesn't feel it.

Everything feels so far removed from him now—even his own heartbeat feels like an echo, rather than something connected to him.

And there's someone screaming, and he just wishes they would stop, except that— Oh.

That’s just him.

He’s screaming.

And this time, when he launches himself towards the figure—he doesn’t stop.

He’s not even sure if it’s out of grief, anger, or fear anymore.

All Xie Lian knows is that he wants it to stop.

Like there’s this broken chord inside of him, ringing louder and louder and louder— and if he doesn’t do something now, he’ll break apart.

Like a wounded animal, lashing out in desperation.

But for the first time in Xie Lian’s life—his strike doesn’t seem to land at all.

Actually—it feels like he’s falling, as though the forest floor has opened up beneath him, leaving him plummeting into darkness, darkness, darkness, until—

When Xie Lian opens his eyes—he isn’t in a moonlit forest on the mountainside. Not anymore.

He’s in some sort of courtyard—this time in broad daylight—

And it isn’t cold anymore.

Actually, it doesn’t smell or feel like any other place he’s ever been, and— “Dianxia?”

Back in the city of Fu Gu, Hua Cheng, Ming Yi, and Shi Qingxuan are jolted to attention by one sound in their communication array.

One blood curdling, awful sound. A scream.

Both Ming Yi and Shi Qingxuan flinch, unfamiliar with such a noise—but Hua Cheng has heard it before

His first night as a dead man, when the love of his life finally found his body.

The worst sound in the world. The only thing that can make the ghost king afraid, and after so many years of building up his armor—

He feels naked, broken, and stripped bare.

Ming Yi notices the look upon his face, opening his mouth to ask, but —

Before he can, black painted nails grip him by the throat, punching him so deeply into the ground, a crater is left in the shape of his body.

Then, the ghost king rounds on Shi Qingxuan.

“Switch back, NOW!” He snarls, nails biting into his palms until they bleed. If the Wind Master wasn’t inside Xie Lian’s body right now, he probably would have physically threatened him to get the point across —but that doesn’t seem to be necessary.

“I-I’m trying!” She croaks. “He’s the one controlling the spell, and he won’t answer me!”

Hua Cheng pinches the bridge of his nose, trembling with anger.

“Before you switched, what kind of terrain was it?”

“Wh—?”

“If you waste my time, you won’t survive long enough for the Venerable to get you.”

It’s startling—because Hua Cheng has never been what Shi Qingxuan would call ‘friendly’ towards her, but—

Clearly, he’s capable of turning absolutely ruthless on a dime.

“I—It was hard to tell, I was blindfolded and I couldn’t hear, but—I could smell pine trees.”

He turns away from her, pressing his fingertips against his temple, speaking into an entirely different array.

‘Shuo.’

Normally, there isn’t always an immediate response between the two of them, not if the other is busy—

But when Hua Cheng uses this tone, the reply is instant. ‘What is it, Hua Chengzhu?'

'His highness is in danger, ' Hua Cheng expresses quickly, his tone clipped and matter of fact. 'We're forty kilometers from Qinghe now, and he was taken through a travel array—to somewhere on a mountain with pine.'

It might sound like a vague description—but to Autumn Twilight Shrouding Forests, it's enough.

There are limits to the range of travel arrays, particularly those that have only been used once—so he has to be within a certain radius.

'...Alright, ' the forest demon replies. 'I'm going.'

'There's something dangerous with him—and he's in the Wind Master's body,' Hua Cheng warns. 'The soul switching spell?'

'Yes.'

Normally, Shuo would ask more—but in a situation like this, he immediately sets himself to work, while Hua Cheng inhales deeply.

When he breathes out, he extends his senses, and along with it, his spiritual power.

The very same aura that he's been restraining recently, not wanting to overwhelm Xie Lian with the sight of it at all times.

The mortals can't see it—but it envelops the down of Fu Gu in a matter of seconds— and Shi Qingxuan, looking around through his cursed shackles, gasps with surprise.

Even still, it expands further and further out, hordes of silver butterflies slipping into the trees.

He'll find him.

Hua Cheng squeezes his eyes shut.

He'll find him.

And if he doesn't—the spell will run out, first.

Xie Lian looks around, disoriented—trying to discern if this is a dream, or a memory.

The details feel too sharp to be a construction of the subconscious, or some sort of illusion. He can see the individual leaves on the bushes—the intricacies of the carvings on the pillars.

So it's not a dream, no—

But it's far too unfamiliar to be a memory, either.

"Dianxia," the voice repeats, this time closer—and now, Xie Lian realizes— Whoever it is—they aren't calling to him.

Just as he realizes that, a child rushes past him, mischievous laughter darting through the air.

But just as the little boy passes through Xie Lian's view, he realizes—

There's something vaguely familiar about his features.

The shape of his nose—the shade of his eyes.

He's barely more than a toddler—all around cheeks and clumsy steps.

"Prince Bolin!" An exasperated servant cries, rounding the corner. "No running inside the place!"

Xie Lian received similar scoldings himself as a child, but— Prince Bolin?

"Oh," another voice interrupts, calling out from behind him. "He's just trying to fly away, isn't that right little love?"

When Xie Lian turns his head—there's a woman standing there, with dark hair and violet eyes, holding her arms wide open.

And in an instant, he recognizes the gentle adoration in her eyes. She's the boy's mother.

Prince Bolin beams, rushing into her arms.

"No!" He cries, but he giggles—as though she's exactly right.

"Liar," she smiles, blowing kisses against his cheek until he squeals with laughter, trying to squirm away. "Aren't you going to say yellow to your father?" The Queen looks up towards Xie Lian—and when she does, his face freezes.

“…Darling, what are you wearing?”

Xie Lian looks down at himself, but he’s not wearing anything odd—still just the dress that the Wind Master was wearing before. Maybe a little low cut, but—

She isn’t looking at him.

She’s looking through him.

And when Xie Lian turns around, he sees.

A figure dressed in elegant robes of red and gold—the sort of thing he would expect to see on a king, or an emperor. But on his face—

It’s a mask.

Half smiling, half crying.

A sight that has only ever filled the Crown Prince of Xianle with overwhelming terror.

But not now.

Now, as he watches the man wrench his head from side to side, fighting to tear the mask off of his face, his fingers clawing desperately—

“Darling?” His wife questions again, holding their son tighter in her arms.

—Xie Lian can’t help but feel pity, building in his gut.

“Papa?” The child questions, holding his mother’s dress a little tighter, and as Xie Lian watches the masked figure struggle, a voice pierces through the scene, loud, sharp—

“NO!”

And just as quickly, it all goes dark.

Xie Lian rolls over onto his hands and knees, disoriented—and when he looks up— He’s back where he started.

In the middle of the woods, on the slope of a mountainside.

Trembling, his lungs burning.

What—?

'XIE LIAN!'

Hua Cheng has never raised his voice to him before—or called him by his first name. But now, calling into Xie Lian's private array—he sounds beyond desperate.

'San Lang,' he replies shakily, 'I'm sorry, I—'

'Let the Wind Master switch back with you!'

The prince hesitates, looking around him.

'…I don't think she can deal with this thing by herself,' he mutters—somewhat aware of the fact that Hua Cheng doesn't care about that—

But Xie Lian does.

And while Xie Lian might be frightened, or hurt—

That's all it can do to him, and in comparison to the possible consequences to Shi Qingxuan, it seems like a small price to pay.

Hua Cheng seems to know him well enough to understand that he won't leave her like this.

'Put some distance between yourself and it, then switch. She can send up a signal for us to find her when you do.'

Before, Xie Lian might have staunchly refused, but—

'I'll hang him, too…'

He swallows hard, his hands trembling against the dirt.

'…Just like I hung Hong'er.'

'…Okay,' he replies faintly, rising to his feet. He feels strange—and he can only blame that on being in a body he's unaccustomed to.

While Shi Qingxuan's body isn't weighed down with shackles—it also seems to tire faster than his own—and far more prone to nausea.

The easiest tact seems to be running to the top of the mountain—where her signal could be seen the easiest, and where she would automatically have the high ground on any attacker before they managed to reach her again.

Once he breaks through the tree line, he calls out— ‘Lady Wind Master?’

‘Oh, your highness!’ Shi Qingxuan replies immediately, audibly relieved. ‘We were so worried!’

‘Do you think you can switch back? If you send a signal up, we’ll come to you immediately.’

‘Yes, yes!’ She agrees quickly.

After all—she might have been frightened before, but with the cursed shackles, it’s difficult to stay in Xie Lian’s body for that long. And if they wait any longer, Hua Cheng might just end up punching Ming Yi through the earth’s core at this point...

‘Okay—prepare yourself!’

Xie Lian is hit by that weightless feeling once more, floating up, up, up—only to crash back down with a heavy weight, slamming back to earth, with the familiar sounds of Fu Gu bustling around him.

He never thought a day would come when he would open his eyes and feel comforted to see darkness—but now, when he sees the sea of crimson—

Xie Lian makes a choked sound of relief.

“San Lang—!”

His words are broken off when he finds himself enveloped in a crushing embrace.

ARTWORK INSPIRED BY THIS STORY

Shared with permission from the artist, do not reproduce or reuse for any reason.

?
I'LL DO WHATEVER AMUSES ME.

CREDIT: IMAGINARY

ANNOUNCEMENT!!!

The EXTREMELY talented ImaginaryCanvas has decided to take on the project of creating a comic adaptation of this story!! I'm so honored and grateful that they have taken the time to take on such a massive task, and I've been a fan of their work for a very long time, so this was extremely exciting news! While this has been in the works for a little while now, the first chapter is coming out very soon! Here is the cover art:

Artist: @ImaginaryCanvas
Author : @CATACLYSMICEVIE

The Original Post is here!

I'm sure plenty of you are already familiar with Imaginary, but if you want to keep up with WIPs from the comic or updates on when things will be coming out, please follow them and support them on twitter and patreon if you haven't already!

Chapter End Notes

a big thank you to Imaginary again for taking on this project! I'm so honored and excited!

xoxo, Evie

The Terrace of Cascading Wine

Chapter Summary

> ‘Lady Wind Master,’ He calls into the communication array, lifting his head from Hua Cheng’s chest. ‘Are you alright? Can you send us a signal?’ After a moment, Shi Qingxuan replies—
>
> ‘...I don’t think that will be necessary, your highness—and did something bite my hand while you were in my body?!’
>
> Xie Lian winces sheepishly before pushing past that, ‘What do you mean?’
>
> ‘I know where I am, I think...’ Shi Qingxuan’s voice is slightly faint, surprised. ‘Actually—this is the place where I ascended.’
>
> Xie Lian perks up, his eyes wide.
>
> ‘Really?’
>
> ‘Yes—it’s the mountain where my brother and I trained in cultivation—the Terrace of Cascading Wine.’

Hua Cheng’s arms crush the prince against his chest briefly, but fiercely—his cheek pressed against Xie Lian’s hair.

He doesn’t say it out loud—but the feeling behind it is loud and clear . ‘Don’t ever do that again.’

Xie Lian squeezes his eyes shut, pressing his face into the front of Hua Cheng’s robes briefly, trying to get those words out of his head:

‘I’ll hang him, too.’

“...I’m sorry,” Xie Lian mutters. “I thought I could handle it, I’m—”

“It doesn’t matter,” Hua Cheng shakes his head. “You’re back now.”

Xie Lian takes a long, shaky breath—and he realizes his shoulders are still trembling.

“...Something strange happened,” he whispers, working to steady himself. “...I saw—” He pauses. “Where’s the Earth Master?”

“Who cares?” Hua Cheng’s reply is flat.

The earth master is currently dragging himself—one limb at a time—from a deep crater in the ground, coughing up dust as he goes—and Xie Lian doesn’t have time to ask more.

‘Lady Wind Master,’ He calls into the communication array, lifting his head from Hua Cheng’s chest. ‘Are you alright? Can you send us a signal?’ After a moment, Shi Qingxuan replies—

‘...I don’t think that will be necessary, your highness—and did something bite my hand while you were in my body?!’

Xie Lian winces sheepishly before pushing past that, ‘What do you mean?’

‘I know where I am, I think...’ Shi Qingxuan’s voice is slightly faint, surprised. ‘Actually—this is the place where I ascended.’

Xie Lian perks up, his eyes wide.

‘Really?’

‘Yes—it’s the mountain where my brother and I trained in cultivation—the Terrace of Cascading Wine.’

And Xie Lian is more than a little ashamed to admit—he’s relieved to hear it.

For a moment, in the pits of his terror—he really had believed that it was the White Clothed Calamity.

But luring Shi Qingxuan to a place personal to her? That means it has nothing to do with Xie Lian

Which leaves only one option left.

“San Lang,” Xie Lian goes to stand, and Hua Cheng lets him go—however reluctantly. “Is there a Venerable of Empty Words that would be powerful enough to access the memories of a heavenly official?”

The Ghost King hesitates.

Within the ghost realm, the supremes sit atop the heap. A very distant third to them in terms of power is Ren Song.

Venerables aren’t quite the same.

“There’s one,” Hua Cheng agrees. “That spirit was far older than me.” Xie Lian’s eyebrows raise.

“A Venerable could live that long?”

“...” Hua Cheng is quiet, seeming to choose every single word meticulously before he speaks. “Before the Kiln began producing Ghost Kings, there were many failed experiments performed by it’s forge master.”

It’s...forge master?

“The original Venerable of Empty Words was one of them—though it was so powerful, we call it the Reverend of Empty Words.”

Which makes Shi Qingxuan’s situation far more dangerous than Xie Lian thought— but there’s something else bothering him.

“...This forge master of the Kiln—was it Zhao Beitong?”

Hua Cheng and Ming Yi go completely still, both of them whipping around to look at the prince.

“...What?” The calamity questions flatly. “Where did you hear that name, dianxia?”

“...After the mission in Banyue, one of her weapons was recovered by General Pei,” Xie Lian explains. “Jun Wu told us that she was the first calamity, wife of Bai Wuxiang—and that she created the weapons that destroyed the last Heavenly Dynasty.”

Ming Yi almost opens his mouth to correct him—then seems to remember that the ‘earth master’ would have no way of knowing that.

Hua Cheng, however, replies easily.

“Most of that is true—but she was no Calamity.” He corrects him quietly. “She was a martial goddess.”

Xie Lian brightens, surprised—after all, he’s never heard of a martial goddess before —

But it also reveals a confusing crack within the story he’s been told. Why would a goddess destroy the heavens?

And if all of that is true—

Was she the woman Xie Lian saw in his vision?

Xie Lian supposes it's possible—if the Reverend of Empty Words was her creation— It might possess some of its creator's memories, and that was what he saw.

Finally, Ming Yi speaks up.

"The travel array isn't working. That thing must have cut off the connection points." Xie Lian frowns, his stomach tightening with building worry.

'...Lady Wind Master? Is there a place where you could hide out until we get there?'

'Sure—the tavern where I used to drink is still here, it's just empty now...'

'That's good,' the prince replies quickly. 'Seal yourself inside, and don't open the door for anyone other than us.'

'Or Ren Song,' Hua Cheng interrupts. 'It's possible he might reach your location before we do.'

'Either way,' Xie Lian concludes, 'Someone will be there soon. Just don't open the doors for anyone else.'

'I can do that much, your highness,' He can practically hear Shi Qingxuan rolling her eyes. ' I'm not a child. I don't need you to explain that I shouldn't open the door for strangers.'

"But you'll tell them your name, your birthday, and everything else..." Ming Yi grumbles.

Since he's only said that out loud and not into the array, Xie Lian opts to ignore it, telling Shi Qingxuan—

'Good, we'll be there soon. Hold on and wait for us as best as you can, alright?'

Then, he turns to Ming Yi.

"How long will it take for us to reach him, you think?"

The earth master has already set off down the street, his face turned away from them. "On foot? An hour."

As they set off, Xie Lian looks to Hua Cheng. "Could I have—?"

Before he can even finish asking, Hong'er is being placed back in his palm—with the utmost care.

"…" Xie Lian closes his fingers around the ring tightly, holding it close to his chest for a moment.

Even in someone else's body, being free from his shackles for the first time in so long —the most alien part of all of it was the absence of the chain around his neck.

"Thank you, San Lang," he whispers, slipping the necklace back on, tucking the ring inside his robes.

Hua Cheng watches the gesture, his expression carefully controlled. "You said it was important to you."

So, of course he took good care of it.

Xie Lian smiles faintly.

He's aware that Hua Cheng has no way of knowing just how meaningful the gesture is —

But it means the world to Xie Lian.

"It's the last thing I have left of someone precious to me," he explains quietly. Hua Cheng doesn't reply—he just reaches for his hand, holding on tight.

The walk to the Terrace of Cascading Wine is quick, with little interruption from the task at hand. Ming Yi leads the way, his steps quick, posture sharp—and Hua Cheng and Xie Lian follow close behind, the former giving his god a brief history of their destination.

When Shi Wudu was sixteen, he came to study on this very mountain under a powerful master—and after his ascension, during Shi Qingxuan's time in the middle court, the Wind Master would often come to this place to continue his training.

And, the Wind Master being the sort of person that he was—each day of training was capped off with stopping by the local tavern before returning to the Heavenly Realm, drinking and laughing with friends to his heart's content.

Until one day, when a local man became so rowdy with a group of young women—the Water Master's deputy felt the need to intervene.

He bewitched his cup of wine—and when he spilled it all over the man's head, he was knocked out cold.

A year later, he would ascend from the very same place—coincidentally, while drinking.

Xie Lian can't help but find something about the tale rather odd. After all—ascension is a matter of fate and chance.

(Xie Lian himself ascended while sleeping.)

But Shi Qingxuan's path...

For most people who ascend, they take one of three directions: Martial prowess.

Scholarly might.

Acts of personal sacrifice.

For the Wind Master—while Xie LIan thinks she's a kind hearted and decent person— her path doesn't match any of those.

Outliers exist...and yet.

There's something about Shi Qingxuan's story—the whole of it—that doesn't seem to make sense. Colliding and incongruent factors that Xie Lian can sense, but not quite name.

And finally, when they grow close, and Xie Lian feels the familiar slope of the mountain path beneath his feet—a thought strikes him.

"...Shi Qingxuan hasn't asked us if we were getting close yet," he mutters, holding Hua Cheng's sleeve a little tighter.

For someone as anxious and impatient as the Wind Master at this moment—that's somewhat out of character.

Hua Cheng hums in acknowledgment, his eyes fixed on the path ahead.

"She might be too frightened to speak.'

That's not entirely out of the range of possibility...but still.

The closer they grow to their destination, the more Xie Lian feels a sinking pit in his stomach. Maybe lingering terror from his experiences in Shi Qingxuan's body—

But it feels like more than that.

"...Have you heard from Ren Song?" He questions softly. "Do you think he would have arrived before us?"

Hua Cheng falls silent, but Xie Lian can sense it, pouring off of him—Concern.

"It's been quiet."

That's the other thing that's been bothering him—

Hua Cheng is right.

It is quiet.

From the river at the foot of the mountain, to the stillness of the air.

There are no sounds of the forest.

No rustling of leaves or chattering of animals. Even the insects wandering beneath the grass seem to have fallen silent.

And then, when they begin to pass the tree line—it comes into view.

A familiar aura—sharp and green, with a burning core—and he's almost relieved by the sight.

Until Xie Lian notices something that makes his blood run cold.

Before, the aura from Ren Song's spiritual power couldn't be compared to Hua Cheng's—but it was still brighter than that of most other ghosts. But now...

It's noticeably dim.

Hua Cheng is greeted by an even more terrifying sight.

A small figure, against a crumbling stone wall marking the edge of the pavilion. Slumped over, his hair blowing limply in the breeze.

Ming Yi stiffens in turn beside him—so startled, his disguise briefly flickers—

But there's no comparison between that, and the darkness that passes over Hua Cheng's face.

Unlike the other two, Xie Lian isn't frozen in place with shock, instead rushing the rest of the way up the hill, kneeling by Shuo's side.

"San Lang—is he alright?!"

The calamity kneels down in front of him, placing his hands on Shuo's shoulders as he looks him over—and with every passing moment, his expression becomes more and more contorted with rage.

"Look at me," he mutters, giving Shuo's shoulders a harsh shake. "Now!"

"San Lang," Xie Lian interrupts, concerned—but before he can say more, the ghost's eyelids start to twitch, his movements weak, but present.

"H...Hua Chengzhu?" He rasps, his words slightly slurred—and when he opens his eyes, the pupils are blown, nearly blocking out his entire irises with darkness.

"I'm here as well," Xie Lian adds, feeling around for Shuo's hand, squeezing it gently. "What happened to you?"

The demon struggles to reply, wincing, blood dripping from the corner of his mouth— But when Hua Cheng finishes examining him, he—

He knows exactly what happened, and when he explains his voice is so cold, so sharp with anger—it actually startles Xie Lian to hear it.

"That thing—it fed off of him."

Xie Lian stops, looking over at the Ghost King with wide, unseeing eyes. "...His fear, you mean?"

Hua Cheng's expression is grim, his mouth pressed into a thin line. Eyeing the wounds in the side of Shuo's neck—

In the shape of a set of fangs.

"More directly than that, your highness."

For once—Hua Cheng doesn't have to explain, and Xie Lian—

He feels his stomach plunge with remorse.

Xie Lian doesn't have to ask how the creature did that—or why.

After all—he's done it before.

Centuries ago, standing in the Royal Palace of Yong'an for the first time, staring down the man that Xie Lian had wanted to blame for everything that had ever gone wrong in his life, even if the world is never so simple.

And in that moment, desperate for spiritual power—he had taken it from Wu Ming.

Not in the way he does now, relying on the generosity of those around him—Xie Lian simply took it.

He reached out and grabbed the ghost by the throat, digging his nails in until he felt power rushing through his veins once more.

Until Xie Lian felt strong again. Until he felt safe again.

It's one of the moments in his life he's always been deeply ashamed of —but never more so than now, listening to Shuo's shallow, unsteady breaths.

"...Will he be alright?" The prince whispers.

Hua Cheng doesn't reply immediately, pressing his fingertips to Shuo's temples, rapidly feeding some of his own power into the ghost's body to tide him over in the short run.

His reserves weren't completely depleted.

There's no sign of his form dissolving—and he wasn't reduced to a ghost fire.

But still—the damage wasn't insignificant. The 'Reverend' or whatever attacked him— it clearly meant to leave Ren Song entirely subdued, unable to complete his task.

"...He'll be alright," Hua Cheng concludes, allowing Xie Lian to let out a low sigh of relief, before adding— "But he needs to be taken to Ghost City for treatment."

His shoulders are tense, clearly torn as to what to do—but Xie Lian doesn't hesitate.

"Then you'll have to take him back," the prince concludes, his tone matter of fact.

Hua Cheng doesn’t argue that point—but there’s one sticking point for him:

“Come with me, then.”

The prince hesitates, turning his head back in the direction of the Terrace of Cascading Wine.

In any other circumstance, he would. Even if Xie Lian hadn’t grown fond of Shuo in the last few weeks—Hua Cheng is clearly upset about him being hurt, and the prince wouldn’t want him to have to take him back to Ghost City alone, but…

“…I have to find Shi Qingxuan and return her to the heavens first,” he murmurs, biting his lip. “As soon as I do, I’ll join you there to make sure he’s alright.”

“Your highness,” Hua Cheng mutters, seeming utterly torn, “you can’t expect me to leave you alone after that.”

“But I’m not alone,” Xie Lian points out with a wry smile, still squeezing Shuo’s hand tightly, pushing the boy’s hair behind his ear. “Ming Yi is here with me, we’ll stick together.”

Oh, if only he could see the look that Hua Cheng gives the ‘earth master’ in response. Within their communication array, it’s the same thing, over and over again.

It wasn’t me.

It wasn’t me.

It wasn’t me.

And why should Hua Cheng care, when the result is the same?

“…I’ll return as soon as he’s settled,” the ghost king mutters under his breath, while saying another within He Xuan’s communication array—

‘At this point, it doesn’t matter if it was you.’

‘I—’

‘You started this.’

So bent on revenge, that he can stomach the idea of being a pawn in a game someone else is clearly playing—too focused on his goal to even find out who is moving him across the board.

And now, lifting Shuo's form into his arms—

Ming Yi can't even look at the boy.

"...I'll look on the north side," the earth master starts, "you can take the south—"

"You'll look together," Hua Cheng cuts him off coldly, holding Shuo with one arm, lifting a set of dice from the pockets of his robes.

Normally, Xie Lian would be offended by the implication that he couldn't go looking by himself.

But given what just happened...

He can't really blame Hua Cheng for wanting Xie Lian to avoid being separated from the others again.

Once the ghost king disappears through his newly constructed portal —one that seems to be working now that the reverend has cornered it's prey—

Xie Lian and Ming Yi begin their search.

Initially, they have one goal: finding the tavern that Shi Qingxuan had agreed to hide within.

But when they do...

Ming Yi's face pales when he catches sight of the structure—and the door sitting wide open, swinging gently in the breeze.

Xie Lian has never heard him sound quite so desperate, until he calls — "Shi Qingxuan!"

He rushes towards the door, finding the inside of the building empty and abandoned —with no sign that Shi Qingxuan had ever been there to begin with.

And, of course—their calls into the communication array go unheard...or ignored.

"...I don't think it could have forced its way in here," Xie Lian mutters, pressing his hand along the frame of the door.

There's no damage to the lock or the wood—and no sign of forced entry.

Ming Yi falls silent for a moment, his palms pressed flat against the wall as he leans his forehead against it, breathing in through his nose, deep and slow, his shoulders stiff—but they refuse to tremble.

It—

It wasn't supposed to happen like this.

"Then why would she have answered the door?!" He growls, speaking to Xie Lian far more roughly than he had dared to in Hua Cheng's presence—but now he does not bother. "She was TERRIFIED, she wouldn't have answered to anyone else!"

"No," Xie Lian agrees, "I don't think it was a stranger."

The earth master rounds on him, infuriated, almost crying out those words again—

It wasn't me.

It wasn't me.

It wasn't me.

But the crown prince has no reason to suspect that it was—has no idea what is truly going on.

Hua Cheng and He Xuan—

They keep one another's secrets well, in spite of any disagreements they may have over the other's methods.

And oh, how Hua Cheng disagrees with him. How he judges him. It's always so easy to pass judgment on a life you haven't lived.

"...What makes you say that?" He questions slowly, his voice low, almost dragged down with emotions, turning flat and cold.

"She was still wearing earplugs—she wouldn't have been able to hear anyone calling at the door," Xie Lian explains, his expression grim. "But she was here."

Xie Lian can still smell her perfume, even if the remnants are faint.

“…Someone spoke into her private array, then?” Ming Yi mutters, leaning against the wall, pinning his hands against his temples. “Why does she share that password with anyone who fucking asks?!”

Xie Lian doesn’t comment on that—because even he agrees that, up until this incident began unfolding, the Wind Master was far too trusting.

“All we can do now is keep looking,” Xie Lian mutters, turning around. “She can’t be far.”

The Reverend of Empty Words had to subdue Shuo in the time before they arrived, and from what Xie Lian was able to gather after fighting it—

The creature is strong, frighteningly so. But it would not have been able to injure a powerful demon like Ren Song in a mere instant.

It hasn’t had time to go far.

Ming Yi seems to make the same conjecture, finally able to calm down enough to step away from the wall, hurrying back out the door.

“Stay close to me,” he mutters, reaching back to grab Xie Lian by the wrist. “I’m not dealing with Crimson Rain Sought Flower trying to skin me alive because you tripped over a rock.”

“San Lang wouldn’t do that,” the prince replies solemnly, more than aware of the fact that he’s lying through his teeth.

Ming Yi rolls his eyes—but he makes no comment.

The Terrace of Cascading Wine is more of a complex now than it used to be—more popular during the summer months, going unused during the latter weeks of fall and the season of winter.

There are multiple courtyards and buildings to check—and in each and every one of them, they find no sign of Shi Qingxuan.

The Earth Master grows silent, but Xie Lian can feel tension building up in the way that his hand grasps the prince’s wrist, laying heavy in the air.

“I think it would make the Wind Master happy, if she knew that you were worried,” Xie Lian comments quietly, almost hoping for Ming Yi to snap, retorting something about not being nothing of the sort—

But he says nothing.

"...Hold on," the prince mutters, digging his heels in and pulling them both to a stop. "I have an idea."

"If it's another stupid spell, I don't have spiritual power to spare like Hua Cheng—"

"No," Xie Lian assures him, shaking his head. He reaches down to his side— unsheathing fangxin. "This is different."

It just occurred to him, that's all.

Ming Yi stiffens as he watches the crown prince bring the sharp edge of the blade to the inside of his wrist.

"...What are you doing?"

"She still has Rouye," Xie Lian's expression doesn't change, nor does his breathing even halt as he slices into his own flesh, blood pouring down.

He stares down blankly, unable to see it running down his arm, dripping down and landing on the earth below

Xie Lian has lost many things over the course of his life, loved ones he thought he couldn't bear losing.

But the one thing that remains to him—as meaningless as it feels—still holds some value.

His line is ancient—and within his veins runs the blood of kings.

The same blood that birthed Rouye, forming its first baptism.

And if the demon is within reach, and Xie Lian's blood has been spilt — It will come.

Ming Yi is silent, watching Xie Lian's blood pool on the ground beneath his boots, staining the grass.

When he finally does speak, he sighs.

"...If you had to use blood, you should have used mine," he mutters.

Xie Lian shrugs, waiting calmly.

"It wouldn't work with yours."

And before the earth master can point out that they have no way of knowing if this will work—

There's a flash of white at the top of the hill before them, leading from the great tower looming over the pavilion.

Rouye.

Ming Yi starts dragging them forward before the demon even reaches them—and when it does, it wraps itself tightly around Xie Lian's wrist, slithering around excitedly as it drinks in the freshly spilt blood, hurrying to consume all that it can before the wound seals itself up.

Some might think of it as a slightly grim habit for one's own spiritual device to have, but Xie Lian has never minded. After all, it actually helps the blood clot faster, and—

After all, it deserves a good meal every once and a while. It works rather hard in the prince's service

When they reach the tower, Ming Yi is prepared to climb to the very top of it, but— That won't be necessary.

The moment Ming Yi sees her, the noise that rips out of his throat—

It's one that Xie Lian desperately wishes he wasn't familiar with.

He lets go of the prince's arm, and for a brief moment abandons any decorum, leaping the rest of the way up the hill in one step, falling to his knees by the Wind Master's side.

She's been left sprawled on the tower entrance, eyes closed, her normally sun kissed skin drained of any color.

And above her, scrawled into stone in what looks so much like blood, are the all too familiar words, the characters still dripping:

WRETCHED BEGINNING, WRETCHED END.

Xie Lian hurries after him, but—

This time, he does trip over something on the ground, not quite the same in shape as a rock, but easy enough for the toe of his boot to get caught up in.

He catches himself with one palm, Rouye holding him back with his other, and when he reaches down to see what tripped him...

He finds the Wind Master's fan, a powerful spiritual device...split in half, the character for 'Feng' cut straight in two.

Xie Lian holds onto it for a moment, his eyes wide with shock.

After all, he knew the creature was strong—that fact was clear from the very beginning. And he knew it was clever—clever enough to manipulate and terrorize.

But what short of a calamity would be powerful enough to snap one of Jun Wu's weapons in half? Who would dare?

In his distraction, he quite isn't sure if he understands the words that leave Ming Yi's mouth in a pained moan, but he could almost swear—

It sounds like 'Not again.'

"Wake up," the earth master pulls her into his arms, giving her a gentle shake. "Don't..." his voice cracks with pain, sinking down, down, down, only to rise again with terrified anger as he shakes her again, this time harder. "Don't be a fucking crybaby, WAKE UP!"

Xie Lian bites his lip, taking a long, deep breath, and accepting the truth of this situation.

This matter has grown beyond what they can handle.

He lifts his fingers up to his temple, entering the proper password before calling out—

'Ling Wen?'

There's a pause, but, as always, the civil goddess responds swiftly.

'Your highness?'

'I need to speak to the Water Master as soon as possible, ' Xie Lian explains, brushing himself off as he rises to his feet. 'He needs to descend.'

'...He's with me now,' Ling Wen replies calmly, her tone marked with confusion. 'But he rarely descends to the Mortal Realm now, particularly with the days ahead being so difficult. But, I can certainly pass along a message to him.'

'Something has happened to the Wind Master,' Xie Lian's reply is swift and concise, wasting as little time as possible. 'I don't know if she's going to be alright, and he needs to come to the Terrace of Cascading Wine immediately.'

Then, there is absolutely no response.

Ming Yi crushes Shi Qingxuan against his chest with one arm, and with his other, he quickly searches her body for any injury, finding none.

He hadn't—

For the briefest moment, their only witness being a blind man, he rests his forehead against hers, his eyelids squeezed shut.

It—

It wasn't supposed to happen like this.

Telling her the truth—even if that truth was horrible—

It was the only way he could think of to protect her from what's coming.

To show her what the Heavenly Court actually was, and more importantly...

What her brother actually is.

What the Water Master Shi Wudu has always been.

The sort of man who picks and chooses who lives and who dies upon his own convenience.

Who can live with the rape and murder of innocents, and use their graves as the foundation beneath his own success.

To show her that he's a—

BOOM!

BOOM!

BOOM!

The sky flashes with each clap of thunder, heavenly flight flashing down upon the mountain each time, but the first is the brightest. So intense, Xie Lian has to throw his arms over his eyes to shield them, his shackle stabbing painfully in protest.

And as soon as the dust settles, he hears a cry— “QINGXUAN!”

The Water Master moves so quickly, it’s impossible to discern individual steps, his robes streaming around him as he rushes to his sister, shoving Ming Yi aside.

The Earth Master steps back, his hands lifted up on either side of his head, but his eyes are narrowed, watching the Shi siblings with an expression so venomous, Xie Lian can almost feel it, even if he can’t see it.

Behind him, hurrying to his side are Pei Ming and Ling Wen—neither of whom have ever been close allies to the Wind Master, but seeing her brother in such a state has them both ashen and pale.

The Water Master leans down, pressing his ear against her chest—

And when he finds silence, he lets out something more than a cry or a scream.

It’s a howl.

The sort of scream that Xie Lian has only heard from grieving parents, holding their children in their arms.

The sort of sound that reaches inside of your chest and hollows you out.

Shi Wudu can’t breathe, not in the moments since he heard that his sister wasn’t. Can’t think. Can’t feel.

There’s only pain and terror, flashing between one and the other.

That horrible, building denial—telling himself that this can’t be right.

That he saw his sister at breakfast yesterday, and that she was fine. Her smiling, happy, self. Flicking strawberries at him with her chopsticks whenever he had the nerve to stop paying attention mid-conversation.

And the utter, merciless agony that can only come from silence.

Ling Wen stands at a distance, visibly at a loss for words, one hand clutched over her chest, her expression gaunt.

The only one who dares to step closer is Pei Ming, his own expression stricken as he kneels behind the Water Master, but where he tries to touch his shoulder—

Shi Wudu cringes away, trembling, whipping his head around in either direction to stare at Xie Lian and Ming Yi, his eyes bloodshot, brimming with tears.

“WHO DID THIS?!”

Xie Lian lowers his chin, and Ming Yi’s expression remains dark, closed off.

Shi Wudu looks up— and now, he finally sees the words written above the tower door —

In an instant, his face drains of all color, clutching his sister’s body closer as he scrambles away from the steps, running straight into Pei’s chest, his breaths quickening.

“...WHO THE FUCK WROTE THAT?!” He chokes, readying himself to wring the truth out of the other two if he has to—anything, just to avoid facing the truth of his sister’s limp form in his arms, but—

But then, there’s a rattling breath that arrests every other thought.

He freezes, turning his attention to Shi Qingxuan’s face—watching as her eyelids twitch, and finally—she begins to cough.

Xie Lian exhales a shaky breath, just as Shi Wudu lets out a trembling sob of relief.

“Qingxuan,” he croaks, rocking back and forth. “Can you hear me?!” He reaches down, pushing her hair from her face—and now that the Water Master can see that his sister is alive, he can actually allow himself to feel that overwhelming sorrow, tears slipping down his cheeks.

“...ge...?” Shi Qingxuan rasps, eyes still closed.

“I’m here,” Shi Wudu replies quickly, his voice breaking, “Gege’s right here...”

Her eyes begin to flutter, just as her brother looks up, readying himself to call for medical assistance before they can—

CRACK!

The sound of the slap is so sudden, so sharp—everyone goes silent.

The Water Master is frozen, a red mark growing on his cheek, his eyes wide, his tears still dripping from his chin.

Xie Lian struggles to grasp what's happened, until he hears Shi Qingxuan choke out—

"Don't fucking TOUCH me!"

She shoves at her brother's chest violently.

Shi Wudu still doesn't move—too shocked to react, but with every word that comes out of his sister's mouth—

"I don't EVER want to see you EVER AGAIN!"

That surprise rapidly turns to hurt, building and cresting in his eyes, and—

Pei shoves her hand away, his tone livid.

"What the FUCK has gotten into you?!" He snarls, eyes flashing. "Who the hell talks to their own blood like that?!"

Shi Wudu's head is still whipped to the side from the slap, his hair slipping over his shoulders to hide his expression.

"...Pei—don't," he mutters faintly.

"No," the general shakes his head, his voice trembling with anger, "I've looked past too much already—who do you think you ARE, speaking to your brother like that?! All while he's SHEDDING TEARS OF WORRY OVER YOUR UNGRATEFUL—!"

Regrets are like hailstones.

Forming so harmlessly, so many careless choices made out of emotions like fear, anger, or hurt.

And very rarely does one ever think a cold breeze or a cloud overhead will lead to a storm.

But once they form, they begin to fall. And it's the falling that gives them power.

Gravity pulls them further and faster, building up speed and force—to the point where a ball of ice no bigger than a man's hand could kill you.

Shi Qingxuan has been blessed in her life. Cherished and protected from the harshness of storms.

She never learned of the storms she could create on her own. The pain she could cause.

What it would be like to feel so sorry, that it turns into a recurring ache in your gut, flaring each time you remember what it felt like to be so cruel .

But the words that fall from her lips now will plunge down to the earth with such force, causing such pain—

That she will regret them for the rest of her life.

"I WISH HE WASN'T MY BROTHER!" She screams so loud, her voice cracks.

Shi Wudu still doesn't move.

His expression is hidden—and when she thrashes to get away from him, his arms are still locked around her.

"Let GO OF ME!" She screams, shoving at his chest again. "Don't YOU HEAR ME?! I —"

"Shi Qingxuan," Xie Lian starts, recognizing the terrified, hurt tone in her voice.

He felt like that once before himself—and the way he lashed out at his loved ones, the things he did that he couldn't take back—

They've haunted him ever since.

"—I HATE YOU!"

Xie Lian balks, absolutely stunned to hear the Wind Master speak that way.

But before he can react—the Water Master seems to snap out of whatever daze he was in, snatching his sister by the wrist, holding her in an iron grip.

“That’s enough.” He speaks calmly, his voice controlled through sheer force of will. “I don’t know what has gone on with you—but we’ll deal with this once you’ve received medical care.”

He stands with the Wind Master in his arms—even as she struggles, fighting to get away from him.

“PUT—PUT ME DOWN! MING-XIONG, YOUR HIGHNESS—HELP ME —!”

The moment Xie Lian takes a step forward, the Water Master’s eyes flash in his direction.

“Your highness,” he murmurs, his voice shockingly calm, given everything his sister just said— “Do not interfere.”

Shi Qingxuan tries her best to struggle—but whatever happened has left her body severely weakened.

She tries to cry out one more time, choking out the syllables,

“MING-XIONG—!”

But before she can say any more, her eyes roll back into her head, and she goes limp.

Ming Yi rushes forward, but before he gets even remotely close—

A sword flies through the air, stopping to hover before his throat, the sharpened tip glinting in the sun.

Shi Wudu hasn’t lifted a finger—and yet, the scabbard hanging by his side is empty. His fan still sits in his belt, untouched.

Clearly, he doesn’t seem to deem a possible battle with Ming Yi worthy of using such a device.

And the words he spares for the earth master are so frigid, even Xie Lian shivers, taking a step back.

“Know your place, Earth Master Ming Yi.” He holds Shi Qingxuan even closer, turning to return to the Heavens. “This is a family matter.”

Xie Lian doesn’t think he’s wrong—and as bizarrely as the Wind and Water Masters may be behaving at the moment, Shi Wudu is still her brother.

One who clearly loves her quite deeply, no less.

Who better to look after her now, than him?

Ming Yi is not quite so easily convinced.

“She doesn’t seem to want to be considered your family,” he glares, taking another step. “And she doesn’t want to go anywhere with you!”

The Water Master doesn’t turn back, and the sword doesn’t move—the tip of the blade digging into the base of Ming Yi’s throat from where he’s stepped forward, pricking him until blood begins to drip down.

“...Ming Yi, if you think your input is relevant, you have severely miscalculated your position.” The Water Master turns his head only slightly, enough so to meet Ming Yi’s gaze through the corner of his eye. “Stand down.”

The Earth Master glances around. Xie Lian has stepped aside, but seems to be listening to the situation rather intently, his brow furrowed.

Ling Wen stands at the furthest distance with her fingertips pressed to her temple— clearly in communication with other heavenly officials.

But the greatest and most obvious obstacle in this situation comes from General Pei, standing directly beside the water master, his hand noticeably resting upon the pommel of his sword where it rests at his side.

“...You certainly are confident when it’s three on one,” The Earth Master comments flatly, his rage barely hidden beneath a veneer of sarcasm. “So impressive—it’s easy to see why the emperor is so fond of you.”

And where their gazes clash, Shi Wudu’s eyes spark with anger.

“Assuming I need help to protect my family is a mistake you won’t survive making,” Shi Wudu warns him coldly. “And if you think I’m leaving my unconscious little sister with a man who has been openly interested in her, then maybe we should have the medics look at you as well.”

The Earth Master falls silent—but not out of shame, no.

Xie Lian can sense many emotions from the god—but none of them are shame.

But, to his surprise—

Ming Yi makes absolutely no denial of what the Water Master accuses him of.

"...Good luck with your calamity, Lord Water Master." He inflects his statement with a sarcastic bow, rising and turning on his heel to walk away.

"I'm sure that it will be a sight that none in the heavens will ever forget."

Xie Lian falls silent, listening as the other officials go their separate ways, finding something odd about Ming Yi's statement.

Not the sarcasm—he's come to expect that from Ming Yi.

No, what surprises him is that the earth master spoke so much at all.

Still—once he's gone, and the other three gods have ascended back to the Heavens once more—

Xie Lian's task here is finished, and as worried as he is about Shi Qingxuan—there's another, far more pressing matter to attend to now that her safety has been secured.

Slowly, carefully, he makes his way down the mountain—setting himself on the path towards Ghost City.

The Weight of Lies

Chapter Summary

> “...It’s Mount Tonglu,” he mutters, wiping a hand down his face.
>
> Xie Lian is quiet for a moment, trying to understand.
>
> “...What about Mount Tonglu?”
>
> “It’s opening,” Hua Cheng explains through clenched teeth. “Not now—but soon. And it...has an effect on calamities.”

It’s an awfully long way from here, and Xie Lian doesn’t have the spiritual power necessary to create a travel array—which means he’s left traveling on foot.

Normally, such a journey would take him around two days or so, but given how serious Shuo’s injuries were...

Xie Lian is reluctant to take so long in returning to them.

In which case—the most obvious option, of course, would be to call Hua Cheng in his private communication array in order to ask the Ghost King to come and fetch him.

And that—that would require saying the password. Not once. Not twice.

But three times.

And Xie Lian—he can’t bring himself to do that. But—

That isn’t his only option.

After a moment of fishing around in his pockets—Xie Lian lifts out a set of dice, remembering Hua Cheng’s words from not so long ago—

‘It doesn’t matter what you roll—I’ll always appear.’

It seems like a bit of a silly thing to do, after all—almost like a child waiting outside of a hall after martial arts practice, calling his mother to come and fetch him home.

But still, Xie Lian had felt horrible about not accompanying them back before—

And waiting two days to see if Shuo is alright seems like too much to bear.

But just as Xie Lian prepares himself to roll...

He hears something.

This distant, rhythmic sound, a repetitive thud , thud , thud , followed by... Chanting.

Gravelly voices, repeating the words in unison:

“YI YU XI, YI YU XI!”

“YI YU XI, YI YU XI!”

And in all honesty, if any other person had witnessed the sight that appears before him, they would have likely begun to scream and run for the hills.

But Xie Lian can’t ‘see’ any sight, and even if he could—he’s become a bit too accustomed to the presence of Ghosts to feel startled when he sees the small pockets of resentful energy descending towards him.

Six ghosts, each bearing a structure shrouded in shadow and mist until it grows closer—when anyone standing nearby would have been able to see it’s true form:

A step litter.

Extravagant, with golden bars and a crimson silk canopy fluttering slightly in the breeze.

Xie Lian, somewhat unaware of what’s going on, simply steps back from the road in order to allow the ghosts to pass—but they do no such thing.

Instead, they come to a halt directly in front of him.

Xie Lian is able to discern from the sound of their movements now that this must be some sort of litter—and he finds himself wondering if he’s come across some well off female ghost, off to meet some lover on a date, but...

One of the bearers turns its head towards him, the vertebrae in its neck cracking as it does so. Each of the ghosts are little more than bone, their skeletons gleaming gold under the demonic light from the step litter.

“Pardon, sir,” one of the skeletons says, its jaw bones creaking with each syllable. “We were sent by the Ghost King Hua Chengzhu to retrieve the Crown Prince of Xianle. Would that be you?”

Oh. Oh .

Xie Lian lifts his hand from fangxin, suddenly realizing that he had reached for the weapon in the first place.

“I—yes, that’s me,” he agrees faintly—and as soon as he confirms his identity, one of the golden skeletons scrambles forward to pull aside the canopy.

He offers one bony hand to help the prince up the steps.

“Right this way, sir—right this way!”

Xie Lian hesitates at first.

In his younger years, it was common for his parents to attempt to insist that he travel from place to place on the royal litter—but he often refused.

Back then, it was simply because he preferred to walk—and now, it almost seems inappropriate for someone like him to be carried around in such a grand litter. After all, who does he think he is?

“...There’s really no need,” he mumbles, but the skeleton bearer wiggles its hand insistently.

“Our lord’s orders I’m afraid, we insist!”

...But if Hua Cheng really did order those creatures to come all this way...

Xie Lian sighs, allowing himself to be assisted up the steps.

It really can’t be helped.

Once inside, he finds a chair that is really far too wide for just one person, though Xie Lian wouldn’t go so far as to call it a divan or sofa.

In any case—it’s more than comfortable enough for him as he takes a seat, pulling his legs up underneath him as he leans his head against the cushions.

And once the prince is elated and comfortable, the litter takes off once more—moving far faster than it did before.

As a matter of fact—Xie Lian would dare say that it could easily out pace a man on horseback. But somehow, the ride remains smooth—calm enough for him to relax, as his mind begins to wander.

There's something strange going on between the Masters of Wind and Water.

Not just Shi Qingxuan's words when she awoke in the Terrace of Cascading Wine— but they were completely out of character.

Even to Pei, whom she openly dislikes, Xie Lian has never heard the Wind Master be so harsh, so—

So openly cruel.

And for that reason alone, Xie Lian would believe that she had been bewitched by the Reverend when it attacked her. Such a move would make sense, given how turning Shi Qingxuan against her only family would add to her misery, but...

If that were the case, he would have expected Shi Wudu to seem more shocked.

He was hurt, clearly—but he didn't ask questions, or express the sort of confusion that Xie Lian would expect from a brother whose sister suddenly turned against him in a fury.

Instead, he simply silenced Shi Qingxuan and took her away—

Almost as though he didn't want to give her the chance to say anything more, implying...that he's siding something.

And Xie Lian...he might believe that.

Because while Shi Qingxuan has been acting strangely ever since she came to ask him for help—her fright was a clear explanation for that, and Xie Lian doesn't think that she's been dishonest with him at any point so far.

It's Shi Wudu who has been behaving oddly—and for quite some time now.

That might be a presumptuous conclusion to come to—after all, Xie Lian only met the Water Master rather recently, but…

His actions have contradicted everything Xie Lian had assumed about him before— from not only his reputation, but also his position.

The Water Tyrant. Known for being selfish, prideful, and distant from the Mortal Realm.

Who also just so happens to be Jun Wu's favorite.

A position that Xie Lian remembers being in all too well.

Which is why Shi Wudu's actions confuse him even more.

He remembers the conversations he used to have with the emperor—the emphasis that was always placed on courtesy and humility.

Qualities that the Water Master has never reflected, except—

Except for in the moments when he's directly opposed Jun Wu in public.

Taking up for Hua Cheng, someone he seemed to care very little for one way or the other. Stopping that play during the Mid Autumn Festival.

Those two instances stood out in stark contrast to everything else Shi Wudu has done in Xie Lian's presence—and in both moments, while his actions were kind—

The Water Master didn't speak compassionately, or express concern for those for whom he was interceding.

If anything—he seemed distressed in those moments, hiding any disturbance with a veneer of condescending arrogance.

Almost like he's…afraid of something.

Or someone.

Could that…have been the Reverend of Empty Words?

But that doesn't make any sense.

Even if Shi Wudu knew that the Reverend wasn't destroyed—it had left them in peace for four centuries. How could he have known that it would return?

And why would that make him behave so erratically in the Heavens, the place where he—and Shi Qingxuan—would be the safest?

That would mean that something within the Heavens was frightening him—or, at the very least, occupying his thoughts enough to impair his judgment.

But what could do that to a god as powerful as the Water Master? And if something is threatening him...

That's a problem.

Not only because of the Water Master's strength, and the threat it could pose to all of them, but—

Because Xie Lian doesn't actually believe that Shi Wudu is what he seems.

The selfish, arrogant person that everyone, even his peers seem to believe him to be.

There has to be someone else, underneath such a heavy shield of pride.

The older brother that Shi Qingxuan adores, always having such faith in. And after that display—

Xie Lian agrees with the assessment Ming Yi made during the Mid Autumn festival.

...He does believe that General Ming Guang and the Water Master are lovers. And not in the casual sense that people typically associate with Pei—

That protective outrage he showed on Shi Wudu's behalf on the turn of a dime... From the outside looking in, the truth becomes difficult to deny.

Pei Ming isn't simply the Water Master's friend—or even a casual partner.

He's in love with Shi Wudu.

And in Xie Lian's experience, such trust and loyalty from those who love you— It doesn't come from nothing.

Then, something clicks into place for him—so suddenly, it actually makes him sit up in his chair, reaching out to grip the hand of it.

The thing about this situation that has been crawling underneath the surface of his thoughts, tugging at his attention.

The reason he felt so certain in his evaluations about the Water Master. The—

The reason he nearly intervened, when Shi Qingxuan lashed out the way she did. Because—

Xie Lian reaches up, grasping the chain around his neck tightly. The Water Master…

…In eight centuries, he has only encountered two people who strongly reminded him of Hong'er.

The first being Hua Cheng, and the second…

Is Shi Wudu.

And that might seem like a bizarre comparison to make. A child born with nothing to the God of Wealth.

But it's true.

Every comparison Xie Lian has made between Hua Cheng and Hong'er has been drawn between the way the two looked after him—similarities in small mannerisms and habits.

At first glance, the Ghost King felt so familiar, that when they met… Xie Lian called out Hong-er's name.

It had been so long since he felt the agonizing disappointment of calling out for him, and receiving no answer.

And even if there have been other similarities that he's noticed since—there's no point in asking again.

That was one of the things he learned from the Reverend.

There's one thing he does fear, even how—and it's feeling that pain, that loss, all over again.

And of course—he's under no pretenses that there is any actual connection between Shi Wudu and Hong'er.

The two lived centuries apart—and even the possibility of reincarnation isn't likely.

Xie Lian knows that people say you can't recognize a soul's past life. That everything about them becomes erased when they pass from one journey into the next.

He knows.

But if he came across Hong-er's soul again, he would feel it.

Against all reason, against everything that he has ever been taught—Xie Lian believes that.

The connection he draws between the two stems from the way they treat those they care for.

With a level of loyalty that often seems almost absurd.

A love so fierce, that, in order to protect it—

It makes a man willing to become ruthless.

Xie Lian has no doubt that, had he lived long enough—Hong'er would have become immeasurably strong. Maybe even stronger than him.

All in the name of protecting Xie Lian.

Of keeping him safe.

And if someone had threatened that...

The prince has no doubt that Hong'er would have used any means at his disposal to protect him. And not only that, but—

Hong'er could behave pridefully himself.

Never with Xie Lian—he always treated the prince with the utmost level of humility and respect—but with others, certainly.

But that smugness—while it was sometimes the result of a playful nature, more often than not, it stemmed from one of two emotions:

Fear, or pain.

And while it's obvious that the Water Master is afraid of something, it leaves Xie Lian to wonder—

Whatever that thing may be—is it hurting him, too?

And if that's true, there aren't many people who could—

Before Xie Lian can complete that thought, the step litter comes to a halt.

He almost asks what the issue is—but when he opens his eyes and sees the ocean of crimson spiritual energy around him, that answer becomes self-evident.

The deja vu isn't lost on him—remembering the last time he was stopped by a ghost, riding in a litter like this...if not slightly less grandiose.

But this time, when a hand reaches between the curtains—Xie Lian reaches with his own to take it without complaint.

"Gege," the Ghost King sighs as he helps him down the steps, noticeably relieved. "You're here."

Xie Lian gives his hand a gentle squeeze, sticking close to Hua Cheng's side as he leads him through the streets of Ghost City.

"I promised I would come as soon as I could, San Lang," the prince assures him. "... How is Shuo?"

Just as he asks—he notices something else— The street is relatively quiet.

Unusual, for a place like Ghost City.

"...It's been a long time since a high level savage ghost was attacked like this," Hua Cheng admits softly, leading Xie Lian towards Paradise Manor. "It's left everyone on edge."

Particularly when it wasn't a ghost who had tangled with Heavenly Officials, like Xuan Ji.

Her decision to harass Pei was ill advised and clear cut—and allying herself with Qi Rong won her few friends in the ghost realm.

But Ren Song isn't in the same league as her—and even if he was—

He's under the direct protection of the most powerful ghost there is: Hua Cheng.

Which begs the question:

If Ren Song can be brought to such a state—how are any of them safe?

And what ghost could have done it?

When they step through the halls of Paradise Manor, it's devoid of any servants, the quiet only broken by…

Swearing.

"MotherFUCKER that HURTS!"

Xie Lian exhales sharply, so relieved to hear that the ghost is awake, even if it's only to curse at someone—and when he rushes into the bedroom, Shuo glances up, blinking blearily.

He's sitting up on the edge of the bed, struggling against Yin Yu, who has been working to stitch up the wounds on his neck.

A sweat has broken out across his forehead, and his cheeks are unusually flushed for a ghost—and Xie Lian can hear how hoarse his voice is when he croaks—

"…Dianxia?"

For a moment, the prince freezes, visibly startled—but he quickly recovers from it, hurrying to Shuo's side, reaching over to grasp his hand.

"I'm here," Xie Lian murmurs, reaching up to press the back of his hand against Shuo's forehead.

And when he feels the unusual heat there, he frowns—looking to Hua Cheng with concern.

The ghost king shrugs, arms crossed over his chest as he leans against the wall, watching them with a guarded expression.

"Whatever that thing was—it's death qi is toxic."

Xie Lian arches an eyebrow. He's aware of the fact that such things are a danger to mortals, but…

"I had no idea ghosts could be sickened by that sort of thing…"

"Not usually," Hua Cheng agrees, his eyes growing impossibly dark.

"But not all ghosts are the same."

A weaker ghost, for example, would not have been able to feed off of Shuo—much less leave him so much worse for wear. And Xie Lian seems to be rapidly coming to the same conclusion that Hua Cheng did, when he found him—

It allowed Shuo to live intentionally. Otherwise, he would be...

"Did it find your ashes?" Hua Cheng questions—and his voice sounds calm, but there's clearly tension underneath.

Xie Lian stiffens, startled—having had no idea that Shuo carried something as precious as his own ashes on his person at any point in time.

"...No," Shuo mumbles, reaching up to rub his fingers over the choker sitting around his throat.

The emerald there still gleams in the candlelight, unharmed—and the ashes hidden behind it remain untouched.

He's undressed from the waist up while Yin Yu finishes dressing the wound on the side of his throat—dangerously close to where the ashes sit.

"...Do you remember anything about the creature that attacked you?" Xie Lian questions gently, still squeezing his hand..

"Not really," Shuo mutters, shaking his head. "Everything's blurry, but...it was strong."

The way he says the last word—with so much trepidation— It startles Xie Lian.

Because...there are supposedly only two ghosts that are stronger than Shuo—and one of them would never hurt him

"...Was it Blackwater?" He questions quietly, not seeing the way Shuo and Hua Cheng look at one another—their expressions tense, but grim.

"No," Shuo shakes his head, his voice coming out a little steadier now. "We aren't enemies—and I would have recognized him."

Xie Lian nods, unsurprised. After all—the Reverend of Empty Words and Blackwater being one in the same...

Well, the implications of that stretch too far to consider. “Did you manage to get a clear look at his face?”

Xie Lian wouldn’t have been surprised if Shuo had said that he didn’t remember, or that he simply hadn’t recognized him, but—

“...He didn’t have one.”

The prince pauses, unsure of what to make of that.

“You mean...” he swallows hard, fighting the goosebumps rising on the back of his neck. “...He was wearing a mask?”

“No,” Shuo shakes his head slowly, his brow furrowed as he struggles to recall. “He just...had no face.”

Xie Lian grips his hand a little tighter as he listens.

“Where his eyes, nose, and mouth were supposed to be, there was just...nothing.” Shuo mutters, sniffing and rubbing his nose irritably. “I remember it running towards me on all four limbs...almost like a dog, but not really, more like...”

“...A spider?” Xie Lian prompts him quietly.

“Yeah,” Shuo mutters, a shiver wracking him. “Just like a spider.”

The prince can still remember it through his mind’s eye—that warped , smiling face, wearing the skin of his father as it crawled toward him like a beast, crooning those words over and over again;

Don’t be scared.

Did you have a nightmare?

Don’t...don’t be scared.

“I don’t know what happened after that,” Shuo concludes, glancing back up at Hua Cheng. “Next thing I knew, you were carrying me back to Ghost City.”

“...You need to rest,” the calamity mutters, pushing off of the wall as he walks over to Shuo’s bedside, pushing up his sleeve. “You might remember more when your strength comes back.”

He offers the ghost his wrist—which Shuo takes without hesitation.

Xie Lian may be a bit hypocritical for being startled by the sound of Shuo's fangs piercing Hua Cheng's skin—but the ghost king seems completely unbothered, watching as the boy drinks his blood.

"He doesn't have enough spiritual power to purge the death Qi on his own right now," he explains to Xie Lian as Shuo takes a few more hungry swallows. "This is the most efficient way to give him mine."

Xie Lian supposes he's engaged in the same behavior before with Rouye, even if he wasn't explicitly giving spiritual power in that sense.

Of course—he's also aware of Hua Cheng's other 'efficient' means of sharing power, but...

That method wouldn't be appropriate for being used on Shuo, given the nature of their relationship.

...But then again, if that's true...why is it appropriate when it's the two of them?

Xie Lian swallows hard, contemplating the implications behind that until Hua Cheng pulls his wrist back, his skin knitting back together instantly as he slides his sleeve back into place.

"...Come gege," he mutters, walking out of the room. "We have other matters to discuss."

The prince remains on the bed beside Shuo for a moment, his head tilted to the side.

It's very clear—to him at least—that Hua Cheng is worried about Shuo. After all—he can't imagine the Ghost King offering his own blood up for just anyone, and...still.

He seems reluctant to let that show.

"..." Xie Lian gives Shuo's hand one last squeeze, reaching up to pat his cheek gently. "I'm glad you're alright," he murmurs, "I was so worried when we found you like that."

The demon hangs his head, ashamed.

"...I won't fail again, your highness," he mutters—sounding bitterly disappointed in himself.

"..." Xie Lian pats his cheek one last time, rising to his feet—and then, he does something that truly surprises the ghost.

He leans forward, carefully wrapping one arm around him in a gentle embrace, a—

A hug.

He's hugging him.

Shuo is too stunned to reciprocate, stiff and awkward—but he makes no move to push Xie Lian away, and after a moment, he leans back on his own.

"...I don't care how many times you fail," Xie Lian mutters, shaking his head. "As long as you're still here—that's all that matters."

The Ghost falls silent, his eyes wide—and Xie Lian takes that moment to follow after Hua Cheng, knowing that he ought to let Shuo rest.

Maybe it wasn't his place to say such a thing—and more likely than not, he wasn't the person Shuo wanted reassurance from in that moment—

But Xie Lian's life would have been so different if just one person had told him that—and he knew that Shuo needed to hear it.

When he joins Hua Cheng in the hallway, he quietly relays what happened between Shi Qingxuan and his brother after the ghost king left—and to Xie Lian's surprise, he doesn't ask any questions, listening quietly, his hands clasped behind his back.

"...Are you alright, San Lang?"

The Ghost King looks to him, standing a little bit straighter.

"What do you mean, your highness?"

Xie Lian shrugs, clasping his hands behind his back. "You just...you've seemed like there's been something on your mind."

A tension that only seems to weigh him down more and more. And oh, if only he knew.

Hua Cheng almost bites back a smile, noticing that they're walking with the same posture, side by side.

"...It's nothing that his highness should concern himself with," the calamity mutters, shaking his head.

In the end, the reason is simple:

If Hua Cheng had it his way—he would have absolutely no secrets from the prince, but...

He hasn't been given any form of a choice.

Xie Lian falls silent—unaware of the nature of Hua Cheng's predicament, but the Ghost King can tell—he doesn't like having his worries brushed off.

But none of that prepares him for the next question to come out of the prince's mouth.

"Why did neither of you ever tell me?"

"Never tell you what?"

"That Shuo was born in Xianle."

Hua Cheng comes to a sudden halt in the middle of the hallway, his eyes widening.

"...For being as old as he is, I always thought his accent seemed a little modern," Xie Lian explains, fiddling with the hem of his sleeve. "But I never gave it more thought than that...until just now."

When Shuo called him 'dianxia.'

He's called him that before—plenty of times—it's not the word itself that was strange.

It was that, clearly because he was disoriented—Shuo slipped back into his real accent.

And THAT inflection on 'dianxia' is one that Xie Lian has heard plenty of times before.

From Mu Qing.

He still says it that way, even now.

Meaning that Shuo was most likely raised as a commoner and in Xianle.

"...You'll have to ask him," Hua Cheng mutters. "I don't know what his reasons for keeping it to himself were."

But now—Xie Lian notices something else.

Hua Cheng—

He sounds frustrated.

More so than Xie Lian has ever heard him—even when the prince was ignoring his calls into their private communications array while he was fighting the Reverend.

“...San L—?”

Before he can even finish saying his name—Xie Lian’s been backed into the wall.

Not forcefully—even now, Hua Cheng wouldn’t dare—but with his hands on the wall above Xie Lian’s head, the prince is given little room for escape.

“What if I was, as well?”

Xie Lian stares up at him, his shackle gleaming faintly in the dim lighting of the hallway—confused.

Hua Cheng’s gaze never leaves Xie Lian’s face—

And if the prince could see him in that moment—the tortured, frustrated look in his eye—

He would know.

“...I don’t understand—”

“What if I was from Xianle?”

Xie Lian falls silent, speechless from shock, confusion, and—

That horrible feeling—one that’s only ever hurt him. A spark that he’s tried to smother so many times—because it burns like nothing else:

Hope.

“...Are you?”

There’s a long, heavy pause—as though Hua Cheng is wrestling with something within himself, and finally, he spits out—

"...No," he mutters, taking a large step back, wiping at the corner of his mouth—and the back of his hand comes away red. "I was born in Xuli."

And oh, he could almost scream—

The one thing he's allowed to say about his mortal life that's actually true—and it's a detail that would be utterly meaningless to the prince.

And now, he can't even bear to look at Xie Lian, who—

Who has never looked quite so crestfallen.

"...Were you trying to tease me just now?" He mumbles, still shrunken back against the wall, even if Hua Cheng is no longer crowding him in. "Because it wasn't funny."

"No!" The ghost king is vehement about that much, shaking his head. "I wouldn't—"

"Then why would you say that?"

Hua Cheng wants to tell him.

He would give anything to tell him.

How frustrating it is, watching his god solve so many mysteries, big and small—but never the one standing right in front of him.

That the only thing he's carried on for these last eight centuries has been the chance to tell him.

But he can't.

Because of a curse that he's no closer to breaking now than he was as a ghost fire. And while he's always had those emotions, at the moment...they feel unbearable.

"...It's Mount Tonglu," he mutters, wiping a hand down his face.

Xie Lian is quiet for a moment, trying to understand.

"...What about Mount Tonglu?"

"It's opening," Hua Cheng explains through clenched teeth. "Not now—but soon. And it...has an effect on calamities."

That’s partially true.

It’s the reason that Hua Cheng is struggling to contain his frustration—but it’s not the cause of those emotions to begin with.

“...Is it painful?”

And even now—in the midst of wanting to rip his own hair out—

Hua Cheng’s gaze softens.

“No,” He assures Xie Lian quietly, shaking his head. “Dianxia shouldn’t worry himself with it.”

“...And when Mount Tonglu opens...”

“You won’t need to worry about that, your highness.”

Hua Cheng has no plans for Xie Lian being anywhere nearby when that time comes.

The last time Mount Tonglu opened, he was perfectly content to hide within dreams.

Until the Kiln’s call became too much for him to bear. And so, He Xuan was forged.

There’s no reason that he couldn’t hide away again.

(Unless, of course, fate does not give him a choice.)

Choices, at the end of the day, are ugly things. They seem so small, made in moments of carelessness or quiet desperation.

But they grow, and they grow, roots clawing into a man’s foundations until they crack.

Shi Wudu’s sister won’t look at him anymore.

Her food sits on a tray at the end of the bed, pushed aside—not a single bite taken. She’s facing away from him, her arms wrapped around her legs, holding them tight against her chest, hair flowing loosely down her back.

“…You can’t keep me here forever, you know.”

The Water Master stands in the doorway, stone faced.

“I don’t imagine that will be necessary,” he replies calmly, walking over to lift up the empty tray. Something he would normally leave to an attendant, but…

He hasn’t allowed anyone near Shi Qingxuan since they returned.

“Mu Qing said your powers would recover in a month or so,” he shrugs, balancing the tray against his hip. “By then, the situation will be handled.”

A laugh rips from her chest, disbelieving—and she holds herself just a little bit tighter.

“…You really think this is a situation that can just be ‘handled?’” She questions, her eyes swollen and red. “You think that’s what I want?”

Shi Wudu stops, facing away from her, his gaze settling upon the closed door. “We’ll discuss that later.”

His sister whips around, glaring at his back, her hands bunching in the sheets. Shi Wudu’s strength has always been a comfort for her. He’s always stood so tall—and because of that, she never had to worry about feeling weak.

But now—she’s been the one living with the guilt for only a day, and it already feels as though it’s begun to crush her. And if that’s true—

Then how does he live with it?

After four centuries of that crushing guilt, how does he live with himself?

“We’ll discuss what I want…after you’ve already made the decision for me,” Shi Qingxuan mutters, shaking her head. “That’s fair.”

“I don’t think you and I are in a position to discuss fairness, Shi Qingxuan.”

He places his hand on the door, and she grits her teeth, her shoulders trembling with frustration.

“That takes some nerve, when YOU’RE THE ONLY ONE WHO IS ALLOWED TO LEAVE!”

She reaches out in a frenzy, trying to find anything to throw in a fit of rage—and the glass paperweight that she does hurl at him never lands.

Her brother reaches up, catching it without so much as turning around to look.

“You haven’t exactly given me a choice,” he shrugs, setting the paperweight onto a side table.

“There is ALWAYS a choice!” Shi Qingxuan glares vehemently. “You just make them on your own—you NEVER tell me what’s going on! That—that thing had to tell me —!”

Her brother whips his head around, his expression dark.

“I don’t know what that thing told you,” Shi Wudu mutters, not shrinking or flinching away from her glare. “I just know that you instantly took it at its word instead of asking me for my own side of the story!”

“And WHY SHOULD I HAVE BELIEVED YOU?! YOU NEVER TELL ME ANYTHING!”

Shi Qingxuan wishes she could say that her anger was fearsome. That she was the sort who could calmly air her grievances without stammering over a single syllable, but she isn’t. She’s always been an angry crier. Crumbling into tears when her emotions get the best of her—and now is no different.

Her brother has always been the opposite. He’s even more calm when he’s angry— almost as though his blood freezes over as the words come out of his mouth.

“WHAT MAKES YOU THINK YOU DESERVE THE CHANCE TO EXPLAIN YOURSELF?!”

But not now.

Now, she watches his expression contort with so many different emotions.

Fear. Pain. Regret. Shame.

“BECAUSE I’M YOUR BROTHER!”

They’ve argued before. They grew up as brothers, after all—and for many of those years, Shi Wudu was a teenager, raising a child on his own.

But Shi Qingxuan’s brother has never been like this.

His mouth twisted with emotion, eyes shining, his hands balled up at his sides.

“Maybe—” He slams the tray of food down on the table, shoving it aside. “Maybe I’m not forgivable. Maybe you should disown me, or hate me—but if I’m this horrible, irredeemable monster,” he swallows thickly, pressing a hand against his chest, almost losing the will to go on, but—

He forces the words out, nonetheless. “Then let me confess it myself!"

“You—!” Shi Qingxuan sputters, her eyes widening. “You haven’t denied anything, and you think you’re entitled to that?!”

“Maybe not from the rest of the world,” her brother mutters darkly, shaking his head. “But from you, yes.”

For the simplest reason in the world.

“Do you think I would ever turn on you like that without giving you the chance to speak?!”

“Then just tell me if it’s true!” Shi Qingxuan chokes, wiping at her face angrily.

“If what is true?!”

There has always been an invisible line, drawn somewhere between the two of them. One that has been there for years, but only one of them was ever aware of its existence.

“He Xuan, the scholar from Fu Gu,” Shi Qingxuan croaks, staring him down, her eyes narrowed. “Did you switch his fate with mine?!”

And now—that line has been crossed.

“Is that why the Reverend of Empty Words left me alone all of these years?!”

Shi Qingxuan doesn't know what she expected. Maybe some small part of her was hoping that he would be angry. That he would vehemently deny the accusation. Perhaps he would even feel betrayed, because she trusted that monster over him.

But his reaction is none of those things.

The Water Master, he—

He looks relieved .

"I-Is it—?!"

"Yes," Shi Wudu's reply is faint, but it makes Shi Qingxuan's stomach plummet like a stone. "Yes, it's true."

She doesn't know if she expected him to deny it, or if that would have made her feel better, but...

Somehow, this is worse.

"...And you aren't..." Shi Qingxuan swallows thickly, bitterness on her tongue. "You aren't going to try to justify it?!"

"Do you think I could?" Shi Wudu asks quietly, watching his sister fall silent.

There might be an explanation for doing something so horrible to an innocent man— Shi Wudu has made those to himself countless times.

But there is no justification, or excuse.

"You..." Shi Qingxuan sobs, her face flushed with hurt and rage. "That's all you have to say?! You...you demand the chance to explain yourself, and then when I charge you with it, you don't deny it, and —!"

"I asked for the chance to confess," Shi Wudu interrupts her, his voice numb. "And now I have. There's nothing else to say."

He turns to leave, but—

"NOTHING ELSE TO SAY?!" Shi Qingxuan shakes her head, nails biting into her palms. "HOW CAN YOU SAY THAT?!"

The Water Master closes his eyes

“I had to make a choice,” he explains calmly, even if his chest aches. “Between being a good person, and watching you die.”

When he was too young to understand what the real consequences were. What they would mean.

Shi Qingxuan stares at the floor, the truth settling over her like a heavy blanket of guilt—

Until her brother continues.

“And that was a choice I had already made.”

The first time Shi Wudu made that choice, he was ten years old.

And the consequences of that felt just as sharp, just as real as what he did later. He made it again in the days that followed.

Again, when he was thirteen.

Again, when he was sixteen.

Then, he was seventeen—and that choice was being laid out before him again. Trading one life for another.

And he felt the shame, the fear of punishment and scorn—because stealing a man’s fate is a profane thing to do.

A monstrous thing to do.

Shi Wudu knew that.

But he had tried every other alternative—and it felt like just another step on a path that he had already been walking.

“...What are you talking about?” Shi Qingxuan whispers, her voice trembling. Her hurt, her anger, it’s still there—in an ever tightening knot with her guilt. But when she catches a glimpse of her brother’s eyes...

There’s an ache within them. A pain that runs to the bone, and she—

Shi Qingxuan has never looked closely enough to see it before.

Shi Wudu glances up towards the ceiling, exhaling slowly. There are certain things he could never tell Shi Qingxuan. Things that—if she knew them—she couldn’t live with. But a long, long time ago, when he was young—

One person told him the right thing.

The same man who told him that you couldn't run from your curses.

A young cultivator—one calling himself Bolin. Shi Wudu isn't even sure if that was his real name anymore, but—

'All you're doing by coddling him is making him better prey.'

Shi Wudu swallows hard, pressing his palm against his forehead.

'Your brother won't learn until you allow him to.'

He knows. He knows that, and still—some lessons are painful.

"Just TELL ME!" Shi Qingxuan cries, "What are you talking about?!"

Shi Wudu's hand trembles as he lowers it from his face, and he doesn't look away from the door.

"How did you think we got to keep the money?"

His sister freezes, her eyes wide with confusion—clearly having expected him to say anything but that.

"...What?"

"Shi Qingxuan..." He sighs, wrapping one arm around his middle. "You're four centuries old. I wasn't even a teenager when our parents were murdered. You really think everyone just stepped aside and allowed a child to run the clan and the shipping business?"

Shi Qingxuan doesn't move, her mouth forming into an 'o,' eyes wide.

"You..." She swallows thickly, shaking her head. "You were the heir. Our uncle made sure—!"

"No," Shi Wudu corrects her. "I was the heir, but when that much money is at stake—people don't care."

Everyone feels pity for a sob story. Two young brothers, rendered orphans by robbers—it's an awful tale.

But when the funerals were held and the tears were dried, there were two defenseless, isolated children left behind—holding the largest fortune in Qinghe.

And Shi Wudu might have been incredibly young, but he was old enough to understand what people would do for gold.

Who they would kill for gold.

And in a world where they had lost everything else—that was the only resource he had to protect Shi Qingxuan:

Wealth.

"I had to make choices, to hold onto that money." Shi Wudu mutters, shaking his head. "I had to make choices, to keep your identity a secret."

It didn't take long for the side branches of the Shi family to begin pointing fingers regarding their sudden changes in fortune.

It took even less time for them to come to the unanimous conclusion as to when their troubles began:

When Shi Qingxuan was born, and the Reverend of Empty Words made its claim upon his life.

And yes, it was horrible business, they had said. So pitiful.

But if the child was doomed to die miserable and penniless...

...Why should the entire clan have to suffer the same fate?

'If the boy cannot be saved, why not just end it quickly?'

Shi Wudu's jaw clenches, remembering the conversations that happened before his very eyes.

Between wealthy, entitled old men, who craved that which was not theirs to begin with.

'If we just let the creature take him—there's no need to draw this out to reach the same conclusion.'

"I made choices," Shi Wudu repeats quietly. "And I doubt recounting any of them would find me favor in your eyes, or forgiveness. I don't need any of that."

Shi Qingxuan stares, and in her shock, the tears begin to slow.

“…You don’t think you need my forgiveness?” She whispers, her voice hoarse.

She has cried so much in the last day, it’s left her throat raw.

Her brother turns his gaze towards the floor, his expression unreadable.

“Even if you don’t forgive me—even if you hate me—you’re alive,” his explanation is muted, each word coming out evenly.

“And these last four centuries—you’ve been happy.”

“…Do I look happy now?!” Shi Qingxuan whispers, her brow pinched. “And even if I was—those years—being a god—all of it—it was a lie!”

“Shi Qingxuan…” Shi Wudu rubs his temples, tired. “Do you think any of this is real?” He points out the window, to the glimmering streets of the Heavenly Capital below, gods and goddesses strolling past, going about their business. “Do you think half of the people down there deserve to be here? Honestly.”

His sister doesn’t reply, and he paces.

“If this was a place that was built for people who deserved to be happy, then you would be here,” he mutters, half to her, half to himself.

And he wouldn’t be.

“But—it isn’t, it’s—”

“What?!” She snaps, “I don’t understand what you’re saying!”

She sits up on the edge of the bed—still angry, still hurt—but more confused than anything else. And watching her brother pace like this, watching his words become almost nonsensical—

It’s frightening.

“Ascension isn’t about who deserves it!” Shi Qingxuan struggles to stand, bracing herself against the side of the bed, one hand against her chest. “It doesn’t matter if I deserved to be happy, or if I was unlucky—that’s horrible, you think I don’t hate it?! But that was MY FATE! And—and you stole someone’s future!”

The Water Master doesn’t flinch away from the accusation. Doesn’t deny it.

“And I PAID!” His hand slams against the wall, so hard—it actually cracks the marble. “I’ve paid EVERY SINGLE DAY SINCE I DID IT!”

The moment the words come out of this mouth, he falls silent.

He doesn’t say another word, and he won’t look at her.

Shi Qingxuan hangs her head, biting her lip so hard, she tastes iron.

“...How?”

She doesn’t see the way his shoulders shrink.

“How did you pay, gege?”

He looks down at his wrist, feeling numb.

Disconnected from himself.

Remembering when a cursed shackle sat there, dragging him down. When he couldn’t see.

When he could only feel what was being done to him.

‘You know how to get out.’

“...Was it being worshiped all these years? Was that your penance?” Shi Qingxuan mutters, her voice shaking. “Having the entire world admire you?! Was the wealth such a horrible price to pay?!”

“Shi Qingxuan—”

“Was it the fact that no one is ever good enough for you?! Is that why you always pushed me so hard?! Because I was never good enough?!”

“I never thought—”

“YOU CAN’T SAY THAT!” She shakes her head, her hair whipping around her. “You know what the WORST part of all of this is?! MAYBE I could have ascended on my own. MAYBE I could have earned this—BUT YOU NEVER GAVE ME THE CHANCE!”

It’s the first time she’s seen her brother flinch.

“Was I supposed to wait and hope you ascended before that thing killed you?!”

“YOU WERE SUPPOSED TO BELIEVE IN ME!” Shi Qingxuan sobs, “That’s ALL I ever wanted, don’t you understand?! But the only thing you’ve ever believed in is YOURSELF!”

“That’s not true, Qingxuan.”

“Oh, forgive me,” She sneers, “You only believe in yourself—and fucking PEI, of ALL people!”

He stiffens, his expression hidden. “Don’t bring him into this.”

“Was THAT the price you had to pay?! Falling in love with a man who doesn’t give a SHIT ABOUT YOU?!”

The last time they spoke about his relationship with Pei—the Water Master adamantly denied having such feelings for him.

“You don’t know what you’re TALKING ABOUT!”

He makes no such denials now, his hands clenched into trembling fists at his sides.

She doesn’t know.

She couldn’t know.

Ever since the moment he sold someone else’s future away to save hers, he also gave up his own.

Because if he hadn’t...He would have told Pei.

Even if it meant that his lover might have left—Shi Wudu would have told him.

Told him that every single moment of happiness he’s had as a god was a moment spent by Pei’s side.

Told him that he’s terrified of the moment that he’ll leave. Told him that he—

He would have told Pei that he needed help , if he hadn’t already known that he didn’t deserve it.

Shi Wudu would have told Pei that he was in love with him, but— He thinks that, on some level, the general must already know.

He doesn't think it's possible to love someone so deeply, so entirely, without them knowing.

But Pei is patient, and he's never pushed him.

"...Pei is—"

'The only person who has ever put me first.'

Shi Wudu bites his lip, breathing in deeply through his nose.

"He's a good person, Shi Qingxuan. And when I'm gone—you'll be grateful for him."

She's so caught up on the last part, she doesn't notice her brother said 'when.'

Not 'if.'

"Grateful?!" She laughs, but there's no mirth in it. "What was the price, then?! How did you pay?"

Still, her brother doesn't answer her.

Shi Qingxuan grips the bedpost, her legs trembling with the effort it takes to stand up.

"You won't tell me?" She glares, her eyes stinging. "Whatever it was, can you look me in the eye and say you didn't deserve it?! That it wasn't a fair punishment for what you've done?!"

When her brother replies—his voice has gotten so quiet, she can barely hear him.

"No."

He knows, he—

Shi Wudu squeezes his eyes tightly shut.

"...When I pass my calamity, I'll find the Reverend, and I'll kill it." He explains slowly. "After that—if you want me to turn myself in, I will. If you want me to go into exile—I will. If..."

Shi Wudu takes a deep breath.

"If you want me to never show my face in front of you again, then that's what I'll do, just let me—"

"That isn't what I want."

Shi Qingxuan shakes her head, gritting her teeth.

"You were always supposed to ascend, gege."

That was his destiny. He—

Shi Qingxuan's brother has always been a genius. Someone who was meant to rise above everyone else. But she—

She was supposed to die a lonely, miserable death many centuries ago.

Wretched beginning, wretched end.

And all she's done up until now is survive off of the kindness—and cruelty—of others.

Maybe all she was ever meant to do was serve as motivation for him.

Some tragic part of some young hero's backstory. A chapter of grief meant to make him stronger.

Shi Qingxuan has always been well aware of the fact that she was never the central character in her own story.

As such, her only goal was ever to have a good time, and stay out of the way. But now—she knows.

That happiness—those years she wasted being silly and carefree—

All of that belonged to someone else.

And now, her place within that story feels superfluous. It feels...wrong.

"...When this is over, I'm renouncing my godhood." She says the words with such stubborn, ringing finality—they feel as though they might as well be written in stone. "That's the right thing to do."

Finally, her knees give out from exhaustion—but before she can hit the floor...

Her brother catches her, kneeling on the ground with Shi Qingxuan in his arms, his head hung low.

That's when she feels something wet land on her arm. For a moment, she's too stunned to move.

But when she does—she reaches up to press her hand against Shi Wudu's cheek, and —

"...Gege..."

"...You shouldn't be out of bed," his voice sounds just as calm as it was before, and now, Shi Qingxuan realizes—

Realizes that her brother has been crying all this time.

"Gege—"

He lifts her up, setting her back down on the edge of the mattress, and Shi Qingxuan expects him to make another attempt to leave—to to tell her that she's being ridiculous, that he wouldn't let her, but—

The Water Master falls to his knees.

"Please."

Finally, Shi Wudu raises his chin, and Shi Qingxuan sees.

Sees how tired her brother looks.

How his own face has grown so pale, his eyes bloodshot and swollen.

His cheeks soaked with tears.

"Please," he repeats, reaching to grab both of her hands with his own. "I've never asked you for anything Qingxuan—but please , don't make me watch you die," he chokes the words out, squeezing tightly.

His hands are trembling.

He's a proud man. One who doesn't ask for things. Who doesn't beg or plead.

Even when she said she hated him, he didn't beg for forgiveness.

When she said she wished he wasn't her brother, he didn't plead with her to take it back.

But now, when she threatens her own future—the Water Master falls to his knees and asks for mercy.

"I'll do anything," his face contorts as a sob rips out of him, his shoulders trembling. "I'll tell everyone what I did, I'll take as many shackles as the Prince of Xianle, I'll—" He drops his face against her knee, his body wracked with broken, silent weeping.

"...Anything but your own godhood?" Shi Qingxuan questions, torn between the ache of everything she's just learned, and—

The utter inability to watch her brother cry.

And the words he utters in reply don't make sense to her then.

But later, they will.

And when they do—they'll break her again.

"...He won't let me go," Shi Wudu whispers, his voice breaking.

Maybe with a shackle, or with blackmail—

But he'll never let Shi Wudu walk away with no strings attached.

'You know how to get out.'

There's only one way out.

Just one.

"...Who are you talking about?" Shi Qingxuan whispers, placing a hand against the side of his head. "Gege, I don't understand—"

"Forget it," Shi Wudu sobs, his hands tightening around hers until they ache, but she doesn't complain. "It doesn't matter, just—just don't make me!"

Her older brother always felt like an adult, even when he wasn't.

She can barely remember anything of their mother, but one of the few memories she's held onto is a day they went to the sea.

She kept on trying to swim too far into the surf, and her brother would pull her back. Their mother would try to reassure him—

'Sweetheart, we're watching your sister—why don't you go play? It'll be fine.'

Their older cousins were swimming not so far away, which honestly would have been more fun for a boy that age than looking after a toddler, but…

Her brother always insisted on looking after her himself.

When he was a teenager, he was immersed in paperwork and ledgers—and even once those were cast aside, he was training every single day, working towards his ascension.

He's never seemed like a child—not until now. Crying those words—

'Don't make me.'

'Don't make me.'

'Don't make me.'

Because he can bear anything, live with anything—but not watching her die.

And listening to him weep, no matter how angry she is, he—

He's still her brother.

"…Even after all of the things I've said to you," she mutters, staring down at him, "After how many times I've dragged you down…the only thing you're scared of is losing me?"

Shi Wudu doesn't reply at first, struggling to catch his breath, but—

"…It doesn't matter what you do," he mutters, lifting his head. His voice is just as raw as hers now, but the words come out clearly. "What you say to me, how you feel about me," he looks into her eyes—and there isn't an ounce of insincerity in his gaze.

"I will always be your brother."

Now, her hands are the ones trembling in his grip, and her gaze is unsure.

"And I—" his voice trembles, but he presses on. "I know you won't ever agree with what I've done, and that you won't forgive me."

But Shi Wudu doesn't need her forgiveness, and he's never asked for it.

Those who suffered for his actions are long gone now—and he has no way of making amends to them.

Some mistakes can't be taken back, no matter how badly you want to, and— Shi Wudu doesn't want to.

He might be sorry, but if he had to make that choice again today, he would. He hasn't learned. He hasn't changed.

He doesn't deserve to be forgiven.

He doesn't deserve to have what he wants.

But Shi Qingxuan—

She never did any of those things. She never knew.

"...But someday, I hope you learn what it's like to love someone unconditionally," Shi Wudu concludes. "Because it's been the joy of my life."

That was another sacrifice he made when he was young.

He didn't know every price he would pay for switching fates, but...he knew one.

When Hua Bolin came to their home, asking about their family history—that was when Shi Wudu learned the reason behind his sister's fate.

That she was being targeted as payment for a wrong his ancestors committed centuries before.

And it seemed so infuriatingly unfair.

That his sister, who had never hurt anyone, who had been born into this world as an innocent—should pay for the sins of an evil old man from centuries before.

Casting that curse aside to someone else felt equally arbitrary, even if he knew it was wrong...

...Life wasn't fucking fair. That's what he told himself.

But he also knew that, because of what he had done to He Xuan—if he had any descendants, he would be passing on a blood debt.

That they, in turn, might be cursed.

And so, from a young age, he knew his sister was the closest thing he would ever have to a child of his own.

In many ways, he's the closest thing she's ever had to a parent— raising her since she was barely four years old.

He wasn't perfect. He knows that.

But he's never loved anyone or anything in this world quite as much as her, and he's always known that was the only thing about him that was even marginally redeemable.

Shi Qingxuan is quiet, one hand on his head, the other squeezing his.

"...We'll talk about what to do after your calamity," she mutters, adding— "And we'll do it together."

He doesn't get to make those decisions without her.

Not anymore.

"...Alright," her brother agrees, his breaths slowly evening out.

"And when we do—someone is going to have to pay for this, gege."

"...I know."

Oh, he knows that better than anyone.

After a pause, she asks—

"You aren't going to let me out of here until it's over, are you?" His silence is answer enough. "Wudu—"

"It's for your own safety."

He straightens up, preparing to leave again—and when he does, Shi Qingxuan reaches out, grabbing his sleeve.

"Can you just tell me one thing?" He's hesitant, but she clings onto him stubbornly. "Please, gege."

"...What is it?"

And the one question his sister asks—

"Who told you how to switch fates?"

—it's the one question he can't answer.

"You couldn't have been more than a teenager when you did it," Shi Qingxuan mutters, her brow furrowed. "So...who told you?"

She doesn't think even his cultivation master would have known. Even among the heavens—a spell like that isn't commonly known.

"...It doesn't matter," her brother's voice is distant, quiet.

"But—"

"I'll be back later," he turns to the door. "There's something I need to take care of."

"How could it not...!"

Before she can finish asking her question, the door slams behind him—and she's left alone.

"...Matter."

She sinks back against the bed, her eyes staring at the ceiling, thoughts going in countless directions.

But something is bothering her more than anything else.

'It doesn't matter.'

'He won't let me go.'

'Forget it.'

Each time her brother—whom Shi Qingxuan knows better than just about anyone— said those words, he used a tone that she has never heard from him before.

One of helplessness.

The Wind Master sits up, staring at the door.

Whoever helped him switch fates—and the person that he's afraid of—

They're one in the same.

But...who on earth is there that could frighten her brother? And if he isn't going to tell her that himself...

Shi Qingxuan grits her teeth, determined.

“…I have to get out of here.”

All Ships Will Sink

Chapter Summary

> The farmer's wife glances from the teenage girls, then back to him. "Say…" Her smile turns a little sly. "Shouldn't your parents be pushing for a marriage for you by now? You're getting to that age."
>
> Several of the girls watching hurry a little faster to lift up their packs, giggling sheepishly, and Xie Lian finds a small knot in his hair.
>
> It must have gotten in there while he was sweeping out back this morning, after he brushed it.
>
> He turns around, combing his fingers through the tangle just as Hua Cheng replies—
>
> "Oh—I'm already spoken for."

Chapter Notes

See the end of the chapter for notes

Back in the mortal realm, Xie Lian is left with a mystery of his own to solve.

It's been three days since Shi Qingxuan was swept off to the Heavens by his older brother—and despite the prince's repeated attempts to reach out to him, he hasn't heard a word.

Xie Lian isn't particularly disturbed by that—not yet, anyway. Given everything that happened in Fu Gu and the Terrace of Cascading Wine…Shi Qingxuan might still be receiving treatment.

No, that isn't what he finds mysterious or odd.

You see, after spending two days in Ghost City, Xie Lian had to return to Puqi Shrine. Not only because he had left his duties unfinished in his hurry to help Shi Qingxuan— but also, because, well…

Hua Cheng did send servants to help with the shrine in his absence, but… It's one thing, to have them doing chores and looking after the children.

It’s another thing altogether to have them dealing with Lang Qianqiu and Qi Rong, so—Xie Lian had to go back.

And to his surprise—Ren Song asked to tag along.

He expected that much from Hua Cheng, who had expressed wanting to spend some time in Puqi Shrine before the business with the Reverend of Empty Words—but not him.

For the most part, he lounges on the hill next to the Shrine, watching Guzi play, helping with the cooking.

Even more shocking was Lang Qianqiu’s reaction to the entire thing.

Initially, he grumbled about Shuo’s return—but when he saw the forest demon was injured, his tune…suddenly changed.

Not drastically—he still grumbles in response to Shuo’s verbal abuse, but…

He also starts doing more around the shrine than JUST making sure Qi Rong doesn’t escape. Little odds and ends that he seems a little lost with, a prince who has never actually had to do chores before, but—

Shuo supervises.

Which he’s doing right now, actually. Laying back on the grass, lazily tossing a ball back and forth with Guzi—heckling the prince of Yong’an as he chops wood.

“Put your back into it!” He drawls, his ankles crossed. “Me or Hua Chengzhu would’ve had it done an hour ago!”

“As if Crimson Rain has been out here chopping wood,” Lang Qianqiu grumbles, wiping the sweat from his forehead with the back of his hand.

“Oh, I’m sure he’s very familiar with the prince’s woo—” Shuo starts the joke without thinking, then stops before he can finish.

“…What?” Lang Qianqiu stares, trying to put that one together. “I don’t get it.” Shuo rolls over, pressing his face into the grass.

“Forget it.”

“Why do you sound like that?”

He groans, and his voice is muffled when he replies—

“Nothing, I’ve just never been more disgusted with my own sense of humor than I am right now.”

Lang Qianqiu waits, expecting some sort of explanation—but when one never comes, he hacks at another slice of wood, this time putting more force into it.

Too much force—because this time, he shatters the entire log into splinters.

“Now look at what you did!”

“I DON’T KNOW WHAT YOU WANT FROM ME!”

From inside the shrine, Xie Lian tunes out the shouting, standing in front of his donation box.

There were some donations sent by the time he arrived that clearly came from Mr. Mo as thanks for him dealing with the fetal spirit—that isn’t shocking.

What is shocking, however, is the rest of it.

At least two dozen gold bars, stuffing the box to the brim.

And having not found any indication like a note or a calling card to tell him where they came from—

Xie Lian sets off from the shrine, walking down to the fields below. “San Lang?”

The ghost king straightens, brushing the dust from his hands. “Gege?”

Normally, helping in the fields is something Xie Lian would help the farmers with— given that they make donations to the shrine in exchange—but when Hua Cheng is here, he insists on doing it in his stead.

To ‘pass the time,’ as he says.

“Did you leave gold bars in the shrine?”

The calamity tilts his head to the side.

He’s wearing his younger skin right now—that of a nineteen year old, his hair in a loose braid that Xie Lian tied for him that morning.

“No, it wasn’t me.”

His outer robe is tied around his waist while he works, and it certainly isn’t indecent —and yet, it does draw some attention, with some young ladies lingering on their way back from the river, pretending to reorganize their packs while they watch him work.

Of course, Xie Lian couldn’t notice that—and he doesn’t see the way his undershirt is unbuttoned at the top, revealing the sharp edge of his collarbone and the toned lines of his chest, or how his sleeves are rolled up to the elbow, but, well—

The others certainly do.

“Why?” He cocks his hip out slightly, leaning his chin on top of the shovel he was using to dig a new irrigation trench, raising an eyebrow. “Do you need some gold, gege? You can have—”

“No!” Xie Lian corrects him, waving his hands in front of himself nervously.

“I just don’t know where it came from—I don’t really think I’ve done anything to deserve it.”

“...” Hua Cheng thinks it over. “Do you think it could have been the Water Master?”

Xie Lian pauses, rubbing his chin. “...Shi Wudu? Why would he give me that much gold?”

It doesn’t make any sense—there’s enough in there to be worth at LEAST a million merits.

“You said it seemed like he was hiding something when he took Shi Qingxuan back to the Heavens,” Hua Cheng points out. “Maybe he wants you to keep quiet about what happened the other night.”

Xie Lian falls silent with a frown, and while he thinks that over, one of the farmers stops, noticing the young ladies dallying on the side of the road, follows their gaze to the youth in the field—and he waves enthusiastically.

“Well, if it ain’t Xiao Hua! You know, we met your old man the other day!” Hua Cheng smiles, offering a polite wave in return. “Did you really?"

"Yeah—he mentioned your mother was feeling under the weather. Is she doing better?"

The reminder of that incident makes Xie Lian's ears heat up with embarrassment almost immediately—but Hua Cheng seems completely unbothered.

"Oh, yes—she's always had a strong constitution."

The farmer's wife glances from the teenage girls, then back to him. "Say…" Her smile turns a little sly. "Shouldn't your parents be pushing for a marriage for you by now? You're getting to that age."

Several of the girls watching hurry a little faster to lift up their packs, giggling sheepishly, and Xie Lian finds a small knot in his hair.

It must have gotten in there while he was sweeping out back this morning, after he brushed it.

He turns around, combing his fingers through the tangle just as Hua Cheng replies—

"Oh—I'm already spoken for."

Xie Lian's fingers go still just as the giggling stops.

"Spoken for—you're already married?!" The farmer sputters, hands on his hips.

Hua Cheng watches Xie Lian from the corner of his eye. "That's right."

"Well, I'll be damned! She must be a gorgeous young lady to snag a young man like you! Accomplished, too!"

The young man hums in agreement, still leaning his chin on his shovel, watching Xie Lian's back.

"The most beautiful person I've ever met, certainly."

Xie Lian fidgets with the knot, even more focused than he was before.

"Not to mention intelligent, kind, and hardworking."

The farmer whistles, approving that Xiao Hua would speak of his young wife with such glowing praise. "You sound smitten!"

Hua Cheng's smile turns lopsided, his eyes sparkling in the afternoon sun.

"I fell in love at first sight when I was a child. They were older than me, and it took me years to win them over—but it was worth it."

He speaks with such sincerity, all the farmer and his wife can do is stare with surprise, the latter saying—

"She sounds like a lucky girl."

They're already walking away, but under his breath, Hua Cheng replies— "I've always been the lucky one."

Xie Lian starts when the ghost walks over to stand beside him—and by then, not only has he gotten the knot out, but he's absentmindedly braided half of his hair.

"That was quite a story," Xie Lian comments, making his way back up the hill, working on undoing his ministrations. It's easy enough, though it does leave one side of his hair wavy.

"Story?"

"Well," Xie Lian doesn't look up, fiddling around. "San Lang isn't married."

"Mmm..." Hua Cheng nods, watching his antics with an odd expression, "You're right, gege," he reaches over, tucking some of Xie Lian's hair behind his ear. "I lied about that part."

The prince has no idea why he's smiling about something like that.

"So insincere..."

But the next words out of Hua Cheng's mouth make the smile drop from his face.

"But the rest of it was true."

Xie Lian looks over at him, startled.

"...What?"

"There is someone special to me," Hua Cheng explains, watching him intently. "I just haven't won them over yet."

"…" Xie Lian stops walking for a moment, his fingers going still in his hair.

"…Dianxia?"

For a moment, he's quiet, with his head tilted down—and before Hua Cheng can decide what to make of that reaction—

Then, Xie Lian starts walking rather quickly, returning to the shrine.

"I don't want…" he mutters under his breath, trailing off.

"…Don't want what?"

"All this gold," Xie Lian concludes, lifting up the donation box with a huff. "I don't care why the Water Master gave it to me—it's too much. Besides—I've been meaning to check on Shi Qingxuan."

Hua Cheng frowns, watching him head out the door.

"Your highness…" the disapproving tone makes Xie Lian stop in the doorway, glancing back at him.

"It would be ill advised to involve yourself in this situation any further."

Xie Lian doesn't ask him what he means—it's obvious there's more to this than what meets the eye, but still.

"…I'm just going to make sure he's alright, and give the gold back." Xie Lian explains. "That's all!"

Hua Cheng watches him go with a frown—but he doesn't stop him.

Xie Lian's journey to the Heavens is rather uneventful. While he may have been involved in a few noteworthy incidents recently, he's still considered a pariah by most of the Heavenly Court, so no one stops to ask him questions as he marches towards his destination:

The Palace of Ling Wen.

She doesn't work up from her work immediately, surrounded by stacks of scrolls, her assistants running about, bewitched memorandums flitting around in the air.

Actually, she doesn't notice him until one of the memos nearly smacks Xie Lian in the face.

"Your highness—?"

Thud!

The Prince sets down the crate he's been carrying—and when he does, she sees the heaps of gold bars gleaming inside.

Now, normally, Xie Lian has always had a calm, graceful countenance. That which would be expected from a man of his station.

And he isn't harsh or even remotely inappropriate now, but— He's scowling.

...Ling Wen doesn't think she's ever seen the Crown Prince of Xianle scowl before. Or that she's even heard of such a thing.

"I would return these to the Water Master personally, but I doubt I warrant an audience with him at this time," he explains quietly. "But I have not earned this gold, and I will not accept it. Give him my thanks."

"I..." Ling Wen stares at him, stunned, her jaw hanging open. "...your highness, I don't believe Shi Wudu sent these to you."

Xie Lian pauses, the wind rather effectively knocked out of his sails. "...Pardon?"

Ling Wen glances over the box, counting the bars within.

"Believe it or not, he's actually rather good at reading the room."

She glances back up at Xie Lian, who has gone from scowling and self righteous to sheepish in a matter of seconds. "And he doesn't like wasting his efforts. He wouldn't send a gift that was likely to be returned."

Or a bribe, for that matter.

"...Oh." He mumbles, his voice suddenly rather small. "I see."

Ling Wen stares at him, trying to decide what to make of his slightly scattered expression. "Are there any other officials who might owe you some sort of debt?"

None that Xie Lian can think of, certainly.

"...Just split it and give it to Feng Xin and Mu Qing, then," Xie Lian mutters, glancing away. “They’ve both had their deputies helping me extensively recently—and I never paid them back properly for the damage caused by my ascension…”

“…Alright,” Ling Wen agrees slowly.

She wants to ask more, but before she can Xie Lian…he leans his elbow against her desk in what could only be the poorest attempt at looking casual she has ever witnessed.

“So…how have you been?”

The Civil Goddess stares at him.

“…What?”

“I mean…how have you been doing?” Xie Lian questions, twiddling his thumbs. “It seems pretty busy.”

Ling Wen can’t take her eyes off of him, her expression openly bewildered.

“…It’s always busy.”

“Right,” the prince lets out an awkward laugh. “Right…”

(Ling Wen hasn’t seen him quite so out of sorts.)

“…And how have you been, your highness?”

“Good,” Xie Lian replies a little too quickly, turning his face away. “Very good.”

“…Are you sure?” Ling Wen questions, unsure if she actually wants to know, but feeling obligated by friendship to ask. “You seem rather…”

“What?” Xie Lian turns to look at her rather suddenly, his expression tense. “I seem rather what?”

Ling Wen is frozen, her eyes wide, beginning to err more on the side of wishing that she had never asked at all.

“…Bothered,” She concludes calmly.

“Oh. Well.” Xie Lian picks at his fingernails, finding that his cuticles have become slightly overgrown. Which isn’t surprising, given that he hasn’t exercised proper nail care in quite some time.

(He gave up around a century into his second banishment.)

But you see, being accident (and somehow conflict) prone as he is, he loses fingers, even entire hands somewhat frequently, and when they grow back, the nail beds tend to stay perfect for at least a few months.

Mu Qing would probably say something about him being a ‘freakish lizard,’ if Xie Lian mentioned that to him.

Xie Lian digs his thumbnail into the cuticle on his ring finger, pushing it back.

He doesn’t know why he’s thinking about what Mu Qing would say right now, anyway.

Xie Lian wouldn’t tell him, people tend to act disturbed when he mentions that sort of thing.

It’s not exactly pleasant small talk.

Ling Wen for her part can’t stop staring at the way one side of Xie Lian’s hair is perfectly combed and straight, and the other has a slight wave.

“...Your highness?” She prompts him, hoping that he’ll either get on with what he’s saying, or flee the conversation.

Before she even finishes her last syllable, Xie Lian replies—

“I misinterpreted the situation.”

“You—?”

“I’ve misinterpreted a lot, lately.” Xie Lian continues, picking at his cuticles a little more fervently. “It’s just confusing, you know?”

Ling Wen is open mouthed, two of her deputies stopping to stare.

“Sometimes, you really think you know what a person means, and then you’re just...” He trails off, staring into the middle distance. “Silly.”

“...”

Ling Wen sets down her pen.

“Your highness?”

"Yes?"

"Your nails are bleeding."

"Ah." That would explain why his hand is wet, then. "So they are."

"...Do you need me to—?"

"I should be going."

Xie Lian pushes away from the desk, only to get smacked in the face by a passing memo.

"..."

"..."

"..."

Ling Wen and her deputies watch in unsure silence as the prince stands still, his shoulders hunched.

"...I didn't break something just now, did I?"

Ling Wen looks down at the memorandum, one paper wing crushed as it wiggles forward miserably on the floor, and one of her deputies rushes down to pick it up.

"...No," She answers quickly, her words coming out in an awkward rush. "No harm done. But your highness—"

The front doors of her palace swing shut, and she and her two deputies are left sitting there in shocked silence, papers flitting past all around them.

"...Lady Ling Wen," one of them speaks up, staring after him. "...What just happened?"

It takes a long time for her to answer.

"One of two things," she mutters, reaching up to massage her fingers over her temples. "The first possibility is that he thought the Water Master sent him a courting gift, and was embarrassed to have misinterpreted the situation."

One of the deputies was in the middle of taking a sip of tea, which they promptly spit out, spraying it across the floor as they hunch over, hacking. Ling Wen reaches over to slap her back, helping to clear her airway.

“Or, it’s something to do with Crimson Rain Sought Flower.” More than likely the latter.

Xie Lian finds himself on the doorstep of the Palace of Wind and Water a few minutes later, and to his surprise—

“I’m sorry your highness,” the deputy god who answers the door bows his head. “The Wind Master isn’t accepting visitors right now.”

“...Is she still unwell?”

“No,” the deputy shakes his head. “She’s much better—but the Water Master has said that she wouldn’t like any visitors.”

Xie Lian frowns, exchanging a few more niceties before the door is shut in his face.

If Shi Qingxuan really was better, she would want visitors. Actually—she’d probably be out and visiting people herself.

“...”

Xie Lian turns on his heel—and instead of walking back down the avenue, he takes a sharp turn at the edge of the palace wall, disappearing down an alley.

Now, normally, he would say that he’s very good at respecting boundaries. Infinitely better than he is at enforcing his own.

But in this case, when a friend is in a precarious position, well...

It’s better to be safe, than sorry.

Leaping over the wall is easy work, his footsteps silent on the ceramic tiles of the roof as he makes his way over the palace, peering down below. Not at the roof itself, which he obviously can’t see—

But Shi Qingxuan’s aura, burning dimly below.

Thankfully, in the Heavens there aren’t any mortals without spiritual power for him to worry about—so when the small, flickering green form below is the only one he sees—Xie Lian knows Shi Qingxuan is alone.

And when he drops down, swinging in through the window, she gasps.

“Your highness!” Shi Qingxuan sits up, her hair slightly askew. “You came!”

When she hurries over, taking Xie Lian by the arm—and while she’s much better than she was before, the crown prince still notices how sluggish her movements seem now, compared to her normal gait.

“I wanted to make sure you were alright,” Xie Lian explains, placing his hands upon his friend’s shoulders. “Are you feeling any better? They said you weren’t accepting visitors, but—”

“That’s all gege,” Shi Qingxuan mutters, her expression dark with frustration. “He’s been planning to lock me up in here until his calamity is over, and heaven knows how long that will be!”

“Given how serious your attack was, I don’t blame him for being worried...” Xie Lian admits, even if he does think the Water Master goes too far in his protectiveness.

And speaking of which—are they even on good terms right now? Given what Shi Qingxuan said to him the last time he saw her, that seems almost impossible...

But before Xie Lian can ask, he notices something, his eyes narrowing. “...Lady Wind Master, there’s someone under your bed!”

Shi Qingxuan lets out a little scream, clinging to Xie Lian’s side, just as a voice hisses —

“Would you be quiet?!”

“...Ming-Xiong?!” She whispers loudly, dropping down to her knees as the Earth Master crawls out from underneath the bed. “...You came to rescue me?”

“Shut up.”

His tone is flat, and cold—but the minute he’s sitting up, he reaches for her face, taking it between his hands.

“Did he hurt you?”

Shi Qingxuan stares up at him for a moment, her expression taut with confusion. “...You mean my brother?” She questions.

Ming Yi's jaw is locked.

"Who else?"

And what else could he be expected to think? The last time they saw her, it was after Shi Wudu had knocked her out and dragged her off to the Heavens, all but threatening Ming Yi's life when he attempted to interfere.

"...No," Shi Qingxuan mutters. "He wouldn't."

Ming Yi doesn't seem to believe that, but the Wind Master is too distracted to focus on reassuring him. Instead, she glances around, listening to make sure there aren't any guards nearby or listening in—and once she's sure of that—

She leans forward, giving Ming Yi a quick, rushed kiss—taking advantage of the fact that the only other person in the room can't see it.

"Thank you for coming for me, Ming-Xiong," She whispers.

The earth master is quiet, reaching up to tuck a stray curl behind her ear.

"You thought I wouldn't?"

Her fingers tighten in the front of his robes for a moment, her cheek pressed against his as she replies—

"I thought my best friend might."

He turns his face into her hair, and for the briefest moment—he smiles.

"...Who's that?"

Instead of replying with her usual antics—whining about how cruel and unfair Ming- Xiong is to her—

Shi Qingxuan just wraps her arms around his neck,hugging him fiercely. "I'll explain everything," She whispers. "But we have to get out of here first."

Xie Lian glances around them, taking in the positions of the guards around the palace. It was easy enough, sneaking in—but sneaking out, particularly when Shi Qingxuan is still not completely back to normal?

“I’ve already made a path,” Ming Yi shrugs, pointing towards the bed.

Xie Lian perks up, making his way over as the earth master pushes the furniture aside. “Really? How did you manage that?”

“Oh!” Shi Qingxuan beams with pride. “Ming-Xiong actually got out his spiritual device!”

“...He did?” Xie Lian tilts his head, expecting a sword, or a...

“It’s a shovel!” Shi Qingxuan explains, “It can dig through just about anything!”

Xie Lian doesn’t react at first, because, well—

His first instinct is to laugh, which isn’t particularly nice, especially given how useful Ming Yi’s tool is in this situation.

“That’s...perfect!”

And honestly—he can’t say that it isn’t impressive, having a spiritual tool that can tunnel underneath the Heavens itself.

They drop down into the tunnel with Ming Yi at the front, Shi Qingxuan in the middle, and Xie Lian bringing up the rear.

“...Can’t we use a light or something? It’s so dark down here,” Shi Qingxuan whines, holding onto Ming Yi’s shoulders as he tunnels forward, chipping ahead with his shovel, foot by foot.

“The light would draw too much attention.”

“How would it draw attention underground?!”

“Someone particularly sensitive might sense that someone is underground using magic, even if it’s for something that small,” Xie Lian explains. “Better to avoid drawing attention until we find a safe place to resurface.”

“And to be quiet,” Ming Yi adds, somewhat testy.

Shi Qingxuan takes the hint, growing silent for a time as they burrow forward, the tunnel sealing itself behind them as they move forward in the earth.

The only issue is that, despite the fact that it’s laid out like a city—the Heavens is a truly massive place.

It takes them a few minutes to get out from underneath the Palace of Wind and Water, and even then, they have to navigate through the Martial Avenue, which stretches on, and on, and on.

And eventually, Shi Qingxuan's patience wears thin.

"...Can you tell where we are?" She whispers, glancing back in Xie Lian's direction, squinting in the dark. "I don't think I can walk much further."

Xie Lian tilts his head, listening closely to the sounds above. "...We're still beneath the Martial Avenue," he explains.

"There are people above us, and—" He stops before he can finish that thought, feeling the hairs on the back of his neck stand up.

Even without his sight, his battle instincts are as sharp as ever—enough for him to make a split second decision.

Shi Qingxuan gasps, making a muffled grunt when Xie Lian claps a hand over her mouth, yanking her back against his chest, forcing her not to make a sound—and within an instant, his reasons become clear as a sword plunges down from above.

And he was right to cover her mouth—because the scream of shock she would have let out is silenced against his palm.

She's quiet, her chest heaving nostrils flaring as the three of them remain still, waiting.

"...Looks like I missed them—but they're close!"

It looks like Shi Qingxuan's escape has already been noticed—and they don't have any more time to waste.

They remain silent and still until the sounds of their pursuers above fade away—and once they do, Ming Yi starts digging even faster than before.

Xie Lian ends up carrying Shi Qingxuan in his arms—both to save her energy, and to keep them moving faster whispering to Ming Yi—

"How long would it take you to draw a travel array?"

"...Thirty seconds," the Earth Master mutters. "But I can't draw one until we resurface."

“We’re underneath someone’s palace now,” Xie Lian listens closely, “And it’s quiet. This is probably the best chance we’re going to get.”

“With those assholes that close behind us?!”

“Yes,” the prince agrees, “I’ll have to buy you time—make the destination my shrine.”

“Won’t that be predictable?” Shi Qingxuan whispers urgently as Ming Yi begins tunneling up towards the surface. “They’ll just follow us there!”

“They’ll hesitate,” Xie Lian mutters, moving her so that he’s carrying the Wind master on his back as he climbs up.

“How do you know that they will?!”

Ming Yi looks like he might prefer taking on their pursuers.

“Because Crimson Rain is there.”

Xie Lian doesn’t have to say it for him to know.

The prince does feel somewhat guilty about that.

He had assured Hua Cheng that he wasn’t going to get himself involved with this mess any further, and now...

Well, it’s too late to consider other options.

And when they exit the tunnel, stumbling to the surface...it’s quiet.

Shi Qingxuan tightens her arms around Xie Lian’s neck still hanging from his back as Ming Yi kneels down on the floor, drawing the array.

“...I’ve never been in this palace before,” She comments, glancing around—finding the space completely unfamiliar.

“...Or maybe not this particular room,” she amends.

“Hmm?”

“Well—it’s someone’s bedroom.”

And the moment she says that—Xie Lian opens his eyes to look around —

Finding a distinctly bright, golden aura in the far corner of the room, presumably where the bed is.

"...Oh dear."

"What?!"

Just as Shi Qingxuan asks, candles around the room flicker to life, illuminating everyone within.

Ming Yi looks up in the middle of drawing the array, and his face falls.

"Oh god, did it have to be HIS palace?!"

"Who?!" Xie Lian questions, completely unaware.

The god sits up, curly hair sticking up in every direction as he rubs at his eyes, and Shi Qingxuan pauses, eyeing his bare torso and chest.

"You know, I guess it shouldn't be surprising, he is a martial god, but..."

A vein pops in Ming Yi's forehead.

"You're SERIOUSLY DOING THIS RIGHT NOW?!"

After the stress of the last week, Shi Qingxuan is desperate for even just a moment of comedy.

"Don't be jealous, yours are bigger! Especially in your female fo—!"

"SHUT UP!"

"Where are we?!" Xie Lian interjects, "People are—!"

The door to the bedroom bursts open, and when it does, the daylight from outside comes streaming in.

"QI YING!" Pei barks, storming through the door. "Hurry—the Wind Master is being abducted!"

Shi Qingxuan cries out with indignation.

"ABDUCTED?! I'm ESCAPING!"

"You're not a PRISONER, your brother is trying to—!"

"Lock me in my room and not let me leave?!" Shi Qingxuan glares.

“What does that sound like to you?!”

“...Well, it’s for your own good!”

Isn’t Qi Ying the Warden of the West, also known as Quan Yizhen?

Wasn’t he the one Xie Lian sat next to during the mid autumn festival?

“...” Xie Lian turns to look in the Martial God’s direction, bowing apologetically.

(Which looks somewhat ridiculous, since he still has Shi Qingxuan on his back.)

“Sorry for waking you, General!”

Quan Yizhen looks back at him, his eyes wide, slightly dazed from being woken up in such a manner.

Pei takes a step forward, only to stop when Xie Lian places a hand on the hilt of his sword.

“...Your highness, this isn’t a matter you want to involve yourself with.”

Shi Qingxuan shrinks slightly, but Xie Lian simply hitches her up a little higher on her back with one hand, the other still on his sword.

“Lady Wind Master has helped me more than once, I won’t abandon her now.”

“You have no IDEA what you’re getting into!”

“You’re the one who doesn’t know what you’re getting into!” Shi Qingxuan glares. “You don’t even know what’s GOING ON!”

“I know that this is the LAST thing your brother needs—!”

“And who gives a fuck?!” Ming Yi glares. “What about what she needs?!”

Xie Lian takes one step back, closer to the array—and Pei quickly seems to decide that the time for negotiation has passed.

“Enough—Qi Ying, help me secure the Wind Master!”

There’s a long pause as the Warden of the West looks from Xie Lian, to Pei, back to Xie Lian.

Ming Yi finishes scribbling down the array in that time—and when he does, he reaches out to grab Xie Lian by the elbow, yanking him back into the formation.

Pei lunges forward, drawing his sword—

BOOM!

Xie Lian immediately draws fangxin, but... The blow doesn't land on him.

Xie Lian isn't sure what happened, even as the array flares and activates around them, listening as Pei Ming cries out indignantly—

"QI YING?! WHY ARE YOU ATTACKING ME?!"

And in an instant—they're gone.

Shi Qingxuan clings to him tightly, glancing around.

"Oh, thank god, we made it back—and you're—" Something in her tone changes as Xie Lian sets her down. "...you're right, Crimson Rain is here."

Ming Yi sends her a venomous look, and Xie Lian is baffled. "Didn't I already say that he was?"

"You certainly implied, but..."

"Gege," Hua Cheng comments from where he's sitting up on the counter, watching the group of newcomers with his knees spread. "I didn't realize you were returning with guests."

Directly contradicting what Xie Lian told him before.

"Ah, well..."

Xie Lian rubs the back of his neck, backing away from the other two, more in Hua Cheng's direction. "Things got a little bit out of hand, it wasn't part of the plan—"

Then, he accidentally backs up so far, he ends up bumping into the counter, between the calamity's spread knees.

Which would be embarrassing enough if he hadn't stumbled in the process, and when he throws up a hand to stop himself, well—

It lands on Hua Cheng's chest.

The Ghost King's skin, to be more specific.

To say it most accurately, Xie Lian's hand is on Hua Cheng's bare chest. He yanks it back almost immediately, going red all the way to his ears.

"Oh—I, I didn't—!" He stammers, realizing exactly what Shi Qingxuan must have been thinking. "He—He wasn't like this when I left—"

And now, realizing exactly what she was staring at, he throws his arms out in front of Hua Cheng, who obviously wasn't expecting company.

"NOBODY LOOK!"

From behind him the ghost king raises an eyebrow, setting his flask down on the counter.

Liquor, probably.

From the smell of it, and, well—

Xie Lian has tasted it on his lips before, the mere memory of it making him grow even more red than he already is.

"What are you doing sitting around in a shrine shirtless, anyway?" Ming Yi grumbles, etching a new travel array on the door.

"I spent the day working in the fields, and I was taking a rest," Hua Cheng shrugs, drumming his fingertips against the edge of the counter. "Is there a problem, Ming Yi?"

The earth master doesn't say a word, focusing on his task as Hua Cheng reaches for his outer robe.

Once he pulls it about his shoulders and goes about the task of buttoning it up, Xie Lian seems to relax. "What should our next step be?"

"We can't stay here," Ming Yi scribbles down the array even faster. "Most gods would avoid a fight with Crimson Rain—but not Ming Guang."

Xie Lian jumps when Hua Cheng slips down from the counter behind him, his hip brushing against the prince's skin as he walks past.

"Have you fought him before, San Lang?"

Hua Cheng crosses the room, watching Ming Yi's progress from over his shoulder.

"We've never met."

He shrugs, watching the final symbols being etched into place.

Shi Qingxuan moves closer as well, prepared to leap through the array as soon as it's ready.

"Even you wouldn't challenge him?"

A soft laugh falls from the ghost king's lips.

"More like he's never been foolish enough to offend me."

Ming Yi steps back, the array glowing brightly as he performs the final hand signals to activate it.

"But," Hua Cheng adds as the door is opened, "I'll keep a low profile this time around."

Not because he wouldn't relish in the fight—Xie Lian has spent enough time around Hua Cheng to know there's little he enjoys more —

But because he doesn't want to cause Xie Lian any trouble.

Shi Qingxuan is the first through, with Ming Yi behind her, and Hua Cheng and Xie Lian following closely behind—and when the portal shuts behind them, the first thing Xie Lian notices is the change in temperature.

It's warmer—slightly more humid, with lower elevation.

When he listens closer, he can hear cicadas beating in the distance—what's left of them anyway, given that most have already returned to hibernation.

"Oh, Ming-Xiong, this is perfect," Shi Qingxuan sighs with relief, stretching her arms over her head. "Pei won't come here unless he's desperate—that gives us time," she mutters, running her fingers through her hair as she paces the room, frantic.

“...San Lang?” Xie Lian leans towards him, speaking quietly. “Where are we?” Hua Cheng leans down to reply right next to his ear—

“The Palace of the Rain Master, your highness—but it would seem that she isn’t here at the moment.”

Ah—right. No one ever explained the details to him, but someone did mention that Pei is rather wary of her, refusing to enter her territory if he can avoid it.

Ming Yi watches Shi Qingxuan as she walks back and forth across the room, her normally well groomed hair slightly tangled, falling in front of her face.

She’s still pale compared to her normal complexion, with dark circles beneath bloodshot eyes.

“What happened back there?”

The earth master crosses his arms over her chest—looking as though he might want to go to her side, but choosing to keep his distance.

“Why wouldn’t your brother let you leave your palace? What’s going on between the two of you?”

“...”

Shi Qingxuan stops, pressing her face into her hands.

“...He’s being blackmailed.” She finally replies, hesitant to say anything more—

And upon hearing her describe it like that—Ming Yi’s face goes blank.

“Who?” He asks flatly, his knuckles white where he grips his elbows.

“My brother,” Shi Qingxuan doesn’t look up, holding her face even tighter as she stares at the floor.

“And what has your brother done that would warrant being blackmailed?” Ming Yi presses, his eyes locked on hers.

Shi Qingxuan won’t meet his gaze.

Hua Cheng suddenly feels compelled to turn away, not seeming to want to watch Ming Yi’s expression any longer. Instead he chooses to occupy himself with one of the cats lounging in a nearby patch of sun.

And after a long moment of silence, Xie Lian asks his own question.

“...Lady Wind Master, the day you ascended,” he asks quietly, his tone gentle as he watches her shoulders hunch. “...It was the last day of autumn, wasn’t it?”

Shi Qingxuan shrinks, her voice trembling slightly. “...Yes,” she whispers.

Hua Cheng doesn’t say a word, scratching a kitten beneath its chin. Its fur is white as snow, marked with dark patches around its eyes and throat.

Xie Lian sighs, rubbing the back of his neck. “...I think I know what happened,” he murmurs.

When Shi Qingxuan doesn’t speak up on her own, he continues.

“The Scholar He Xuan—I would be willing to bet he was born on the same day as you, likely in the same city,” Xie Lian squeezes his eyes shut. “That’s the only way it could have worked.”

Hua Cheng glances over at him, surprised.

“...Are you referring to swapping fates, your highness? How do you know about that?”

Xie Lian can hear Shi Qingxuan’s heart thumping anxiously, and his own aches with sympathy.

“My Guoshi taught me when I was young,” he explains. “Before he disappeared...he was fearful that I might attempt to switch my own fate to escape the situation.”

Hua Cheng stiffens, his jaw clenching with anger. “Dianxia never would have done such a thing.” Xie Lian offers a tired smile.

“Careful, San Lang.” For a moment, his expression becomes distant. “Have that much faith in me. and I’ll end up surprising you.”

Mei Nianqing was an excellent teacher. Xie Lian came to appreciate that time more and more during his own time as a teacher.

But the man had his own scars.

Xie Lian had simply been too young to see them and recognize them for what they were.

He would dote upon the crown prince, often treating Xie Lian like his own son. But there were other moments.

Times when he would regard Xie Lian with an air of fear and dread.

Not because he believed Xie Lian would do something terrible—but simply because he knew that the prince could.

And given what Xie Lian would do later—maybe he wasn't wrong.

Hua Cheng's reply goes silent, unheard.

'But you could never disappoint me.'

"You say that as though your Guoshi didn't want you to resort to such a thing," Ming Yi mutters, still watching Shi Qingxuan.

"He didn't—he forbade me from even considering it."

"...Then why tell you about it to begin with?"

"He didn't tell me the exact spell," Xie Lian explains. "He just wanted me to understand that I should never use it—in case I ever heard of it from someone else."

"...And what did he tell you?" Shi Qingxuan asks quietly.

If Xie Lian had known of all of the forces at play—he would have told the entire truth. That switching fates is not a skill taught by cultivation masters.

It's old magic. Dark magic.

Cursed.

And the spell is never taught by someone with good intentions.

Mei Nianqing told Xie Lian the story when he was a young, over confident god.

All he had been thinking of at the time had been an attempt on his life, during which he had been saved by a young soldier, guarding him in a cave until the danger had passed.

But even in that state...

Mei Nianqing's cautionary tale frightened him.

Switching fates is so uncommon, it belongs more to legend than it does to history. The number of times the spell has been cast in any records—that of the heavens, of mortals, or ghosts, is less than one could count on both hands.

And each instance has always begun in the same way.

When someone of truly magnificent destiny is faced with an impossible situation. Some sort of obstacle that cannot be overcome.

A man desperate to save his lover.

A mother, wishing to protect her children.

...Even a prince, struggling to hold onto his kingdom.

And at their lowest moment of fear and desperation, a figure has always appeared, offering to save them from failure, to give them their heart's desire—

To change their fate.

For someone in such a desperate situation, it's an impossible choice. So difficult to resist.

And they never realize that the person offering is not their friend. That what they offer isn't salvation...

It's a trap.

The cruelest kind.

Because of the things they don't tell the spell caster.

First: that you cannot switch fates between two individuals unless their destinies are already deeply intertwined.

Always causing pain to those you meant to save.

And second...

Any suffering caused by the spell will eventually come back to you. And it won't stop.

Not until the debt incurred has been paid.

And when such debts cannot be forgiven, well...

It only ever ends one way.

But Xie Lian can't tell Shi Qingxuan that without frightening her more.

"...He told me that practicing dark magic always comes at a steep price—to everyone around me." Xie Lian explains. "Lady Wind Master—how did you learn what your brother had done?"

Shi Qingxuan somehow grows even paler remembering, turning away and wrapping her arms around herself

"...The Reverend told me," she mutters. "Or, well...it showed me."

"...Showed you." Ming Yi repeats flatly.

Shi Qingxuan doesn't explain any further—but Xie Lian can already guess what happened.

"It showed her a memory, it did the same thing with me."

Hua Cheng looks over at him sharply.

"...It did?"

"Yes," Xie Lian frowns, his brow pinching with concentration. "Though I'm not sure if the memory was from the Reverend's perspective, or someone else's..."

And it begs another question:

Was the memory it showed Shi Qingxuan the Reverend's? And if so, how was it present when Shi Wudu switched their fates?

And if not...how did it get a hold of Shi Wudu's memory?

Then, the pieces fall into place.

Hua Cheng has never watched someone get so close to the truth, despite all odds.

"...It's not the Reverend," Xie Lian mutters.

Shi Qingxuan turns around to look at him sharply. "What?"

"The creature hunting you—it isn't the Reverend of Empty Words."

He shakes his head, feeling somewhat breathless as the facts come together. “Did you notice anything odd about the story during the Bloody Fire Social?”

Shi Qingxuan falls silent, thinking hard, and Hua Cheng—who always answers his questions, rhetorical or not—remains silent.

The one who answers him, in the end, is the most soft spoken of the four: Ming Yi.

“...The way he died,” the earth master replies slowly. “It was wrong.”

“What?” Shi Qingxuan looks between the two of them. “How was it wrong?!”

“All of the other victims of the Reverend of Empty Words died by suicide,” Xie Lian paces, not so differently from Shi Qingxuan’s movements a few minutes before. “But not He Xuan, he...”

“...Drowned,” Ming Yi concludes quietly.

“The Reverend never devoured him—and there’s no other instance of a victim escaping its wrath. Anyone that strong, who endured such a horrific life...” Xie Lian stops pacing, his stomach sinking. “Would form into an extremely powerful ghost.”

One bent on only one thing: Revenge.

And as for how He Xuan could have access to Xie Lian’s memories, tormenting him the way that he did—Xie Lian has other theories about that, but—

BOOM!

A sudden, thunderous crash outside steals his attention.

“OI!”

In the fields beneath the palace, the farmers scatter at the sight of Heavenly light and thunder opening up above the landscape—

All except for one of them.

A bull, jet black with long, ivory horns.

It rears back on its hind legs, and in doing so its shape begins to change.

Where there was once a towering beast now stands a man—one with long, thick black hair, a square jaw, and a gold ring through his nose.

"...Well, well!" He barks, his chest rumbling with laughter. "If it ain't little ol' Pei Ming!"

The martial god steps forward, unamused.

"I'm not here for a fight," Pei sighs, eyes gleaming in the sun. "I'll be in and out of your hair quickly."

"Do you think I let outsiders waltz about my mistress's lands freely?" The Rain Master's deputy crosses his arm, muscles in his arms and chest flexing.

Pei places one hand on the hilt of his sword, "Do you think I would have come here if I wasn't prepared to cut you down?" He questions coldly.

His normal smiling, happy go lucky demeanor is gone—replaced with something colder, sharply focused.

Yushi Huang's deputy raises both eyebrows, shocked.

"Well, you've suddenly got quite a lot of nerve—!" He starts, rolling back his sleeves as though he's looking for a fight, but—

Pei simply walks right past him, his expression dark. "I don't have time for this."

There are few people in this world he actively avoids—Yushi Huang being one of them.

But some things are more important than guilt, or regrets.

The moment he shoves the door to the temple open, the Wind Master is already indignant.

"How did you find us so quickly?!"

Pei glances around the room, taking in possible enemies.

Ming Yi, he isn't worried about.

Xie Lian is problematic, but with the cursed shackles, he can be dealt with. And the fourth...

Just looks like a young farm hand, sprawled on a bench with a cat in his lap.

“…Tracking spell,” he mutters, which only serves to make Shi Qingxuan even more indignant.

“How dare—!”

“YES!” Pei glares, rounding on her with such frustration, it actually makes her flinch. “I fucking DARE!”

“General—”

“And if you would pull your head out of your ass for even A SECOND, you’d realize why!”

Shi Qingxuan laughs with disbelief, and even without her spiritual powers or her fan, she’s practically rearing and ready to fight.

“That is RICH, coming from YOU!”

“I’m not wasting my time with this,” Pei growls, stalking forward. “We’re leaving.”

“I’m not going ANYWHERE with you!”

“When you’re incapable of protecting yourself AND your stupidity impacts others, YOU DON’T GET A SAY!”

“STUPIDITY?!” Shi Qingxuan tries to lunge for him, only to be stopped by Ming Yi’s arm around her waist. “YOU DON’T EVEN KNOW—!”

“You know what I DO know?” Pei’s eye twitches, and this—

This isn’t like him. Not at all.

Even if Shi Qingxuan doesn’t care to admit it…

Something must be wrong, for Pei to be acting so spooked.

“These two,” He jabs his thumb in the direction of Xie Lian and Ming Yi, “CANNOT keep you safe from that thing, but they’ll get hurt trying. Is that what you want?!”

Finally, Shi Qingxuan falters.

Clearly, she hadn't considered that possibility, but…

…Xie Lian did get hurt last time, trying to protect her.

"Ming Guang," the prince steps forward, both of his hands raised. "There's no need to be so rash, we can discuss the situation calmly."

Pei looks at him, his expression slightly wary—but determined. "Your highness, normally I would agree—but there isn't any time. I hope we aren't forced to delay any further because you've forced me to fight you."

"You won't be fighting him."

Pei Ming turns his gaze to the youth in the corner—

One with a surprisingly deep voice for a teenager.

He hasn't moved, his legs stretched out lazily, scratching the cat in his lap behind the ears.

But his gaze is sharper than any blade.

Xie Lian sighs, remembering what Hua Cheng had said about not making a scene, but instead of addressing that veiled threat, Pei seems to change tact.

"…The more time you waste, the more you put your brother's life in danger," he turns to Shi Qingxuan, who grows still.

"…What?" She questions slowly, and the next words out of Pei's mouth bring silence to the entire room.

"His calamity began as soon as you left the city," he takes a step towards her, and Ming Yi's arm tightens around her waist. "And it's not going well."

"…It did—?"

"And I'm not there to help him, even though he needs me," Pei continues, his knuckles white where he grips his sword at his side. "Because he was actually sick with worry, not knowing where you were. So, are you coming willingly, or am I dragging you?"

Shi Qingxuan falls silent, and for the first time in a few minutes—Hua Cheng actually forces himself to look at Ming Yi.

Watching her face, everything about him radiating calm, but— Hua Cheng knows better.

He's tense. Wound up so tight, he could easily shatter.

And he warned him. But...

Shi Qingxuan pushes his arm down from her waist, stepping towards Pei Ming—only for him to catch her by the wrist.

"...You're actually going to help him?" He questions, staring at the back of her hair, his expression guarded.

"After everything you just told us?"

Shi Qingxuan doesn't look at him, her head bowed low—clearly torn about what the right thing to do is, given the situation, but...

"...Of course she is," Pei grabs her other wrist, pulling her along. "He's her brother!"

"He's—"

"He's right." Shi Qingxuan mutters, biting her lip—and this time, she pulls her wrist out of Ming Yi's grip. "I'm going to have to figure out what to do after his trial is over, but for now...He's my brother."

No one in the room sees.

No one else is watching.

But Hua Cheng is.

Closely enough to see the flash of pain in He Xuan's eyes. Brief, but deep.

'Families are complicated.'

Hua Cheng warned him of that, and still.

Two things blind a man to reason:

Love, and grief.

He Xuan has both in abundance.

He brings up the back of the line as they follow Pei Ming and Shi

Qingxuan to the array the martial god used to travel to Yushi Huang's territory from the Eastern Sea.

'You can't blame her when she doesn't know that it's you.'

He makes the attempt at reasoning with him, but receives no reply.

'It's obvious that you don't want to hurt her. Why—'

'It shouldn't matter who I am. Who my fiancé was. Who my sister was.'

Hua Cheng falls silent, having no means of arguing with such a statement.

'If you're saying she wouldn't be able to stomach what he did as easily if she could put a face to the person who died for her—that's not good enough.'

Maybe it isn't. Not to the person who suffered.

But it's also very—

'That's something I respect about the Crown Prince of Xianle.'

It's unfair, of course—bringing Xie Lian's convictions to such a debate is the equivalent of bringing a broad sword to battle when your enemy wields a toothpick.

And given the fact that the two of them shared so many memories in the Kiln—He Xuan knows far more about Hua Cheng's past with the prince than most.

'Remember that day, when the night touring green lantern pulled you behind his carriage in a sack?'

Hua Cheng's mouth presses into a grim line.

'Xie Lian didn't know you. You were just an orphan with nothing to your name.' He watches his God's back a few meters ahead, hair gently bowing in the breeze. 'What would have happened if he had been more like Shi Qingxuan?'

Hong'er would have died.

Maybe he would have become a ghost fire, maybe not, but most likely —

There would have been no Wu Ming. No Hua Cheng.

Nothing.

Still, it's not a perfect comparison, not even close.

Xie Lian held no love for his cousin—only disgust.

And Hong'er had been very much alive—someone Xie Lian could step in and rescue.

Not a dead man from four centuries ago—one whom Shi Qingxuan now believes has been terrorizing her.

And while He Xuan wasn't responsible for everything that happened in Fu Gu... He isn't entirely innocent, either.

'You wouldn't be interfering if the prince didn't care for her,' He Xuan adds, his shoulders squaring stubbornly. 'If you want to protect him—keep him out of this.'

'You think I haven't been trying?'

What is Hua Cheng supposed to do, when Shi Qingxuan runs to Xie Lian for help at every turn?

Even now, he plans on trying to convince Xie Lian to stay behind. Hell, he's even willing to use Shuo's injury to guilt trip him into returning to the shrine, but—

'Pei! ' Ling Wen's voice cries out in the general communication array—and for once, she sounds urgent. 'Have you located the Wind Master?'

'I have her, we're returning now, ' Pei replies, and within the communication array...

If the horrified whispers are anything to go by—the Water Master's battle isn't going smoothly.

'You have to hurry,' Ling Wen speaks in a rush now, 'A group of fishing vessels weren't warned, and they've gotten swept up in the mess—at least forty mortals are at risk!'

Xie Lian stiffens, and Hua Cheng closes his eyes, breathing out slowly through his nose, speaking into the prince's private array—

'Your highness—we should stay back.'

He makes the suggestion, knowing full well that, when lives are at stake, he'll—

'I'm sorry, San Lang.' Xie Lian frowns, his posture turning stubborn as he hurries ahead, closing in on Pei's array. 'I know I told you I would stay out of this—but there's more at stake than you know.'

Hua Cheng could say the same to him, but...

There's no time to discuss it.

Pei Ming leaps through his array with Shi Qingxuan in tow, Ming Yi following directly after them—and then, Xie Lian, with Hua Cheng close behind.

With one step, Xie Lian is in the fields, and with the next— He stands on the rocking bow of a ship.

But the men around them are no ordinary soldiers. All of them are deputies within the Palace of Wind and Water, powerful cultivators in their own right—each one milling over the decks, manning the helms, adjusting the sails.

"Ge!" Shi Qingxuan cries, looking around. "Where is he?!"

Xie Lian blinks, struggling to see, because—

He's now having the dawning realization that, similar to Hua Cheng, Shi Wudu was restraining his own spiritual power this entire time.

But not now.

The air around them is charged with power, vividly blue, crackling in the storm— filling Xie Lian's entire range of vision.

"OVER THERE!" Pei holds one hand up against his forehead, shielding it from the violent winds, pointing ahead. "IN THE CENTER OF THE STORM!"

One of the higher ranking deputies rushes over, standing at salute:

"General Ming Guang!" He cries, "The Water Master is holding his ground—but the storm keeps pulling us further out—how should we handle the civilians?!"

Pei presses a hand against his temple, thinking.

First, he speaks into his private array with the Water Master—uttering the only words that could matter to him at this moment:

'Your sister is here.'

There's an ominous crash of thunder in response, then a rush of the water as something shoots towards the boat—springing forth upon reaching the bow, boots landing heavily on the wooden planks.

The Water Master doesn't spare anything else even a passing glance.

"SHI QINGXUAN!"

Normally, he's dressed in fine silks and jewels, hair flowing down his back—

But the Water Master dresses very differently for battle, it would seem.

Instead, he wears deep, midnight blue robes that fit much closer to his body, more suited for combat, with black trousers and heavy leather boots underneath.

It's more comparable to something a ship captain would wear—not a god of wealth and opulence.

And his hair, rather than hanging down his back, is pulled up into a high ponytail, clasped with a gold hair pin that doesn't match anything else he's wearing, but, well—

(It was a gift.)

The Water Master pulls his sister into a fierce hug—so tight, her ribs ache with protest.

"Where were you?!" He mutters, pulling back, placing both hands on either side of her head, looking her over for injuries. "Are you hurt?"

Xie Lian can't help but notice how similar his reaction to seeing Shi Qingxuan was to Ming Yi's, but then again…

Both men care for the Wind Master deeply, that much is clear—even if their forms of care are very different.

"I'm fine," Shi Qingxuan mutters, reaching up to press her fingertips to a cut on Shi Wudu's cheek with a frown. "I didn't mean to—"

"It doesn't matter."

The Water Master pulls her in for another hug, pressing a kiss to the side of her head as he squeezes his eyes shut, taking deep breaths.

And now, with the knowledge of where his sister is—and that she's alright—he seems to regain his focus.

Shi Qingxuan isn't startled by the gesture—her brother has always hugged her, and when she was small it was never unusual for him to kiss her on the forehead or the hair when putting her to bed at night, but...

To be affectionate in front of others— That's never happened before.

"Whatever happens next, you stick with Pei or Ming Yi, understand?" He mutters, stepping back. "I need you to promise me. I can't—" He lowers his voice. "I can't do this if you don't."

"...Okay," the Wind Master agrees, eyeing his expression warily. "But I —"

Before she can say anything more, Shi Wudu turns around, looking to Pei as he unsheathes his fan from his belt. "I need you to protect the ship."

The General grits his teeth, displeased with the arrangement—but there's nothing else to be done.

He can't fight the Calamity on Shi Wudu's behalf—that isn't how such things work. And as for the fishermen, well—

The sea is too unruly right now to be safe for anyone other than Shi Wudu at the moment, so they won't be able to assist them until the cyclone is dealt with.

And as the mist starts to clear, it's more obvious that it isn't a storm at all—rather it's more like seven raging pillars of water, swirling with the force of a maelstrom.

Shi Wudu places one foot on the bow, glancing back to one of his men.

"If any blasts get past me, make sure she takes it on the head—and keep your heading due West. We cannot go any further East, understand?"

"Aye, sir!"

Xie Lian is slightly puzzled by the second order.

What lies to the east that the water master is trying to avoid?

Satisfied, he steps over—but this time, instead of running across the water's surface, he snaps his fan open, giving it a powerful wave.

The instant that he does, something springs from the water, landing beneath his feet as it rushes him back into battle.

And after a moment of staring—Hua Cheng realizes that he's seeing a dragon. Conjured from the sea water, with the Water Master riding its back.

"...I'll admit it," the ghost king hums, leaning against the railing beside Xie Lian. "The water tyrant lives up to the reputation."

Pei snaps his eyes away from the battle, finally seeming to notice Hua Cheng's presence with an air of irritation.

He's never been fond of that nickname.

"...Your highness, who is the kid?"

Xie Lian perks up, moving to stand in front of Hua Cheng.

"He's just someone from my palace," the prince shrugs, his hands clasped behind him innocently. "He won't cause any trouble."

Pei glances from Xie Lian, to the youth looking over his shoulder, his gaze suspicious.

"Your highness..."

"Hmm?"

"With all due respect, you don't have that many acquaintances, and nobody works in your palace."

Xie Lian pauses, feeling somewhat sheepish, because—

Well, both of those things are true.

"...Regardless of who he is—he's just here to help me," The prince lifts his chin. "And as I've said–he won't cause any trouble."

“He’s right,” Hua Cheng yawns, leaning his elbows back on the deck railing. “Just pretend I’m not even here.”

Easier said than done.

While they’ve been talking, Shi Wudu has been clashing with the water pillars in the distance, his dragon curling around them in a tight coil, squeezing like a constrictor until they come crashing back down.

“...Well, as you can see, this is almost over with,” Pei mutters. “So, there’s no need.“

Xie Lian can’t argue with him there—and he almost asks Hua Cheng to wait for him back in the shrine, since he’s sure this will be over in a matter of minutes, but...

Within his private array, Hua Cheng speaks up . ‘Gege, it’s important you stay beside me this time.’

...This time?

What does he mean?

Once the Water Pillars come crashing back down to earth, Shi Wudu lifts his fan, gathering the force of the currents below.

Once they’re in his grip, he directs them towards the merchant ships in the distance, pushing them further and further out, until finally—they’re out of range.

Shi Qingxuan lets out a shuddering sigh, dropping down to her knees with relief as her brother returns to the ship.

“Oh, thank the heavens,” she mutters, pressing a hand against her forehead. “I really thought you were—”

She falls silent when she sees the look on her brother’s face.

“It’s not over,” he rounds on one of his men, fists clenched. “Didn’t I tell you to keep west?!”

“We did, sir!”

Just then—Xie Lian feels the ship shudder and groan. “What’s happening?!”

The Water Master glances around the sides of the ship, sweat beading at his temples —already exhausted from the first round of the fight.

“Gege?!” Shi Qingxuan grasps the railing, startled “What’s happening?!”

Shi Wudu doesn’t answer at first, breathing raggedly as he moves his fan, attempting to use the currents to push the boat to the west, with the others, but…

Nothing happens.

Pei frowns, his brow knitting with confusion.

“…Shui—?”

“The communication array isn’t working,” Shi Wudu mutters, rubbing the side of his head. “We…we have to…”

He winces, pinching the bridge of his nose—and Pei’s expression turns focused.

“…Shi Qingxuan—go with Ming Yi and use the travel array to summon reinforcements.”

For once, the Wind Master doesn’t argue with him—rushing below decks. And Xie Lian can’t help but notice…Hua Cheng has become rather silent.

“…San Lang,” he reaches out, hoping to grab his sleeve—but the calamity grabs his hand instead, holding on tightly. “What’s going on?”

“…” He watches as Ming Yi’s back disappears below decks before turning his attention to the prince, his tone somewhat clipped.

“The far eastern sea is Blackwater’s territory.”

“Black Water Sinking Ships?” Pei mutters, startled. “Of all of the terrible luck…”

Just then, Shi Qingxuan returns from below decks, even paler than she was before.

“The travel array isn’t working!”

“Well, isn’t that just common sense?” Hua Cheng rolls his eyes. “If the communication array is down, why would the travel array still be working?"

Pei sends him an irritated look. "You—"

The ship rattles again, even more violently this time—making even Shi Wudu lose his balance. Pei Ming catches him, his hands on the Water Master's shoulders.

"Fine, if you know so much—then what's going on here?!"

Hua Cheng seems perfectly relaxed—but his grip on Xie Lian's hand is tight.

"Any ship within Blackwater's territory will sink," he shrugs, and though no one else can see, when he drags his thumb over the back of Xie Lian's knuckles, the prince's ears grow a little warm.

"There's only one thing that can float out here."

"What?" Shi Wudu rubs his forehead, opening his eyes. "What kind of wood? There might be something in the cargo hood that can—"

"Coffin wood," Hua Cheng replies calmly.

"..."

"We don't have any of that on board, do we?"

While Shi Qingxuan's intentions by asking are innocuous, her brother can't help but be exasperated.

"Why would a GOD have coffin wood on his ship?! We CAN'T DIE!"

"Not with that attitude," Ming Yi mutters under his breath.

Hua Cheng reaches into his pocket—he's been wearing the disguise of a poor fisherman, up until now, one that's quickly broken when he lifts out a golden flask, raising it to his lips.

(Subtlety be damned, he needs a drink.)

"...Then we'll just have to abandon ship."

Despite the fact that this is a Heavenly vessel that no doubt is worth a royal treasury's worth of gold—the Water Master seems perfectly comfortable with leaving it behind. "We'll have to retreat by air, instead."

As he says this, the gods around them begin mounting their heavenly swords, rising away from the ship decks—with the exception of Pei, who stands upon Shi Wudu's blade beside him, and Shi Qingxuan, standing on, well...

Mi Ying's shovel.

The handle, to be more precise.

Xie Lian can't even focus on the hilarity of the situation, not when he's gripping fangxin, thinking.

Maybe, if Hua Cheng was lending him spiritual power, fangxin could carry him to safety. But both of them? The blade is fairly old, he doubts...

But before he can say a word, Hua Cheng wraps an arm firmly around the prince's waist, speaking next to his ear,

"Flying out won't work—you'll have to hold onto me, your highness."

"...It won't?"

Hua Cheng eyes the dark waters below.

"...Things happen when you try to fly in Black Water's territory. Do you trust me?"

Xie Lian stares blankly ahead, feeling somewhat unsettled, for once, that he can't see what might be coming.

"...Yes, but—oh!"

Without another word, he's swept off his feet.

"San Lang?!" He mutters, grasping at the front of the ghost king's shirt—a very similar position to when he plunged down into the Sinner's Pit in the Crescent Moon Kingdom.

"The ship is going down," Hua Cheng explains, stepping up onto the bow. "We don't want to be on board when it does."

Suddenly, Xie Lian understands Hua Cheng's sudden sense of urgency, remembering something the Ghost King told him weeks ago, just after Xie Lian found out who he was.

Nine times out of ten, Hua Cheng is stronger than Blackwater.

But there is one, glaring exception to that rule:

Every Ghost King is Supreme within their own territory, and this…

This means that the situation they've now found themselves in is just about as dangerous as it gets.

Without another word, Hua Cheng leaps overboard, taking Xie Lian with him as he plunges into the water below.

Xie Lian gasps from the cold, throwing his arms around Hua Cheng's neck. "We'll start sinking in a minute," the ghost king speaks next to his ear. "But—!"

CRASH!

CRACK!

If Xie Lian could see the creatures bursting from the water, even he would have felt a hint of fright.

Enormous fish skeletons, closer in size to a small whale, leap from the depths—eyes burning red as they attack the heavenly officials floating above.

"Just hold onto me," Hua Cheng repeats, squeezing his eyes shut, concentrating. "Don't let go, and you'll be safe."

Xie Lian isn't worried for himself—not exactly.

He knows that Hua Cheng's arms are the safest place to be in this scenario. But the people above…

"The Water Master will have to protect them as best as he can," Hua Cheng seems to guess what he's thinking, grasping Xie Lian firmly by the jaw. "Take a deep breath, now."

Xie Lian doesn't even think before obeying, sucking in a deep breath of air— "Hold it!"

Just as he gives that last order, Xie Lian feels the water beginning to suck them down, dragging them into the depths below.

He keeps his mouth tightly shut, holding onto his breath as he clings around Hua Cheng's neck as tightly as he can.

'It's alright.'

That's the last thing he hears, along with the roar of the water in his ears. Hua Cheng speaking into his private array—

'Just hold on.'

Then, with the building pressure of the sea around them, Xie Lian fades into unconsciousness.

Plunging further and further into swirling darkness, drifting between dream and reality.

'Just hold on.'

'Just hold on.'

And, as usual, Xie Lian doesn't remember his dreams.

Not even when he sits up with a ragged gasp, clutching the chain around his neck.

"DON'T!"

He glances around, his breathing ragged as he clutches his chest—

And, as usual, he's in darkness.

From the gritty texture beneath his hands and feet, it's fairly obvious that he's somehow made it to a beach, and...

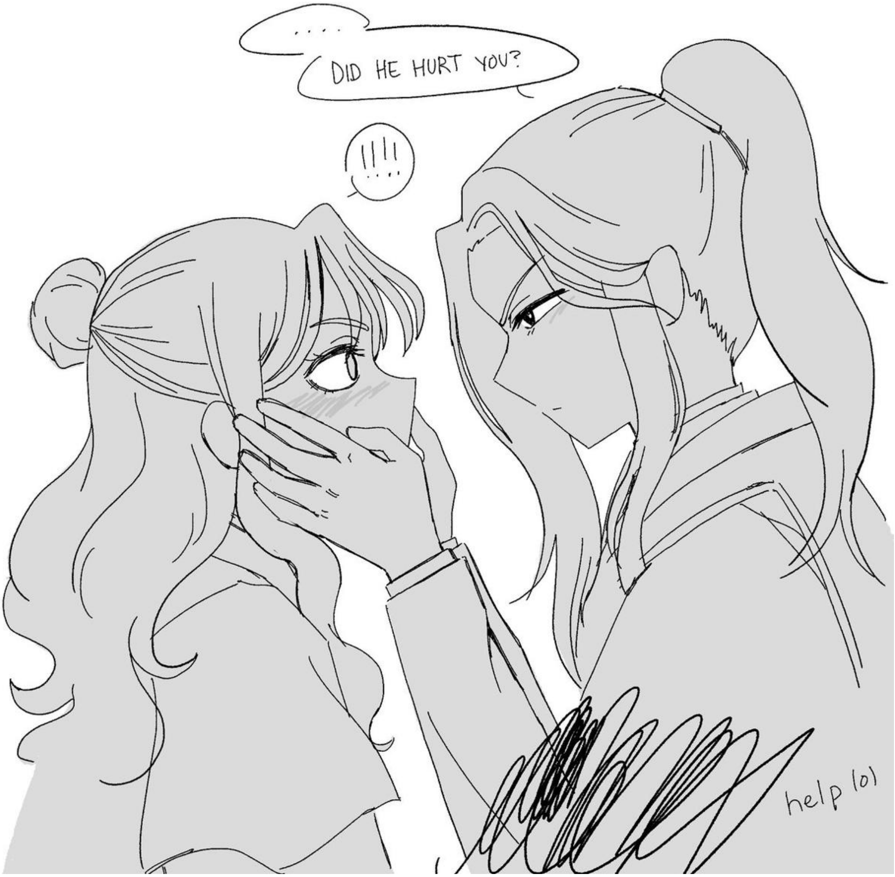
Panic builds in his throat.

He's alone.

ARTWORK INSPIRED BY THIS STORY

Included with permission from artists, do not reproduce or reuse for any reason

CREDIT: PANICKING ARTIST



. . . .
DID HE HURT YOU?
!!!!
. . . .
help lol

CREDIT: ASH

[image]

CREDIT: BANANA SCOUTS

Chapter End Notes

thanks to Banana Scouts, Ash, and Panicking Artist for their beautiful work, and allowing me to share it!

xoxo, Evie

The State of You

Chapter Summary

> The prince swallows hard, sitting up a little straighter.
>
> Normally, his embarrassment over doing such a thing would make him hesitate, but —
>
> He's desperate.
>
> "...I'm so, so sorry in advance..."
>
> Without any further preamble, he leans down, using his thumb to push Hua Cheng's chin down, just as the Ghost King did for him before, opening his mouth as he seals their lips together.

Chapter Notes

> content warnings for this chapter: there is a mildly nsfw scene that could be considered dubious consent. (No one intentionally violates anyone, it's difficult circumstances.) Secondly, there is brief reference to sexual assault.

"San Lang?!"

He's quiet, listening closely for a response, but...

There's just the gentle rush of the waves, and the breeze in the trees. No one answers.

Xie Lian swallows hard, pushing his hair out of his face.

"SAN LANG!"

Old wounds flare easily.

Xie Lian rolls over onto his hands and knees, feeling around blindly, fighting back the panic that has seized his heart in an iron grip.

He has to be nearby.

He—

Xie Lian hands his head, his lips trembling.

“...He wouldn’t leave me,” he whispers, his voice rasping from the salt water he must have inhaled while passed out.

And just as his hand starts to reach out again, fumbling in the dark—
He feels a boot.

Xie Lian yanks his hand back at first with a choked whimper.

‘Not again.’

That’s the only thought in his mind.

‘Please, not again.’

Xie Lian is many things, but he’s never been a coward.

But right now, all he wants to do is run away, to not—

To never live through something like that again.

But...he can’t.

“...” He reaches out again, this time his hand landing higher up, feeling a man’s leg, his clothes, much like Xie Lian’s, soaked with sea water. “San Lang?”

He was wearing a skin before, but one Xie Lian had felt before—so when his palms press against his cheeks—

It’s him.

A broken sound tears from his throat as he grips the ghost king by the shoulders, giving him a shake.

“Can you hear me?!”

How much water could he have inhaled? Xie Lian has drowned plenty of times before, trying to fish in all four seas. Once, he even drifted for an entire month before being pulled up in a fisherman’s net.

But Hua Cheng probably hasn’t dealt with that before.

Xie Lian feels around frantically, trying to decide what he should do.

This is one of those moments where his immortality comes back to haunt him— having a body that heals from any wound or illness has left his understanding of medical practices woefully inaccurate.

But...when Xie Lian was in the lake before, chasing the fetal spirit...San Lang...

The prince swallows hard, sitting up a little straighter.

Normally, his embarrassment over doing such a thing would make him hesitate, but —

He’s desperate.

“...I’m so, so sorry in advance...”

Without any further preamble, he leans down, using his thumb to push Hua Cheng’s chin down, just as the Ghost King did for him before, opening his mouth as he seals their lips together.

In any other situation, he would be absolutely mortified to do such a thing, but now...

Now, he’s focused on the task at hand, holding Hua Cheng’s face between his hands as he blows hair down his throat, feeling his chest rise and fall with each breath that Xie Lian gives him.

What...what is he going to do, if he doesn’t wake up?

Xie Lian has no idea how to treat a ghost for an injury, he doesn’t have any spiritual power—he can’t even get Hua Cheng out of here and take him to someone in Ghost City for help. He’s really so—

Xie Lian is startled from his thoughts when he feels a hand land on his shoulder.

Of course—he can’t see that Hua Cheng’s eyes have been wide open for the last seven seconds, too shocked to speak—but the hand gripping his arm is enough to tell the prince—

He’s awake.

Xie Lian leans back sharply, sighing a shaky breath of relief.

“San Lang!”

Hua Cheng sits up with him, a couple of ragged coughs wrenching from his chest.

"A-Apologies, gege..." He mutters, sounding half winded, half dazed. "Stretching the defense array was more complicated than expected."

"...Array?" Xie Lian replies faintly.

"If you don't have enough spiritual power to shield your body, the currents here pulverize flesh and bone," Hua Cheng explains, decisively looking away from him.

So, he obviously had to shield Xie Lian.

"And in the Wind Master's current state..."

The prince's eyes widen.

"...You protected Shi Qingxuan?" He questions faintly.

Hua Cheng has always made a point of being decisively unhelpful to other Heavenly Officials. Outwardly cold, even to the point of hostility.

"She got blown to the other side of the island with Ming Guang, but she's fine—"

Before Hua Cheng can say another word, Xie Lian does something slightly out of character.

He lunges forward, flinging his arms around the Ghost King's neck, hugging him tightly, his face pressed into his chest, not seeming to mind that his robes are soaked and covered in sand.

At first, Hua Cheng is too stunned to respond, and Xie Lian chokes out;

"I-I thought..." He swallows thickly, his chest aching, and his eyes stinging. "I thought you were..."

"...Dead?"

Xie Lian doesn't know whether to laugh or cry.

Actually, he wishes he could cry.

There's an ache in his chest, one that gets heavier and heavier with every passing year—and if he could shed a tear, maybe it would be a little lighter.

But nothing seems to break through anymore, no matter how deeply it hurts.

"...I know it sounds ridiculous..."

Because he already is dead, Xie Lian shouldn't have anything to worry about, and yet...

He's seen a ghost dispersed before his eyes before—until all he had left was a black saber and white flower.

"I don't..." Xie Lian swallows thickly, leaning back.

"I don't know what came over me, I'm sorry--"

Before he can completely pull away, arms wrap around him, pulling him back in.

"San Lang—?"

"Don't apologize," the ghost king mutters, one arm tight around his back, his hand stroking the back of his head.

"I'm sorry for frightening you, gege."

Xie Lian bites his lip, resting his cheek against Hua Cheng's chest for a moment, allowing his panicked breaths to slow.

"It wasn't your fault," he whispers.

Honestly, he's daunted that Hua Cheng would expend so much energy that he'd actually end up knocked out, even if it was only for a short period of time, but...

He seems fine now.

Still.

Hua Cheng being a ghost was never something that bothered Xie Lian...

Until now.

Because at this moment, the only thing that might make him feel secure would be hearing his heartbeat.

"...San Lang?" He mumbles, the unsteadiness in his voice prompting Hua Cheng to hold him tighter.

"Yes?"

"Could I...ask you for a strange favor?"

The ghost king hums, leaning his chin on top of Xie Lian's head for a moment. "Anything."

Xie Lian closes his eyes, fighting the urge to--

"...Could you summon one of your butterflies?"

He doesn't seem bothered--just surprised as he complies.

Clink!

Xie Lian turns his head when he feels the creature land lightly on his shoulder, one of its wings gently bumping against his cheek.

"...Can I ask why?" Hua Cheng murmurs, watching the look on the prince's face curiously.

Xie Lian doesn't reply.

He just stares at the silver light emanating from it's wings.

Because he can't see him. He can't hear his heartbeat, or the pace of his breath.

He tilts his head to the side, allowing those wings to brush against his cheek once more.

But when he hears the sound of silver bells, or sees the ethereal glow of wraith butterflies--

Xie Lian knows he's alright.

He's here.

(San Lang is here.)

When it becomes clear that the prince isn't going to answer, Hua Cheng takes a different tact.

He reaches forward, taking the side of Xie Lian's face in his hand, guiding his god to look back toward him.

"If it makes gege feel better, I'll let him in on a secret," he murmurs, stroking his thumb over Xie Lian's cheek.

The god stares up at him blindly, waiting.

In these brief moments when they're alone, when no one can see the look in his eyes, Hua Cheng tries to take the chance to take him in.

To etch every line of that face even deeper into his memory, watching him with open adoration.

"No matter what happens to me--I won't leave this world," he murmurs, watching Xie Lian's parted lips, his chest aching with longing.

"...Even if your soul dispersed?" The prince whispers, feeling slightly doubtful.

"Even then," Hua Cheng assures him gently. "I would always come back."

That takes Xie Lian back to when Hua Cheng leapt into the Sinner's Pit, those words he gave to Xie Lian before disappearing below.

'Don't worry, gege.'

'I'll always come back.'

"...How?"

Hearing that from anyone else, Xie Lian might have felt patronized. He isn't a child. He understands death and loss better than most.

Except for a ghost, maybe.

(No one mourns like a ghost.)

But Hua Cheng sounds...sincere.

"Because," he shrugs. "I still have something precious to me in this world."

Xie Lian pauses, leaning back to tilt his head to the side, his eyes narrowing. Why...does that sound so familiar?

Hua Cheng stares down at him, not saying a word, watching the wheels move in his head.

And they do.

They spin faster and faster, reaching top speeds—

...And they go speeding in the wrong direction.

"Right," Xie Lian swallows hard. "That...right."

The person he fell for when he was a child.

The beautiful, intelligent, generous stranger that he loves.

That's when it also starts to dawn on him:

Xie Lian just gave him mouth to mouth, then proceeded to mope about, thinking about how he wished Hua Cheng would breathe, because...

...Ghosts don't need air.

"...Uh..."

"...Dianxia? Is something wrong?"

"...I'm so sorry," he mumbles, stumbling back out of Hua Cheng's arms, scrambling to his feet.

"Gege—?"

"I—I WAS JUST—!"

Hua Cheng leaps to his feet to hurry after him, worried by the panicked tone in Xie Lian's voice.

"What?!"

"...I THOUGHT YOU NEEDED AIR!"

Your highness, just calm down—"

That's not even remotely possible for Xie Lian, who feels almost delirious with guilt and embarrassment, charging blindly through the woods.

"I'M SO SORRY!"

"YOUR HIGHNESS, YOU CAN'T RUN OFF HERE!"

Like hell he can't!

What was he thinking?!

He can't even imagine how bad that looks—particularly after Hua Cheng had JUST told him that he was in love with someone, and not so long ago, Xie Lian had practically batting his eyelashes and insisting 'mouth to mouth didn't count as a kiss' so Hua Cheng would—would—

There's also another fairly obvious drawback to charging through a forest you've never been in before while blind and emotionally distressed, therefore not paying attention to your surroundings...

THUNK!

Xie Lian slams face first into the tree, so hard, his arms are still sticking straight out, and he goes flying backwards.

CRACK!

BOOM!

And the tree, a sizable specimen, comes crashing down.

That would all be bad enough, but no.

It doesn't stop there.

Before he can hit the ground, he lands back in Hua Cheng's arms—but this time he has a bruised forehead and a bloody nose.

"...I'm so—"

"I know you were just trying to help me," Hua Cheng assures him, a deep frown settling across his face.

He says that, but he sounds unhappy.

Before Xie Lian can question that, because Hua Cheng does seem bothered by something, he—

He feels the Ghost King's lips press against his forehead, and his heart leaps all the way into his throat.

"San L—!"

Then, his lips are on the bridge of his nose, and Xie Lian lets out something that sounds somewhere between a yelp and a death rattle.

"There," Hua Cheng mutters, placing both hands on Xie Lian's shoulders as he spins him around, walking him back towards the beach.

When Xie Lian reaches up to touch his nose, he can feel that it's no longer bleeding— honestly, it was probably broken before, so—

So obviously, that's what Hua Cheng was doing.

"...Thank you, San Lang," he mumbles, still feeling somewhat mortified.

The calamity doesn't immediately respond, guiding Xie Lian to sit down on a fallen palm log on the beach.

"You can thank me by staying still," he mutters, straightening up. "This place isn't safe."

Xie Lian falls silent, listening as Hua Cheng walks away, hands in his lap.

Rarely does Hua Cheng ever try to tell him what to do—so, if he's doing it now—

He must be really worried.

In any case, the butterfly stays with him, sitting in Xie Lian's lap, crawling over his hand when he offers it, wings beating gently.

Xie Lian watches it, taking quiet comfort in its gentle glow.

After a minute or so, Hua Cheng returns, his wet outer robes stripped off, the tree Xie Lian knocked down with, well—

(His skull.)

—propped up on one shoulder.

He drops it down onto the sand with a low thud!

He extends one arm out, palm flat, and Xie Lian can see the brief glow of spiritual power as he activates a magical array.

"...You can use that here?" He perks up, hopeful. "Can you communicate with the outside? We could go get reinforcements—"

"Sorry, gege," Hua Cheng shakes his head. "It's not that kind of array." He reaches his hand inside, pulling out an ax. "It's storage."

"...Oh," Xie Lian mumbles, feeling slightly crestfallen. "That makes sense."

At first, he thinks Hua Cheng might plan on using the tree for firewood—but that turns out to be necessary.

Crack!

With a simple snap of his fingers, a campfire sparks to life, warming him without any visible source.

"Hold out your hands for me."

The prince obeys without question, and Hua Cheng hands him a fish skewered on a stick, roasted to perfection—(likely by magic.)

"Oh," Xie Lian blinks, "You should eat first, I really don't need—"

"Only one of us needs food to survive," Hua Cheng speaks over him.

As he says this, he drops a handful of berries into Xie Lian's other waiting palm.

"...I don't need to eat to survive—" Xie Lian starts, prepared to go onto the same train of thought as he did with Lang Qiangqiu and Shuo a few weeks before in the shrine, but—

"Can you stay in proper fighting condition without eating a certain amount?" Xie Lian stops, his mouth hanging open—because he's got him there.

Hua Cheng straightens up, turning back to the tree, stripping it of limbs and bark, cutting into usable planks.

"But I—"

"—haven't eaten in two days." Hua Cheng mutters, making Xie Lian feel slightly chagrined. "In a place like this, you'll need your strength. Make sure to eat it all."

And instead of arguing anymore, Xie Lian relents, picking pieces of fish from the bone, chewing thoughtfully.

"...What are you doing?" He wonders quietly, listening to the sound of sawing and hammering.

“We have…” He thinks it over, glancing up to evaluate the position of the stars in the sky. “A three hour window to get out of here, give or take. And there’s only one way out.”

Xie Lian chews on another bite before popping a berry into his mouth. “…Where’s here, exactly?”

“Black Water Island,” Hua Cheng lays out the newly hewn planks. “Blackwater rules the eastern sea—but this is his actual lair.”

“…And why is the window two hours?”

Hua Cheng kneels down, measuring out the proportions he needs.

“I take it you’re aware of the fact that the Water Master is also worshipped as a moon goddess?” Xie Lian nods, and he continues, “It’s a full moon tonight.”

A harvest moon, actually.

It hangs over the sky like a golden locket, making it easy to see clearly.

“Even in Blackwater’s Lair, he’ll be able to defend himself and the others until sunrise,” Hua Cheng explains.

The reminder of Shi Wudu makes Xie Lian frown, his chewing slowing down.

“…I need to speak to the Water Master before we make an escape,” Xie Lian mutters, his expression grim. “There’s something he doesn’t know.”

Hua Cheng pauses in his work, turning to look over his shoulder, watching Xie Lian’s expression closely.

“…What do you mean?”

The firelight highlights the planes and shadows of his face in stark contrast—and now, his shackles have an almost eerie glow to them.

“I didn’t say before, because I didn’t want to frighten Shi Qingxuan,” Xie Lian pops another berry into his mouth.

“But there’s more to the fate switching spell than the Water Master knows.”

Because whomever taught him such a thing—Xie Lian doubts it was a well meaning teacher, warning him of the cost.

Hua Cheng's hands go still.

"...Meaning?"

"The suffering of the victims of a fate switching spell always rebounds on its caster," Xie Lian explains, chills running down his spine as he contemplates what that would mean for the Water Master. "And if Scholar He's story is completely accurate, then..."

Xie Lian can't say he isn't horrified by the Water Master's actions—or that he doesn't believe that Shi Wudu is deserving of punishment for what he's done, but—

No one deserves...

Hua Cheng listens to him explain, the bitter taste of repulsion building on his tongue.

"...It's very likely that the Water Master is going to be raped."

Or, that's already happened.

After all—He Xuan's fiancé and sister were victims of the fate switch as well.

Just saying the words makes Xie Lian feel a little sick, but he forces himself to continue.

"He'll be forced to watch unimaginable suffering, and then..." Xie Lian swallows hard. "He'll drown."

It seems ludicrous, imagining a scenario where the Water Master could drown.

But still, if the story is to be believed...

(And Xie Lian does believe it.)

...That's Shi Wudu's fate.

Hua Cheng is quiet for a moment, thinking.

"Would telling him spare him, you think?"

“...I don’t actually know,” Xie Lian admits. “I don’t think it can be stopped.”

“Then maybe it’s best if he doesn’t know,” Hua Cheng murmurs, going back to his task.

“If it were me, I’d rather not live in fear of something I can’t prevent.”

Xie Lian doesn’t know which he’d rather have. Either option seems horrible, but...

“In any case, if we get out of here, the emperor can send a horde of reinforcement. Shi Wudu is his favorite, right?”

“Right...” Xie Lian agrees—but even still. If Blackwater is stronger than even Hua Cheng here, he isn’t sure if there are enough reinforcements in the world to make a difference. “...And what are you building, exactly?”

“I already told dianxia,” Hua Cheng shrugs.

“There’s only one thing that floats in Blackwater’s territory.”

A coffin.

“...But that’s just a regular tree you’re using,” Xie LIan tilts his head. “How is that going to—?”

“We happen to have a dead man on hand,” Hua Cheng points out.

“Once I lay down in it, it’s a coffin.”

Xie Lian can’t argue with that logic—even if he’s slightly daunted by the prospect.

“...It can’t be worse than the last time I was in a coffin,” he offers, trying to make light of the situation, but—

Hua Cheng isn’t laughing.

“If there was another way, I wouldn’t force dianxia to relive that.” He mutters, seeming torn, and Xie Lian shakes his head.

“It won’t be like reliving it at all, really.” He assured him. “You’ll be with me.” Back then, it was the silence that was the most difficult to bear.

Hua Cheng doesn't seem completely comforted by that fact, but he doesn't argue. And as he works, Xie Lian finishes his food in silence, his mind drifting in other directions.

"...San Lang?"

His reply is immediate;

"Yes?

"How come you haven't won that person over yet?"

That beautiful, intelligent, perfect...

"...Well, dianxia already knows," Hua Cheng shrugs, his eyes far away. "I met him when I was very young. I don't know if he ever saw me as more than a child."

"...Even now?" Xie Lian raises an eyebrow. "But you're close to my age."

"Yes," Hua Cheng agrees with a faint smile. "But he hasn't seen me in a long time. And..." he sighs, sitting back.

"He really saw me at my worst," he mutters, turning his head to look into the fire.

"...Your worst?" Xie Lian questions, struggling to imagine.

There's no mirth to Hua Cheng's smile anymore, his eyes burning with self loathing.

"I...was so weak back then," he mutters, disgust burning in every syllable. "I was worse than useless."

Hearing Hua Cheng speak that way about himself...

It hurts more than Xie Lian expected.

"...Then I envy them."

His response makes Hua Cheng stop to look up at him, nearly stopping his work completely.

"...You do?"

"If a person told me they loved me..." Xie Lian sighs. "I don't think I would have believed them unless they saw me at my worst."

Even Hong'er didn't see how low he could truly stoop—but even still. He wouldn't have left, even if Xie Lian had tried to push him away. He knows that.

"...That's really how you feel?" Hua Cheng questions quietly.

Xie Lian reaches up, grasping the chain around his neck. "...You know, I don't know if there's ever been a person who was loved as much as I was, back when I was strong," Xie Lian explains quietly. "But I grew up with that. I was raised to expect it. I felt...entitled to it."

He had never known anything less than utter adoration.

"But..." Xie Lian smiles faintly, shaking his head. "I don't think there was anyone who ever made me feel quite as loved as the boy who stayed beside me when I was at my weakest."

Even if Hua Cheng needed to breathe, he would have stopped by now.

"And he wasn't wealthy," Xie Lian adds, twisting the ring between his fingers. "Or powerful, or anything like that. Actually—knowing him, he would probably say the same thing as you: that he felt useless. But..."

Xie Lian sets aside the stick, having finished his fish.

Now, he holds Hong'er with both hands, leaning closer to the fire for warmth.

"He meant the world to me."

When Hua Cheng speaks again—his voice is oddly quiet.

"...It really didn't matter to you?"

"What didn't?"

"That he was weak."

"He was never weak," Xie Lian corrects him softly. "But yes."

To this day—Hong'er was the strongest person he had ever met.

"I guess...the best way to phrase it would be..." Xie Lian sighs, spinning the ring a little faster.

"...The one basking in infinite glory is you. The one that's fallen from Grace is also you."

The ring comes to a halt between his fingers, flashing in the moonlight.

"What matters is you—not the state of you." He concludes quietly. "I..." He struggles for a moment, trying to phrase his words carefully. "I really admire San Lang, so I'm jealous of anyone who got to see you at your best, and your worst. They're a really lucky person."

It's then that he seems to remember to feel self conscious, rubbing the back of his neck.

"...But I suppose all of that must sound pretty silly."

"It doesn't," Hua Cheng replies quickly, shaking his head. Something about him sounds distinctly...unsettled, though not in a bad way.

"But...I'm the lucky one," he reaches down, tracing a fingertip through the sand, staring into the fire. "Just having any place in his heart, even if it isn't the same kind of attachment as the kind I have for him...that's more than enough for me."

"...Really?"

Hua Cheng's finger digs deeper into the sand, grains digging roughly underneath his fingernail, but still, he claws deeper, speaking evenly, even when his eyes sting with emotions that won't break through.

"Even if I was nothing more than a happy memory, I'd be grateful."

He's done nothing to convince Xie Lian that his beloved isn't the lucky one.

Xie Lian knows what it's like to be loved so selflessly, and it's a greater blessing than anything the Heavens have to offer.

"...But I have something to ask you, gege." He looks up.

"What is it?"

"After you came to Ghost City for the first time, when I was taking you away from the Heavens..."

(A generous way of phrasing a situation that was half rescue, half abduction.) "He said you had a husband."

Xie Lian stiffens, his complexion immediately turning splotchy and red.

“Oh, I…” He swallows hard, and Hua Cheng—

He just goes and makes it worse.

“And it’s not the first time I heard of dianxia having a husband, so I wasn’t sure if that was your method of letting him down gently.”

“I—you heard what?” Xie Lian croaks, fighting the urge to turn around and bury his entire head in the sand.

Hua Cheng reaches down, twisting the bead braided into the end of his hair. “I didn’t realize it at the time, but I put it together later.”

(He isn’t above telling a white lie, here and there.)

“I encountered a cultivation master during my travels by the name of Jiang Chi,” he explains. “He told me that his teacher had been the love of his life, but refused to marry him—all because he was mourning a husband.”

“…He said I was the love of his life?” The prince mutters, feeling slightly mortified.

“He did,” Hua Cheng eyes his face closely. “So, it made me wonder.”

“Wonder what?”

“Have you ever been married?”

“…” Xie Lian pulls his knees up, shaking his head.

“No,” he whispers. “No, there was just…someone I wanted to be with, when I was younger,” Xie Lian explains carefully, reaching down to fiddle with the ends of his hair. “And we never got the chance to…And he was gone before I realized…”

“…That you were in love with him?” Hua Cheng questions.

His tone is calm—detached—but his expression is anything but.

And when Xie Lian nods, he looks as though he’s been kicked in the gut.

“Did anyone else know?”

"I told Mu Qing," he twists his finger, winding a lock of hair around it. "...But I ended up regretting that," he admits

Instead of expanding on that, however, his expression darkens.

"...And I think Bai Wuxiang knew," he mutters, wrapping his arms around his knees.

"What makes you say that?" Hua Cheng asks him quietly.

"Because...he used him to hurt me," Xie Lian whispers.

And now, they're both remembering two very separate things.

Xie Lian is thinking back on how he was forced to relive that day, over and over again.

How Bai Wuxiang wore Hong'er's face more than once.

Even in the temple, when they were...

But Hua Cheng—

All he can think about is one of his worst memories.

Being a ghost fire, unable to speak, unable to step in.

Watching the love of his life in tears, being kissed on the banks of a river by Bai Wuxiang...

...Wearing the face of his former bodyguard. Feng Xin.

"...And I guess I just kept on saying that afterwards, because if he had asked me to marry him...I would have said yes," Xie Lian admits, knowing how silly it must sound. "And I—for some reason, I do get proposals often."

"For some reason," Hua Cheng repeats faintly.

"Yes, and I just...for so long after that, I never felt that way about anyone else."

Talking about it is difficult—and Xie Lian has never been comfortable enough to confide in someone like this, but—

Just admitting it, getting it off of his chest—it feels like a relief.

“Eventually, I started to feel like I never would…and it was comforting, imagining a scenario where…”

“Where you were together,” Hua Cheng finishes for him, oddly quiet.

Xie Lian nods, letting his hair slip from his finger.

“…And do you still feel like you never will?”

There’s a long, long beat of silence. One where Xie Lian keeps his face turned away from him, constantly fiddling with the chain around his neck.

When it becomes clear the prince isn’t going to answer—Hua Cheng drops the subject, rising to his feet.

“We should get moving.”

“Oh?” Xie Lian looks up, letting the ring slip back underneath his robes. “Is it ready?”

“It’s the best I could do on short notice,” Hua Cheng nods, lifting the coffin with one hand, using the other to help Xie Lian walk to the shore. “It’ll have to work.”

He says that, but Xie Lian has absolutely no doubt that it’s most likely meticulously crafted.

Hua Cheng is remarkably skilled at anything he tries, really. Cooking, fighting, carpentry—it makes one wonder where and why he learned…

“Here,” Hua Cheng steps inside first, laying down on his back as he guides Xie Lian to step in and join him. “It’ll be a tight fit, but…”

At first, Xie Lian isn’t particularly concerned by that. After all, they’ve shared a bed plenty of times, how bad could it—?

Then, when he starts kneeling down—

He realizes there isn’t enough room for them to lie side by side, even if both of them are on their sides. The only way for him to get in is to, well…

Lay on top of Hua Cheng. Which he struggles to do.

At first, he tries to place his knees on either side of Hua Cheng’s hips

—but the coffin is too narrow, and the size of his thighs doesn't allow for it.

The only thing he can really do is place one knee between Hua Cheng's leg, essentially...straddling his thigh.

He carefully lowers himself, wishing there was a way he could brace his arms that would keep his weight off of him—but there really isn't.

Hua Cheng eyes him carefully—seeming to completely misinterpret the reason for Xie Lian's nerves.

"You're sure it won't be too much for you?" He asks quietly.

Referring to, of course, Xie Lian's prior experience with being in a coffin.

Xie Lian shakes his head quickly, clearing his throat.

Normally, he might have been, but in this situation, he's so distracted...

"No," Xie Lian mutters, "Like I said, it's not the same if you're with me, just..."

Hua Cheng waits, giving him all of the time he needs to formulate his response—

"...Could you lend me some spiritual power?" He asks, biting his lip.

"If something happens and we go into the water again, I don't want you end up hurt trying to—"

He falls silent when Hua Cheng leans up on his elbows, pressing their foreheads together, a gentle warmth passing between them.

"It's no trouble, and I won't get hurt," Hua Cheng assures him gently, even as Xie Lian fights the urge to pull away, his heart stuttering. "But I don't want gege to worry."

"...Thank you," Xie Lian whispers hoarsely as he leans back down.

Once they're both settled in, the coffin lid swings shut with a heavy creak—and with a flick of Hua Cheng's wrist, the heavy wooden box is pushed into the water.

And for all of the currents and waves around them—Hua Cheng was right, it's perfectly buoyant.

Actually—despite being inside an enclosed space, Xie Lian finds himself, for the most part, rather comfortable.

He's not laying on the hard wooden surface of the bottom of the coffin, after all—and with Hua Cheng's arms cradling the small of his back, he feels very secure.

It's just…

"…San Lang?" He mumbles, his voice slightly muffled by Hua Cheng's robes.

"Hmm?" The ghost king hums, his chest rumbling slightly under Xie Lian's cheek.

(This does nothing to help this odd, squirming feeling in the pit of the prince's stomach.)

"Wouldn't this be easier if we switched?" He mumbles, feeling slightly self conscious.

"What do you mean?"

"With you on top, and me on the bottom."

Hua Cheng raises an eyebrow, staring at the coffin lid overhead.

"Does top or bottom really make that much of a difference?"

"I-Um—Well—" Xie Lian clears his throat again, "I'm a martial god, I know…I'm pretty heavy, and the body you're wearing right now is only eighteen or nineteen, correct? That can't be—"

Then, their predicament—well, Xie Lian's predicament—gets even worse.

Because Xie Lian has always been aware of the fact that Hua Cheng was taller—and… more muscular—than his teenage form, but—

Feeling his body grow and shift against him, making the coffin even more cramped than it was—

"San Lang!" He cries, his voice cracking slightly.

"Don't just go and make yourself bigger all of the sudden!" He wishes he sounded more scolding, but—

Really, it sounds more like he's whining, especially when Hua Cheng's forearms—now substantially more muscular—tighten around his back.

"Still worried about being too heavy?"

After a moment of Xie Lian struggling to respond, a sly, teasing smile curves the ghost king's lips.

"Or is this about what you told me the other day in Puqi village?"

It takes Xie Lian a moment to understand what he means, and when he does—

'How did you imagine it?'

Xie Lian's eyes go wide open, and he chokes on his own breath.

'O-On top of me...'

"SAN LANG!" He cries, trying to cover his face with his hands—but that's hard to do in this position, so—

He just buries his head in Hua Cheng's chest, mortified. "Don't tease me right now!"

Hua Cheng only laughs quietly in response, his palm flattening against the small of Xie Lian's back, rubbing slow circles with his thumb.

"Sorry, sorry, forgive this impudent one..." He smiles.

Xie Lian frowns, not lifting his head from the ghost king's chest.

He doesn't sound sorry, and Xie Lian isn't sure if he's feeling all that forgiving.

But he does take advantage of the moment of silence to try and readjust, pressing his leg up slightly as he tries to lift himself up—

Only for one of Hua Cheng's hands to flash down from his back, grabbing his hip in an iron grip, forcing a choked sound of surprise from Xie Lian's throat.

"Don't move," the ghost king growls, making Xie Lian jump. "Wh—?"

"Something's noticed us."

Before Xie Lian can ask what, something smacks into the side of the coffin—sending it spinning around until he can't tell which way is up or down, Hua Cheng holding him tightly until they settle, and—

This time, it leaves Hua Cheng pressing down on top of him.

Which is an entirely different sensation than what he was feeling before.

All he could think about back then was trying to make himself as small and unobtrusive as possible--worried about whether or not Hua Cheng was comfortable, if he was too heavy, and now...

Hua Cheng is heavy on top of him, but not in an uncomfortable way. He can still breathe easily, he isn't in any pain, but...

But Hua Cheng's thigh, built with seemingly nothing but firm muscle, is pressed firmly between Xie Lian's legs.

Pressed there .

"..."

Xie Lian's face is still smushed against Hua Cheng's chest, but his eyes are wide open, silently panicking.

The ghost king, however, seems to be too focused on the threat from the outside to notice Xie Lian's distress.

"You had better hold onto me, your highness." He mutters, his eye narrowing as he extends a protective barrier around the coffin, silently cursing black water with every thought he has to spear, launching a number of swears into their private array, knowing that He Xuan isn't listening.

It's been 'stay out of this' and 'don't get in my way' this whole fucking time, and the moment Hua Cheng actually does manage to get his god to leave the situation willingly, they get dragged back by He Xuan's demented fucking pets .

'I'm going to kill you.'

He glares at the surface of the coffin as they're rattled again, bracing his arms over Xie Lian's head to avoid hurting him, even if their bodies are still slammed together to some extent.

'Your first death is going to look like a vacation when I'm done with your worthless—!'

SLAM!

The prince lets out a ratting gasp, his arms clutching at Hua Cheng's shoulders when the coffin is hit with another barrage, and Hua Cheng's focus on declaring his vengeance is momentarily broken.

"Are you alright, dianxia?!"

"I-I'm fine!"

Xie Lian whispers, his voice low, because he's worried if he speaks any louder, it might break. "Just--what do we do if the coffin breaks?"

"...Just hold onto me," Hua Cheng repeats, "I won't let you sink."

"I...I know..."

Assured that Xie Lian isn't in pain, Hua Cheng goes back to splitting his attention between defending the coffin, and threatening He Xuan.

'You're not going to have to worry about fucking your arch nemesis's little sister anymore, because I'm going to castrate you.'

SLAM!

'I'm going to make you walk around with your balls hanging around your neck like a nice little accessory so you can explain to anyone who asks what a DUMB ASS MOTHERFUCKER YOU ARE—!"

SLAM!

"Ah!"

"Are you hurt?!"

"N-No!"

'I'm going to find a way to resurrect you from the dead, eviscerate you, feed you your own entrails, watch you die, then BRING YOU BACK TO START ALL OVER AGAIN—!'

And then, on top of everything else—Xie Lian won't stop squirming.

"Don't move!" He doesn't mean to snap, but...

...Xie Lian can't do this.

He can't do this.

What's...

He flattens his legs, wishing desperately that he could close his knees, but that's not possible in this scenario.

What's wrong with him?!

He's NEVER had this issue before, except, well—

The first time that Hua Cheng helped him heal his injuries to his arm, after escaping the Heavens.

Is it just because—he's attracted to him?

And why, in eight centuries, is the first person he's been actively attracted to the one he ends up in this sort of situation with?!

It's not as though Xie Lian has never had those feelings before, or that he's never been...visibly aroused, but...

Never in front of another person, and always when he was a teenager. Even the last time he was...excited, around Hua Cheng—they were interrupted before it got to...

This point.

Where Xie Lian is pressing as far back against the coffin floor as he can, his heart pounding.

And there's this...pulsing feeling, like a second heartbeat, but...

...Down there.

And this coiling heat in his stomach that's getting worse and worse every time something slams into the coffin.

It leaves him feeling somewhat frantic.

Because each time he makes a noise, or cries out—Hua Cheng checks in on him to make sure he's alright. And the next time that happens, he's—

He's going to notice.

There's no way he won't.

And in that case, Xie Lian is going to have to die.

Probably by repeatedly smashing his head into the side of the coffin. Or by simply swimming down to the bottom of the ocean and starting a new life. He'd be a pretty decent crustacean, given the chance.

And this—

It's going to look so, so bad.

Maybe he could have gotten away with calling it an embarrassing natural reaction before, but—

Can he get away with that after giving him unnecessary mouth to mouth, asking him about sexual positions, and telling Hua Cheng he was JEALOUS of his beloved?!

He can't, he—he can't!

SLAM!

And this time, when the coffin gets slammed into from above, forcing Hua Cheng to crush down on top of him, Xie Lian—

He panics.

This time, Hua Cheng doesn't ask if Xie Lian is alright, or if it the god is hurt— This time, he—

"..."

It's silent in the coffin.

Xie Lian is silent, heart galloping at breakneck speeds, and Hua Cheng--

When he speaks, his voice is low, muted, almost—

Almost small, as he croaks out one word, sounding unusually lacking in composure.

"Why?"

"...Um...I thought..."

Xie Lian bites her lip.

She doesn't blush often. Actually, until recently, she went centuries without getting even a little bit hot under the ears.

"...Changing into a smaller form might make it less...cramped," She lies, her words rushed with embarrassment.

Around Hua Cheng, however—she's blushed more in a matter of months than she probably has in her entire life.

But nothing quite compares to the heat in her face right now.

"..."

"S...San Lang?" She questions, feeling guilty for springing this on him, but...

What else was she supposed to do?! At that point, it was a life, death, or starting a new life as a deep sea crab sort of decision!

At least now, regardless of what she's feeling, it's not...Visible.

"...That was very considerate," Hua Cheng's voice is oddly stiff.

"Jiejie really does think of everything."

There's something about hearing him say 'jiejie' that makes Xie Lian's heart pound even faster.

Of course, there's one drawback that she notices at first, because while most of her got smaller...one part of her didn't.

Her chest, which is pressed tightly against Hua Cheng's.

Hua Cheng finally looks down at her face, his eye hungrily scanning a new iteration of goddess, committing the sight to memory. And just like her male form—

She's gut wrenchingly beautiful.

But looking down was a critical error.

Because while his only intention was to take in Xie Lian's face, he—

Once again, Xie Lian changed nothing about the shape or fit of her robes when she switched forms. Meaning the front...doesn't cover...in a decent manner...

"San L—?" Xie Lian starts, finding him oddly quiet, but—

Then, out of nowhere, the ghost king's thigh–which had already been settled between hers—presses up suddenly and firmly , pushing her higher up against the coffin wall, and—

(Away from Hua Cheng's now 'visible' problem.)

"H-Hah—!" She sucks in a shuddering breath, discovering, much to her misery—

Just because she isn't a man, the...tension...in her gut hasn't disappeared. Now, that throbbing is even more concentrated, and it—

"What are you—!"

SLAM!

This jolt makes his knee—not by his own intention, he would never do such a thing intentionally—drag up and against her, and all the while–

Hua Cheng's hand curls into a fist, braced over her head, and he barely manages to hiss through clenched teeth—

"Stay still!"

He seems extremely focused, probably on getting them to safety, Xie Lian can feel his spiritual power pulsing around her, and—

She's an awful person.

Trembling—all over, but particularly her thighs—unable to control her breathing with gasping or making mortifying sounds, so she—

She just makes the decision to stop breathing all together, which only makes the shivering more noticeable.

"...Jiejie?"

'Don't.'

"W...What?"

'Please don't call me that right now.'

"Be honest..." Hua Cheng mutters, his teeth clenched, eye squeezed shut—

Feeling like the most selfish man to ever exist, all while Xie Lian is silently panicking–

"...Is it getting to you?"

"...What?" She croaks.

"I-I don't know what you're—!"

"I know you said you'd be alright because I was with you," Hua Cheng mutters, sounding so guilty, and—

Oh.

"But if this is too stressful for you..."

Oh.

Xie Lian's hands tighten around his shoulders.

She's an awful, awful person.

Her hands tighten around Hua Cheng's shoulders, trembling.

"...Yes," She whispers, lying through her teeth–but her voice is so unsteady, it's completely believable. "I'm—I'm scared," she whimpers, "I—"

SLAM!

"I'm really, really scared!"

She buries her face in his chest, taking deep, unsteady gasps, terrified to exhale, because she doesn't know what sounds are going to come out of her mouth next, and–

And telling Hua Cheng that was a mistake.

It was the worst mistake she ever could have made.

Because now, Hua Cheng's other hand comes down to cup the back of her head, stroking her hair, guiding Xie Lian to press her face into his shoulder.

(Mistaking one type of unsteady breathing for frightened hyperventilation.)

And when he speaks again, his voice is right next to her ear—so low, gentle, and soothing.

"It's alright," he whispers. "I'm right here, I won't leave you.”

Oh—

SLAM!

The next press of his thigh makes her stomach twist in—

An undeniably wonderful way.

"You're safe."

A shudder runs through her, and Hua Cheng hushes beside her ear, his hand sliding down and underneath her, rubbing against her back.

"Relax for me."

There's something deep and authoritative about his tone, and Xie Lian feels herself drowning in guilt, because—

He's just trying to help, because Xie Lian told him that she was afraid. She—

Xie Lian lets out a pitchy little sigh, forcing her muscles to unclench, and when they do—that includes the muscles in her thighs.

Which leaves her weight fully settled against Hua Cheng's leg.

A few more tiny, muffled noises escape her as Hua Cheng hushes her, gently reminding her to breathe.

She's the worst person alive.

Lower than scum, honestly.

Her fingers claw into the back of his robes, clinging so tightly and—

SLAM!

This time, the attack on the coffin is unrelenting, and without either of them moving intentionally—

It leaves Xie Lian's hips being moved up and down against his thigh, over and over again in an inconsistent, maddening rhythm.

Her stomach keeps coiling and tensing, like it's building up to something that she needs, that she might explode if she doesn't get, even if she has no idea what it is—then, the coffin shifts angles, or the attacks change, and it fades, only to buildup again—

She's horrible. She—

She deserves another thousand years of banishment just for this. Or maybe another cursed shackle. But—

She presses her face deeper into Hua Cheng's shoulder, her toes curling inside her boots.

Xie Lian would be lying if she said she wanted it to stop. And for once, in her long, mostly miserable life, Xie Lian—

She does something extremely selfish. Objectively awful, considering the fact that Hua Cheng genuinely doesn't seem to understand what's actually going on—

She...

...Does exactly what he told her to do.

Relaxes.

Her shoulders limp but trembling as any sound she makes is muffled by the thundering crashing outside, the rest of it caught in Hua Cheng's shoulder.

Her eyes are open now, but half lidded, going hazy as her breaths start to hitch.

And she's learning something else now. Something she never needed to know about women, because she never planned on being with one —

(Never planned on being one, either.)

But the longer this goes on, the easier it gets for her robes to slide against her with his thigh.

And with that—

It feels even better, even if there's something mortifying about slick fabric dragging over such a sensitive place, over and over again.

Part of her briefly panics, wondering if he can feel it, but—

Her robes were already wet before they got in the coffin. She—

It feels like she's getting closer to that feeling again, even if she's not sure what it is or what it means, it's—it's good, it's so, so good, and she doesn't want it to stop, even if there's an ache for something...more.

Almost like a need to fill a void.

A sense of emptiness that she's never felt before, and doesn't understand now. Is this something that women just...feel? It's—

SLAM!

Her eyes roll back into her head, her stomach tensing.

But that's okay, if it--if it feels like this, it's more than okay, as long as it doesn't—

"Jiejie," Hua Cheng speaks up suddenly and her mind scrambles, trying to form a coherent thought, "Hold on!"

Wait, no, no, she's—!

CRASH!

Then, it's absolutely freezing.

Xie Lian doesn't have the frame of mind to remember to hold her breath, inhaling sea water immediately on her first gasp, and just as she begins to choke, she feels Hua Cheng's arms tighten around her.

He—He wasn't kidding about the currents before—they're strong!

It feels like being sucked down a drain, even as Hua Cheng's arms remain locked tightly around her middle--and this time, she's able to use the spiritual power he lent her to extend a protective barrier around both of them, and eventually, they crash back onto the shore.

Xie Lian fumbles, reaching up to make sure that Hua Cheng is still conscious—and when she feels that he's up and moving—

She rolls onto her hands and knees, hacking up sea water into the sand as Hua Cheng pats her back.

"Well," General Pei's voice makes them both stiffen. "If it isn't Crimson Rain Sought Flower..."

Ah, so Hua Cheng did switch back to his original form…

"...And the Crown Princess of Xianle."

ANNOUNCEMENT:

The first chapter of the comic adaptation was released today by Imaginary Canvas! You can access the entire thing through twitter! Imaginary did an amazing job, thanks so much to them for the hard work!!

READ HERE

A Good Man

Chapter Summary

> Pei looks at the surface of the water, the hairs on the back of his neck sticking straight up.
>
> “That,” he points, his tone conclusive, “is a trap.”
>
> Even if he doesn’t know what’s going on—he can see that much.
>
> “...It is,” Shi Wudu agrees, his eyes unmoving. “But it’s pretty straight forward.”
>
> After all, who would go for something so obvious?
>
> From behind them, Ming Yi leans against a tree, his eyes flashing gold in the dark, his arms crossed.
>
> And a slow, satisfied smirk spreads across his lips.

Chapter Notes

> this chapter is long, but it's a VERY important one, and a doozy! good luck!
>
> content warnings: violence

See the end of the chapter for more notes

Her face, even as she's pale and shivering, flushes red.

From beside him, Shi Wudu doesn't seem particularly amused, snapping his fan shut.

"We don't have time for this," he mutters, his mouth pulled into a tight frown. "I didn't pull you back here after that coffin shattered just to stand around and gawk at her."

"...You were the one who pulled us back in?" Xie Lian straightens up, squeezing the water out of her hair. "I thought you couldn't control the currents here?"

"Full moon," Shi Wudu mutters, "I pulled water in from the west."

"He's a genius, if you don't recall."

Xie Lian does–but still, to manage such a thing in Blackwater's lair is still impressive.

"Thank you," She murmurs, trying to rub some warmth back in her arms, and—

She nearly jumps out of her skin when she hears Hua Cheng let out a snarl, yanking her behind him.

"What are you looking at?" He hisses, glaring in the direction of...

Ming Yi, who simply crosses his arms over his chest, raising an eyebrow.

"Isn't that a little hypocritical?"

After the show he made of staring at Shi Qingxuan's bare chest in ghost city, it's what he gets.

Never mind the fact that Xie Lian is soaked from head to toe, and wearing ill fitting white robes.

Ming Yi wasn't the only one looking—he was simply being less subtle than Pei Ming. "..."

Hua Cheng extends his arm out, opening the array he used to retrieve the ax before, when he needed to construct the coffin—this time, pulling out a black outer robe, holding it out behind him so Xie Lian can cover herself in something warm and dry.

"Here, your highness."

"...Thank you, San Lang," Xie Lian murmurs—wishing she hadn't been seen by the others in such a state, but it can't be helped.

In any case, it only takes her a moment to use the spell to change back, wrapping the new outer robe around himself as he clears his throat.

“We were just...it was cramped in the coffin, so I...”

Pei Ming raises an eyebrow. “Didn’t you build it for the two of you to escape? Why not make it bigger?”

Xie Lian scratches the back of his head, his nerves slightly frayed after that encounter.

“I…well…”

Shi Wudu’s eye twitches. “We don’t have time for this!” He snaps. “We still can’t find Shi Qingxuan, and sunrise isn’t far now!”

“What?” Xie Lian stops, concerned. “I thought she was with Pei!”

“She was,” the general agrees. “Then Ming Yi and Shi Wudu caught up with us, and…”

“She disappeared,” Shi Wudu concludes, clutching the golden locket around his neck, his tone frantic. “You can see spiritual energy, can’t you?”

The question is directed towards Xie Lian, who glances up, surprised. “I can, but…”

“Can you use it to track her?!”

Xie Lian scans the area, narrowing his eyes with concentration.

“It would have been easier before,” he mutters, “she lost so much spiritual power in that attack…” And as he looks around, he tries to speak up. “Lord Water Master?”

“What?”

“There’s something you should know,” Xie Lian looks back toward him. “Could we speak privately—?”

“I don’t have time for that right now!” Shi Wudu shakes his head, “I can wait until after we get out of here!”

Pei looks back and forth between the two, concerned.

“Shui-Xiong, if the crown prince thinks it’s important, maybe you should—”

“Does it have anything to do with where my sister is?” Shi Wudu cuts him off pointedly, and Xie Lian sighs.

“…No,” he admits.

“Then it doesn’t matter,” his hands clench into fists. “Can you tell where she is, or not? I can’t waste any more time.”

From her spiritual energy? No. But there’s another way.

A slightly more embarrassing way, but Xie Lian doesn't have the time or care to worry about that right now.

He takes a deep sniff, then turns his head.

"...This way," he mumbles, reaching for Hua Cheng's hand, slightly wary of taking down another tree.

Seeming to sense what he wants, Hua Cheng takes him by the arm without a word, leading him through the forest briskly.

"...You can smell her?" Pei questions, vaguely impressed.

"She wears expensive perfume," Xie Lian explains, having Hua Cheng continue due north through the forest, leading them deeper towards the center of the island. "And when you lose one of your senses...the rest become much stronger."

"Still," Pei tilts his head. "You're like a proper little tracking hound, your highness."

Hua Cheng sends a dark look back over his shoulder.

From the rear of the group, someone is watching them both with a keen eye.

Ming Yi's gaze drifts back and forth between Ming Guang and Crimson Rain Sought Flower.

From the shape of their jawlines, the similar build to their shoulders.

He always thought there was something vaguely familiar about Pei Ming, but now, seeing him and Hua Cheng standing in such close proximity...

It's strange.

But he doesn't care enough to think on it further.

His gaze narrows in on the back of the Water Master's head, his nose wrinkling slightly as, when no one is watching, he allows the true venom within his glare to peek through.

The group is moving quickly, but spread out—making sure there's no chance to miss something.

Shi Wudu glances down at his hand as they hurry through the forest.

His fingers—

They won’t stop shaking.

“...She’s alright,” Pei murmurs from his side, watching the look on his face with a small, worried frown. “You know that.”

The golden locket hanging around his neck is reason enough to know. It’s still, unmoving.

She isn’t hurt, then.

The Water Master blows out a slow, shaky breath.

“...Pei.”

Even now, in his frantic worry to find her, he stops walking.

The Martial god stops beside him immediately, not knowing what to expect, but—

Shi Wudu’s hand reaches out, snatching the collar of his robes, pulling Pei Ming down until they’re eye level.

“You remember what you promised me?”

It isn’t difficult to guess what he means.

Shi Wudu hasn’t demanded Pei promise him very many things:

And only one of them was ever so important.

“...Yes,” he raises an eyebrow. “But once we get back to the Heavens, we can straighten out the matter with your sister, she won’t be in any danger—”

“Promise me again.”

“...” Now, Pei frowns, feeling reluctant. “What’s going on with you?”

He’s been with countless beauties over the years. Princesses, concubines, generals, actresses—

And none of them have ever had eyes that compare to the Water Master.

Now, though—they’re darker than they have ever been.

“Promise me,” he repeats, his fingers tightening in the front of Pei’s robes.

“...I promise,” Pei mutters, his brow furrowed as he stares down at him. “You know I never break my word.”

Shi Wudu doesn’t reply, his jaw clenched

The others are far enough ahead, and Ming Yi is far enough behind that he dares to reach down, cupping the Water Master’s cheek. He half expects to be pushed away, but—

He isn’t.

“...You know it won’t ever come to that,” Pei points out, his thumb brushing over his jaw.

The words he offers are meant to bring comfort to Shi Wudu. To make him feel safe.

“...If someone wanted to get to you, they would have to kill me first,” he leans down, pressing their foreheads together. “You aren’t going anywhere.”

But they don’t. They strike terror.

After a brief pause, Shi Wudu tilts his head up—pressing a chaste, exceedingly brief kiss against Pei’s lips before pulling back.

An unusual gesture from him, given how easily someone else could see.

He’s never done something like that.

Not until now.

But, in contrast to the sudden show of affection—his voice is like ice.

“Understand—if the time comes where you can only protect one of us, and you choose me over her...” Those eyes snap up to his, burning like an aurora in the darkness. “I will never forgive you, Pei.”

Before the general can respond, Shi Wudu pulls his face out of his grip, hurrying after the Crown Prince of Xianle and Crimson Rain.

He knows.

On some instinctive level.

Ever since Xie Lian sent that message from the Terrace of Cascading Wine, he knew.

If that thing wanted his sister dead, she would have died there. If it wanted her to die here, she would be dead already.

His nails bite into his palms as he walks faster, pieces of jet black hair falling loose from his ponytail, framing his face.

This isn't about his sister.

Shi Wudu was raised around sailors and fishermen. He knows the game.

Shi Qingxuan isn't the target.

She's bait.

And the more desperately he tries to get to her, the deeper he's being reeled in.

A fish on a hook.

Shi Wudu knows.

And still…

He walks even faster.

Finally, when they reach the center of the island—the tree line breaks, revealing a large clearing, filled only by a lake.

One with black waters, the surface smooth as glass—in spite of the breeze. Xie Lian comes to a halt on the shore, his stomach sinking.

"…The trail stops here," he calls over his shoulder, just as Shi Wudu appears on the beach beside them, eyeing the waters warily.

"And you don't see any sign of her spiritual power?" Xie Lian peers down into the darkness, and…

All he sees is resentment.

So dark, so vivid, it makes him wince.

"...No, I don't see it anywhere."

Shi Wudu can't take his eyes off of that water, the muscles in his jaw working.

Pei comes to a halt beside him, sending his friend a sharp look.

"You aren't thinking about it."

"..."

Pei looks at the surface of the water, the hairs on the back of his neck sticking straight up.

" That," he points, his tone conclusive, "is a trap."

Even if he doesn't know what's going on—he can see that much.

"...It is," Shi Wudu agrees, his eyes unmoving. "But it's pretty straight forward."

After all, who would go for something so obvious?

From behind them, Ming Yi leans against a tree, his eyes flashing gold in the dark, his arms crossed.

And a slow, satisfied smirk spreads across his lips.

Suddenly, the locket against Shi Wudu's chest begins to vibrate violently, and the Water Master goes rigid, watching the water with a faint sense of dread.

It's not a trap, if the point isn't to trick you.

It's not a trap, if you don't have a choice but to jump in.

Pei doesn't see it coming—doesn't have a chance to stop him before he lunges, leaping into the water.

It doesn't splash, there are no ripples on the surface.

He just slips beneath without a sound.

"...WUDU!"

Xie Lian's words from before reverberate through his mind.

'In the end, he'll...'

The Prince looks down into that darkness, his blood going cold.

...Drown.

Xie Lian's next step is an impulse—and maybe an unfair one.

Even Hua Cheng doesn't have time to react before he plunges in after the Water Master, disappearing into the dark.

It's like ice, sucking him down, down, down, like he's plunging through a free fall instead of through the water, but—

Xie Lian isn't afraid.

It was a calculated gamble.

Based on one very important factor:

Hua Cheng has repeatedly made it clear that, while they aren't friends...they do have a working relationship.

And, nine times out of ten, he's more powerful than Blackwater.

So, even though Blackwater might be more powerful in his own lair...

He won't lay a hand on Xie Lian.

Because if he did, he would make an enemy of Hua Cheng.

Who, knowing him, has already leapt after Xie Lian.

It's a risk, but...

Finally, after what feels like forever, he breaks through the water's surface, landing on...

A cold, stone floor.

He hunches over, struggling to catch his breath, his body aching, because that water—

Something about it felt as though it was sapping the life out of him.

"...SHI QINGXUAN!" Shi Wudu rasps, pushing wet bangs out of his eyes.

"GEGE!"

The Shi siblings rush towards one another.

Shi Wudu grabs her by the face, looking her over, desperate to find where she's hurt, but when he finds no injuries, he...

He notices that her locket isn't hanging around her neck. "...How did you get down here? Where's your necklace?"

"I-I don't know!" She cries. "One minute I was beside you and Ming-Xiong, and the next thing I knew, something grabbed me, and—my locket..." She looks to the other side of the room briefly before cringing, burying her face in her brother's chest.

Slowly, Shi Wudu follows her stare, finding...

Cages.

His arms tighten around his sister protectively, pulling her behind him.

The creatures inside barely even look human.

Gaunt, thin—covered in dirt and grime, some of them moaning and whimpering—but most of them are silent, staring off into space.

But one of them, seated towards the very front, babbling nonsensically, is set apart from the others.

With a golden locket gleaming around his neck.

"...I'll get you another one," Shi Wudu mutters, shaking his head. Just as he says that, the other three come crashing down.

Hua Cheng lands on his feet while the other two land in a heap, immediately rushing to Xie Lian's side, placing both hands on his shoulders.

"Your highness," his voice is hardened with anger. "You can't do that here, it's—"

"Not safe," Xie Lian replies quietly, "I know."

He looks towards Shi Qingxuan and her brother, worry settling in the pit of his stomach.

"Do you know what this place is, San Lang?"

“...Blackwater Manor,” Hua Cheng answers after a moment.

So, this is where the other Ghost King lives.

Xie Lian rises to his feet, thinking.

As he does, Shi Qingxuan looks around the room, hugging her brother tighter when she notices what...looks like some sort of shrine.

“...What is that?” She mutters, pointing to the pile of bones set up on an altar—clearly having been used for some form of worship.

“Blackwater...he wouldn’t just have his remains sitting out, would he?”

“No,” Hua Cheng shakes his head. “I’ve seen his ashes before—those aren’t it.”

And even if they weren’t—Blackwater isn’t a god. He would get no use from having his ashes worshiped.

So why...?

Shi Wudu doesn’t seem eager to focus on that, instead looking up towards the black, smooth surface of the ceiling, his lips curving into a grim frown.

“...I don’t think we can leave the way we came,” he mutters.

No, Xie Lian agrees with him there.

That would make it too easy for the prisoners being kept here to escape. No, Blackwater would have another way of exiting.

“...There’s no way he sails through the entire eastern sea every time he wants to leave this place,” Xie Lian mutters under his breath, rubbing his chin.

It would be too time consuming—and it would be a liability, in the case of an emergency.

But if he was going to have a means of escape—it would be here, in his private residence.

One that the mortal men he’s keeping here wouldn’t be able to use: A travel array.

Just as Xie Lian thinks of that, Ming Yi seems to come to the same conclusion, finding a dip in the floor beneath their feet.

With a snap of his fingers, a small blue light appears in his palm, illuminating the floor below—revealing the carvings etched into ancient stone.

"..." Shi Wudu glances at him, down to the floor, seeming to put together what needs to be done in his head.

He can't judge by the stars anymore—but he knows they don't have much more time before the sun rises.

Maybe only minutes.

"If you can set it to the correct location, I can spare enough power to run it," he mutters, watching as Ming Yi examines the array more closely.

"...It's a unique array," the earth master frowns, tracing the carvings.

"What do you mean?"

"It only gives you a one way trip."

Xie Lian supposes that makes sense—after all, if the door worked both ways, it would make it possible for people to sneak into Black Water's home unannounced, so...

Hua Cheng steps over, grabbing him firmly by the arm. "Set it to Puqi Shrine first."

Xie Lian glances up.

"But—"

"That's a good idea," Shi Qingxuan mutters, pressing a hand to her forehead. "I've already dragged you into so many problems as it is...and the rest of us are going to the same place anyway, so we can all leave after you do."

It...makes sense. But Xie Lian...

Shi Wudu rolls up his sleeves, watching the look on the Crown Prince of Xianle's face, and...

Something about it makes his skin prickle unpleasantly—even though he can't place why.

"...Your highness."

Xie Lian turns to the Water Master—as much as he can in Hua Cheng's grip.

"Yes?"

"What was it that you wanted to tell me, before?"

Of course—now that his sister is safe, he's willing to listen. And...

Xie Lian frowns, shaking his head.

"...It's something we should discuss in private," he mutters. "I'll come visit you soon, and we'll talk."

Before the Water Master can ask anything more—

"It's ready," Ming Yi murmurs, looking up from his place on the far end of the array.

"..." Shi Wudu looks away, placing his hand on the outermost symbol. Under his power, it glows vividly blue, illuminating the entire room.

"San Lang, you can go first—" Xie Lian starts, only for Hua Cheng to drag him forward, his tone insistent.

"We're going together."

"But—"

"No." Hua Cheng suddenly turns firm, and suddenly—sapphire eyes are watching him very closely. "We're doing as I say this time, dianxia."

Hua Cheng doesn't look back at any of them, even as Xie Lian attempts to drag his feet, and in the blink of an eye—they're through in a flash of blue light, disappearing in an instant.

And what comes next— It all happens so fast.

The Water Master has one hand on the array, his eyes flickering around everyone else in the room.

His sister, beside him.

Ming Yi, who should be watching the portal to make sure it's closing before he sets their next destination, but…

He isn't.

And Pei Ming, watching him.

Shi Wudu straightens, watching the shrinking portal in front of them.

"…Hey," he mutters, his voice suddenly quiet—enough so to draw the general's attention.

And the look on the Water Master's face—

It's odd.

Wide eyed, pale. To be expected, after the week he's had, but…

"Do you remember what you told me, the night of the mid-autumn festival?"

Pei frowns, glancing over at the other two—startled that Shi Wudu would be bringing something like that up here.

"…I remember."

He was hanging his head before—but now, the Water Master looks up at him.

And the minute Pei Ming takes in his expression—he knows.

Something is wrong.

Horribly, horribly wrong.

"…"

Shi Wudu smiles, and those eyes, the eyes that have been drowning him for centuries in the most perfect way—

Now—

They're filled with tears that refuse to fall.

He's too proud to let them slip free.

Even now.

A pride that is so achingly familiar, it fills Pei Ming with this horrible sense of dread.

The Water Master reaches out for him, placing his palm over Pei's heart.

"...You would have been perfect," he admits, looking up at him with that tear laden smile.

Shi Qingxuan looks back and forth between the two of them, not understanding why Pei's eyes have grown as wide as they could possibly be, remembering—

'I would make a good husband.'

Two tears slip free, despite his best efforts—making shining tracks on his cheeks—and now, with his last words—they break.

"And I am so sorry."

It's the first time he's ever heard the Shi Wudu apologize to him—or anyone, for that matter—

But it's not an apology.

Not really.

Pei realizes that one moment too late.

It's—

The hand on his heart gives him a harsh shove, one infused with spiritual power, blasting him back—straight through the portal, just before it closes.

It's a goodbye.

Silence falls in the chamber as the Water Tyrant sinks to his knees, squeezing his eyes shut.

"...Gege?" Shi Qingxuan frowns, confused—reaching out to place a hand on his shoulder.

Her brother doesn't reply, hanging his head.

He can feel it.

The anger filling the room.

"...You had so many chances to separate Pei from the rest of us." Shi Wudu mutters, staring at the darkness where the portal once stood, his voice calm now.

Resigned.

"But you didn't."

"Gege, who are you talking to—?"

The next words out of his mouth make her fall silent, growing pale.

"You had plenty of chances to kill Shi Qingxuan, but you didn't."

He takes a shuddering breath, and when he opens his eyes, he's resigned.

"Pei would have protected me. Keeping him around was an obstacle. Unless..." He turns, looking towards the only other person in the room. "Your plan was to force me to watch him die."

Dark eyes flash in confirmation, and Shi Wudu smiles—not giving a single inch.

"...Fuck you."

"Who are you talking to?!" Shi Qingxuan frowns, tugging at her brother's sleeve.

It's just them, and Ming Yi. Who would he be cursing like that? Who would want to kill Pei in front of him—?

And why does he look like that?! She's never— "Let me send her back."

Shi Wudu looks down at the travel array, his expression exceedingly calm, despite the words he's been saying.

He's had so many chances to kill Shi Qingxuan. But he didn't.

There's no way he wants her to see this.

"..."

Ming Yi doesn't go through the pretenses this time.

Crack!

He doesn't pretend to fiddle around with the array.

This time, with a simple snap of his fingers—it sparks to life, with the destination being set to the Heavenly Capital.

Shi Qingxuan whips her head around to look at him, her eyes widening with confusion.

Ming Yi...doesn't look like himself.

His eyes are black, filled with—

So much resentment, it makes her flinch.

"M-Ming-xiong?"

But he won't look at her.

No, his gaze is locked on her brother with dark intent.

"Go."

"Wh—?"

The portal opens.

"Listen to him, Shi Qingxuan."

"What..." The Wind Master stumbles to her feet, shaking her head as she backs away from the both of them. "What's going on here? Gege?"

"Go," her brother repeats, staring at the portal. "Pei will look after you, whatever comes next."

"What are you talking about?!"

She rounds on Ming Yi, reaching out to grab his sleeve. "Ming-xiong—what are you two—?"

Slowly, he turns his head to look at her—and she flinches away, stumbling back, her face growing pale.

His eyes burn unnaturally in the dim light of the cavern—and his form—

It's changing.

Growing taller, broader—his skin growing waxen and colorless.

Ears sharp, pointed—his eyebrows more severe.

Older, and—

"...That isn't Earth Master Ming Yi," her brother mutters, and Shi Qingxuan— It feels as though she's begun to enter free fall.

"He never was."

"No..." Shi Qingxuan chokes, her eyes welling up with tears as she shakes her head. "You're—you're wrong!"

Still, Ming Yi won't look at her.

Only her brother.

"MING-XIONG WOULDN'T, HE—!"

"Leave." Amber eyes watch her coldly. "And I won't hurt you."

"H-hurt me?!" Now, those tears begin to fall, slipping down her cheeks. "WHAT ARE YOU SAYING?!"

Shi Wudu grits his teeth, grabbing her by the wrist, clearly meaning to drag her. "FOR ONCE IN YOUR LIFE, WILL YOU JUST DO AS YOU'RE TOLD?!"

"NO!" She sobs, twisting out of his grip. "I DON'T KNOW WHAT'S GOING ON, BUT I'M NOT LEAVING YOU!"

She twists around to look at Ming Yi, trembling.

"MING-XIONG, WHAT ARE YOU TRYING TO DO?!"

"...Ha..."

Both of the Shi siblings fall silent, watching as the figure before them presses a hand over his face.

"Hahaha..."

His shoulders begin to shake as his body is wracked with bouts of laughter without mirth.

"HAHAHAHAHA!"

He wraps one arm around his middle, hunching over.

“Look what a good job you did, Water Master Xiong,” he sneers, “You must be so pleased with yourself!”

Shi Wudu doesn’t look up, reaching for his sister’s arm again, but—

But she won’t let him.

“Gege—”

“Four whole centuries.” ‘Ming Yi’ speaks over her, his footsteps echoing against the walls as he circles them, like a cat stalking its prey. “The Reverend of Empty Words...My family...Mount Tonglu...”

The mention of the Kiln makes Shi Qingxuan go still, her face growing as white as a sheet.

“W-Wh—?”

“...All of that, and I’m still cursed. You—HAHAHAHAHA!” He cackles, his face falling into his hands. “YOU’RE EVEN BETTER AT SWITCHING FATES THAN I THOUGHT!”

Switching...

Shi Qingxuan feels all of the breath leave her chest, watching Ming Yi with wide eyes.

...Fates.

Shi Wudu finally looks at him, then at his sister, shaking his head.

“...The rest of it was me,” he mutters. “But this—”

The pain in his sister’s eyes is so endless, he can barely stand to look.

“You did this to yourself.”

“Ming—” She starts, choking on her tears, then stops, her lips trembling as she looks up at him.

This—

This isn’t Ming Yi.

It never was.

Staring down at her now, that all begins to feel horribly clear.

The man before her is no god.

But every inch of him radiates with power, and those eyes, the same eyes that felt so familiar before—

The hatred in them feels alien.

Before her is no friend.

Maybe in another life, he could have been.

Maybe in another life, he was destined to be more. But not this one.

This life has always been cruel, one way or another. Before her now is her enemy, her lover—

Her greatest sorrow.

Black Water Sinking Ships.

The demon He Xuan.

Hundreds of miles away, in Puqi shrine, another storm is brewing.

“SEND ME BACK!”

“General,” Xie Lian’s voice is even, but tense. “Let him go.”

Pei’s eyes are wild, one fist cocked back as he grips Hua Cheng by the collar, and— He’s beyond listening.

“You think I don’t know those two are in league with one another?!” He snarls, shaking the ghost king as he speaks. “YOU KNOW HOW TO GET BACK THERE, DON’T YOU?!”

Hua Cheng, in contrast to what Xie Lian might have expected—is being rather understanding—

Allowing Pei to scream.

“WHAT DO YOU WANT FROM ME?!”

“Pei—”

“YOU WANT ME TO SPY FOR YOU? FINE. YOU WANT THE EMPEROR’S HEAD?! FINE!” His pleas become more and more desperate—to the point where Xie Lian can barely stand to listen.

“TELL ME WHAT YOU WANT, AND I'LL DO IT—JUST SEND ME BACK!”

“Pei!” Xie Lian finally loses patience, listening to Hua Cheng getting manhandled in such a way—reaching over to wrench his hands off of him. “The Travel array only works one way! There’s nothing San Lang can do!”

“YOU THINK THAT THING WAS TELLING THE TRUTH?!” Pei presses both hands against the side of his head, trembling.

‘You would have been perfect.’

He wouldn’t have said that.

Pei knows him inside and out—and Shi Wudu— He never, ever would have said that.

Not unless...

“...Normally, the array does work in both directions,” Hua Cheng admits. “But he must have sealed one end of it for his plan. I couldn’t bring you back there if I wanted to.”

He glances up at the sky, watching the sun rising in the distance.

“...His plan?”

Pei’s eyes narrow.

“...You fucking knew?" He asks slowly, taking another step toward him. “This entire time? You watched him walk into that trap and you just LET IT HAPPEN?!”

“You knew it was a trap.” Hua Cheng points out. “So did he, clearly. And neither of you are my problem.”

A shocked laugh escapes Pei’s throat—but there’s absolutely no amusement in it.

"I suppose I should have expected a calamity to be heartless," he mutters. "The prince's high opinion of you made me think you might actually have some COMPASSION!"

It's the first time Xie Lian has actually noticed someone's words actually get to Hua Cheng—he can feel the way that he stiffens, even if he can't see the change in his expression.

"...He's not heartless," Xie Lian places a hand on Pei Ming's chest, forcing him to take a step back. "You have every reason to be upset, but San Lang didn't do this to Shi Wudu or Shi Qingxuan," he steps firmly between the two men, and when Hua Cheng tries to pull the prince behind him—

Xie Lian pushes his hand away, intent on not allowing a brawl to break out.

"And he's also the only one who knows enough about Blackwater to be helpful, so insulting him and calling him a monster does nothing to help. We don't even know what's going on right now, anyway."

Pei forces himself to take slow, steadying breaths.

"...You mentioned his plan," the general mutters between clenched teeth. "What is it? What is he going to do?"

Hua Cheng stares at him, his eyes distant.

Normally, he delivers information with a smug sense of knowingness, proud of knowing more than most.

Not this time.

"He's going to kill the Water Master. That has always been his central goal."

The way he says it gives Xie Lian pause.

Not that he's going to 'try' to kill Shi Wudu, or that he 'wants' to—

But that he will.

Pei sniffs, clearing his throat.

Xie Lian recognizes what he's doing. As Martial Gods, they share a somewhat common history. Both were in wars at a young age. Both learned their own ways of coping. Xie Lian, however, has never viewed himself as a soldier. A swordsman, yes. A warrior, yes.

But there's a difference between the two.

Xie Lian finds joy in fighting—for the skill of it. What he does, he's always viewed as an art form—a way of expressing himself.

But being a soldier is a profession. One where you must learn to place weaknesses aside. Where your emotions, no matter how unsettling they are, must be suppressed in order to focus on the task at hand.

Xie Lian struggled with that, when he was young.

His first battle occurred when he was only twenty years old, after all.

He had never seen someone die before. He had seen dead bodies. His grandfather, when he passed—but he'd never watched the light fade from someone's eyes in an instant. Not until a soldier standing just two feet away from him was struck in the chest with an arrow. Xie Lian has seen so much death since then, it rarely phases him. But he always remembers that moment.

The soldier had only been a child himself—sixteen years old at most. With a small scar under his cheekbone, laughing with Xie Lian over a joke, one minute.

Dead the next.

His blood landed on the prince's cheeks.

The terror Xie Lian felt in that moment, the sadness, the loss of innocence—

He hadn't been prepared to deal with that. He was so disoriented in the ambush that followed, he was barely able to defend himself.

He wept that night.

Scrubbed his face until it felt raw, wishing it would feel as though the blood had washed away. Threw up any food he dared to eat.

And he just…couldn't stop crying.

Because that soldier was one of his believers. Because he had green eyes, and he spoke about his mother's letters from home. In the five minutes he spent marching beside Xie Lian's horse, he became a person in the prince's mind.

He became real.

And then, he was gone.

Xie Lian wept because it was unfair. He wept because he was afraid. He wept because he felt weak. He wept, because he didn't want to fight anymore. He didn't want to kill green eyed soldiers from Yong'an. Their mothers probably wrote them letters, too.

And for the first six months of the war, Xie Lian cried himself to sleep every night. He barely ate. Barely slept.

But eventually, it stopped—and the pain, fear, guilt, and anger—

He felt it, but he no longer reacted to it. Because that's what it means, to be a soldier.

But Xie Lian thinks, in the years after the war—he began to change. When someone was kind to him, and made him feel safe.

When Xie Lian didn't have to fight anymore.

He started feeling things again.

The good things—and the bad.

He was so, so happy when he was with Hong'er—even if he was too self pitying to realize it at the time.

He laughed, and smiled so often. Slept peacefully. Looked forward to finding him again when he woke up.

But there were also moments when he was so hurt, so angry. Never with Hong'er, but Xie Lian lashed out at him, too. Begged him to leave. Told him to stop wasting his life.

Of course, the prince regrets those moments.

But after Hong'er died...Xie Lian was in another war, all over again.

But he was the only target.

And even when he wanted to—even when he begged to—Bai Wuxiang didn't accept his surrender.

At some point since then, Xie Lian stopped fighting. But he can't recall if he ever started feeling again—not in the way that he used to. He hasn't felt secure enough for that.

But Pei, in all of his centuries of life, has never stopped being a soldier.

It's who he is. It's all he's ever been. It's all Pei has ever been allowed to be.

So now, even under extreme duress—a situation where, if the tables were turned, even Xie Lian wouldn't be calm...

Pei's expression turns to stone.

"Crimson Rain." He turns back to Hua Cheng—his tone less frantic now. "Can you get in contact with Blackwater now?"

"...He isn't answering," the calamity shrugs, his arms crossed. "I don't expect he will until it's done."

When he's done, meaning...

When the Water Master has been killed.

"...Fine." Pei turns around. "I'm not wasting my time here."

"Where are you going, then?" Xie Lian frowns. "We don't have a plan—"

"I know how to get to Blackwater's Lair now." Pei explains flatly. "I'll go to the Heavenly Court, get as many reinforcements as I can, and blast Blackwater's gates open."

Hua Cheng remains silent, at first. But those words—

'The prince's high opinion of you made me think you might actually have some COMPASSION!'

"...That won't work." Hua Cheng speaks up reluctantly. "Even if you could make it in time—"

And he won't, that much is certain.

"—the Emperor won't send anyone to help him. Not when they hear the truth."

Pei freezes, and Xie Lian winces.

“…What do you mean?”

So, he really didn’t know.

And Xie Lian knows Pei, so devoted to Shi Wudu, probably wouldn’t accept the truth from Hua Cheng, so…

“…By Heavenly law, He Xuan has a claim to Shi Wudu’s life,” Xie Lian explains quietly. “The Emperor won’t have a right to interfere.”

“How could Blackwater possibly have a claim over his life?”

Hua Cheng falls silent, and Xie Lian realizes now, just considering his own perspective—

He probably knows more about the story of the Shi siblings and He Xuan—the actual story—than most.

“…San Lang can tell you what has happened,” Xie Lian mutters, “But before that, I think I know how to figure out what’s going on right now.”

Hua Cheng turns his gaze to Xie Lian, his expression immediately turning wary. “Your highness—it won’t help—”

“Let him try.”

Xie Lian sends Hua Cheng an apologetic look, but Crimson Rain has examined that face in countless ways, and he knows what it looks like when the prince has made up his mind. How stubborn the set of his jaw becomes.

“The Wind Master is my friend. I’m going to try to help her.”

The air about Hua Cheng is deeply disapproving as he watches Xie Lian form the proper hand seals, knowing exactly what he’s going to do.

The moment the spell takes effect, his body crumples—and when it does, Hua Cheng is right there to catch him. He sinks to the ground with the prince in his arms, allowing Xie Lian’s head to rest against his shoulder.

Pei takes advantage of the brief moment of quiet to look at crimson rain—to actually see him—and there’s something about it.

“…Is that your true form?” Hua Cheng doesn’t answer, his arms tightening around the god—and Pei Ming takes that for an affirmative. “I always thought the stories about you missing an eye were a rumor,” he mutters, trying to distract himself from the waiting. “How’d it happen?”

Hua Cheng rests his chin on top of Xie Lian’s head—and for a moment, Pei assumes that his answer is once again going to be silence, but—

“Doing something stupid,” He shrugs, is eye flashing up—looking the general over, just as the other is doing with him. “What about yours?”

Pei reaches up to touch his cheek, startled by the question.

He’s always had one scar—running from his cheekbone, all the way up to his temple, framing his left eye and slashing through his brow.

Given his past as a war hero, however—it’s rare that anyone asks how he got it.

“...Doing something stupid,” he admits, and somehow, he manages to crack the smallest joke, even if it’s impossible to find any mirth in it, “more specifically, Xuan Ji.”

And Hua Cheng, to his surprise...almost smiles. Though not quite.

Not when he knows what’s awaiting his god.

Drip!

Drip!

Drip!

There’s a small stream somewhere, running through the underground chambers of Blackwater Manor, breaking the silence with the faint rush and drip of water.

“What do you think is going to happen, if you stay?” He Xuan questions coldly. “Do you think I’ll spare him out of affection for you?”

Shi Qingxuan lifts her head, eyes swollen, face streaked with tears.

“Affection?!” She chokes, staring up at him with disbelief. “You think I believe any of that now?!”

“Shi Qingxuan,” her brother won’t look up. “He’s sparing your life. Just—”

“Someone who had ‘affection’ for me wouldn’t have USED ME!” She cries, trembling from head to toe with fright, but—

The ache, the fracturing feeling in her heart—it hurts too much for her to be overwhelmed by the fear.

“Someone who cared about me wouldn’t have LIED TO ME!”

For the briefest moment, there’s a flash of pain in his eyes—quickly overtaken by a smile.

Then, he laughs. Not the crazed, over emotional laughter from before — This time, he genuinely seems to think something is funny.

“...Oh, my dear,” he smiles, his face dropping into his hand, “the people who love you have always lied to you.” He points one clawed finger towards her brother, “What do you think he spent the last four centuries doing?”

Shi Wudu doesn’t reply.

“But that’s the thing, isn’t it?”

It’s been so long, wearing Ming Yi’s mask. Lifting it from his face, allowing himself to fill out the edges of his own identity once again—it feels like stretching out one’s legs after countless hours sitting down. It feels good.

Satisfying.

“Before I tried to tell you the truth, I thought it was all him,” he shakes his head, slowly walking in a circle around the two, his steps echoing off of the walls. “I thought that he was protective. Controlling. That you were childish and naive, but innocent in all of this...”

“She is innocent.” Shi Wudu mutters. “She had no idea, she never did anyth—”

CRACK!

The slap is so violent, even a god so powerful as the Water Master hits the floor, hard—and Shi Qingxuan rushes to his side.

“I wasn’t done speaking.” He Xuan glares.

He stares at them, his head tilted to the side, pupils blown.

Shi Wudu, too proud to even acknowledge the cuts on his cheek from He Xuan’s claws—and Shi Qingxuan, trying to staunch the blood with her sleeve.

“...But I understand it now,” He Xuan continues. “You liked the lies he told you.”

Shi Qingxuan pauses, eyes widening, her sleeve hovering over her brother’s skin.

“Because those lies gave you the life you wanted. Drinking and parties. Wealth and amusement. And who were you to question that?”

Shi Wudu can’t bear the look in his sister’s eyes.

Learning far too late in life, the burden of self awareness.

“She didn’t do anything to you,” he mutters, pulling her behind him.

“Correct,” He Xuan agrees flatly. “That was you.”

And he lived with it so easily, for so long.

“You threw me down. But I want to know,” he stops in front of them, meeting Shi Qingxuan’s gaze. “On that climb to the Heavens, did you ever look down to see what you were stepping on to get there?”

Her lips tremble.

“She didn’t know.” Shi Wudu repeats, shifting in front of her, breaking the line of sight between them.

“Yes.” He Xuan agrees.

“Then you know I’M the only one to blame!”

“Before I knew her, yes. But that’s the thing about your sister,” He Xuan kneels down in front of them. “You look at her, and you see the same, terrified child you signed my death warrant to save,” he muses, staring into Shi Wudu’s eyes. “But I see who she actually is.”

"She's—"

"She's brilliant." He Xuan cuts him off flatly. "Observant. Curious. Passionate. Loyal."

So many compliments, given sincerely—but now, all Shi Qingxuan can do is hang her head with shame.

"I doubt that it never occurred to her that the Reverend's disappearance was odd." He Xuan watches her, finding the way she shrinks to be a quiet form of agreement. "The scroll of research you had Ling Wen put together was a farce. She could have easily figured that out. And while we're playing the honesty game, let's point out—"

He looks back to Shi Qingxuan.

"You have never cared that much about cultivation at all."

She makes no arguments there—in all honesty, as He Xuan requests, learning cultivation was something she did purely as a means of survival.

But she's never tried particularly hard.

"...Did you just assume that you were naturally gifted?"

"Leave her be—!"

"I knew."

That admission makes both of them fall silent—Shi Wudu with shock, and He Xuan...

He just listens, his eyes dark and unfeeling.

"I knew...my brother had done something, because I was more powerful than I should have been," She admits. "But Ming—" She stops herself, the mere reminder of that name being a lie sending more tears flooding down her face. "He—he gave me so many treasures and magical devices, I thought..."

"Did you ever ask?"

No.

And they both know why.

Because she had been afraid of the answer.

“And Shi Qingxuan, I was willing to forgive all of that.” He Xuan admits, watching her face. “I almost changed my mind so many times.”

“...It’s not too late,” she croaks, looking up at him, makeup smeared around her eyes, hair in her face. “I can forgive you, too! Just don’t—!”

“It is.” He looks away from her sharply.

“You haven’t done anything you can’t back,” Shi Qingxuan whispers, reaching out for him with trembling fingers, struggling when her brother holds her back. “I know you’re in pain, but—!”

“It’s too late, Shi Qingxuan.”

“It’s not! It’s—!”

“I GAVE YOU SO MANY CHANCES!” She flinches away, and now, her tears aren’t only for herself.

They’re for the agony in He Xuan’s voice.

“I was so, so sure, that when you knew the truth—you wouldn’t stand by it.”

“I didn’t,” Shi Qingxuan sobs, shaking her head vehemently. “I DIDN’T!”

“DON’T TELL ME THAT!” He Xuan turns away from her, his hands trembling. “You KNEW what you were doing, waiting until after his calamity! DON’T TELL ME YOU DIDN’T!”

In truth, Shi Wudu would have been nearly impossible to punish after that.

Some gods are simply too powerful to be held accountable. After passing his third calamity, Shi Wudu would have been one of them.

“...You don’t want her here for this either,” the Water Master speaks up finally, rubbing Shi Qingxuan’s back as she weeps in his arms. “She understands now. That’s what you wanted, right?”

“She can leave if she wants to,” He Xuan places his hands against the wall, black claws gleaming against smooth marble. “I never closed the portal.”

“...Qingxuan—”

“NO!” She half sobs, half screams. “I’M NOT LEAVING YOU!” Her arms cling around her brother’s neck, and—

Shi Wudu has to look away, his own eyes stinging.

“Go.”

“No,” her face is soaked with tears, her breaths coming faster and faster, until the room spins. “Please—please, I—I know what he d-did isn’t—I know you c-can’t forgive him!”

After all of those things she said, back in the Palace of Wind and Water—

Some small part of the Water Master had shattered.

Believing that she could never love him the same, knowing what he had done, but...

“BUT HE’S MY FAMILY!”

...Families are complicated.

“PLEASE!”

He Xuan’s back is turned—and he won’t look at her.

“TAKE ME, INSTEAD!” She pleads, “TAKE ME AWAY, LOCK ME UP SO I CAN NEVER SEE HIM AGAIN! THAT WOULD HURT HIM SO MUCH MORE!”

Shi Wudu pales, yanking her back. “Absolutely not!”

“OR KILL ME, INSTEAD!”

He Xuan presses a hand against the side of his head. “Enough.”

“I’LL GIVE UP MY GODHOOD,” She promises, hyperventilating. “I’LL DO ANYTHING YOU WANT—!”

“THERE IS NOTHING YOU CAN DO!” He Xuan snarls turning around, marching over, and yanking them apart. “DON’T YOU SEE THAT?!”

Shi Wudu coughs, straining to speak as he's hauled away from his sister by his throat, his feet dragging across the floor. "This isn't her…!"

"I'm going to introduce a new tradition to your family," Black Water snarls. "Letting people make and live with THEIR OWN CHOICES."

If she wants to stay, she can stay.

If she wants to watch, she can watch.

He Xuan drags the Water Master by the throat, too angry, hurt, and beside himself with grief to think about the fact that he isn't struggling.

Not even a little.

Instead, he forces him before the altar.

On his knees, yanking his head up by the hair—

Forcing him to look at the ashes and bone before him.

Lives.

Futures he destroyed.

Birthdays that were never celebrated. Vows that were never made. Children that were never born.

"Say you're sorry," He Xuan commands him coldly.

Shi Wudu looks up at him for a moment, his chest rising and falling quickly. He's pale. Trembling now, though he wasn't before He Xuan grabbed hold of him.

A coward, trembling before his death.

But there's something about his reaction that He Xuan can't stand.

Shi Wudu might seem afraid, on some level—but not of him.

His eyes are almost looking through him. Like he's thinking of someone else. Like he doesn't even see him.

He Xuan's fingers tighten, his eyes burning with rage.

"APOLOGIZE!"

"I'm sorry," Shi Wudu breathes.

He Xuan peers into his gaze, trying to find something in there.

The coldness. The cruelty.

Looking for the monster.

Even when Hua Cheng was making vague overtures about letting this go—he echoed the same sentiments.

People are the choices that they make.

And what could Shi Wudu's choices make him, if not a monster?

How could someone who caused so much suffering look like that?

Where does he get the right, after everything he's done, to look so fragile?

Shi Qingxuan is weeping uncontrollably, begging, but she's incoherent—

'Lady Wind Master.'

She jumps violently on the floor, but before she can speak—

'Don't react to what I'm saying now.'

She obeys, covering her mouth with one hand, curling up into a ball on her side, her breaths hitching.

'He's—dianxia, I can't stop him! He's going to kill—!'

'I don't think he's in control of himself right now, Shi Qingxuan.'

Her tears slow, her breaths stuttering as she listens closer.

'You...you don't?'

'San Lang explained it to me—but Mount Tonglu is opening soon.' The prince explains quickly. 'It has an effect on Ghost Kings.'

She almost asks what that has to do with anything, before realizing faintly—

Right.

Her Ming-Xio—

He Xuan.

He Xuan is a ghost king.

'...I think he means it,' Shi Qingxuan watches the two of them, shuddering with grief and fear.

'He does,' Xie Lian agrees. 'But he'll regret this if you don't stop him.'

'I can't!' She whimpers out loud, covering her mouth with both hands. ' I can't stop him!'

'You can try. Shi Qingxuan, you have to try.'

'I already did! He wouldn't listen!'

'He will, just keep pushing him.'

(The thought process being, of course, that it can't make things worse.)

'Why would he listen to me?!'

The words that echo in her mind make her pause, the tears slowing on her cheeks.

'Because he cares for you, Shi Qingxuan. I've seen it.'

The tears return in full force.

'He doesn't,' she sobs, her chest aching, as though something inside of her is dying. 'HE HATES ME!'

'He does, even if he doesn't want to remember it right now,' Xie Lian's voice is persistent, trying to talk her through it.

He doesn't.

He doesn't.

How could he?

'You have to try and remind him,' Xie Lian speaks firmly, trying to keep her focused. 'That's the only thing you can do.'

From the other side of the chamber, He Xuan has come to a similar, if not perpendicular conclusion.

That he needs to show her. To show himself.

Exactly who her brother is. What he is.

“...You want me to spare him?” He glances in Shi Qingxuan’s direction, watching how she sits up, her eyes wide and dazed, nodding through her tears. “Alright, Water Master Xiong—I’ll give you a chance.” He Xuan lets go of his hair.

Shi Wudu falls forward onto his hands and knees, watching as Blackwater crosses the room—momentarily frightened that he’ll go to his sister, but—

He Xuan walks past her.

To the cages.

“I’m sure you remember that little spell of yours,” he murmurs, opening the door.

Every single mortal inside is one already marked for death.

Murders. War criminals. Rapists.

He drags one out by the hair, the madman practically giggling as He Xuan drags him across the floor.

“Why don’t you show off for your little sister?” Shi Wudu grows still.

He Xuan deposits the murderer beside Shi Qingxuan—the very same one that was wearing her locket before.

This time, he kneels behind them both, pushing them close together as he lifts the locket from the man’s neck—placing it back around Shi Qingxuan’s.

“Switch them.”

Shi Qingxuan trembles, cringing away from the man beside her—and further into Ming—He Xuan’s arms as a result.

And oh, how ashamed she is, that they still feel like home.

“Come on,” He Xuan prompts him, staring the Water Master down.

“Do it, and I’ll let you both go.”

Shi Wudu looks from him, to Shi Qingxuan.

Who smiles, mouthing the words—

‘It’s okay.’

And finally, in that moment, He Xuan sees something ruinous in Shi Wudu’s eyes. A pain that lingers deep in the soul.

‘It’s okay, gege.’

“...” The Water Master rises to his feet.

Slowly, as He Xuan backs away, he crosses the room, walking back over to his sister’s side.

And when he kneels before her, He Xuan watches. He waits.

Ready to step in and kill him the moment he begins the spell, because the point isn’t for Shi Wudu to succeed. The point is to show Shi Qingxuan what his cruelty looks like. To bring that thing out, like a poison, so He Xuan can finally kill it. So he can finally slay the monster that swallowed his life whole.

“...” Shi Wudu hangs his head low, his hair hiding his face.

He takes three breaths, long and slow. And when he looks up—

Shi Qingxuan’s brother smiles at her. It isn’t a happy smile.

It’s exhausted. Worn. Defeated.

But it’s—

It’s also at peace.

He takes her face between his hands, and for a moment, he leans their foreheads together

They can’t use travel or communication arrays here, but—

They can talk like this, however briefly.

And within Shi Qingxuan’s body—

Xie Lian hears it too.

‘Thank you.’

‘Ge—’

Shi Qingxuan was never a burden.

She made him strong.

Stronger than anyone else.

Having someone to protect. Someone who needed him.

It made him brave.

He wouldn’t have made it, if he hadn’t had someone else who needed him.

‘I failed you in so many ways, but…’ Shi Wudu inhales again, his shoulders trembling. ‘You have to be brave now, Qingxuan.’

‘Gege, listen—!’

His final words make her fall silent, too shocked to speak.

‘I love you, meimei.’

In all of Shi Qingxuan’s years of using her female form—he’s never called her that before.

Not once.

And while it often bothered her, she knew why.

Because Shi Wudu always remembered the fact that Shi Qingxuan was forced to disguise herself as a girl, when they were children.

Associating that with a lack of choice.

With the childhood that was stolen from her.

He never embraced Shi Qingxuan’s love of her female form. And this small act of acknowledgement—it feels like a final gift. The only thing he can give her, before—

Shi Wudu rises, letting her go.

“Don’t—” She starts, only to be drowned out by—

"HA!"

The Water Master throws his head back—

And he laughs.

"HAHAHAHAHA!"

He turns his head, looking at He Xuan over his shoulder. Smirking.

A wide, sneering smile spreading across his face. Showing him exactly what he wanted to see.

"You think you're so clever, don't you?" He muses, shoving Shi Qingxuan back. "Gods, you're still so pathetic."

He Xuan stares, his expression cold, non-reactive.

At first.

Shi Wudu presses a hand against his chest, laughing again. "The Crown Prince of Xianle already knows what I did. My airhead of a sister told plenty of people. Why do you think I locked her up? Never occurred to you?"

He Xuan's eyes flicker to Shi Qingxuan, who seems too shocked to respond.

"You think I care about making it back when people know what I did? That I'd rather be sent into exile by the emperor like Xianle?" Shi Wudu throws his head back, laughing again, full volume. "No, no...I've had four centuries of a life you couldn't even imagine," the water god smiles, clasping his hands behind his back as he walks closer to Shi Qingxuan. "I mean, maybe you can...you did spend a few decades eating my scraps, didn't you? Like a stray dog that no one wanted."

Shi Qingxuan's jaw drops, because this isn't him. This isn't her brother, he's—

"Gege," she speaks up, "Stop it!"

"And it makes sense now, that my sister is attached to you," Shi Wudu tilts his head back, pacing around He Xuan now.

Almost as though he's no longer the prey. "

She's always had an overdeveloped sense of pity for broken, worthless things. She used to bring back sick puppies when we were little. Birds with broken wings. She must have eaten your self pitying act right up," He sneers.

"...Self pitying?"

"Listen, listen, he's not—!"

"Yeah, because you what? My sister was cursed. I can't help but notice she's still here, after having lived this fabulous, happy life that you resent her so much for."

"BECAUSE YOU—!"

"Because I did something about it." Shi Wudu sneers. "Because I wasn't weak, like you."

He Xuan's eyes flare, and Shi Qingxuan—

Maybe his mind was already made up to kill Shi Wudu before, but he was—

'Mount Tonglu is opening soon.'

In spite of Xie Lian's warning, He Xuan seemed rational.

Hurt. Enraged. But rational.

But Shi Qingxuan knows her brother doesn't mean a word.

She saw the remorse, when he admitted to what he did before.

He made no excuses then. Seemed ready, almost relieved to accept punishment. And now—

"You've had so many years to kill me, but you waited." Shi Wudu looks around them, rolling his eyes. "You waited until you could lure me here, because you're not strong enough to kill me otherwise. And now that I am here, you're...playing mind games still? I thought Ghost Kings were supposed to be formidable."

He stops directly behind him, speaking just next to He Xuan's ear.

"Is that why you're always in Crimson Rain's shadow? Last time I checked..."

"..." He Xuan's hands ball into tight fists, his knuckles white.

"He took down thirty three gods single handedly." Shi Wudu sighs, rubbing the side of his neck. "And you can't even kill one?"

"GEGE, STOP IT! MI—HE—HE DOESN'T MEAN IT!"

But it's too late. He Xuan already tried to tell her, but—

"Maybe if you didn't hesitate so often, you would still have a little sister too."

BOOM!

It's far, far too late.

Shi Wudu's back hits the ground, hard—so hard, the marble splinters underneath his back—with Blackwater's knee crushing down on top of his chest, pinning him down, fangs bared, snarling in his face.

"AT LEAST SHE DIDN'T HAVE TO WATCH!"

And for a moment, in spite of all appearances— Both of them are getting exactly what they wanted. One, a swift end.

The other—the monster they always wanted to find. Satisfying both the desire to kill, and to be killed. Clawed fingers grip his hair, and begin to pull.

"WAIT!" Shi Qingxuan panics, scrambling to her knees, trying to get to them before it's too late. "HE'S TRICKING YOU, HE'S—YOU DON'T WANT TO DO THIS!"

He Xuan's eyes are blown, watching the Water Master's neck strain, bones cracking. "I do," he breathes. "I really, really do."

"You don't—THIS ISN'T WHAT YOU NEED!" Shi Qingxuan shakes her head, desperate.

"WHAT MAKES YOU THINK YOU KNOW WHAT I NEED?!"

The next words that come out of her mouth are the only in existence that ever could have made him pause.

"...Because you—YOU'RE A GOOD MAN, MI—HE XUAN!"

Silence falls across the room, and He Xuan—

His hands go still.

Shi Wudu doesn't make a sound, his breaths ragged, eyes closed, waiting. But He Xuan doesn't see him, right now.

He sees another face.

Kind eyes, and a warm smile.

Freckles like constellations across her nose.

He sees those eyes welled with tears, whimpering from the pain. And begging him.

Begging the man she loved, with her last breaths—

'Y…You're a good man, H…He Sheng. '

…Begging him not to become cruel.

That day, when his heart died.

He stares down at that face.

The face that has haunted every angry, pained thought for so many years.

The monster.

Her killer.

And he—

Drip!

Shi Wudu starts, his eyes fluttering limply, when something wet lands on his cheek.

"…No."

He looks back at her now—actually looks at her, and—

Two red lines make their way down his cheeks, dripping from his chin.

Ghost kings don't cry, after all. They lose that ability.

They only bleed.

"He Sheng was a good man," Black Water whispers, his form flickering. "He was a big brother. A friend. A son. He did what he thought was right. And he tried—"

His voice breaks, crimson tears falling from his chin.

"He tried so hard to do the right thing."

And it never worked.

No matter what he did. Everything. Everyone.

They were taken away.

And he never—he never knew what he was doing wrong.

Never knew what he had done to deserve what was happening to the people around him.

Never knew how to make it stop.

"..." Shi Qingxuan's tears might be human—

But they carry just as much sorrow.

"He's still in there." She clutches her chest, her breaths hitching. "I know he's still in there."

The man who held her so gently.

Who would find ways to make her laugh that seemed unintentional, because he was always so determined to keep a straight face.

Who insisted that he didn't care—but he never left her alone in the morning after they spent the night together.

He never let Shi Qingxuan cry without finding a way to distract her from it.

The man who made her feel capable. Strong. Like she could do things on her own. The man who kissed her under the fireworks just weeks before, telling her not to think about next year. Because she was eighth, this year.

Shi Qingxuan was enough, this year.

"...You don't know that."

“I do,” She whispers, her lips trembling. “I fell in love with him.”

He Xuan stares at her, his expression frozen, and for just a moment, her stomach leaps with hope, until—

Until she watches all of the feeling in his eyes slowly fade away. Because sometimes, after so much pain—

You learn not to feel things, even when you should.

“No.” He Xuan repeats, his voice hollow. “You didn’t.”

He slowly turns his head back down, looking at that face. He was a good man, once.

He loved so deeply, and he tried so hard.

All for nothing.

He’s done too much since then.

‘D...Don’t...’

He’s gone too far.

‘Don’t let them...make you f-forget that, He Xuan...’

Since that day, when he felt his heart die, piece by piece.

‘You’re...a good man.’

Good men Rest In Peace.

And oh, the things He Xuan has done, all while telling himself that he no longer had a heart.

“...He would have loved you,” He Xuan admits, only now, while denying the existence of his own soul.

Only now, while he breaks the last thing he loves. Watching the terror and pain in her eyes, as he explains—

“But your brother murdered him.”

And finally—his true form appears.

Bloodshot eyes, ruptured blood vessels in the cheeks and throat, spidery dark veins stretched over pale, waxen skin.

The corpse of He Sheng. A good man, who drowned.

And maybe, if he does what he couldn't do before—

If he slays his monster—maybe then, he'll find some peace.

Or maybe, it won't. Either way...his little sister's killer doesn't get to breathe anymore.

He's taken too many things already.

He Xuan won't allow him another breath.

Not a single one.

He starts to pull again, this time far more viciously, and Shi Qingxuan—she only has one idea left, and she knows it isn't very good.

It's not something that you can take back.

Admittedly manipulative. But—

It feels fair.

It felt fair, at the time.

"...I can hurt him more than you can."

He Xuan pauses, just as Shi Wudu goes still, and Shi Qingxuan—

She throws her head back, and she screams. With all of the force in her body. With all of the bravery that she possesses—

"I DISCARD IT!"

Shi Wudu stares, his eyes slowly growing wider and wider, all while He Xuan is frozen.

Now, the Water Master begins to struggle.

"MOVE!" He shoves at He Xuan's chest with a shocking amount of strength, suddenly displaying—

He never had any intention of fighting back to begin with. "STOP HER!"

"What—?"

“YOU HEAR ME, YOUR MAJESTY?!”

Now, for the first time in a long time— He Xuan feels something.

Something he felt a hint of, before, on the Terrace of Cascading Wine. Even though back then, he covered it up with layers of anger and denial:

Terror.

“...No,” he rasps, his fingers, which have dreamed of nothing but crushing the throat beneath his hands, going limp.

Shi Wudu, however, is anything but frozen—shoving Black Water off of him while the demon is too shocked to respond, rushing to her.

“I DON’T WANT IT ANYMORE!” Shi Qingxuan screams, “IT WAS NEVER MINE, SO TAKE IT BACK!”

“STOP—!”

He hopes, against all reason, that he won’t hear.

The only person who can grant her what she’s asking for. The person Shi Qingxuan is screaming out to, now.

He prays silently, abandoning all pride, pleading.

Pleading that he’s done enough. That he’s kept enough secrets.

That having his body and soul hollowed out and stripped bare is enough for the emperor to grant him one mercy:

Allowing him to die like this.

Letting it end.

Not forcing him to watch his sister—

BOOM!

Golden light fills the room in a crash, blinding all three of them.

And when it fades...

Shi Qingxuan is limp on the floor, breathing heavily.

“...No...” Shi Wudu mutters, grasping her shoulders, looking her over.

“No, no, no...” He presses his fingertips to her temple, trying to give her spiritual power, but—

The Water Master screams.

“NO!” He looks up at the ceiling, tears pouring down his cheeks, rage in every inch of his face, practically howling with a mixture of grief and fury. “I DID EVERYTHING YOU EVER ASKED OF ME!” Shi Qingxuan blinks blearily, her ears ringing. “GIVE IT BACK!”

It’s useless.

There’s no cursed shackle on her body.

This isn’t exile.

He couldn’t take it back, even if he was feeling merciful.

He Xuan stops, staring at her—how dull her complexion suddenly looks, how—

How the room suddenly feels colder.

“...What is this?” He asks flatly.

Shi Wudu whips his head around to send him a venomous glare, holding Shi Qingxuan against his chest.

“What the fuck do you think it is?!” He snarls. “ISN’T THIS WHAT YOU WANTED?!”

“She’s...” He Xuan glares, recoiling from both of them. “You think I’m going to fall for that?!”

“Fall for WHAT, you STUBBORN ASSHOLE?!” Shi Wudu shakes his sister for emphasis. “WE BOTH FUCKING SAW IT!”

“She’s not mortal.” He Xuan stalks forward, even as Shi Wudu scrambles back, holding her protectively. “For the most OBVIOUS fucking REASON!”

“You—!”

“IF SHE WAS MORTAL, HOW WOULD SHE STILL BE IN THAT BODY?!” His anger is spurred on by terror, fumbling for a logical explanation that tells him the worst isn’t true.

That her time has suddenly become so limited. Shi Wudu falters, suddenly unsure.

“It’s a spell,” He Xuan points at Shi Qingxuan furiously. “If she had no more spiritual power, then it would run out!”

And in that case—Shi Qingxuan would have reverted to her male form immediately upon Jun Wu taking her divinity.

But her shape has remained unchanged.

“...I don’t...” Shi Wudu stares down at her, struggling to line up what He Xuan’s saying—which is an indisputable fact—with what he just saw.

Another indisputable fact. Until—

Until his sister scrambles out of his arms, rolling over onto her hands and knees, and —

Gagging.

He Xuan stops, his arms hanging limply at his sides, just— Just staring at her, his eyes growing wider and wider.

“I don’t...” Shi Qingxuan rasps, holding one hand against her stomach as she dry heaves, “I haven’t been able to change back since the festival...I don’t...know why!”

“...You...” Shi Wudu stares down at her, his lips parted and trembling. “...You can’t change back...”

It’s dawning on all of them now, in different ways.

Both of Shi Qingxuan’s hands rest over her stomach as she sits up, dumbfounded. But—how—?

He Xuan stumbles backwards, pressing a hand against his forehead.

And it’s so, so unfair.

Because he—

He couldn’t have known, but—

Now, finally, a memory comes to him.

But not really.

A glimpse forward.

One he saw in the Kiln, centuries ago.

That’s the cruelest thing about looking forward.

Seeing things shuffled and out of context. Not knowing what’s real, and what isn’t. What was part of his future, or Hua Cheng’s. Or if it was a dream.

But—

‘Papa?’

There was a little boy.

Dressed in fine silk robes.

With dark hair, and…

Green eyes, just like the leaves on the trees, twinkling up at him brightly.

‘Bet you can’t catch me this time!’

That memory, sealed away for so many years—is now unlocked.

His—

He Xuan’s face drops into his hands.

His son.

He saw his son.

And the choice that’s left before him—leaves him with only two options.

Each horrifically unfair.

To him, and to her.

His fingers tighten around his temples, trembling.

“…Dammit…god…fucking…”

BANG!

His fist slams into the wall, making the room shake.

Shi Wudu can’t look away from his sister.

It takes a moment to crest over the dawning realization that someone you never stopped viewing as a child could conceive one of their own.

It—

It isn’t unheard of for goddesses to conceive. It—

It happens.

And there aren’t many examples of officials who were born male, like Shi Qingxuan, who often spend their time in female form. It just—

Shi Wudu had assumed that her body, being the result of magical transformation, wouldn’t be able to bear a child.

And even if she could...

...When Shi Wudu asked her if she was sexually active, his sister had told him no. Even when he specifically asked about Ming Yi—

She denied it.

And it had never occurred to him, until this very moment, that she would lie to him.

And that—

That changes everything.

“...You...”

Ming Yi sleeping with his sister was something he wouldn’t have approved of, even if he wouldn’t have forced her to put a stop to it.

But He Xuan.

He Xuan, sleeping with his sister.

While lying about who he was.

About his intentions.

"…I'LL FUCKING KILL YOU!"

"Gege—!"

The blow actually lands on He Xuan, who is simply too shell shocked to respond—a bunch so violent, it actually manages to spin his head around, snapping his neck.

Shi Qingxuan screams, shrinking against the wall, until she remembers, well— He's already dead.

And essentially invincible in this place—which Shi Wudu is perfectly aware of—

But that doesn't stop him from punching, kicking, and clawing at the calamity until they wrestle down onto the floor.

"GE, PLEASE, WE JUST—!"

She just barely managed to save his life, and now—

Finally, after taking around twelve consecutive hits to the face—

He Xuan makes his decision.

Shi Wudu stops in the middle of cocking his elbow back, choking—

A hand wrapped around his throat once more.

"Mi—He Xuan—!"

He looks over at her—and this time—

He actually sees her

And later, she'll be so, so confused.

Because now, in this moment—

It doesn't look like he hates her.

It—

It looks like he's sorry .

Crack!

With his free hand, he snaps his fingers—

And two portals open.

“...Where...” Shi Qingxuan starts, then, with a flick of his wrist, she begins to slide away, even as she claws at the floor, trying to stop herself from going through one portal, as she—

As she watches He Xuan drag her brother through the other. Realizing—

He never said a word about sparing her brother’s life.

He—

He’s still going to—

“DON’T!” She screams, flailing as she falls into darkness, “MIN—HE XUAN, DON’T!”

Chapter End Notes

> ...it's a boy!
>
> xoxo, Evie

Levels of Intent

Chapter Summary

Pei Ming sits Shi Qingxuan up, grabbing her by the shoulders. “What happened?!”

The Wi—

The young woman doesn’t respond.

Her face falls into her hands—and—

She begins to weep.

Not gently, or beautifully.

But straight from the pit of her stomach. Gut wrenching, heaving sobs.

Chapter Notes

content warnings; this chapter has brief references to abortion as well as rape, read with caution!

The next thing she knows, she is lying against soft grass.

Birds chirping overhead. A river in the distance.

A few feet away, Xie Lian sits up in Hua Cheng’s arms with a ragged gasp, bracing one hand against his leg as he coughs, and a few feet away...

Pei Ming sits Shi Qingxuan up, grabbing her by the shoulders. “What happened?!”

The Wi—

The young woman doesn’t respond.

Her face falls into her hands—and—

She begins to weep.

Not gently, or beautifully.

But straight from the pit of her stomach. Gut wrenching, heaving sobs.

“...He Xuan took the Water Master through a separate portal,” Xie Lian speaks up. “It’s impossible to say where, but...”

Xie Lian waves his hand in an awkward little gesture, pointing to Shi Qingxuan. “I officially appoint you as my deputy.”

Shi Qingxuan seems reluctant, crossing her arms—and Pei stares at Xie Lian like he’s lost his mind.

“Did you just call the Wind Master your deputy?”

“...I’m not the Wind Master anymore!” Shi Qingxuan spits out between bouts of heaving sobs, and when Pei Ming and Hua Cheng look to Xie Lian, he...

He sighs.

“She renounced her godhood in order to satisfy Blackwater’s revenge, but...”

It wasn’t enough.

“If that’s the case, then why are you...?” Pei questions, looking over her form, and then—

It dawns on him and Hua Cheng simultaneously, with Pei seeming nothing more than shocked, and Hua Cheng, he—

He is visibly horrified.

But no one is looking at him.

“I’ll take her to the Heavens—Mu Qing will have to take a look at her as soon as possible.”

And judging by the situation, well—

Pei will be hunting down wherever Black Water has taken the water master.

So—there’s no time to waste.

Xie Lian stands up, reaching over to squeeze Hua Cheng's shoulder. He...

For an instant, part of him wishes that the Ghost King could come with him, even if he knows that Hua Cheng wouldn't be welcome in the capital.

He sighs.

"I'll come find you in Ghost City once we know what's going on."

Pei doesn't say a word, kneeling down and lifting Shi Qingxuan up into his arms. Despite centuries at one another's throats, she doesn't protest.

"As will I."

They told Pei that they would explain, after all.

Though Xie Lian expects that not even Hua Cheng has an explanation for everything that just transpired.

Still.

"I'll be waiting," Hua Cheng mutters, crossing his arms—seeming to loathe the idea of Xie Lian going to the heavens alone just as much as the prince does.

"Be careful, gege."

The first thing he does, upon entering the Heavenly City, is summon Mu Qing from the communication array.

His private one, not the general matrix.

That venue is flooded with panicked officials, worrying about the Wind and Water Masters.

Given the seriousness of the situation, within a matter of minutes...

They're standing within the Emperor's private palace, with Shi Qingxuan laying back in bed as Mu Qing examines her.

The others stand off to the side—and the discussion—

It's tense.

"Where could he be that we wouldn't know?!" Pei has done well up until now, keeping his composure--but the longer he goes without answers or even a lead, he becomes more and more frayed.

"I've asked every scout I have," Ling Wen mutters. "And they've all reported back." Even she, normally stoic, is visibly upset.

"And you?!" Pei whips his head around to look at Jun Wu, who has been sitting in a chair by Shi Qingxuan's bedside, rather quiet. "You MUST know where he is!"

The emperor has his legs crossed, his mouth leaning against his fist.

"I can't see him anywhere," he mutters, his eyes narrow, tension written across the set of his mouth.

"Since when?" Pei Ming stares, shaking his head. "Since when has there been something YOU couldn't see?!"

"Pei," Ling Wen places a hand on his arm—silently warning him.

"...I can't see within Blackwater Manor, not unless someone within calls out to me." Jun Wu points out—and they know he isn't there. "Nor can I see within certain sections of Ghost City."

In an instant, everyone in the room looks at Xie Lian, who frowns. "He isn't there," he firmly denies it. "San Lang would have told me."

"Yes," Pei mutters, laughing helplessly. "Because he's been extremely forthcoming, hasn't he?"

"Pei..." Feng Xin places a hand on Xie Lian's shoulder. "Don't lash out at him over Crimson Rain's actions."

Xie Lian shrugs his friend's hand off, frowning at both of them.

"San Lang didn't help Blackwater, not even once." He shakes his head. "The only reason he was there was to make sure no harm came to me."

"But he knew what was going to happen, and he didn't say..." Pei looks up at Xie Lian, seeming genuinely lost. "Can you actually defend that?"

The prince falls silent, and before he can answer, Mu Qing stands up, slipping off his gloves.

"...It's true," he mutters, offering news that, in any other occasion, would be joyous.

In this case, however, it brings only tense silence in the room—everyone watching Shi Qingxuan, who is staring out the window, her expression blank and dazed.

"…" Pei wipes a hand down his face, turning away from Xie Lian as he walks over to her, sitting on the edge of the bed.

"Look, I know this is not a conversation she's going to want to have with everyone else here," He mutters. "Nan Yang—I—"

He grits his teeth, closing his eyes.

Knowing full well that, if Jun Wu can't see where Shi Wudu is, then no one can.

And in that case, the best thing he can do is stay here, waiting for one of the scouts to report back, sending as many people possible to search —

But Shi Wudu…

'If it comes down to it, and you choose me over her—I won't forgive you.'

…Would want someone with Shi Qingxuan.

"Gather as many martial gods as you can, and have them sweep their sectors. I know a few minor water deities I can set on the search. Ling Wen—send word out to them. Odds are he wouldn't have ventured into the Northern or Western oceans, but it's worth looking."

He glances back in Xie Lian's direction.

"Is there any chance Crimson Rain would be willing to look in the Ghost Realm if the request came from you?"

"…I don't know," the prince answers honestly. "But he wouldn't lie to me either way, so it can't hurt to ask."

Pei nods, and Xie Lian can't help not notice that—while he's doing exactly what should be done to organize their search efforts—

Jun Wu has taken a noticeable back seat to that discussion.

Wasn't Shi Wudu the closest to him?

Is he really so worried that he can't give orders?

Pei leans closer to Shi Qingxuan, who shrinks away slightly.

And she can't be blamed—their interactions for the last few centuries have been characterized by shouting matches and constant bickering, but now…

Pei Ming speaks to her calmly. Gently. “Who do you want to stay?”

“…His highness…” She mumbles, pulling the sheets up to her chest, sitting up. “And Xuan Zhen.”

The rest of them have assignments to carry out as it is—and as such, they make their exits.

Leaving Pei Ming, Mu Qing, Xie Lian, and the emperor behind.

“…I’ll be going too,” Jun Wu finally mutters, rising to his feet. “I have my own avenues to look into for finding him, but…there are two things you should know.”

This, he directs at Shi Qingxuan.

“If your brother is found alive, he will be exiled.”

Pei suddenly goes rigid.

“What?” He asks flatly. “On what charge?”

“…” Jun Wu eyes him for a moment, and Xie Lian feels compelled to speak.

“It’s been an emotional day for all of us, your majesty.”

“…Indeed. I’ll allow Shi Qingxuan and Xianle to explain the situation to you then.” Jun Wu looks Shi Qingxuan over, his gaze…complex, but…

Remorseful.

“Had I known your condition, I would not have granted your request.”

Shi Qingxuan bows her head, biting her lip. “If I had known—I wouldn’t have asked,” she whispers.

“And while I have great sympathy for your situation…Xianle, I understand you appointed Shi Qingxuan as your deputy.”

Xie Lian lifts his head, raising an eyebrow. “I did, your majesty.”

“I’m afraid that violates Heavenly Law.”

“Since when?” Pei frowns. “How is it a violation?”

“When a god or goddess discards their immortality, it’s because they’ve gone into retirement in most cases.”

Which, in itself, is a rare choice. Most gods fade into obscurity rather than bowing out willingly.

The Rain Master is an odd exception to that trend. She has offered to train a replacement and retire no less than six times in the last millennia—and each time that she’s tried, her worshippers have stubbornly refused to stop praying to her. After the sixth time, the emperor said stripping her immortality was a waste of effort.

When Shi Qingxuan asked her why she seemed so determined not to live among the other heavenly officials, Yushi Huang simply said: She did not enjoy politics, and she had no skill as a leader. She would be much happier at home, on her farm, until her years ran out.

Which Shi Qingxuan found strange at the time, as a young god herself.

There didn’t seem to be anything political about it. There’s no choice in whether or not a person ascends. Even the emperor is only in charge because he has the most worshippers.

And yet now, years later…She can’t help but wonder if the Rain Master was right all along.

“…But, it’s also true that when a Heavenly Official renounces their godhood, any crimes they committed during or after their ascension can no longer be punished by the Heavens.”

Pei grits his teeth—and he can’t even argue with that point. He’s been in the Heavenly Court long enough to remember instances where officials were pressured into retiring, rather than endure the scandal of being banished.

‘Let’s not be another Xianle,’ is a common phrase.

“It takes you out of my jurisdiction—and in cases where the crime is also a violation of mortal law, the worldly authorities will deal with you there.” Jun Wu sighs, leaning one hand against his dresser. “But there used to be a loophole in that system.”

Jun Wu taps his finger over a small scratch in the wood. Unnoticed by anyone who isn’t looking for it.

It came from a sharp corner on one of the Water Master's earrings, dragging as the emperor held his head down.

...And here he had thought that he wouldn't have any mementos.

"There used to be a trend long ago, in the former dynasty, where corrupt officials would retire or discard their godhood, have their friends appoint them back to the middle court, and essentially live the same lives as they did before. Even if they didn't ascend again."

Xie Lian can hear the obvious problem with such a thing—but Pei still can't seem to buy into that line of thinking.

"What crime has she committed? She clearly gave up her divinity under duress. It shouldn't even count!"

Xie Lian reaches over to pat Shi Qingxuan's hand.

She doesn't respond, simply turning her palm over to squeeze her fingers around his —and Xie Lian knows—

She isn't going to say it. Probably can't bring herself to, given what may or may not be happening to her brother at this very moment.

"...San Lang and Shi Qingxuan can probably explain the circumstances more accurately later," Xie Lian sighs, closing his eyes. "But during their mortal lives—Shi Wudu swapped the fates of He Xuan and Shi Qingxuan."

"...What?"

His reaction isn't quite what Xie Lian expected.

He doesn't immediately deny that Shi Wudu would have done such a thing—nor does he sound particularly horrified.

Only shocked, and confused.

"...The Reverend told me," Shi Qingxuan mutters, pulling her legs up against her chest. "Or...I suppose that was actually He Xuan."

It was him from the very beginning.

Trying to tell her.

To give her 'chances.'

“...And when I confronted gege, he told me it was true.” Pei falls silent, thinking it over.

And once again—he doesn’t react.

“...Then if he were here, he’d tell you—it’s his crime, not hers.”

Jun Wu crosses his arms, and Xie Lian sighs, knowing exactly what it comes down to. “...Not necessarily,” he mutters. Sympathetic for Shi Qingxuan—but crimes aren’t always committed intentionally—or even knowingly.

“How can she be punished for something she had no part in?”

Pei Ming is an honorable man. A soldier by trade.

But as someone who was raised to rule—Xie Lian’s understanding of laws, both earthly and divine, is more nuanced.

“She’s not as directly responsible as Shi Wudu, she didn’t commit the act herself, but...” He sighs.

Jun Wu watches him, vaguely approving.

“You haven’t forgotten your training, Xianle.” He murmurs, turning his attention back to General Pei. “There are different levels of guilt.”

Attached to different levels of intent.

Purposefully.

Knowingly.

Recklessly.

And negligently.

Purposefully wouldn’t even describe what Shi Wudu had done.

After all, he wasn’t the one who actively committed the crimes against He Xuan’s family.

He simply knew that, by switching his fate with Shi Qingxuan’s, a tragedy was reasonably certain to occur.

To make the comparison more simple:

What Shi Wudu did was selfish, and the repercussions were severe—but he's no Bai Wuxiang, that much is certain.

"It's not about what she knew," Xie Lian turns his head away, feeling distinctly uncomfortable with the situation. "It's about what she should have known."

She didn't purposefully hurt He Xuan. She didn't knowingly commit an act that she knew was reasonably certain to hurt He Xuan.

She wasn't even reckless.

That would imply that she deliberately engaged in behavior knowing that it could cause someone harm.

But Shi Qingxuan, whom Xie Lian would still say is an innocent in this situation—

Was negligent.

Even she admitted it, in Blackwater Manor.

That she knew something was off early on, sensing that her sudden rise was amiss.

And she made no effort to uncover the truth, fearing what the answer would be.

Maybe if she had pursued it from the beginning, she would have uncovered the truth.

And if she had, their fates could have been switched back—likely before He Xuan's family was murdered.

Her benefit, her decision to live in ignorance—directly resulted in his pain.

It's not comparable to what her brother has done, it's the lowest level of guilt, but—

She's still guilty, even if it's a far lesser crime.

"...I should have done something," Shi Qingxuan admits quietly. Not having the same technical knowledge as Xie Lian, but—

Knowing, in her heart, that she was wrong.

"You didn't know." Pei shakes his head. "If you're guilty of a crime, then we all are." He glances over at Jun Wu, and—

That's the irritating thing about Pei Ming.

His gaze is unwavering, and he always looks the emperor in the eye.

"If every single god who looked the other way from sin was banished, the Heavens would stand empty and leaderless."

"..." Jun Wu cracks a lopsided smile, but he—

He seems to find no joy in the situation.

"And people say you're not a poet, Ming Guang. You deserve more credit." He looks back at Shi Qingxuan, who struggles to meet his gaze.

"But there are realities to situations that we must accept. In this case —the Water Master's crimes have been made public. I have sympathy for Shi Qingxuan, but I can't give her no consequences at all."

At a certain point, it ceases being about justice—

And it becomes political.

"If Shi Qingxuan had not discarded her godhood, I simply would have banished her for a short term. But now that she has, if I allow her back into the middle court, with her connections..."

She would suffer very little punishment at all—and that would erode what little credibility the Heavens has when it comes to enforcing their code to begin with.

"So, you're telling me she's going to be a scapegoat?" Pei questions with a glare. "You can't make any exceptions?"

"Let's not pretend that you aren't capable of swallowing injustice when it benefits you, Ming Guang." Jun Wu points out calmly. "And yes, there will be exceptions made for the former Wind Master."

Xie Lian doesn't dare to feel hopeful, listening as he explains:

"While she will not be granted spiritual powers or a place within the middle court, she may maintain a residence within the Heavenly Capital and travel between realms as she pleases."

And Xie Lian cannot deny—that is a generous exception. Mortals are forbidden from entering the Heavens, Ghosts as well—

(Though that doesn't stop particularly determined calamities from sneaking in through the back.)

Xie Lian has actually never heard of such an exception. "And her child, when born, will have the same privilege."

Which makes sense, Xie Lian supposes. After four centuries of being a god, Shi Qingxuan has no family or friends in the Mortal Realm to return to. It...

It genuinely does seem like a kindness.

But one thing does strike him as odd: Mu Qing's silence is becoming deafening.

He's one of the most opinionated people Xie Lian knows, never shy about sharing his thoughts—and he hasn't said a word during this entire debate.

Until now.

"Is your decision final, your majesty?" He looks into Jun Wu's eyes, wary—and now Xie Lian starts to realize.

Mu Qing knows something that they don't.

"It is." Jun Wu glances around the room one final time, offering Shi Qingxuan one last piece of hope: "And Lady Shi Qingxuan will be allowed to partake in cultivation. Perhaps, with luck, she'll ascend on her own merits."

He says that—but Xie Lian doesn't think the emperor believes it. More like he's offering empty words of comfort.

"But, if you find my ruling unsatisfactory..." the emperor shrugs. "Your child's father is a ghost—which means you fall within their jurisdiction as well."

He glances around the room—the very bed that Shi Qingxuan is laying upon, thinking.

Taking quiet intrigue in how many things have happened here that they don't know about.

The satisfaction that brings. The sense of control.

“I don’t know what they can offer you, but you’re welcome to try your chances with them. In any case, I wish you the best of luck. Now,” he walks towards the door. “I should be looking for your brother.”

The door shuts behind him, and Shi Qingxuan—she shrinks.

“…What does he mean by that?” She mutters, confused.

How would that even work, asking the Ghost Realm for help?

“…He means San Lang,” Xie Lian murmurs—surprised to find that, after such little time…

He now knows more about the Ghost Realm than most Heavenly Officials.

While Hua Cheng and Blackwater are technically of equal rank—the latter is notoriously uninvolved.

(Which now, knowing that he was posing as a Heavenly Official, makes sense.) The de facto decision maker within the ghost realm, as a result, is Hua Cheng.

“…But how could he help me?” Shi Qingxuan mutters with a frown.

“Protection, I’m assuming…”

After all, Xie Lian doesn’t believe that He Xuan intends to return to harm Shi Qingxuan, but that’s more of a hunch—whereas Hua Cheng’s protection provides a guarantee of safety.

“…And would he protect me?” She questions, unsure.

“Yes.” Xie Lian agrees immediately.

Maybe not if Shi Qingxuan was any other official, but after everything they just went through…

Hua Cheng wouldn’t refuse.

“Then that’s just as much good as letting her stay in the Heavens.” Pei crosses his arms. “She would be even safer here. But that—that isn’t what we need to worry about right now.”

Which surprises Xie Lian—because it feels like the most pressing matter at hand, but—the general turns to Shi Qingxuan, looking her in the eye.

“You have options. You don’t have to make a decision today, but whatever you do decide—you won’t be alone.”

Operating under the assumption, of course, that her brother will remain by her side when he returns.

When.

Pei Ming refuses to consider the possibility of ‘if.’

“...Options?” Shi Qingxuan questions, uncertain.

“You obviously weren’t trying to have a child,” Pei explains—and it’s a little awkward for both of them, switching from their normally antagonistic dynamic—

But he puts that aside with shocking ease.

“And even if you were, the identity of the father—and what he’s done—complicates things. No one would blame you if you didn’t want...”

...If she didn’t want to continue the pregnancy.

“...Considering everything, Min—” She hangs her head, biting her lip. “He Xuan hasn’t actually...”

And Xie Lian—

He can’t help but feel pity.

Because even now, after everything— ‘I know he’s still in there.’

Shi Qingxuan still seems to have some amount of faith in him. That Blackwater, at his core, is a good man.

Pei isn’t receptive to that point of view—given Shi Qingxuan’s situation, her brother’s disappearance, and the fact that he lied, but—

“...I’m so sorry.”

Everyone pauses when those words are blurted out in a rush—

From no one other than Mu Qing.

Shi Qingxuan looks up, startled to be hearing that from him—but she offers a strained smile.

“I-It’s okay, really! It’s...my fault for being so—”

She stops when Pei’s hand lands on her shoulder, squeezing firmly—and when she looks up, he stares right into her eyes.

“This,” he looks down at her stomach, “is not your fault. You were lied to. He’ll pay for that.”

Shi Qingxuan frowns. “I don’t want—”

“Mu Qing,” Xie Lian speaks up, talking over them both. “What were you talking about?”

He knows him.

Knows him a little too well, honestly.

While he might have felt sorry for Shi Qingxuan being lied to and saddled with an unplanned pregnancy—he wouldn’t have spoken like that.

He must know something.

“...” Mu Qing looks at the ceiling, tracing gilded tiles with his eyes as he takes a deep breath.

He hasn’t had to do this, not to someone he knows.

The benefit of being a physician to a court of immortals.

“...I’m sorry,” he repeats carefully, not looking down. “But you don’t have options.”

Xie Lian and Pei both stiffen, and Shi Qingxuan stares, confused.

“What?”

She reaches down, placing a hand over her stomach without even thinking—a newfound instinct, but one that feels as simple as breathing.

“What’s that supposed to mean?”

“...If your body was still immortal, we could terminate the pregnancy at your request. But...”

Pei stares, the muscles in his jaw working. “But what? You’re saying that won’t work?”

“...Look, it’s a unique situation,” Mu Qing mutters, crossing his arms. “But there’s good reason to think that attempting that might kill her.”

Xie Lian stiffens—immediately reaching for Shi Qingxuan’s hand, squeezing it tightly. “...Kill her?”

“If the father was a god, or a mortal man, it would be different. But in this case...”

The father is a ghost.

Not only a ghost—but a powerful calamity.

“...Even if we terminated the fetus—and she’s early along, it wouldn’t be complicated—the cursed energy it’s carrying would immediately cause it to become a fetal spirit, like...”

Like Cuocuo.

And with a father that powerful—

It would devour Shi Qingxuan from the inside.

“...I didn’t want to get rid of it anyway,” Shi Qingxuan mutters, holding onto Xie Lian’s hand tightly, holding herself around the middle with her other arm.

She’s already lost so much—

The idea of having a family. Even a small, admittedly twisted one...

Is comforting.

Still—

Mu Qing’s expression hasn’t gotten any less grim—and Pei Ming can hardly stand it, rising to his feet.

“If you have more to tell us, then just spit it out Xuan Zhen.”

He blows out a breath, finally dropping his eyes down from the ceiling—and he forces it out quickly.

"No mortal woman has ever survived carrying a ghost's child to term."

Shi Qingxuan feels all of the breath leave her—and now, it feels as though she's hearing every other word that's being said. Listening through a fog.

"...So you're telling us she's dead either way?!"

"If she was still a goddess, her body could survive terminating the pregnancy—or she could use her spiritual power to purify the cursed energy within her body and carry the child to term, but..."

"Then just let her use mine!" Pei cries out, frustrated. "I've got more than enough to spare!"

"It doesn't matter how much spiritual power you give her if she can't control it and direct it towards the child," Mu Qing pinches the bridge of his nose, and Shi Qingxuan—

She's never been more vividly aware of the consequences to her own choices.

"Shi Qingxuan has been a goddess for four centuries," Xie Lian frowns, holding onto her hand resolutely. "Surely, she can..."

Then, he notices that his friend has begun to tremble.

"...I always had spiritual devices, your highness." She whispers—and Xie Lian remembers what he heard He Xuan tell her, back in Blackwater Manor, when Xie Lian was attempting to help her—

That Shi Qingxuan had never cared too much about developing her cultivation.

"I never...learned how..."

Now, it begins to dawn on him.

"Even a high level mortal cultivator would struggle with purging that kind of resentment from inside their own body. And in the time it would take for her to learn..."

The child would grow to term, and...

Kill her.

Ascending again, one way or the other, might be easier.

Even if both seem equally impossible.

Still—

Xie Lian's eyes narrow with determination, and he holds her hand firmly. "Then I'll teach you cultivation myself."

The prince is more than happy to admit that, in most occasions, he's useless.

But he's managed to ascend three times. One of his students founded a cultivation sect. Another is Martial God of the East. He was able to teach Xiong Li enough to ascend in a single year.

That has to count for something.

"...Thank you, your highness," Shi Qingxuan mumbles, her voice thick with emotion— fear, and sadness. "I'll do my best, but..."

To some extent, cultivation is a matter of hard work and dedication. But it's also about natural talent.

And she just learned—

None of the talent she thought she had was her own.

And her brother, who knew her better than anyone...

He was so sure that she couldn't ascend or survive on her own, that he was willing to commit such a horrible crime to save her.

"...And you don't just have me," Xie Lian points out, reaching up to stroke her hair, pushing her bangs away from her face. "San Lang knows so many things, he can teach you too—and you know, from all the traveling I've done, I know quite a few cultivation masters in the mortal—"

"Thank you, your highness." Shi Qingxuan repeats herself, her voice still trembling. "I know you'll do your best—and you don't have to feel obligated to help me. You've already done so much..."

"It's nothing less than what you would do for me, if the tables were turned."

"..." Shi Qingxuan leans against him, crumbling when Xie Lian wraps an arm around her, pressing her face into his shoulder. "...Xuan Zhen?"

"Yes?" Mu Qing responds wearily.

"The baby…my baby…" She mumbles, her voice quivering. "…Even if I can't…will it be alright?"

"…Yes, most likely." Mu Qing nods.

In a normal situation, the results would be a bit more mixed. Most mortal women who conceive children with ghosts—while already a small group—the ghosts involved are usually less powerful, and…

Shi Qingxuan was a goddess when she conceived

In all likelihood, she's probably carrying the most durable unborn child currently in existence.

Normally, when a mortal woman is consumed by the fetus—the child left behind turns into a ghost fire.

But as the child of a goddess and a ghost king… It has far better chances.

By the end of the day, she's resettled into Pei Ming's palace—unable to stand the sight of her own, knowing that her brother isn't there.

Xie Lian stays for the first day, then the second—waiting with everyone else for word of the Water Master, as well as his abductor.

But nothing comes.

No sightings. No contact.

Nothing.

Xie Lian comforts the Wind Master as best as he can—and while they try to start with some basic lessons—

She's so worried for her brother, it doesn't seem to be of any use. Then, on the third day—Xie Lian stops in her room just after lunch.

"…I can wait longer, if you'd like—but since we haven't heard anything more…I think I should go and ask San Lang about what he might know."

At the very least—even if all he does is admit that he doesn't know about what's going on—showing that he's not assisting Blackwater could help take some of the blame that other heavenly officials have been so eager to lay at his feet.

“That makes sense,” Shi Qingxuan agrees.

She’s sitting beside the window now, wearing a loose white dress, with an oversized blue robe thrown across her shoulders.

Her brother’s.

She hasn’t stopped watching the golden gates, twisting her locket around and round her fingers.

“…Mu Qing will see to your lessons while I’m gone,” Xie Lian reaches over, giving her shoulder one last squeeze. “We’ll discuss logistics after…”

“Thank you, your highness.” Shi Qingxuan reaches up, patting his hand with her own. “Really.”

Xie Lian offers her a small smile—having already assured her countless times that it’s nothing, and he knows she would do the same, but…when he makes it to the door, she calls over.

“Your highness?”

“Yes?”

Xie Lian stops, his hand on the door handle.

“…If I don’t make it, I don’t want everyone arguing over…”

Over her child.

The mere mention of that makes him wince.

“It's too early to be worrying about that.”

“I know, but…” She bites her lip. “I trust you to know what’s right.”

At least someone does—because he certainly doesn’t.

“And I think it would help me relax if I knew…whatever happens to me, someone will be putting them first, you know?”

Oddly enough—yes.

Xie Lian thinks he might understand.

"...I promise," Xie Lian murmurs, "Regardless of what happens—I'll make sure they're well looked after."

But he desperately hopes it won't come to that.

Even if Shi Qingxuan is somewhat ill prepared to be a parent...It's clear—

How deeply she cares for the child already.

"Thank you, your highness."

He leaves not long after—and Shi Qingxuan is left alone, staring out the window, her locket settled against her palm.

"Where are you?" She whispers, staring at the horizon.

Three days.

The longest she's ever gone without seeing her brother is nine.

And in the time since they became friends, this is the longest she's ever gone without seeing...

...He Xuan.

The three longest, loneliest days that she can remember.

Punctuated by the waiting, and wondering.

Then, as she watches the sun begin to set, she feels it.

One moment, it was perfectly quiet and still, and the next...

The golden locket she's been twisting round, and round, and round—

It begins vibrating violently against her palm.

So much so, she nearly drops it from surprise, and then—

Shi Qingxuan feels her blood turn to ice.

There's only one thing in the world that would make it do that.

If the owner of its other half was—

Was in pain.

"...Pei," she mutters, the word barely coming out from her fear, her voice half hoarse. She pushes back, her chair screeching against the floor.

She spent countless years hating the man. Resenting him.

Rolling her eyes each and every time her brother said the words—

'When I'm gone, you'll be grateful for him.'

And now, here she is—stumbling through the halls of his palace, screaming for him to hurry.

"PEI—!"

Then, just as quickly as it began—

The vibrations stop.

The locket goes still against her palm.

Cold, and unmoving.

"...SOMETHING'S—!"

BOOM!

For a moment, all of the Heavens grows still, enveloped in a flash of golden light, the streets rocked by the force of the crash.

Shi Qingxuan barely manages to catch herself against the doorframe, and outside— she can hear confused cries.

"Just what was that?!"

"Are we under attack?!"

"The crown prince of Xianle didn't ascend again, did he?!"

"He wasn't banished a third time, you fool!"

"Was it the—?"

Then, someone cries out over the rest, words that bring such relief, her knees almost buckle;

"...IT'S THE WATER MASTER!"

The Myth Behind All Monsters

Chapter Summary

> The portal closes behind them, and that hand that's been dragging him in a Vice grip finally lets him go—sending him tumbling down against a hard, stone floor.
>
> Actually, when Shi Wudu manages to open his eyes, looking down— It's marble.
>
> Smooth not from the work of craftsmen—but through millennia of natural weathering.
>
> And when he forces himself up onto his hands and knees, coughing—
>
> He finds himself in a place unlike anywhere else that he's ever been.
>
> A cavern with a ceiling that stretches so high, it's impossible to see the end of it. "...Where are we?" He rasps, coughing as he struggles to his feet.
>
> Blackwater doesn't reply.

Chapter Notes

> CONTENT WARNING: this chapter features discussions of consent, graphic violence, death, and severe childhood trauma. Continue with caution!

See the end of the chapter for more notes

THREE DAYS AGO

If Shi Wudu's neck hurt any more, he'd think his head was about to go flying from his shoulders.

The clawed grip around his throat is like iron, dragging him forward, step by step, even as the Water Master kicks his feet and struggles—

THUD!

The portal closes behind them, and that hand that's been dragging him in a Vice grip finally lets him go—sending him tumbling down against a hard, stone floor.

Actually, when Shi Wudu manages to open his eyes, looking down—It's marble.

Smooth not from the work of craftsmen—but through millennia of natural weathering.

And when he forces himself up onto his hands and knees, coughing—

He finds himself in a place unlike anywhere else that he's ever been.

A cavern with a ceiling that stretches so high, it's impossible to see the end of it. "…Where are we?" He rasps, coughing as he struggles to his feet.

Blackwater doesn't reply immediately.

He's facing away from him, hands clasped behind him—shoulders thrown back.

"…Where I was born."

Of course, for a moment—Shi Wudu is confused.

He knows exactly where He Xuan was born, exactly when. The details of his birth were the tools and method of his crime.

But—

Ghost King's have their own place of origin.

In death, they are reborn.

"…" Shi Wudu glances down at his palm, watching as a bright orb of blue energy forms before disappearing.

His powers aren't suppressed here, then.

They're no longer in Blackwater's territory.

"…Why bring me here?" He questions,glancing around, silently looking for an exit.

Still, he won't answer.

Shi Wudu closes his eyes.

Before—he had been utterly prepared to die. On some level—he had even been longing for it.

To get it over with.

But that was before

Before he knew his sister's fate.

And now—

"...This was a mistake, you know."

He Xuan's lips curve into a tired smile.

"Maybe."

But it's the only thing that he could think of.

"You should have killed me before. I—I gave you SO MANY CHANCES!"

He's still bedraggled from the fight with his Heavenly Calamity. His hair rumpled, clothes torn.

"I don't need 'chances' to take your life." He Xuan's voice goes from exhausted to hardened, claws flashing at his sides."It's mine to take. Mine to spare."

Shi Wudu's eyes narrow as he paces around the edge of the Kiln, flashing as he reaches into his belt.

"I don't want your mercy, Blackwater," he hisses. "It means NOTHING to me!"

He Xuan turns his head slowly, looking at him over his shoulder, black hair flowing loosely down his back.

The whites of his eyes have gone completely dark, with burning, golden irises in the center.

"...Oh, Shui-Xiong," his smile is lopsided, half cracked—marked with the kind of suffering that leaves a mind warped as he utters the Water Master's pet name with such sarcastic affection. "Who said anything about showing you mercy?"

"…"

Shi Wudu stops, hand in his belt.

Then, he smiles.

Relieved.

"Then you should have killed me before."

Blood still drips from the two cuts on his cheekbones, creating two paths down to his chin.

His fan is pulled from his belt, a white flash in his speed.

BOOM!

And now—

It's begun.

One might assume that, in a cave far removed from any source of water—a Water God and a Demon of the Black Water might be forced to fight on a smaller scale.

Not so.

And a battle between a god of the highest caliber and one of the Four Great Calamities, well—

It's a rare sight.

And it rapidly becomes clear to He Xuan…just how much the Water Master was holding back before.

Even during the battle with his Heavenly Calamity, before he pulled them off course. Every blow is landed with such ferocity—even blocking causes damage.

"YOU STILL THINK YOU'RE JUST A VICTIM, DON'T YOU?!"

Each time they clash, the very ground beneath them seems to rattle.

BOOM!

"AND YOU STILL THINK YOU'RE NOT THE VILLAIN?!" He Xuan snarls, catching his fan with one hand, using the other to slash with a wave of dark energy.

Shi Wudu drops down, sliding underneath as the wave shoots past, so powerful, it scorches the opposite wall of the Kiln, leaving a deep scar.

“IF BEING MISTREATED WAS ALL IT TOOK TO JUSTIFY CRUELTY, THEN I’VE ALWAYS BEEN A VICTIM!”

BOOM!

“BUT THAT’S THE DIFFERENCE BETWEEN YOU AND ME!” Shi Wudu’s next blow lands on his arm, actually managing to break Blackwater’s stance. “I NEVER MADE EXCUSES FOR WHAT I DID TO YOU!”

He Xuan briefly sinks to his knees, eyes flashing up at him, narrowed with hate.

“…And I DON’T NEED TO MAKE ANY EXCUSES TO YOU!” He lashes out on his own this time, sweeping the Water Master’s feet out from under him.

He wasn’t much of a fighter, once.

Life made him learn.

He reaches down for Shi Wudu’s throat once more, but—

CRASH!

The Water Master’s boot lands in his gut, sending him flying into the opposite wall with a slam .

“Not to ME!” He rolls to his feet, “FOR WHAT YOU DID TO SHI QINGXUAN!”

“You have no idea—”

“Do you HONESTLY THINK SHE WOULD HAVE GONE TO BED WITH YOU, IF SHE HAD KNOWN?!”

For the first time, there’s a crack in He Xuan’s resolve. The smallest flicker of remorse.

“I’ve always been the villain in your story,” Shi Wudu admits raggedly, the two of them pacing around the edges of the kiln, watching for the other’s next attack.

“...How does it feel to be the monster in hers?”

Those words actually seem to lash into him, making him flinch, pressing his hand back against the Kiln wall.

“...I brought you here because of her,” He Xuan spits out, claws digging into marble. “I STOPPED back there—for HER!”

“DON’T PRETEND YOU CARE!”

That’s all men like him do.

They look at you for the things that you have. For what you can do for them. Then they claw into you, like a vulture on a carcass. Pulling out everything of value.

And when there’s nothing left of you, they complain of hunger. He’s had enough.

He has nothing left.

He’s hollowed out, nothing but scars and regrets.

But—

Not Shi Qingxuan.

Never Shi Qingxuan.

“IF YOU CARED, YOU WOULD HAVE JUST KILLED ME, AND LEFT HER OUT OF IT!”

This time, when they charge in for the next attack—

Shi Wudu’s eyes burn, glowing an unnatural shade of blue, gleaming with heavenly light.

And this time, He Xuan is frozen.

Not by his own choice.

Frozen in the air, his arm raised for another blow.

Faint sounds filter through the air as Shi Wudu stands beneath him, one hand raised, curled into a fist.

It takes He Xuan a moment to realize what they are—wondering if other ghosts in the area sensed the fighting, but—that's not it.

They're prayers.

Thousands.

Begging for salvation. A child. Wealth.

Revenge.

And with them comes strength—strength that the Water Master is instantly converting into Spiritual Power.

"You and Shi Qingxuan have something in common," the Water Master tilts his head, hair slipping from his ponytail. "You've spent so much time infiltrating the Heavens—you haven't concentrated on developing your abilities beyond that, have you?"

In sheer scales of power, he's comparable to Crimson Rain Sought Flower.

But his finesse—his control—is lacking.

Clearly, he gets by on the fact that he has raw talent.

Shi Wudu has the same natural gifts—but that's the difference between them.

He's done nothing, over the last four centuries, but carefully refine and consolidate his strength.

To the point where he can hold one of the Four Great Calamities to heel. Gripping him by only controlling the water within He Xuan's blood.

He struggles, his feet twitching as he rams against the edges of the Water Master's magic, trying to writhe out of his grip.

Shi Wudu stands beneath him, his fist tightening, eyes burning brighter and brighter as he clamps down.

"...I don't think you were wrong, in the beginning," he admits, breathing heavily.

He Xuan's hands strain, veins popping as he fights it.

"But you...became just like me."

And there is no one that Shi Wudu holds more resentment for, more disgust, than himself.

He Xuan did the same thing to Ming Yi, the true earth master, that Shi Wudu did to him.

Continuing a cycle that neither of them chose to be a part of, one that will never stop turning.

Not until someone decides to end it.

That won't be him.

Shi Wudu doesn't have the right to make moral platitudes to anyone. And he—

He knows that men like him can never change.

That some things can't be forgiven.

But he's never tried to escape it.

"...This is the place where monsters are born, right?" Shi Wudu's hand tightens, and the blood vessels in He Xuan's chest cracking.

"Maybe this is where they should die, too."

Blackwater exhales harshly, muttering something unintelligible—at first. "...I'm not a monster."

He Xuan spits the words out, looking down at him, his own eyes beginning to take on a fierce glow.

'What's left of you, after?'

He takes ragged breaths, flailing—until he catches grip.

'What's left of you, He Sheng?'

CLACK!

CLACK!

There's no such thing as monsters.

Hua Cheng tried to tell him that, once.

Even if he was too angry to listen.

Only humans who make monstrous choices.

Shi Wudu doesn't have time to react before he feels something snare around his wrist, looking down to find...

A chain.

Black, heavy—like the kind used to weigh down a ship's anchor, springing from the floor of the Kiln.

And it drags him down, yanking the Water Master to his knees.

He Xuan lands on the floor coughing, wiping his mouth with the back of his hand.

When he rises to his feet, stalking forward, the Water Master's fan is knocked aside as he struggles to break free, tugging until his bones crack—

But to no avail.

At the last moment, he even tries to lash out with a dagger hidden in his boot, but is quickly disarmed.

CLACK!

CLACK!

Another chain shoots up, wrapping around his other wrist—dragging both down to the floor, crossed behind his back.

He Xuan stands over him, and—

He doesn't look like a man on the brink of victory.

He doesn't look like someone taking justice.

He Xuan does not look like a man at peace.

"...You don't deserve my forgiveness." He mutters, staring down at him.

His hands tremble at his sides, and his eyes—

They're agonized.

"I shouldn't have to forgive you."

Shi Wudu doesn't cower, looking him in the eye.

Waiting.

"...I never asked for forgiveness."

He Xuan looks up at the ceiling of the Kiln, the corners of his mouth tight as he stops the tears in his eyes from falling.

"But I have to."

Because He Xuan quickly made his own analysis of the situation, back in Blackwater Manor.

There's a reason of course, that a wealthy, practical man like Shi Wudu never continued his bloodline—or insisted that Shi Qingxuan do it in his stead.

Instead, he allowed an ancient, wealthy family to end with him. Because for what he had done, his bloodline would be cursed.

The same thing happened to Shi Qingxuan.

Her ancestor committed a horrible crime, one that left the resentment of the ghosts Fai and Xiang to fester for centuries. And when they moved on...

That curse was what brought the Reverend of Empty Words to the Shi Family's door. Curses are like fires.

If allowed to grow out of control—the damage from a mere spark can destroy an entire forest.

An entire family.

But they can only burn if you continue to feed them.

"If I can't forgive you..." He trails off, his gaze tormented.

Then his own son will be cursed.

It then, that the magnitude of what he's done seems to dawn on the Water Master, his eyes widening.

It's easy to live with the guilt, when you tell yourself that the only one responsible is you.

That the only one who would bear any punishment, is you.

But—

You can't run from your curses.

Someone told him that long ago, when he was too young and frightened to listen.

Blood drips down He Xuan's cheeks, leaning on the floor of the Kiln—and his voice breaks.

"I don't know if I can."

Because he hates him. Hates him.

He's survived these last four hundred years, on nothing but hating him.

Because it's cruel.

Because it's unfair.

Because if there were any justice, he would get the chance to bring his family peace. To bring himself peace.

"But this is the only way I know how to try."

Because you can't hate someone you know.

You can't reduce someone to a monster if you understand them.

"...Kill me, then," Shi Wudu mutters, shrinking away as He Xuan steps forward, shaking his head. "IF THAT'S WHAT IT TAKES TO FORGIVE ME, JUST KILL ME!"

He thrashes when He Xuan's palm lands on his forehead, trying to get away—but to no avail.

"What are you doing?!"

He rears back his fist, glaring at the floor of the Kiln.

He can't control it—even Hua Cheng couldn't.

But he doesn't want to see into the future—not this time.

"You don't get to keep Jun Wu's secrets anymore, Lord Water Master."

Shi Wudu's eyes grow to the size of dinner plates as he struggles, his fearless resignation quickly morphing into blind panic.

"You don't get to have any secrets, anymore."

"No—wait—STOP!"

BOOM!

Shi Wudu thrashes, white as a sheet as he watches He Xuan's fist slam into the Kiln floor.

"JUST KILL ME!" He screams, his wrist broken and bleeding from his effort to escape.

BOOM!

"DO WHATEVER YOU WANT WITH ME, JUST DON'T—!"

BOOM!

In one final moment of desperation, the Water Master's pride crumbles, leaving behind only naked fear, blind animal instinct and desperation.

And with his last chance to scream—

He cries out for Pei.

Just his name. There isn't time for anything else to be said.

Help me.

Save me.

It hurts.

(It hurts, it—)

'I'm so, so scared.'

Not—not again. It—

(It really, really hurts.)

The floor beneath them cracks—then shatters, plunging them into darkness. One that He Xuan cannot control—but they aren't going forward.

They're going back.

THUD!

He Xuan hits the ground hard—this time, familiar enough to make sure he doesn't land on his head.

And when he sits up...

There's no white floor beneath him.

No endless walls or vacant ceilings.

No Kiln.

No Shi Wudu.

Just...

A house.

Expensive, from the looks of it. With polished floors and thick, expensive rugs.

But not hollow, or sterile, the way that the Palaces of the Heavens can often feel.

There's a set of child's boots on the stairs. An elderly dog, sleeping in the corner.

The smell of baking bread.

There's the sound of footsteps coming down the stairs—and when He Xuan turns to look—there's a man.

Middle aged, with dark hair, green eyes, just the very beginnings of gray in his temples. Dressed in fine clothes—though not particularly ostentatious.

"..." He turns, a piercing gaze focused on He Xuan so suddenly, it startles him —even if he knows he's only watching this memory from the outside.

Then—the stranger smiles, and a seemingly stern expression softens. “Is that a little bird I hear?”

At first, there’s no response—then muffled, distant giggling.

A child’s laughter.

The man strolls through the room, hands tucked into his pockets lazily.

“Did you sneak in from my wife’s garden?”

His tone is knowing, gently teasing—and he receives more laughter in reply.

“No!”

The precocious, petulant reply makes the father smile—making his way over to the source of the giggling—a wardrobe, tucked against the far wall of the living room.

He Xuan can’t help but smile, too.

“Then who have I been hearing flapping about the rafters all morning?”

He muses, grasping the handle of the wardrobe. “Avoiding his lessons…”

“Wasn’t me!” The voice inside protests. “I was sleeping!”

“Is that so?”

The door opens, and He Xuan leans around to see, finding himself…

Surprised.

Having expected to see a child dressed like a girl, with chestnut hair and green eyes, but…

Instead, there’s a little boy.

One with feathery dark hair, sticking up in every which direction, yawning. With the bluest eyes he’s ever seen.

"Wudu," his father sighs, scolding. "You're getting too old for this."

The boy pouts, shrinking further back behind his mother's furs, even as his father reaches in to lift him out, hitching the five year old on his hip.

"I didn't mean to fall asleep!" He whines.

"Then why were you in the wardrobe?"

"Well..." His son blinks innocently. "I was hiding from Hao Laoshi."

"Mmm." Mr. Shi sighs, disapproving. "People are going to start thinking we spoil you."

The little boy just smiles, hugging his father around the neck. Perfectly aware that he is, in fact, spoiled.

"I had a good dream, though!" He exclaims, swinging his feet lightly as his father carries him back through the living room.

"Did you?"

"Mmmhm!"

"What kind?"

"I was an explorer!"

His father raises an eyebrow, giving him an affectionate squeeze. "Exploring what?"

"Uh..." He scrunches his nose up, thinking. "...I don't remember," he admits. "But I was far away!"

"Well, that's very exciting," Mr. Shi murmurs indulgently, carrying him up the steps. "But we need to get you dressed and ready to leave."

"...What?" The little boy frowns.

"But Laoshi already left—there's no more lessons today! Papa, don't make me—!"

"Only because you slept through them all." His father points out.

"Whatever it is, I don't wanna go!" He whines.

"And what should I tell everyone to explain you not being there?"

Shi Wudu thinks it over, his face screwing up with concentration.

"...Tell them I threw up," he replies firmly, his expression rather sage.

"..."

Mr. Shi throws his head back, barking out a loud, full bellied laugh.

"What?!"

"You say that every time, Wudu."

"Well, I might!" He declares, throwing his head back, very indignant. "I ate SO much in my dream, I'm about to burst! I'm gonna throw up Dad, really! Don't make me go!"

Mr. Shi reaches the landing of the stairs, moving into what looks like...a childhood bedroom.

Stuffed animals on the bed. Some of them, pristine, untouched—but a bear that looks like it's seen far better days—

(Most likely his favorite.)

"How would you throw up from eating in a dream?"

"Well, I dunno, I'm not a DOCTOR!" The boy mumbles petulantly. "But I had SO many oranges, and they were HUGE!" He babbles as his father helps him undress, pulling new robes out of a cabinet. "Like...as big as my head!"

"Then how did you eat them?"

He throws his hands up as his father pulls his robes over his head.

"I opened my mouth real wide, like a snake!" His head pops through the top of the robes, and when it does, he opens his mouth as wide as he can in demonstration, showing off two missing baby teeth on his lower jaw. "Like this!"

He snaps them back together. "I see..."

Mr. Shi grabs a comb, working on the mess of his hair. "And why are you so determined to stay home and sleep all day, when I haven't even told you what we're doing?"

“Well...I wasn’t gonna sleep anymore, I was gonna go play with Hu Ning!”

(One of the children next door.)

“...But where are we going?” Shi Wudu looks up curiously, continuously dodging his father’s efforts to make him presentable—but to no avail.

“To the temple.”

“...UGH!” He groans, flopping back on his bed.

His father pauses, slightly scandalized by the sacrilegious outburst.

“WUDU!”

“It’s BORING!” He whines, kicking his feet. “Why do I have to go?!”

“Because we’re going as a family,” His father reaches over, pulling him up and back out of bed.

“My prayers suck anyways!”

“Then maybe you should work on that!”

“Can’t I just write a nice note?”

“You!” His father wipes a hand down his face, pulling his son down the hallway. “You don’t even know how to WRITE!”

“I can have you write it down for me!”

“You’re going.”

“DAD!” He drags his heels as he’s dragged towards the exit. “It’s so UNFAIR, I don’t wanna—!”

“Look,” Mr. Shi sighs, stopping in the entryway, turning to kneel before his son, placing his hands on his shoulders. “Do you know why we’re going to the temple today?”

Shi Wudu blinks, shaking his head. His father sighs.

They were going to wait to tell him together—but if he has to listen to this whining the entire way there...

“Your mother is going to have a baby. Do you know what that means?”

His son’s eyes widen sharply, his jaw dropping open.

“You’re going to be a big brother.” His father takes him by the chin, looking at him seriously. “It’s a big responsibility. You have to take it seriously. It’s time to be a big kid now, understand?”

Slowly, his son nods—no longer making any complaints.

“We’re going to go and pray for their health, alright?”

“...Okay,” he agrees, allowing himself to be pulled along by his father’s hand.

He Xuan follows behind them, watching.

As they meet Mrs. Shi, lighting incense and leaving donations in the temple of the Heavenly Emperor.

Watches as the memories shift and change.

Showing a happy, content family.

A beautiful wife, a devoted husband, and a gifted son.

He sees Shi Wudu being showered with praise and bright predictions for his future.

Intelligent, a natural athlete, with an easy sort of confidence

The sort of child with a naturally strong fate.

Someone destined for greater things—and both of his parents clearly seemed to know it, constantly pushing him to work hard in his studies.

To make the most of his blessings.

And it seemed as though, watching through their eyes—there was no doubt that he would.

He Xuan recognizes the day of his own birth easily enough. The longest day of the year, in the middle of summer.

A warm, beautiful day, the sun sparkling over the western sea.

Light streams in through the window as the Shi family sits in bed together. Mr. and Mrs. Shi whispering quiet words of affection, while their eldest child, with the assistance of his mother, cradles the new baby in his lap.

“...He so small,” the boy whispers. “Is that normal? Is he gonna be okay?”

“Oh, yes...” His mother smiles, holding them both, stroking Shi Wudu’s hair. “He’s smaller than you were, but he’ll grow in no time, don’t you worry...”

“And in the meantime, he’ll have you there to look after him,” Mr. Shi murmurs. “That’s important, Wudu.”

He’s stern, but even at that age—Shi Wudu understands—it’s not really about him.

“Speaking of...” His mother speaks up quietly, reaching over to grasp her husband by the elbow. “Why don’t we invite Shi Jian to his birthday feast?”

Mr. Shi stiffens, and his wife rubs his arm, soothing him.

“Sweetheart, it’s been ten years...he’s never even met Wudu. Don’t you think it’s time you make peace with him?”

They’re talking about Shi Wudu’s uncle, of course.

His father was the eldest of three sons.

Shi Weiyuan, Shi Jian, and Shi Mingyu.

The youngest of the three died ten years ago, and Mr. Shi hasn’t spoken to his remaining brother since.

“Look at him, my love...” Shi Wudu’s mother tugs his arm, guiding her husband to look down at Shi Qingxuan.

Curly brown hair, big green eyes, grasping his brother’s finger in his tiny fist, gurgling soundlessly.

“Do you want him to grow in a family with such a grudge?”

“...”

Mr. Shi reaches down, pushing his fingers through Shi Qingxuan’s hair, looking at both of his sons.

And in his eyes—there is such pride, such love for his children.

“...Fine,” he relents, leaning over to kiss the top of Shi Wudu’s head, squeezing them both closer in his arms. “As long as he understands his place.”

He Xuan remains silent, skulking in the edges of memories, and he watches. Watches, with surprise, as the cultivator comes to spare the Shi family his warning—

To not make a show out of Shi Qingxuan’s birth. To hold no feasts, and keep him in the shadows.

And...

It’s a face that he’s seen before—though not with his own eyes.

But rather through Hua Cheng’s, in his memories of Xianle.

A white haired cultivator, just as young as he was then, with piercing blue eyes.

The former Guoshi for the Royal House of Xie—

Mei Nianqing.

...But didn’t he die in the Xianle Civil War? He wasn’t a god.

How is he here, in Qinghe, four centuries later?

He steps forward, wondering—but before he can, the memory shifts again, this time... to the feast.

“Shi Wuuuuduuuuu...”

The boy turns away, dabbing his mouth primly with a napkin. “Go away.”

“Ah!” His friend huffs, wiggling the back of his chair with her hands. “You’re just gonna ignore me? You’re so BORING now that you’re a big brother!”

“Birthday feasts are important!” The little boy grumbles “I’m not going to mess it up just because you wanna eat dirt or something.”

“Aiyah!” She clutches her chest with offense. “When did I say anything about eating dirt?! That was ONE TIME, and you MADE ME!”

“Yeah, well. Don’t bet on being able to hold your breath longer than me.” He shrugs, popping a mouthful of pickled plum into his mouth. “That was dumb.”

“I didn’t think you were gonna HOLD ME TO IT—and I wanted to meet your uncle! Don’t you?”

Shi Wudu doesn’t look up, pushing his food around his plate. “Nope.”

“But isn’t he a famous cultivator?!”

“He’s not famous,” Shi Wudu rolls his eyes. “My dad says people only know his name because ladies think he’s handsome.”

“Yeah, well, your dad’s a grouch!”

That seems to rile him.

“He is not!”

“Is too, everyone thinks so!”

“That’s not why he doesn’t wanna meet him.” One of the older children, the son of a side branch of the Shi family, leans back in his chair with a smirk. “He’s scared.”

Shi Wudu gawks, his fingers tightening around his chopsticks. “I am not!”

“Why’d he be scared?”

“Oh...cause his uncle wants to kill him.”

“Hey!” The older boy’s sister turns to glare at him, smacking him upside the head. “Watch your mouth, don’t spread tall tales!”

“Am not!” Her brother cries, rubbing his head. “Everyone knows he killed Shi Mingyu.”

“No, he didn’t!” His sister whispers loudly, “Shut up!”

Shi Wudu looks down at his plate, suddenly green in the cheeks.

“He killed your other uncle…” The older boy smirks, leaning in, “Then he’s gonna kill you and your parents, all to get the Shi family fortune. Scary, right?”

“I’m not scared,” Shi Wudu repeats sharply.

The older boy’s sister seems to get exasperated, grabbing her brother by the ear, giving it a harsh yank.

“OUCH!”

“What are you trying to scare him for?! He’s a little kid!”

“I’m NOT little!”

“Besides, everyone knows Shi Mingyu was killed by Li Xiaotong, stupid.”

The mention of that name makes the heir to the Shi family turn even more green, and his older cousin smirks.

“…Oh, you’re scared of him then, huh? Think he’s gonna sneak out of jail and cut your th—?”

Smack!

“Ow!”

“What is WRONG with you?!”

From beside Shi Wudu, his friend rocks on her heels, still wiggling the back of his chair.

“Sooooo…do you wanna meet him, or not?” He mumbles something under his breath. “What?”

“I’m gonna throw up.”

“You ALWAYS say that!” She whines, but—

Shi Wudu quickly slips out of his seat, hurrying down between the tables in the feasting hall, making a beeline for the washrooms, when he—

“AHHHHHHHH!”

A blood curdling shriek pierces the room, making every single head turn.

“What?!”

“What’s going on—?”

A young woman stands at the front of the feasting hall, pointing to the wall with trembling fingers.

And there, written in something dripping and red—

Is the character for death.

“Everyone, stay calm—”

Then, another voice bellows out and over the crowd, booming:

“WRETCHED BEGINNING, WRETCHED END!”

More panicked cries follow as people begin to look around, scrambling in the confusion.

“What was that?!”

“Was it a ghost?!”

“...I see it! THERE’S A BLACK SHADOW!”

Then, utter chaos breaks loose.

People fleeing the hall to get away, shouting and pushing.

And in that mass, Shi Wudu is stumbling, getting knocked about as he wriggles through a crowd of screaming adults, just—

Just trying to get back to the head table, where his parents and Shi Qingxuan are. “Mom!”

He raises his voice, crying out with pain when someone steps on his foot, falling to the ground.

“MOM!”

And for such a small child in a stampede like that—it only would have taken an instant for him to be trampled—

Until he’s lifted up into someone’s arms.

Carried through the stream of party goers fleeing, one hand placed protectively behind his head as they break free.

The boy tries to look up, to see what's going on— But it's too loud, and there's—

There's so much screaming, he—

He buries his face into his rescuer's shoulder, trembling.

Finally they break free, and he hears a deep, unfamiliar voice call out —

"GE! I have him here!"

"Oh," His mother chokes out, rushing forward to take her eldest child into her arms, her voice thick with tears.

"My love, I'm so sorry, are you alright?" She leans down to look at him, her eyes frantic. "Are you hurt anywhere?"

His foot won't stop stinging, but not so bad now that he doesn't have weight on it.

Still, he bursts into silent tears, frightened.

"Oh, darling...It's alright..."She hugs him close, allowing the boy to cry into her neck. "I'm here, I've got you..."

She looks over his head, bouncing him in her arms, giving the man who brought him over a grateful note.

"Thank you, Shi Jian."

Shi—?

Shi Wudu sniffles, twisting his head slightly to peek.

There's a man standing behind his father—slightly shorter, but with a similar face; his features are just somewhat sharper.

Jet black hair, pulled away from his face—and piercing blue eyes, just like his own. "Do you know what that thing was?"

"..." Mr. Shi sighs, pressing a hand against his temple. "A cultivator mentioned something the other day, but..."

“Gege...”

“How were we to believe something so bizarre?” Shi Weiyuan glares. “Who would give up a child’s entire future on the word of a stranger?!”

Shi Wudu looks over his mother’s shoulder—to Shi Qingxuan, sleeping peacefully in his crib.

In spite of all of the panic, he’s fallen right back to sleep. Unaware of the fear permeating the air around him.

‘Good,’ he thinks to himself, hugging his mother even tighter. He doesn’t want Shi Qingxuan to feel scared, it’s...

His eyes drift to the red symbol on the wall, still dripping down towards the floor— realizing that it must be blood.

...It’s the worst feeling in the world.

“...Mom?” He whispers, ears still slipping from his eyes, sniffling. “What was that?”

His mother doesn’t answer, holding him tighter against her, her own eyes fixed on the same point.

In the days that follow, they summon the cultivator back to Shi Manor. They go through their options. His parents beg, plead for there to be another way, but...

It isn’t possible to simply manufacture a better outcome out of thin air. To create an alternative where none exists.

But he does make one thing clear to them, before he takes his leave: That Shi Qingxuan is too young to understand that he is a target. Too young to feel fear.

He isn’t the one that the Venerable of Empty Words is feeding off of. It’s them.

And that kind of strain, over the years—

“Look at me!”

Shi Weiyuan shakes his son by the shoulders, trying to get the eight year old to look him in the eye.

“LOOK AT ME!”

…It does something to a family.

“I know what you’re feeling,” His father mutters, keeping his gaze pointedly focused on Shi Wudu’s face. “And I know it’s not fair, but you CANNOT react. Do you understand me?”

The boy stares at the ground, his shoulders trembling. They were walking down the beach, as a family.

It was supposed to be a normal, relaxing afternoon—with the children wandering ahead, Shi Wudu standing at the edge of the water with his “sister,” ‘Mingxia,’ as ‘she’ collected shells.

That was when it whispered in his ear.

That he was going to watch Shi Qingxuan drown.

Watch his face turn blue, until blood came out of his eyes.

That he was going to break his little brother’s ribs, trying to push the water out of his lungs.

And being so small, only eight years old—

He screamed.

He cried.

He snatched his sister, barely two years old, and ran back to their mother.

She’s already gone ahead with Mingxia now, carrying her back to the house.

Leaving Shi Wudu alone with his father on the beach, half frightened out of his skin, staring at the ground, numb.

“…I’m sorry,” he whispers, “It said—”

“It doesn’t matter what it said,” Mr. Shi kneels down in front of him, his expression stern. “You can’t show it your fear.”

Or else—he’ll become a meal for it, too.

He’ll make it stronger.

And then, Shi Qingxuan will be in more danger.

"...How do I do that?"

"You push it down," his father murmurs. "With any other emotion that you have to— but you don't show fear."

It's a slow process.

Watching a child being conditioned into something cold.

Someone who feels anger, instead of fright.

And He Xuan—

He was the eldest brother, too.

But he never thought he could have been shielded from the Venerable of Empty Words.

Not until he watched how desperately this family tried to shield Shi Qingxuan. And for years—they succeeded.

But at a steep price.

Because over time, desperate to find its prey—

The Venerable became more and more aggressive, desperate to make someone in the Shi family crack. To reveal where the soul it had laid claim to was hidden.

And the eldest child was the easiest target.

It was easy to assume, all those years later, that they had simply been forced to watch Shi Qingxuan suffer—but now...

Just as He Xuan's entire family crumbled under the curse of the Reverend...the entire Shi family suffered.

And still, he—

On the morning of Shi Qingxuan's fourth birthday, he opens his eyes, seeing a not so unfamiliar sight.

It's been getting more aggressive lately.

There's a man-like figure, crouched in the corner of his ceiling—just like a spider, watching him with angry, beady little eyes.

The ten year old stares up from his bed calmly, his expression flat. Unfeeling.

He sits up, pushing his hair out of his eyes, then begins the process of stretching his arms over his head with a yawn.

"I'm going to kill your mother," it rasps. Shi Wudu slips out of bed.

That threat is new.

He strolls over to his dresser, examining which robes he might like to wear that day, then checks the calendar on his desk, ensuring that he doesn't have to prepare for any more exams before going to the party.

"I'm going to kill your father!"

He Xuan watches as the child combs his hair slowly, methodically, never moving his eyes from the mirror.

With each threat, it becomes louder, more hostile—frustrated with being ignored. "I'M GOING TO KILL YOUR BROTHER—!"

The slipper is thrown with sharp accuracy, landing in the corner the creature was previously in—making it disappear in a puff of smoke.

Shi Wudu rolls his eyes, shrugging his robes over his shoulders.

"I don't have a little brother," he responds coldly. "Pathetic."

He goes about his day, just like any other.

The threats, the fear, never knowing when some horrible monster might appear around the corner—

Shi Wudu has learned to live with that, by now.

He doesn't react anymore, having learned—none of it is real .

But this time, for the first time—

One of the Reverend's threats came true.

On what was a normal, happy day. Just like any other.

They couldn't outwardly celebrate Shi Qingxuan's birthday—the only acknowledgement is his favorite dinner being served that evening.

They sit by the fire, after the meal is done—with Shi Wudu's father explaining some of the business ledgers to him while his mother plays with his brother on the floor, helping him use golden foils to build a palace as high as he can.

And Shi Wudu can't help but wince each and every time his brother knocks them down, giggling with delight.

How inevitable it looks.

But still—

It was a happy evening.

A quiet evening, being kissed goodnight and sent to bed.

Fully expecting that he would wake up; and it would be just like any other day. But he doesn't.

He wakes up with a gentle shake to his shoulder—his mother staring down at him, pale and frightened.

"...M—?"

"Shhh..." She presses a finger to his lips. "We have to be quiet."

He's ushered out of bed, and at some point, when they're slipping down the hallway, she whispers—

"People have broken into the house."

For just a fraction of a moment, his eyes grow wide.

"What about the guards?" He whispers.

When she doesn't respond, he knows the truth.

That if she's come to get him out of bed—something has already happened to the guards.

The danger—

It's not fake, this time.

Not a game.

It’s very, very real.

Shi Qingxuan yawns when they come to fetch him, rubbing his hands over his eyes.

“Mama?”

“Shhh…” She presses a kiss to his forehead, lifting him out of bed. “We’re gonna play a game, okay?”

That’s what she tells him, when they hide him under a loose set of floorboards in his bedroom.

That it’s hide and seek.

But he absolutely cannot under any circumstances make a sound.

“Mama…” The four year old whines, looking back and forth between them unsurely, “I don’t like this game…”

“It’s okay, shhh, shhh, it’s okay…” Their mother whispers, pale, her lips trembling. “Your brother isn’t scared, see? He—He loves this one.”

He looks to Shi Wudu, unsure, and—

His brother smiles, his expression completely calm.

“It’s a surprise,” he whispers, “for the special day.”

And it was a cruel thing to do, making Shi Qingxuan think this was a game for his birthday, but—

He kept quiet.

His mother pulls him back into the hallway, holding his hand so tight, it hurts— seeming terrified of every step that she takes down the stairs, certain the floorboards will creak.

“Where’s Dad—?”

“Shhh…”

But this time, when she hushes him—

He sees the tears in her eyes.

When they reach the foot of the staircase she kneels down, pressing her forehead against his, her lips trembling.

“I love you,” she whispers, running her fingers through his hair.

“Wh—?”

“And I’m so sorry,” She squeezes his hands, two tears slipping down her cheeks. “But you have to be brave now.”

“Wh—?”

“I’m going to go and find your father,” she keeps looking back and forth when she speaks, making sure no one is coming. “And I need you to go out the front door, and run as fast as you can to the Taos house to get help.”

“...I don’t...” Shi Wudu glances toward the hall leading out front. “Mom, I don’t think I can—”

“We don’t have time to argue,” she shakes her head, grabbing him by the chin, forcing him to look her in the eye. “You have to. Think—think about your sister.”

He’s scared.

“That always helps me be brave.”

He’s so, so scared.

His mother kisses his forehead.

“...You have been the joy of my life,” she whispers, giving him one last squeeze.

“M—!”

“Now, go.”

She gives him a push.

They split in the hallway, each going their separate ways.

He’s scared.

He wants to go back to bed now.

He wants to wake up in the morning, and complain about going to lessons. He wants his father to yell at him for being out of bed.

He wants—

Shi Wudu stops in the entryway, not making a sound.

There are men in the courtyard.

Strangers.

Wearing masks over their faces, swords hanging at their sides.

"..." He takes a step back, shrinking into the darkness, and he—

He hears a scream.

His mother, screaming.

He can't go back, not to where she is. Can't risk going upstairs.

Can't risk going outside.

And so—

He scrambles into the family room—the same place where, only hours ago, they had been laughing and playing games.

Where they had been happy.

No loose floorboards to hide beneath.

No secret cupboards or passages, just—

Just the wardrobe.

The same wardrobe he used to hide in when he was small, hiding from his tutors—a lifetime ago.

Now, he slips back inside—pulling the door shut with a click .

He scrambles in until his back hits the wall, one or two heavy fur coats slipping from the hangers in his hurry, landing on top of his legs.

The door won't stay completely shut—there's something caught in the latch. Leaving just one sliver of the room outside visible.

And through that dark, narrow view of the world outside—

He watches what remained of a childhood dissolve.

BANG!

A heavy boot kicks the door to the family room in—and it takes everything in the child not to scream.

To clap a hand over his mouth, trembling, but silent.

Did they find me? Is it gonna get me? Is this—?

Is this real?

And he watches with that slow, cruel revelation, as his parents are dragged inside.

His mother thrashing and screaming—his father limp.

The revelation that, in spite of every lie you are ever told:

That parents, no matter how much they might love you, cannot keep you safe.

Shi Weiyuan is left by the fireplace, limp on his back, his breaths coming in ragged, fading gasps.

A path of blood forms on the floor, where he was dragged.

“Please!” His wife sobs, reaching for him. “Please, you can take whatever you want, just—just let me take him to a doctor, PLEASE—!”

CRACK!

The slap is so violent, she’s sent flying into the wall, her head smacking against the corner of the mantle.

Up until now, watching, He Xuan has felt some level of detachment.

But—

“We weren’t finished talking,” one of the men replies, his voice cold—detached. The lady of the house is dragged up by the back of her head, gripped by the hair. Her eyes are half out of focus, blood staining her hair.

“Where are they?”

Shi Wudu’s eyes remain locked on his father, watching his breaths come slower and slower, his eyes widening as his hands—

His hands stop struggling.

“T-the safe is in his office, I—I don’t know if I remember the—!”

CRACK!

“Where are the children?”

She stares up at them, her mouth bruised and slack, tears slipping down her cheeks.

“…They aren’t here,” she whispers.

CRACK!

“You think we won’t find them, you bitch?!”

“THEY AREN’T!”

CRACK!

Shi Wudu has to cover his mouth with one hand, his nose with the other—pressure building in his head from the lack of air—

All so he won’t make a sound, watching as his mother is beaten.

Viciously. Bones breaking, blood splattering across the floor.

“WHERE ARE THEY?!”

This time, when she’s dragged up again by the hair—her face is streaked with blood, one eye blackened, and still—

He watches as his mother spits in the robber’s face, blood splattering across the front of his mask.

And she smiles.

Not like any other smile he has ever seen.

It’s grief stricken. Ferocious.

Not an expression of happiness—something more like a wounded animal baring its teeth.

"We sent them running to the neighbors as...as soon as we saw something was wrong..." She chokes, managing a wet laugh. "I...I really didn't think they were going to make it. D-Did you not catch them?" He watches as his mother laughs loudly, scornfully.

"Then...you're all already dead, aren't you?"

CRACK!

It doesn't matter how sadistically she's beaten—her answer remains the same. And her son, he—

Watching this, he can't help but feel some sick sense of deja vu.

As though this is something he has seen, a dozen—maybe a hundred times before. And maybe he has.

Happening all around him, all the time.

A world where the weak suffer—but the cruel survive.

At some point she's dropped to the floor, her cheek slumped against the wood while the robbers stand over her, arguing.

And at some point, by some odd turn of chance—her eye slides across the room—meeting his through that small crack in the wardrobe door.

He isn't sure at first if she can see him, but—

'It's okay.'

She mouths the words with blood stained lips, her eyes fixed.

'It's okay.'

Shi Wudu can't hear the robbers anymore—or even his own mother's pained gasps. Only his own heartbeat, blood rushing in his ears.

There's a plea in her eyes. A final request that goes unspoken, but her son understands every word.

Not to get caught. To survive. To find his brother—

To protect him.

'I love you.'

He watches then, as her eyes slide out of focus, and her breathing slows.

He learns, so early, what it feels like to watch the life fade out of someone's eyes. To witness their soul slipping away.

She becomes still, eyes still open—staring blankly ahead. And finally, the robbers seem to notice.

"...Oh, fucking hell—LOOK WHAT YOU DID!"

"Me?! What did I do?!"

"You're the one who made the bitch HIT HER HEAD!" The larger robber glares, grabbing his companion by the front of his robes. "AND you killed the husband first! When would a mother give up the children before the father?! Fucking DUMBASS!"

"Why do we even want the kids anyway?! Let's just take the money and go, didn't you hear her say? People might already be on the way here..."

He Xuan has been there, watching through the same crack. Hiding beneath the same robes.

And when he turns his head—

The little boy is staring at him.

Both hands over his face, eyes wide as they can possibly be, and unlike before, with the father—

Shi Wudu can actually see him.

Because this is his memory—one that they're simply reliving.

And those eyes say one thing:

Get out.

This is mine.

No one else gets to see it.

Get out.

But even if He Xuan thought he had a right to privacy—

That isn't how this works.

"I heard the son is a pretty little thing, looks a lot like the mother...and the girl, well —"

He Xuan's stomach twists with nausea.

"You can always get money out of a girl—especially the younger ones."

Somehow, that actually seems to cross a line for the third robber, scratching the back of his head with discomfort.

"Can't we just kill them instead? That's all we're supposed to do, right?"

"But the mother said—!"

"If they actually went to get help, why has no one showed up yet?"

Then, they begin to look.

One of them starts to walk towards the wardrobe, but—

"If one of them was in here, do you think they could have kept quiet through all of that?"

It's a fair point.

"Come on—we can't waste any more time than we already have. Check the rest of the house."

They leave—and He Xuan watches the child's face.

The silent, horrific calculations he's making.

How likely it is that Shi Qingxuan can keep quiet.

They probably can't find him otherwise—not without checking every floorboard in the house.

But he might get scared that it's taken so long for someone to come and find him.

And he actually does have some idea of what the robbers want him for.

He had protective parents—and he was an exceptionally beautiful child.

His mother never gave him explicit details. Simply told him that—because of the way he looked—adults might want to hurt him. Who he should trust, who he shouldn't.

What was appropriate, and what wasn't.

And as those men search the house—He Xuan watches him think about it.

Watches him wait, and listen—his dead mother's eyes staring at him blankly all the while.

If it sounds like they're where Shi Qingxuan is, he'll scream. He'll scream, make them chase him.

Whatever happens, happens—but they won't get Shi Qingxuan. Still—they never do.

And eventually, as the night stretches on, and the candles burn low, they seem to run out of time.

Leaving the house in silence. It feels like it lasts so long.

He counts in his head as high and as long as he can, rocking slightly, but not making a single sound.

And after what feels like hours, he opens the closet door with a creak. The first thing he does is slip on the blood, landing hard on his back. He doesn't cry out.

He rolls onto his hands and knees, tired.

Numb.

"...Mom," he mumbles, glancing at the burning embers in the fireplace. "It's cold."

It's summer. He has no idea why he can't stop shivering.

All over, his shoulders trembling, teeth chattering.

No one answers him.

Shock is a difficult thing to shake, for someone so young.

It's so cold, and he's so tired.

His mother's arms are slightly stiff, when he tries to move her. She's too heavy.

He tries, but he keeps slipping on the blood, and she's—

She's too heavy.

For a moment, he just lays down beside her, trying to pull her arms around him, but—

It doesn't feel the same as being held.

Still, for just a moment, he thinks about staying here. Laying down, and falling asleep.

It's cold, and he's so tired.

But he can’t.

Reluctantly, even as every part of him silently begs to stay behind, to lay between his parents and never wake back up—

Shi Wudu pushes himself to his feet.

His steps are slow, unsteady as he makes his way up the stairs.

There’s a bloody trail on the floor—but he pays it no mind.

That was from his father.

His hands couldn’t stop shaking before, but they’re steady now, prying the floorboards back up, finding—

No wonder he was so quiet.

Shi Qingxuan fell back asleep.

Good.

That—

That’s good.

“Gege?” He yawns, rubbing his eyes as he’s lifted into his brother’s arms.

“Shhhh…” his brother shushes him, holding him close as he carries him from the room.

“Are…are we done playing now?”

Shi Wudu stops in the hallway.

Shi Qingxuan can’t see, his head resting on his brother’s shoulder.

But He Xuan can see the tears in Shi Wudu’s eyes.

“…Yeah,” he mumbles, hugging tighter as he carries him down the steps. “You won, Qingxuan.”

“Gege…you’re hugging too tight…”

“Sorry,” he whispers.

When they get to the bottom of the stairs, Shi Qingxuan is confused as his brother places his hand over his eyes.

“Gege?”

“Shhhh…” his brother hushed him again.

He doesn’t slip on the blood, this time.

It’s dry by now.

“It’s okay.”

“But…”

The bodies lie cold on the floor as he walks past, shapes fading in the dark as they walk into the courtyard.

“There’s just scary stuff outside.”

That makes Shi Qingxuan shrink, hugging him tighter.

“Bad stuff?”

“It doesn’t matter,” his brother responds woodenly.

The gravel in the walkway digs into his bare feet. He’s cold. His head hurts. His arms feel so heavy. He—

He doesn’t care.

His mother said thinking about them—protecting them—made her brave.

“Nothing is gonna hurt you while I’m here, Qingxuan.”

And nothing ever did.

ARTWORK INSPIRED BY THIS STORY

Included with permission from the artist, do not reproduce or use for any reason.

young Swd portrait was found in Swd's home in the family archive
Embarassed
Npab ch. 44
Shi Wudu from Pei Ming’s perspective
@currant_bliss
!!pls do not repost!!

CREDIT: JUNKY

Chapter End Notes

big thank you to junky for their beautiful artwork, and allowing me to share it!

xoxo, Evie

The Things We Live With

Chapter Summary

> He Xuan watched as Shi Wudu changed from a happy, silly child, into a cold one. One who was trained to hide his fear. To mask it with other emotions.
>
> Then, after the death of his parents, he became hollow and stiff—like someone focused only on getting from one moment to the next.
>
> In his teenage years, he evolves into someone else.

Chapter Notes

> content warning: this chapter depicts violence, and grooming

See the end of the chapter for more notes

The murders shocked the otherwise quiet, wealthy city of Qinghe.

And overnight, created the wealthiest orphan in the country.

The side branches of the Shi family take them in as the authorities scratch their heads.

The motive was obviously robbery, but…The safe was untouched.

Puzzling.

But Shi Wudu knows why.

It puzzles the adults around—watching a boy of such an age, having witnessed such a horror, behave as he does.

Focused on his studies, fussing after his little sister like a mother hen. Not weeping, or cowering in terror.

One day, while strong arming Shi Qingxuan into eating his vegetables, he hears one of the adults at the table mention the name—

'Shi Jian.'

Just the mention of that one is enough to make him stiffen.

“…What about my uncle?”

“…We’ve sent word to him in Lanling,” the lady of the house, a distant cousin, explains. “He’ll be here within the week.”

“Why?”

It’s off putting, for a boy not even eleven to speak to adults in such a manner.

Never rude, but always as though he sees them as peers.

“We already held the funeral. There’s no need for him now.”

“…I’m sure he would have come if we had gotten word to him in time, but—”

“I don’t care that he wasn’t there,” Shi Wudu clarifies coldly. “Why do we need him here?”

“Well…he’s the head of the clan, now.” She smiles at him gently, knowing he’s too young for his parents to have explained what would happen in such a situation—and who could have predicted this, anyway? “And you two need a permanent guardian—”

“He isn’t the head of the Clan, and we don’t need a guardian.”

The lord of the house glances over at him, curious.

“Then who is? And who exactly do you expect to look after you two?”

It’s almost unnerving, how sharply the boy stares him in the eye.

“I am, and I will.”

And of course—no one took him seriously.

Not then, anyway.

“HEY!”

A few hours later, the older cousin scrambles back to the edge of his bedroom, holding his hands out in front of him.

“What are you DOING you FREAK—!”

He’s cut off when a boot presses down on his throat.

Shi Wudu might be younger, smaller—

But somehow, also terrifying.

"That's right." The younger child agrees, and watching him with a dull, unfeeling gaze. "I'm a freak. Who knows what I might do." He digs his foot in, and his cousin pales, wheezing. "So, you better give me what I want."

"W-what?!"

He leans in, his eyes like ice.

His cousin has always been a bully. The type who enjoyed inspiring fear in others, particularly when he was insecure.

But he was also the only one who ever called Shi Wudu's uncle a murderer. "You're going to tell me everything you know about Li Xiaotong."

Shortly after, he finds himself in the last place a child should be. The city jail.

The guards were reluctant to let him in at first—even when he made a show of sniffling, telling some lie about wanting to visit his father.

(Not a particularly good lie, given the quality of his robes, or the sapphire earrings he was wearing.)

But regardless of how strange it was for a child to make such a request—gold is gold, and his was as good as anyone else's.

It was a miserable story. One of three brothers.

The Shi Clan is an old family. A wealthy family. Known as shipmasters and merchants.

But never cultivators—and his grandfather had set his mind upon changing that.

He had three sons, after all. His eldest, Shi Weiyuan, could take over the family business.

His youngest two sons, however, Shi Jian and Shi Mingyu, were sent to Langling to study under a cultivation master.

The hope being that, when they completed their training, one of them would return to Qinghe, beginning a cultivation sect in the Shi name.

Both brothers excelled.

But neither of them were able to surpass their Shixiong, a young cultivator native to the city of Langling—of low birth, but said to be a genius.

Li Xiaotong.

The city jail of Qinghe is deep underground. Damp, and cold—with only the rats scurrying across the floor for company.

Most of the men groan and beg as he walks past.

For food. For him to bring the lantern a little closer. Some, even just for company.

But the furthest cell—

It's quiet as a grave.

And maybe, if Shi Wudu had been an average child, he would have been afraid.

But he's learned already, so many times over—

There are far worse things that you can find waiting in the dark.

Clink!

The lantern is set on the floor, kicking up a small puff of dust—and when the prisoner within looks up...

There's a boy staring back at him.

Young, couldn't even be a teenager yet—but with eyes that feel familiar.

The color of them, yes—a piercing shade of blue—

But more so the expression.

Gaunt. Hardened. Not so different from the prisoners in the cells around him.

Not so different from his own.

He grasps the bars, staring down at him.

“Are you Li Xiaotong?”

The prisoner looks him up and down, one knee pulled up against his chest.

He’s pale—thin, as is expected, from a man who has spent the last fifteen years in a cage, deep underground.

But he was handsome, once.

With fine, dark eyes, and even darker hair. Features that are both sharp, and delicate. Before, he was called the Black Jade of Langling—revered for both his beauty, and his strength.

Now, that face is marred with a long, deep scar.

Stretching from chin to temple, his right eye rendered pale and useless. His other stares ahead blankly, uncaring.

“Who is asking?”

The boy grasps the bars a little more tightly.

“My name is Shi Wudu. You knew my uncles.”

Li Xiaotong’s eyes flash briefly with recognition.

Looking him over again, the resemblance is even more obvious than it was before.

“...Weiyuan’s boy,” he muses, lips curling up into a crooked, bitter smile. “Best be going home then. Wouldn’t want daddy to hear about the company you’ve been keeping, hmm?”

He doesn’t rise to the bait, like another child might. Angrily disputing that he was something that he isn’t—an adult.

Instead, he responds coldly:

“My father is dead.”

Li Xiaotong falls quiet, his smile still in place—

And he offers no condolences.

"...And why have you come to see little old me?" He muses, resting his chin against his knee.

"Because I believe you."

The cultivator falls silent, his gaze becoming sharp. "You didn't gain anything from my uncle's murder." In reality—he lost everything.

His future as head of a cultivation sect. His freedom.

And Shi Wudu suspects, from the rumors of how close Li Xiaotong and Shi Mingyu were, something even more dear to him.

"If you had ambushed him, you wouldn't have ended up with that."

Of course—he means the scar.

Not something you gain from murdering a man in his sleep.

But the one who stood to gain the most—

That was Shi Jian.

Who went from the third ranking disciple in his sect to the most senior.

And from one of three heirs to the Shi family, to one of two.

"...And why does it matter if you believe me?" Li Xiaotong questions, his eyes narrowed and distrusting.

So far removed from human kindness by now, he doesn't even trust the words of a child.

"Because, that means I'm willing to get you out of here."

The Shi family is powerful—the most powerful in the city, by far. Maybe in the country.

Since the ascension of General Pei, the Kingdom of Xuli has always been powerful, certainly. The most stable and long lasting state in recent history.

But when the General broke his sword, refusing to take political power after the betrayal of his king—

The people never again respected the government—or the king—the way they once did.

Now, wealthy families pull the strings of power. None more so than his own.

Even at his age, getting a prisoner released isn't a heavy task.

"And why would you be willing to do that?"

Because they want the same thing.

Because when Shi Wudu's mother was lying dead on the floor, those men were frantic to find and kill him, as well as Shi Qingxuan.

Robbers don't need to do that. Maybe if they were after financial gain, like the one who wanted to sell him.

But they behaved as though they had to kill them.

And they beat his mother to death, even after she told them where the safe was.

There's only one reason for that.

Because it would leave one member of the main branch of the Shi family standing. One person who would inherit the largest fortune in the city—really, in the country.

His uncle, Shi Jian.

His uncle, who Shi Wudu's father never trusted.

Who was there, that day.

"My uncle is coming to the city." He explains quietly. "When he does..."

Li Xiaotong, obviously, never had a particularly bright and sunny view of the world. Or of people.

It didn't make it less bone chilling to hear these words from a child.

"...I want you to kill him."

He Xuan leans against the back wall of the jail hallway, watching the boy's back.

Small, but standing straight. Not an ounce of hesitation.

The boy who would grow into the man who would rage against He Xuan for taking his own revenge.

Was it all just hypocrisy?

Was it because he didn't think they were the same? Because he viewed He Xuan as targeting Shi Qingxuan intentionally, even though she was an innocent?

But when the memory flashes forward, taking them to the night Shi Jian died—

The differences between them become starkly clear.

Li Xiaotong tilts his head to the side, a black whip curled around one hand, a knife dangling between the fingertips of his other.

Creak…

Shi Wudu sits on the couch in the far corner of the room, a blanket pulled around his shoulders.

It's cold—

But he's always cold, now.

Creak…

Above them, tied to the main support beam overhead, is Shi Jian.

Dangling.

Hands tied behind his back.

Those ropes will be cut away by morning, when he's 'found.'

People will see the wounds on his body, of course.

Signs of torture.

But gold is gold, power is power, and they will not ask questions.

He was alive when he went down from that rope, anyway.

Shi Wudu knows.

He stood in the same spot where his mother's body grew cold, and he kicked the stool out from beneath his feet.

Watching him fall.

"Well," Li Xiaotong, tosses his knife onto the table with a clatter, his steps swaying and unsteady as he makes his way to the liquor cabinet, pouring himself a drink. "I can't speak for you, but I feel better."

He almost offers his accomplice a drink, but, well—

Ten might be old enough to order and witness a political assassination—but wine? That's a bridge too far, if you ask him.

Shi Wudu pulls the blanket tighter around him, eyes hollow.

"Why would I feel better?" He asks woodenly.

"The man who killed your parents is dead."

Li Xiaotong pours himself a glass, sprawling down onto the couch across from him, feet kicked up over the arm, swirling the glass around between his fingertips, taking a sip.

Expensive stuff.

"You know, I deserve a little credit." He drops his whip to the ground with a clatter.

"Fifteen years in a cage, all while he was out there training...and I still carved him up like a pig." He smiles, taking another long sip. "I mean, you're a shit audience, but who can blame you."

Shi Wudu doesn't reply, eyes lingering on his uncle's boots.

Watching the blood drip onto the floor.

"But, but—this is an important but," Li Xiaotong points at him with his glass, lifting one finger, "I'll give credit where it's due—most traumatized orphans wait for puberty to come around before they get revenge. Hormones and all that."

He tilts his wine back towards himself, finishing the rest in a few swallows. "But you're ahead of the curve—so good for you, champ."

The boy finally looks away from his uncle's boots then, eyes drifting over to Li Xiaotong.

"This wasn't for revenge."

The cultivator lets out a disbelieving snort, letting his empty glass fall to the floor. It lands on the carpet with a thud , rolling onto its side.

"Says the little freak who insisted on dealing the final blow."

Shi Wudu doesn't respond to the goading—doesn't care.

"I'm the head of this family," he shrugs, "it was my responsibility."

"Mmm...but if it wasn't for revenge, then why kill him at all?"

And therein, lies the primary difference between the holder of this memory, and the man watching it.

"..."

Ice cold eyes return to the corpse hanging overhead—and they hold no remorse, nor pity.

But they don't show any satisfaction, either.

Of course—after what Shi Jian had done, Shi Wudu never would have allowed him to take over the family.

Would never have submitted to calling him 'father.'

Shi Jian killed his parents. Destroyed any semblance of a childhood that his nephew had left.

Shi Wudu wouldn't have allowed him to gain the wealth and power he desired in return.

It's Shi Wudu's family. Shi Wudu's gold. He wouldn't have allowed anyone to take it. But that wasn't his primary motivation. "He was a threat."

While Shi Jian didn't have any children of his own—the moment Shi Wudu came of age, he would have been forced to step aside.

If that was the only concern, Shi Wudu wouldn't have cared. He could have simply taken some of the gold, Shi Qingxuan, and started over somewhere else. Their wealth is such that even a small portion could have given them a comfortable life.

But they wouldn't have been safe.

Because Shi Jian was there that day, when the Reverend of Empty words laid its claim on Shi Qingxuan.

He knew the truth.

That his name isn't 'Mingxia.'

That Shi Wudu doesn't have a 'sister' at all.

No matter where they went, he could have revealed their secret.

He had motivation to do so. He had demonstrated ample willingness to kill his own family.

The world hasn't shown Shi Wudu mercy that far—and now, he has no reason to expect it.

No reason to give it, either.

But he doesn't like killing. Doesn't even like the sight of blood.

He doesn't like scary things. He still feels fear, even if he's forgotten how to show it.

"...You're saying you didn't feel even a little bit better, settling the score?"

Shi Wudu turns his gaze back to him, pulling his blanket closer.

"No." His fingers tighten around the edge of the blanket, knuckles white. And his answer is so simple—but it manages to cut through countless layers of distrust, bitterness, and apathy.

"My mom would be sad, if she knew what I did."

Li Xiaotong stares at him, eyes wide.

Shi Wudu's parents are still dead.

The only difference now is that his sister is safe.

He doesn't regret what he did. Doesn't feel any remorse for taking the life of a murderer.

But he doesn't feel any better—and he's still scared.

He will always be scared.

Li Xiaotong could have left that night.

Put Qinghe, Xuli, and the Shi family behind him—never looking back. But—

'My mom would be sad, if she knew what I did.'

Finally, hearing those words, he saw the boy before him for the broken, frightened child that he was.

So, in the years that followed, after the bodies were buried, and the secrets along with them—

He chose to stay.

Taking on the role of 'guardian' over the children, even if his presence was minimal, and more so that of a servant.

He had nowhere else to go, and...

In the end, revenge didn't bring him peace, either.

He Xuan watches, he watches, and he watches.

Standing at the edges of memories.

Watching a ten year old boy grow with each year into a teenager.

And on one hand, he sees what he had intended to, opening the Water Master's memories.

The brother that Shi Qingxuan always spoke of.

He only ever sees happiness, and calm in Shi Wudu's eyes when he's with Shi Qingxuan.

But he doesn't act like a brother—not really.

Waking him up every morning—making sure Shi Qingxuan gets dressed on time, and attends his lessons. Kisses scraped knees, and gives lectures over broken rules.

He tucks him into bed each night—checking underneath for monsters, telling stories until his brother falls asleep.

And he—

Even as he knows why he did this—even if he knows that he needs to forgive him, that he has to forgive him—

Up until then, he hadn't felt a single ounce of movement in his heart. Maybe he never would have, if—

If Shi Qingxuan actually meant nothing to him. But here, he's forced to confront two facts:

First, that this is the man who is responsible for the death of his family. For his own suffering. For Qin Meirong's pain.

And second, that he's also the man who gave Shi Qingxuan a happy, loving childhood.

Both of those things, while they feel utterly incompatible, are true.

He watches, as Li Xiaotong points out that they could leave. That there's plenty of money for them to move to a different home—one with less history.

And he watches as Shi Wudu refuses.

As he says, standing on the same floor where he watched his mother die, that this is Shi Qingxuan's home.

That it's familiar to him, and that he only has good memories here.

Even if that means, every day, Shi Wudu is living inside of a crime scene.

He watched as Shi Wudu changed from a happy, silly child, into a cold one. One who was trained to hide his fear. To mask it with other emotions.

Then, after the death of his parents, he became hollow and stiff—like someone focused only on getting from one moment to the next.

In his teenage years, he evolves into someone else.

Forced to project a maturity beyond his years, wrangling a clan, and a business, under his control.

Being father and mother to a child with a target on his back.

Shouldering a deep fear and distrust for the world.

The personality that forms under such circumstances is haughty, cold, and arrogant.

All sharp smiles, sly insults, and veiled threats.

There are rare moments where he shows his age—some humanity.

But only glimpses, like a crack between the curtains, letting sunlight in.

One of those moments comes when he's sixteen, reading a book while Shi Qingxuan chases a puppy about the room, tossing a ball for it to catch.

But his eye keeps drifting out the window.

"I swear," Li Xiaotong yawns, stretched out on the floor. "You and that temple."

Shi Wudu's eyes snap back down to his book.

"What about it?"

"You act like you've never seen a Ming Guang shrine before. He's everywhere in this region."

The teenager rolls his eyes, turning a page. "I haven't been acting like that."

But there has been a new shrine under construction across the square, just in view of their window.

"Then why oggle at it all day?"

His fingers grip the book a little tighter. "I'm not."

Still, his eyes drift out the window again. "I just..."

"What?"

"...Do you think he actually looks like that?"

Li Xiaotong blinks, stiffening when Shi Qingxuan's puppy runs over his face, where he's laying on the carpet.

"Who?"

"Ming Guang."

"Looks like what?"

"The divine statue!" Shi Wudu grumbles, looking back at his book stubbornly.

"…" Li Xiaotong sits up, looking out the window, examining the statue under construction, and he—

He snickers.

"What?!"

"Well, if he actually does look like that, it certainly explains how he gets so many women into bed." The older man shrugs. "But I'm surprised at you."

Shi Wudu turns another page, even if he doesn't seem to be reading. "Why?"

"I thought having a crush required an actual beating heart," he muses, watching as the teenager's ears suddenly grow pink. "But it makes sense that an uppity brat like you would only want a god."

Shi Wudu's book snaps shut.

And in that moment, the cold businessman and mature brother disappears—leaving behind a red faced, irritated teenager.

"Shut up! I was just asking if—!"

Shi Qingxuan pauses, the puppy now in his arms. "Gege has a crush?"

"No, I—!"

"He sure does!"

Even then?

He Xuan watches, and wonders.

Sees small stolen glances, even as early as being a teenager, looking at divine statues. Seeming somewhat sheepish, offering prayers.

(To the point where he prayed to Jun Wu instead, because that was less embarrassing.)

He has a fiancé, had since he was a child—and while they seem to get on just fine, he doesn't look at her like that.

Not with longing.

And He Xuan finds the idea baffling, that you could long for someone that you've never met, even if it's quietly, sheepishly.

He watches as the teenager begins training in other ways. Learning the basics of cultivation from Li Xiaotong, about combat and magic.

And it's odd, learning that in his mortal life, the Water Master, famous for his fan— was most well known for fighting with a whip, instead.

There are moments when every thought he's had of the man is contradicted.

Moments when he hides in a wardrobe, whining when his father carries him off. When he brings Shi Qingxuan through a murder scene, covering his eyes so he won't see.

Moments where he seems objectively selfless.

And then, there are moments when he's exactly what He Xuan thought.

When, after years of whispers from other members of the family, discussing a horrible, selfish idea—he takes action.

Gathering the members of the side branches of the family together, discussing the future of the clan and the company over dinner—there was just one problem.

A tragedy, really.

Someone poisoned the wine.

He Xuan watches as the others at the table crumple, one by one.

Until only two are left.

Shi Wudu at one end, still calmly eating his food—and his cousin at the other, trembling and frightened.

The same cousin who taunted him during the birthday feast.

A cruel, spoiled child—who had since grown into a lazy, entitled man.

“W-WHAT HAVE YOU DONE?!” He chokes, staggering back from the table, clutching his own throat, waiting for the poison to take hold.

It never does.

“Me?” Shi Wudu questions calmly, lifting his chopsticks to his mouth. “Shouldn’t I be asking you?”

His cousin is frozen, trembling on the floor.

Shi Wudu sets his food down, lifting his own glass—

Water.

“You were the only one whose wine was left untouched.” He muses.

He isn’t old enough to be served wine, after all.

“And you’re the only member of this family with debts.”

He dabs at his chin with a napkin, watching the dawning horror on his cousin’s face.

“I-I—!”

“I was shocked when you attacked me.” The teenager continues. “We grew up together, after all. I thought we were close.”

“But I—I didn’t—!”

Shi Wudu lifts a knife from the table.

His cousin trembles, cringing with terror, but— He flips it around, plunging it into his own side. Grimacing, his body shuddering from the pain— But it’s necessary.

Because when he shouts for the guards—no one questions him.

Nor his testimony, when the trial comes around.

And He Xuan can’t help but think now, watching these events unfold —

Maybe the Venerable of Empty Words sparked the beginning of this. Maybe it was the result of a long standing curse against them—

But the Shi family was already a powder keg—and they destroyed themselves. And after all of that…

After all of the suffering they endured, the cruelties they committed, the person that child was forced to become—

He Xuan watches as Hua Cheng appears—telling him that, after all of that—

He can’t save Shi Qingxuan.

That isn’t exactly what he says—but it’s what Shi Wudu hears.

Because a life in hiding, enduring everything that they have, always—

Always being afraid.

That isn’t a life at all.

That isn’t being saved.

And Shi Wudu is so, so sick of being afraid.

It was shocking to everyone else when, out of nowhere, the last heir of the Shi family placed their company on a blind trust, taking his brother, leaving their home in Qinghe behind.

But to He Xuan, watching from the outside—it’s entirely in line with everything else he’s done.

When he makes a decision, he follows through swiftly—no matter the difficulty.

No matter the cost.

And once he learned that his wealth, his family’s power couldn’t save Shi Qingxuan—

Then, he set his sights even higher.

“I’m surprised,” Li Xiaotong comments.

“You always seemed so concerned with legacy.”

For a time, he was.

Because legacy was all he had left of his parents.

“Oh,” the teenager shrugs, adjusting the saddle on his horse. “I’ll still have a legacy.”

But not as a merchant, or a politician.

The stories of the Water Master and that of Blackwater Sinking Ships is that of a mirror and its reflection.

Similar, but opposite.

He Xuan never cared about becoming a god—not until he learned his divinity had been stolen from him after his death.

Shi Wudu never cared about becoming a god either—he simply found his mortality to be an inconvenience in the goal of protecting his brother.

And so, he made up his mind to discard it.

Once the decision was made—the path was practically set in stone.

“Where will you go?”

Shi Wudu is packed—along with his sister—for a temple on a mountain north of the city, but Li Xiaotong has made no preparations to join them.

“...Probably back to Langling,” he admits, crossing his arms. “After all this time?”

“I’m not needed here anymore.”

There’s a tension in his voice—a clipped coldness that has been growing for some time now, though they have never spoken about it.

But Shi Wudu knows when it began, and he knows why.

When he framed his cousin for murder.

It started then.

When Shi Wudu doomed a man to the same fate that Li Xiaotong had suffered at the hands of his uncle, all those years ago.

He didn’t look at him in the same way, after that.

But the teenager had also given him his freedom, and so—he held his tongue.

Not now, however.

“...Wudu,” he crosses his arms, watching as the young cultivator pulls himself up into the saddle. “You know I’ve never tried to be a mentor to you.”

No, that much is true.

He taught the child how to survive, maybe. Guarded them, when Shi Wudu was too small to do it himself.

And maybe it was the fact that he never tried to pretend to be affectionate, that made Shi Wudu trust him. Made him willing to depend on him.

He should be sad at the prospect of him leaving, given that he’s grown attached, but..

He only feels tired.

“I know.”

“But I’m not interested in watching you do this to yourself,” Li Xiaotong stretches his arms over his shoulders with a yawn, joints cracking. “And I know I can’t stop you.”

Shi Wudu looks down at his horse, hands tightening around the reins. “...What are you talking about?”

His companion shakes his head, with a sigh.

“If you never give yourself a line you won’t cross, then you’ll never know when you’ve gone too far.”

Shi Wudu doesn’t reply—but the pointed skepticism in his eyes is clear.

‘That’s rich, coming from you.’

The man who helped a child commit a murder, all in the name of self interest.

“...Yeah,” Li Xiaotong smiles faintly, his eyes saddened. “Yeah, it’s too late for me. I stopped believing I could turn things around a long time ago. But you—”

He shakes his head, looking away.

“Your old man wasn’t around to teach you, and I never bothered. But sometimes…” He lets out a heavy sigh, like he’s trying to cast off a weight, buried deep in his chest. “Sometimes, it’s better to get hurt, or to fail, than become something that you can’t live with.”

Shi Wudu stops, finally looking back at him—guarded. “…You say that like you think I’m some sort of monster.”

“No,” Li Xiaotong shakes his head, crossing his arms. His hair blows gently in the breeze, his eyes dark, as though remembering a painful memory.

“Actually, you’re probably one of the most human people I’ve ever met. But—no matter how innocent the thing you want to protect is, no matter how good your intentions are—success at any cost isn’t success at all.”

Shi Wudu’s eyes harden.

“You’re talking about Shi Qingxuan.”

And in that moment, he knows that he’s lost him.

That Shi Wudu will never hear him.

Which was why he knew he couldn’t accompany the Shi brothers to the mountain— Because he couldn’t stand to watch.

“No.” Li Xiaotong shakes his head. “I was thinking of your uncle.”

The teenager stiffens, and he adds—

“Shi Mingyu.”

His shidi. His friend.

His first love—and at this rate, likely his last.

“When we killed Shi Jian—you told me that your mother would have been sad, if she knew what you had done. Well…”

Li Xiaotong inhales slowly, steadying himself.

“I probably could have saved your uncle that day—but I would have had to kill his older brother to do it.” He admits. “I don’t know which would have been better—but I don’t have to live with the guilt.”

Shi Wudu stares at him.

“...It seems like you’re still living with it, if you ask me.”

After all—if Li Xiaotong had killed Shi Jian that day—

Shi Wudu’s parents would probably still be alive.

It places the decision to stay with the Shi brothers these last few years, watching over them, in perspective.

“...And it would shock you,” Shi Wudu mutters, his eyes hardening with resolve, “the things that I can live with.”

He flicks the reins to his horse, setting back in the direction of Shi Manor. To find his brother—and take him to the start of a new life.

“Goodbye, Li Xiaotong.”

With that, any semblance of guidance in his life is removed, root and stem—and he is set on a path of training.

Brutal, continuous training. From sunrise, to sunset. So exhausted, he can barely keep his eyes open when he returns home—but he always does.

Eating dinner together—still making Shi Qingxuan sit through lessons, even now— reading stories with him before finally passing out from the exhaustion.

Some nights, he slips into slumber with the book still open in his lap—and Shi Qingxuan carefully pulls a blanket around him.

And now, having seen all of this—He Xuan is aware of the other, unintended result of his plan.

That he might have succeeded in shedding some light on the humanity of the man he hated so much, for so long—

But this isn’t like the last time he was here.

When he shared memories with Hua Cheng and Zhao Beitong—

It wasn’t like this.

He saw their memories, yes—but it felt like more of a flash reel. As though he was watching a play at breakneck speeds.

He saw all of it, remembers most of it—

But He Xuan entered the kiln shortly after his death, barely in his mid twenties.

It had been impossible for his mind to process the number of years he was witnessing. Hundreds, in Hua Cheng's case.

Thousands, in Zhao Beitong's. But Shi Wudu—

They're the same age.

Four centuries.

A number of years He Xuan is entirely capable of processing, having lived them out himself.

So, instead of being more of a distant witness—

He experiences all of it in real time.

It doesn't feel like he watched the Shi brothers grow up, it—

It feels as though He Xuan grew up with them.

It feels as though their parents were people that he knew .

And He Xuan—

He finds himself mourning them.

The longer it goes, the more he senses the Water Master's consciousness struggling, and he realizes...

While he's experiencing all of this in real time—

Shi Wudu is reliving all of it—in the most excruciating level of detail.

And the further they go, the more desperate he seems not to endure that.

As He Xuan is watching the Reverend discover Shi Qingxuan's disguise.

Watching the desperation fear and grow, as she's tortured day in and day out.

How close she came, so many different times, to breaking.

How many nights Shi Wudu spent praying. On his knees until they went numb— begging, with no hope of getting an answer.

And He Xuan knows it's coming, when he feels the strain around the edges of the memory.

How hard Shi Wudu is fighting, trying to keep him out of it.

That's when he sees the teenager kneeling in the temple of the Heavenly Emperor.

Whispering his prayers over and over again.

That's when he appears.

"Do you really mean that?"

Shi Wudu's head snaps up, shocked—

And before him stands a figure that gleams in the candlelight, shadows flickering across his face, wearing robes of white and silver.

Handsome—but almost in an aggressive way.

The mortal can barely stand to look upon him. And he trembles.

"Y—you—!" Shi Wudu chokes, barely catching himself on his hands as he scrambles backwards, his heart pounding.

"Don't be afraid," the heavenly emperor smiles, stepping forward. "You were the one who called me."

It's Jun Wu's temple, after all.

"I...I..." The mortal stammers.

He's a man now—of age, but just barely. And in the presence of Jun Wu, he feels more like a frightened child than anything else.

"I've been watching you for some time, you know," the god muses, watching as the young man's eyes grow impossibly wide.

"Y...you have?"

He Xuan stands in the shadows, glancing back and forth between the two of them, his eyebrows knitting together.

...What is this?

“Your cultivation level has been worthy of ascension for some time now, and yet...you have not come to me.”

The way he says it—it makes Shi Wudu feel almost ashamed, hanging his head, swallowing hard.

“I—I meant no disrespect,” the young man replies, lips trembling. “But I—I couldn’t leave. My little brother...”

“...Yes,” Jun Wu murmurs. “I’ve been listening to your prayers about him for many nights. Did you mean what you said before?”

“What...What I said?” Shi Wudu whispers. And god, He Xuan can feel him struggling.

Fighting with all of his might, not to share this memory.

But why?

What is he protecting?

“That you would do anything,” Jim Wu repeats, “Did you mean that?”

So often, living through these memories, He Xuan has paused, startled by how much older Shi Wudu seemed than his age.

But right now—he seems like exactly what he is.

A frightened, confused teenager.

“Yes,” Shi Wudu admits, his lips trembling. “Anything. If It meant...”

If it meant that his brother would be safe.

Even if it meant crossing a line, or becoming someone he ‘couldn’t live with.’

The martial god looks down upon him, his expression unreadable—and eventually, he offers the young cultivator his hand.

For a moment, Shi Wudu stares, trembling.

Slowly he reaches back, and the heavenly emperor pulls him to his feet.

“It’s horrible, watching the ones you love suffer,” he murmurs, shaking his head with sympathy. “There is no greater terror in this world.”

Shi Wudu nods, his chin dipping low, shoulders slumped.

He was a beautiful child, one who grew into a handsome young man.

Dressed in blue silks, silver and sapphire jewelry holding up silky dark hair, dangling from his ears.

He’s halfway between delicate and sharp—like a large cat of prey, one that has begun learning how to use his claws.

He was so proud, once.

Proud of his wealth. His beauty.

His intelligence and his talents. His family name.

And oh, how that pride lifted him up—pushed him so high, he found himself standing on top of a towering pedestal, far above everyone else.

But he was also dragging someone else up with him. He Xuan watched him do it.

Clutching his little brother’s hand as he dragged them both higher and higher—and now, he finds Shi Qingxuan hanging off of the edge of that pedestal, dangling towards the abyss.

Shi Wudu is left with two choices—to hold on, or to let him go.

And there’s only one path that he’s ever chosen.

But still—

After so many years of suffering, and fighting, and failing—

That pride has begun to fade. The lines blurring with each passing day.

His own faith in himself has begun to falter—He Xuan can see it in his eyes. He expresses that doubt, and Jun Wu reassures him.

Still he…

(He Xuan watches the scene with rising nausea.)

The eyes staring up at Jun Wu are wide, vulnerable— Moldable.

“…But I can’t save him.”

He doesn’t—

He Xuan clutches his head, staring at that face.

But he doesn’t just see Jun Wu.

Not anymore.

Not here.

He sees a man, standing before the mother who forged Black Water Sinking Ships, offering her a butterfly in a box.

The Crown Prince of Wuyong.

He sees a white masked figure, half crying half smiling, clutching a ghost fire in his palm.

He—

He Xuan sinks to his knees, his eyes flooding with tears of contradiction.

Because he—

He hears his brother’s soul screaming.

Not his brother. Not his responsibility.

He’s told himself that so many times.

His alliance with Hua Cheng was always one of mutual benefit. He needed an ally, and He Xuan—

He needed to get stronger—all in the name of revenge.

And he didn’t need another family. Didn’t want to feel that loss again.

Because his heart had already died.

The person who could be all of those things—

A husband, a friend, a son, a brother—

He died.

But standing there now, looking at Jun Wu's face—he feels.

Rage. Sorrow. Fear.

And now, looking at Shi Wudu—

He doesn't see his enemy.

This child—this seventeen year old standing before him—

He hasn't hurt He Xuan's family. Not yet.

He isn't the Water Tyrant. Not yet.

He's—

He's Shi Qingxuan's older brother.

He's Shi Weiyuan and Yu Yanmei's son.

He's frightened, he's tired, and he's alone.

Seventeen years old, with the most powerful man in the world taking him by the shoulders, hands enveloping a smaller, youthful frame, telling him—

"There is something."

And watching this, the feeling in He Xuan's throat—

It feels wrong. It disgusts him. But—

He Xuan feels protective over him.

Shi Wudu goes completely still in Jun Wu's grip, his gaze entranced—like someone caught under a spell.

So desperate to be relieved of this constant state of fear that he's been living in—for most of his life, now—that he'll do anything.

Anything.

And watching his face, all He Xuan wants to do is scream—to tell him to turn way. To not accept it—because anything from that man is a trap, but—

“...What?”

This isn’t He Xuan’s memory, and his protests go unheard.

“You’ve thought of the answer yourself before, haven’t you?” Jun Wu smiles

And it breaks his heart, watching Shi Wudu hesitate.

Seeing how close his life—their lives—came to being something different.

“...Someone told me...” Shi Wudu starts, then stops, his gaze fretful. “That it would only make things worse...”

Hua Cheng.

It—

He Xuan curls onto the ground, his agony pulsing in time with Shi Wudu’s, each swamped in their own mazes of hurt and regret.

Hua Cheng warned him.

He—

Hua Cheng warned He Xuan, too.

So many times.

He never listened. Never trusted him.

Because Hua Cheng only ever cared about one thing: and how could He Xuan know whether or not his advice was sincere, or self motivated? He didn’t care about A- Zhong, or Qin Meirong, or He Xuan’s parents.

Only Xie Lian. But—

He Xuan grips the side of his head, tears of blood slipping down his cheeks.

After living seventeen years of Shi Wudu’s life in the span of only a few hours—his greatest enemy—

He Xuan still feels so much hatred, resentment, and hurt—

But he cares .

And when He Xuan entered Mount Tonglu—

Hua Cheng was the same age that he is now. Meaning—He Xuan's memories—

Did they feel like this for him, too?

Every moment that Crimson Rain Sought Flower tolerated him, assisted him, or tried to talk him out of it—

'What's left of you after, He Sheng?'

Was it not simply because he needed Blackwater as an ally? As a piece in his plans?

Did he—?

"Not if you do it properly," the Heavenly Emperor assures Shi Wudu, squeezing his shoulders. "You're more than capable."

And He Xuan—

He watches the struggle in Shi Wudu's eyes.

The first time he's seen the boy hesitate. Wrestling with himself.

And it aches so deep inside, like a rock clattering down a mineshaft, echoes ringing hollowly throughout.

Because He Xuan knows why.

Shi Wudu didn't hesitate to kill his uncle, because he was a threat. A murderer.

He didn't hesitate to kill the other members of his family, because they were threats to Shi Qingxuan—and selfish, greedy people, who had allowed the Shi brothers to be exploited.

But in this case—

They're talking about hurting people he doesn't know. People who have done nothing to him, who pose no threat to his brother.

He Xuan watches as he's dragged to that line, one he never knew he had, and struggles to cross it.

And it's unfair.

It's probably easier to sleep at night, when the man who ruined your life is heartless. When you can cut his throat without a second thought.

It's hard, when you know the person who destroyed your future takes no joy in hurting people.

When you know that he his favorite toy as a child was a stuffed bear.

That he tried to climb into his mothers arms one last time after she died, and cried silently when she couldn't hold him anymore.

And in the face of his hesitation—

Jun Wu doesn't stop.

He brings up his family.

His dead wife, and sons. Feeling so sorry for himself, it makes He Xuan want to be sick.

Makes him want to rip his heart out, remembering the wail Tonglu Hudie let out, watching San Lang fall from the Bridge of Wuyong.

But Shi Wudu doesn't know.

And instead of feeling the disgust and rage that He Xuan feels—

There's sympathy on his face. A crack in his defenses, one where the emperor can crawl in like a weed, allowing trust to take root.

"...My parents were stolen from me," Shi Wudu admits, glaring at the floor.

"I know," Jun Wu murmurs—and his breath catches in his throat.

"...You do?" The teenager whispers.

"You prayed to me, back then."

And oh, the difference perspective can make.

All He Xuan can feel is horror—because he knows the emperor doesn't listen to every prayer.

Which means he was watching the Water Master as young as the age of ten years old. But all Shi Wudu hears is that someone was watching.

That he wasn't alone.

"You...heard me?" He whispers, his lips trembling, and his eyes—

They prick with tears.

Because he's so, so tired.

But he can't see Jun Wu's expression, staring up at his divine statue now.

The way his eyes have narrowed into an expression that's almost hateful—but his voice remains warm and gentle.

"Those men didn't find you, did they?" Shi Wudu leans back against a pillar, his knees suddenly weak. "They didn't hurt your brother."

It's been so long since he's been protected.

So long, since someone made an effort to actually help him—not without wanting something in return, and now—

"I'll help you."

The teenager lets out a choked sound, knees nearly buckling under him, lips quivering, "Thank—" he chokes, tears slipping down his cheeks, "Thank you, I—"

But it's never so simple. Nothing with Jun Wu ever is.

"If," the heavenly emperor continues, speaking over him as he walks across the temple floor, approaching the human, "you accept my terms."

"...Terms?" Shi Wudu questions, his eyebrows creasing. "Yes, I'll accept anything, anything you ask, I—"

Fingers grip his chin tightly.

He Xuan can only watch with growing nausea, seeing—

Seeing the first glimpse of something that had always been there. Subversive hints lying all around—but no one ever thought about it. Ever looked at it.

Because the truth was inconvenient.

What being the emperor's 'favorite' actually means.

Shi Wudu falls silent, heart pounding to the point where it's almost becomes uncomfortable, meeting Jun Wu's gaze.

"You will tell no one else," he murmurs, thumb digging in slightly beneath Shi Wudu's lower lip, until the cultivator squirms with discomfort.

Not so young that he can't recognize the desire in the Emperor's eyes, but not old enough to believe that interest is directed at him.

"The rules of heaven are limiting at times—even for me. Most of the heavenly officials have never experienced suffering. Not in the way that we have. They won't understand the things we do."

And everything about it is so intentional.

Saying 'we' instead of 'you.'

Making it seem like no one else could ever understand.

Like no one else could ever help him, or even want to.

He Xuan has imagined this moment in so many different ways. He always assumed this must have been knowledge that Shi Wudu went out looking for.

After all, what kind of Cultivator had that knowledge by chance?

He hadn't imagined it as a last resort. Hadn't thought about how pale, desperate, and frightened his enemy might have looked, swallowing down ears of self loathing as he nods in agreement.

Jun Wu smiles, turning away from him, knowing that the teenager will fall into step by his side.

"Tell me," the heavenly emperor murmurs, his footsteps echoing through the hall, asking a question, one that will destroy so many lives—

"What do you know about switching fates?"

He sells He Xuan's future away. His sister's life. Qin Meirong's life.

But there was another price, one that no one (except for the man who orchestrated it) could have known was being paid at the time—

To save his brother, Shi Wudu sold his soul.

The memory shifts forward again, but once they reach the point past his ascension—

"NO!"

It's a testament to the Water Master's strength, really.

While He Xuan has little control over the Kiln—as a Heavenly Official with no cursed energy, Shi Wudu should have none.

They're snapped out of the memory—but not returned to the halls of the Kiln, either. Instead, they're left in a dark hallway in between.

Everywhere and nowhere. Past and Present.

With He Xuan rubbing his head, and—

Shi Wudu is on his hands and knees.

Tears pouring down his cheeks, shoulders shaking.

"...Mom..." He croaks, his voice breaking, silencing himself before he can say the rest.

'I'm cold.'

'I'm so, so cold.'

He just—

He just lived through all of that, all over again.

And all he can see are those eyes.

His mother's eyes, dull and lifeless, staring at him through the crack in that door.

"..." He bites back the bile rising in his throat, looking up at He Xuan with resigned fear—distrust. "...Are you happy?" He mutters, tears falling unceasingly.

“IS THAT ENOUGH?!”

“...” He Xuan doesn’t shout back at him. Doesn’t offer any cruel taunts.

He hasn’t found forgiveness yet.

Not for lack of trying.

He’s found sympathy. Understanding. Even some amount of caring.

But the ache of loss, the searing, inflamed grief—

It’s still there.

And after all of that—part of him wonders if he just isn’t capable of it, as desperately as he wants to be.

As he needs to be.

Because he—

‘Papa?’

He squeezes his eyes shut, pressing his first against his face.

“...This isn’t about punishing you,” he mutters.

Shi Wudu presses his forehead against the cool stone floor, his breaths shallow and hitched.

“Just kill me,” he knows he must make a shameful sight. The Water Tyrant, crying on the ground, begging for death. That must satisfy him, right?

“...I didn’t bring you here to kill you,” He Xuan shakes his head.

And to the contrary—

He doesn’t actually take joy in this.

He doesn’t find any satisfaction in seeing how cruel the world was to the Water Master, before he chose to be cruel in return.

“...Then just stop,” Shi Wudu croaks, sitting up, his arms wrapped around himself. “That was enough, wasn’t it?! You saw everything you needed to see!”

He Xuan looks at the hall around them—and he shakes his head. "I'm not controlling how this ends, believe it or not."

Shi Wudu's stomach sinks.

"It'll show us what it wants us to see before it lets us go."

"What will?!"

Blackwater glances at the walls around them.

"The Kiln."

It's almost bizarre, listening to him speak of Mount Tonglu like a living, breathing thing.

Shi Wudu glances around them, his teeth clenched until the grind and ache. He doesn't care.

He doesn't want to see.

He was ready.

His eyes slide up to He Xuan, infuriated by the hollowed out, exhausted look in his eyes.

Doesn't he understand that he was ready?!

But...not for...

"...I'm going through that again," he mutters, the trembling in his hands becoming even more violent.

Because he knows what comes next.

"DO YOU HEAR ME?!" He lunges to his feet. "YOU'RE GONNA HAVE TO KILL ME, BECAUSE I'M NOT—!"

But the moment his fingers close around He Xuan's throat—the hall they're standing in disappears.

And they're falling, all over again.

Shi Wudu isn't graceful about landing on his feet, ill practiced for whatever this is— crashing down on his hands and knees.

When he looks up— There's no He Xuan. Just a city street, in—

Qinghe.

Shi Wudu recognizes it immediately, whipping his head around. This is Qinghe.

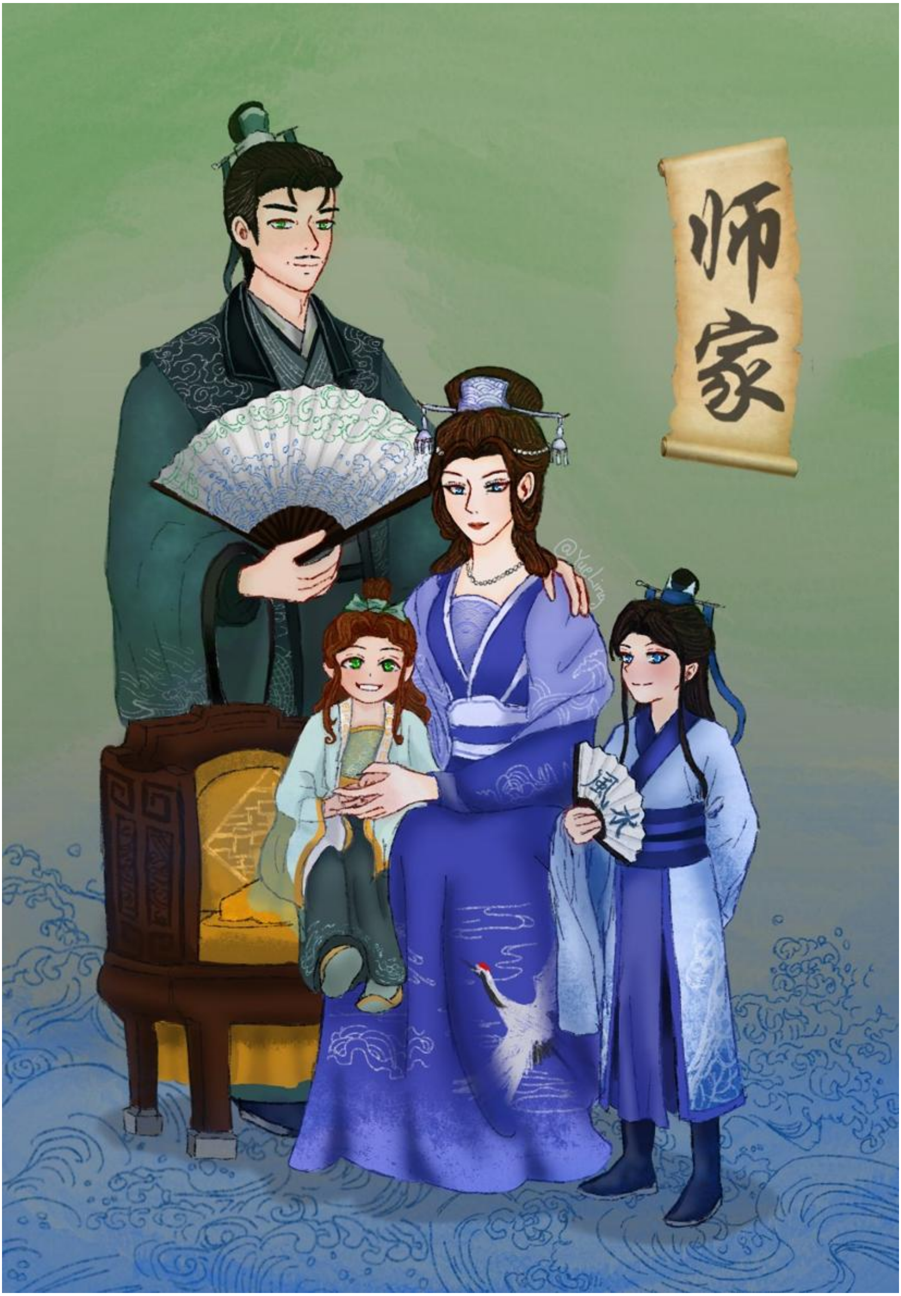
But what memory is this? He doesn’t—

“He Sheng!”

ARTWORK INSPIRED BY THIS STORY

Included with permission from the artist, do not reproduce or use for any reason.

The Shi Family



师家
風水
@YueLing

CREDIT: YUE LING

Chapter End Notes

thank you to Yue Ling for their amazing artwork, and allowing me to share it!

xoxo, Evie

Forgiveness is a Broken Chain

Chapter Summary

> He Xuan fantasized for so many years, about what he would do to reduce that face to tears. To force the proud, cold hearted creature that stole his future to his knees and force him to apologize.
>
> That was what he did, back in Blackwater Manor.
>
> And while Shi Wudu said the words he wanted, accepting his punishment—he wasn't sorry.
>
> And He Xuan felt no closure.

Chapter Notes

> !!! CONTENT WARNING !!!
>
> This chapter covers violence, death, and rape. Please read with caution.
>
> Disclaimer: I would also like to clarify that, like many victims of sexual assault, Shi Wudu's thought processes are heavily impacted by his trauma. His perception of his relationship with his abuser is heavily warped, and his internal narration should be viewed in that context.

The Water Master grows still.

There's a group of neighborhood children, kicking around a cheap sack filled with grain—bothering a boys who doesn't seem interested in playing, sitting off to the side by himself.

"I'm busy."

His friend glares, stomping over. "Busy doing what?!"

The dark haired boy is hunched over a pile of rope, knotting them together with some odd piece of metal—

"Building something."

They go back and forth, and another one of their teammates jogs over with a frown. “What’s he doing?”

“...” The ruddy-faced boy rolls his eyes, crossing his arms.

“He Xuan here thinks he’s gonna be a ship builder, one day.”

The dark haired boy glances up at him sharply. “That’s not what I’m doing.”

Shi Wudu takes a step back, looking around.

Why is he seeing this?

Each time he tries to scream, or call attention to himself—to break the memory and slip out—nothing happens.

No one around even seems to see him, or look at him.

He just—

He has to watch.

Watch, as the children kick one of the parts he’s working on aside.

It skids across the street, into some nearby stalls, and when it does...

Shi Wudu freezes, watching as He Xuan bumps into the Crown Prince of Xianle.

A quiet child, with sun kissed skin, dark hair, and eyes of such depth, fidgeting awkwardly when the god offers him a bronze coin

Wanting to take it, but not wanting to give nothing in exchange. Still, he comes up with something.

“...One of the turnbuckles on your loom is messed up.”

Xie Lian lets out a sigh, looking back at the machine tiredly. “That makes sense, I suppose. It’s pretty old now.”

He Xuan fiddles with the gear in his hands before dropping it into his pocket. “I can fix it,” he offers.

When the Taoist raises an eyebrow, surprised, he explains—

“I’m good at fixing stuff, so if you let me try...”

Slowly, Xie Lian smiles.

"By all means."

Shi Wudu watches, as the child runs home after words—his mother greeting him as soon as he steps in the door.

A quiet home, cramped, with no expensive furniture, heavy rugs, or family portraits— But still, a family home.

And a happy one.

He Sheng's mother smiles fondly, ruffling his hair. "No trouble today?"

Her son shakes his head, moving in a rush so common in little boys, always running from place to place.

"No, Ma!"

Her eyes sparkle down at him—a deep, almost electric shade of blue, like the sea after lightning strikes.

Just like his.

"Good boy," she murmurs, "your father isn't back yet. Are you and your sister eating before you leave?"

He shakes his head, bouncing with excitement.

"We're gonna go early," he mumbles, fishing for the bronze piece in his pocket, "I got this, so we're gonna eat there."

His mother eyes the coin curiously. "How did you get this?"

"The weaver on Gushan street? I helped him fix his loom," He Xuan explains.

"I told him he didn't have to pay me, but he insisted."

That makes his mother smile softly, watching him with such fondness.

Their family doesn't have much—but her son has always been their greatest blessing. Handsome, kind, so talented in everything he tries.

"That's my clever He Sheng," she murmurs, setting down her book. "How about you sit down for a second? Your hair's a mess."

"It's fine…" Her son groans, impatient.

"It's falling all over the place," she snorts, patting the space on the bench beside her. "Come here."

Reluctantly, he complies.

Once he's seated beside her, she undoes the leather cord holding his hair up, combing it for a few minutes, humming while she works, before tying it back up in a high, neat ponytail.

The same style Shi Wudu watched Ming Yi wear, for so many years.

He Sheng leans against her as she does so, eyes half lidded and content. "Isn't that better?"

Her son looks up at her—and he smiles.

"Yeah," he agrees, pressing closer against her, "it's better."

His mother smiles back at him, giving him a one armed hug, kissing the top of his head.

Such a good son, sweet tempered by nature.

Finally, there's the sound of feet coming down the steps. "Gege?"

Shi Wudu doesn't turn around. Doesn't want to look. Doesn't think he could bear it. But—

As if by force, his head is slowly wrenched around. Forcing him to bear witness.

A small girl appears in the doorway—with matching dark hair, plaited into two neat braids down her back, and clear gray eyes, shining with excitement.

"Can we go now?"

He Sheng looks up at his mother for permission—and she smiles, nodding.

"Don't let her out of your sight!"

"I won't," He Sheng agrees, leaping to his feet, hurrying towards the door.

"Hold her hand the entire time!"

"I will!"

Shi Wudu follows after them, footsteps unnaturally light as he treads through memory, looking all around him.

Where are they going, anyway?

Passing through parts of the city he was born in, but has never seen.

Streets and alleyways in the poorer districts. Places his father never would have allowed him to play. And when he was older—he never bothered.

But when they reach the bustling central avenue…

Oh.

Performers and acrobats parade through the streets, popping off firecrackers, dancing around inside paper foil dragons, and kites soaring high in the air.

This—

This was the Fire Festival.

Their family always watched from the terrace, never going down into the streets below.

But here, he can see it all.

The music, the laughter, the buskers sword swallowing and breathing fire.

And he watches as He Sheng uses the contraption he'd been working on all day, to lift his sister up on top of one of the buildings over the central square.

"Oh!" He Zhong gasps, watching as the fires start to light up in the streets below. "Gege! We have the best seats ever!"

He Sheng grins, brighter than he has all day. "Right? You like it?"

From here, they can see the entire parade—and the fireworks as they shoot out across the water. It's…

He Zhong smiles up at him, holding his hand tightly. "I love it! It's the best fire parade EVER! It's just…" Her smile fades slightly. "I wish we didn't have to move," she mumbles, her expression dimming.

He Sheng leans a little closer, bumping their shoulders together. "I know."

"I'll miss my friends..."

"Yeah," he agrees—then smiles down at her. "But I'll be there—and I'm your best friend. Right, A-Zhong?"

Oh.

Shi Wudu takes a step back, swallowing hard.

He—

He's probably only ten years old, and still—he spent the entire day trying to think of a way to make his sister less sad about moving away.

Trying to fix it.

'I'm good at fixing stuff.'

(And it's just like something Shi Wudu would have done, for his own brother.) He watches with growing sorrow, as—

As He Sheng spends the rest of his life trying to fix things.

Being a dutiful son. A caring older brother.

A friend.

His family makes a new life in the village of Fu Gu.

He Sheng excels in his studies, of course—excels in everything.

But the thing Shi Wudu can't seem to stop noticing, no matter how hard he tries not to watch—

Is He Zhong.

How bright and trusting her smile is.

The way she always tries to hard to keep up with her older brother, the way—

The way she idolizes him.

Most boys that age would probably find it annoying, having their little sister follow them around like a little duckling—

But not He Sheng.

He’s so patient.

And he—

He doesn’t stop his sister from trying to climb trees with him, or swim down in the coves by the bay, looking for pearls.

He doesn’t tell her it’s too dangerous, or that she’s too small.

He teaches He Zhong how to do things for herself.

Even if it's hard.

If she falls, scrapes a knee, or sprains an ankle—he's there to pick her up again. To help dry the tears, bandage the craps.

To help her try again, next time.

And with each time that she tries, she gets better—stronger.

She learns how to read in three different languages. How to wriggle down into deep underwater crevices, finding the pearls other children can't reach.

(She has He Sheng keep track of the money she makes selling them, saving up for her very own horse.)

He Sheng might have outshined her, but only out of a testament to his own raw excellence. In any other family, she would have been considered a genius in her own right.

And still—that never seemed to bother her, or breed any sense of competition between the two.

Then, there's a girl with a smile that never reaches her eyes. Soft brown curls, freckles across her cheeks and nose.

Beautiful, but in a gentle way. The kind of face that, even when looked upon by a stranger, feels like home.

And the village treats her like a ghost.

Her twin sister died in the plague that ripped through Xuli only a few months before—and now, she's treated like the broken, remaining piece of a matching set.

No one sees her presence, only her sister's absence.

Still, she tries to smile—for her father, mostly.

Her mother has already passed—Qin Meirong is all he has left.

And her sister's death broke him. Shattered places inside that only a parent can understand.

So, when she brings his lunch to the shipyard, it's cheerfully.

When she carries water to and from the well, she sings.

He Sheng watches—with a look of sheepish longing that Shi Wudu knows all too well.

Nearly drops his hammer twice the first time he sees her, in the middle of helping to secure the siding for a hull in the shipyard.

She notices—holds up a book to hide her smile.

Because the whole village talks about how special he is, what a bright future he has, but—

Qin Meirong just thinks he's handsome. And his eyes, while naturally cold, grow so soft and fond when they look upon those he loves.

And when they look at her...

She doesn't feel like a ghost anymore.

They fall in love easily, like time slipping by on a lazy afternoon.

He offers to help her carry water from the well. She sits on the shore and holds onto the oysters he and He Zhong bring up when they go diving for pearls.

There's a sadness to her—a chill inside that he always seeks to build a fire around to keep her warm.

Trying to fix it.

She confesses one day, how horrible it is for her to be alone. How, until her sister died, she was never by herself.

How weak it makes her feel.

There was a time when she was wary of admitting such a thing to He Sheng, the strongest person she's ever met, that she's afraid of something as silly as being alone.

But he doesn't make her feel ashamed.

He simply tells her that she never has to be.

They spend every day together. And on the nights when she can't stand to sleep alone, she crawls into bed with A-Zhong, He Sheng sleeping on the floor beside them.

Sometimes, her hand dangles off of the bed—and his hand reaches up to grasp hers.

He always squeezes her fingers three times—and when he tries to let go, she holds on. Doesn't let up until she falls asleep, her fingers going limp.

But sometimes, He Sheng holds on a little longer—watching her face in the moonlight through the window.

Fifteen years old, madly in love with his best friend, whispering the words under his breath.

All while Shi Wudu sits in the corner, knees pulled against his chest, stricken and pale.

"...I'm so lucky."

The first time he says 'I love you,' it's an accident.

A-Zhong is a relatively independent girl, but—

Boys are scary. Particularly boys that like her. A boy tells her she has beautiful eyes, and she breaks out into hives.

It's true, it's really true.

That's why she goes running up to her big brother, hiding behind him in the town square, wrapping her arms around his back.

"Gege, help!" She cries, risking a peek around his shoulder.

He Sheng glances back at her, arching an eyebrow. "What is it?"

She nods towards a twelve year old boy in the corner of the square, her lips turning into a deep frown. "Could you do the scary face?"

"Why?"

"He said I was cute..." She mumbles, hiding her face in his back.

Mortified.

So, setting her gege on him is the natural solution.

He Sheng turns his head—and he doesn't say a word. Doesn't need to.

His eyes are so dark, cold, and wrathful—the pre-teen in question goes pale, nearly dropping the basket of potatoes he was carrying as he flees down the street.

From beside him, Qin Meirong giggles. "What?"

"Everyone is so sure that you COULD beat them up, they never stop to think about whether or not you actually would."

He Xuan frowns, crossing his arms. "Who says I wouldn't?"

"Me."

"And why is that?"

She grins, clasping her hands around her back, turning to face him.

"You're a huge softy, that's why," She rocks up onto the balls of her feet as A-Zhong wanders off, making soft (good natured) gagging noises. "Decent to the core."

"Am not," He Sheng rolls his eyes, crossing his arms.

"Are too." She reaches up to poke his chest.

"I've never seen you be anything less than wonderful."

And he just blurts it out, because it's the most obvious explanation, not thinking: "That's because I love you."

They both stop, staring at each other.

Fifteen, wide eyed, blushing from head to toe.

Not sure of what to say.

She waits, knowing it was an accident. And maybe that's true—but He Sheng doesn't take it back.

Even if he's red in the face, nervous, and embarrassed. Because he meant it.

Then, after what feels like forever—

"I-I…love you too."

She says it back.

The first time they said it, there was embarrassment, nerves, and shock.

But every other time, it comes so easily.

When they're reading together under a tree, Qin Meirong against his chest, closing her eyes and smiling as the breeze plays through her hair.

"I love you."

She says it when he has his mouth full, of course, chewing on an apple —

But he grasps her hand, squeezing it three times.

And she knows, he's saying it back.

They so young, when he asks her to marry him. His face pinched with seriousness.

Knowing that he doesn't have much to offer at the moment. That he comes from a poor family, and what he could provide for a future family—

That would come from wits and skill alone.

But he has arguments composed in his head, prepared to present his case, when—

"Yes."

She breathes, staring at him with wide eyes.

“And I—”

“Yes.”

“—promise that I’ll make sure you have—”

“I’m saying yes, He Sheng!”

He stops, and he stares at her.

Then, he smiles.

And Shi Wudu can see the thought in his eyes, over and over again:

‘I’m so lucky.’

In this one instance, watching this unfold—

Shi Wudu agrees.

In this one situation—

His heart aches with envy.

Watching how every single one of He Sheng’s firsts were with someone he loved. How kind they were to one another.

Asking for nothing, but giving everything.

It took Shi Wudu a long time, to realize that kisses were something you could ache for.

That there was a difference between obligation and desire.

Because of that, it took him such a long time to realize it—when he finally did call in love.

So deeply, he mistook it for fear. Being afraid that he might be hated, if the person he was sleeping beside knew what he had done.

But He Sheng’s childhood and teenage years—while not lived in the wealth and opulence that surrounded Shi Wudu’s—

They were happy.

His sister grew into a beautiful young woman. Confident, quick witted—and while her brother studied for the national exams—

He Zhong finally bought that horse.

Practiced her archery day in and day out, with He Sheng's assistance and encouragement, becoming an avid archer.

And while He Sheng is proud—

Shi Wudu covers his mouth, trying in vain, after so many attempts, to look away. He's proud of her, too.

Because now, he's lived those years too.

He's—

He's watched her grow up.

Watched He Sheng grow up.

Watched him fall in love.

And now, for the first time—

He sees himself.

The newly ascended Water Master, coming ashore after rescuing a group of fishermen.

Sees his eyes fix upon He Xuan when he hears the young man's name.

Sees the look on his face change, when he learns the young man's birthday.

Shi Wudu watches himself, from the outside, knowing what decision he's making.

And at the time, it seemed like the only way.

At the time, it was something he was ashamed of—but it wasn't personal . These weren't people he knew .

But now—

Now, he watches He Sheng fall.

Knowing this time—

That this is his fault.

He—

He did this.

At first, it's only the smaller things. Never getting his results from the National Exams back. His ships repeatedly facing bad weather.

But, whereas the Shi family had been a powder keg—

He Sheng's family was strong.

They never turned on one another.

His parents were supportive. His sister offered to go and threaten the exam proctors herself, and—

And Qin Meirong always believed in him. Had endless faith that, no matter what came, he would be able to face it.

They never blamed him.

There were moments when Qin Meirong would try to cheer him up—pressing her palm to his cheek, the way she always did when he was brooding, and talk about the future.

Their wedding, in the summer.

Moving back to the city, after his exams.

How many children they would have.

And the thought of that always seemed to pull him up. No matter how tired he was. No matter how frustrated he was.

Because that was all that he wanted.

A peaceful life. A family with the woman he loved.

And now, as he watches He Sheng scrambling, constantly trying to fix it—

Shi Wudu knows that He Sheng would have had those things.

That they were taken away from him. That he—

He stole those things from him.

And while it might have hurt He Xuan to watch Shi Wudu's childhood, while it might have been hard, feeling sympathy for those that he hated—

Shi Wudu is watching the lives of his victims.

The lives he stole.

On some level, he always knew what he had done.

But that’s not the same as the fear he feels, watching as He Sheng returns home from his final set of state exams—

Only to find his sister and fiancé are gone.

Taken.

By the wealthy merchant family that owns most of Fu Gu—with the intention of making them concubines.

Willingly, or not.

Shi Wudu has lived through things most people shouldn’t. Witnessed sights that would make weaker men crumble, but—

He scrambles backwards on the ground until his back slams into the tree behind him, hands covering his eyes, desperately wishing he could—

He could escape the sight of He Zhong.

Sprawled on her side in the courtyard, hand limply extended towards the gates.

Her body limp and cold as He Sheng falls to his knees beside her, just—

Screaming from the grief.

He Zhong, the little girl with braids and a gap toothed smile, eagerly running by her brother’s side.

He Zhong, who loved climbing trees and snorted when she laughed too hard.

He Zhong, who could eat half of a pork shoulder by herself, but would gag if you tried to make her eat a vegetable.

He Zhong, who was nervous around boys, intimidated by intimacy—Cut her own throat, before those men could force themselves on her.

And now, as He Xuan clutches her in his arms, sobbing, those eyes are staring back at Shi Wudu as her head dangles lifelessly from her brother's shoulders.

He did this.

He—

'I'm your best friend, right?'

A ragged, broken sob rips from Shi Wudu's throat.

'Always.'

Then, he sees it.

The precise moment when He Sheng's heart shattered beyond repair.

When he hears broken, fractured gasps—no, that isn't what you could call them.

They're last breaths.

There, beaten nearly beyond recognition, left alone in the cold, he finds Qin Meirong.

Whimpering his name with bruised lips.

"H...He...X...Xuan..."

He can barely see through the tears, breaths coming so fast, his head won't stop spinning.

But still, he sees.

Still, he watches.

As He Xuan cradles his love in his arms, shushing her whimpers, stroking her hair.

Because he can't save here.

Because there's nothing to be done.

All—

All he can do is help her die peacefully, even as his own heart burns to ash, beating in contradiction of all reason.

Because how could it, when hers is fading? Even so, with all of the pain that she's in... Her eyes are still so warm, looking up at him. She —

Shi Wudu shudders, clutching the sides of his head.

She's at peace already, knowing that she's in the arms of the man she loves. The boy she thought was handsome.

Who always worked so hard to make her smile.

He was determined to show her how clever was without trying too hard. To find ways to make her smile that seemed unintentional on his part.

He Sheng succeeded in making her smile every time—but she never quite believed that it was unintentional.

If there has to be an end, if there has to be a moment when everything about her fades, and the world goes dark—

Then Qin Meirong is happy, that it's in the arms of the boy who told her that she never had to be alone.

She's grateful—even now.

And she's trying to comfort him .

"He X-Xuan," she repeats his name, blood bubbling past her lips with every word she speaks, but still, when he tries to shush her—she presses on, "I-It's alright," she whispers, her eyes turning over his shoulder, looking past him—at something he can't see.

"S...she found me."

Her lips pull up into a faint, broken smile, "H-He was right..."

"I don't..." He Xuan's voice is nearly incapable of speech, "I don't understand..." And neither does Shi Wudu, not at first.

But when he turns his head, here, in the Kiln, he can see.

A young girl in white mourning robes.

With the same curls, warm brown eyes—the same freckles across her cheeks. Qin Meirong's sister, come—

Come to take her home.

A broken set, finally made whole again.

That's where the peace comes from, in dying.

The ones who went first.

Qin Meirong's breaths are rattling towards the end, broken ribs protesting each attempt at air —

But she clutches the front of He Sheng's robes, pulling insistently until she can take hold of his hand, putting everything she has into what will be her final act.

"You're a g...good man," Qin Meirong's last words echo with ringing fatality, her eyes still so clear, even towards the end, staring up at him with a determined light, "Don't....don't let them...make you f-forget that, He Xuan..."

And Shi Wudu can't move, can't breathe.

Can't stop remembering what his sister said—

The words that made He Xuan stop and stare at her in agony, four centuries later.

"You're a good man, He Xuan."

The very last of her strength goes into squeezing his hand.

Once, twice, three times.

Then, it goes limp.

He still holds on.

Even as he clutches her and weeps, screaming until his voice turns raw, he holds onto her hand.

Blinded by the pain, and helpless to top it.

Because He Sheng doesn't know what he did wrong.

Because he doesn’t know how to make it stop.

Because he—

He Xuan can’t fix it.

Compared to the screaming and the sobbing, Shi Wudu’s tears are silent. Staring into He Zhong’s blank, glassy eyes.

Like he never really left that wardrobe that night, so many years ago. Part of him wishes that he never did.

In the reflection of those eyes, he sees her brother’s reflection.

Cradling the body of the woman he loved in his arms, screaming at the world for being so unfair.

But—

Shi Wudu clutches a hand over his mouth so tightly, his fingernails dig into his cheek.

It didn’t have to be.

He was the one who made it unfair.

‘If you never give yourself a line you won’t cross, then you’ll never know when you’ve gone too far.’

And now, he feels how far over that line he is.

Because—

In the beginning, Jun Wu gave Shi Wudu a choice.

The person he is now, the creature he became—

Shi Wudu is a leviathan of his own making, each layer of humanity stripped back by choice. But He Xuan...

He didn’t choose any of this.

But the Water Master watches as a good man dies.

As he’s placed in chains and thrown in a cell.

As his body wastes away and starves after years in captivity.

His mother dies, and he isn't there. Only receives a letter, one the guards read to him tauntingly from the other side of steel bars.

One of them drops a piece of bread on the ground before him, just out of reach.

He Xuan's eyes are always cold now.

There's no one left to make them soften with warmth and affection.

And the lessons he learns are cruel, hammered in over and over again.

That people are selfish.

That life isn't fair.

That the world is cruel.

As the Reverend of Empty Words latches onto his back, whispering hateful words into his ear, day in and day out—

But He Xuan doesn't respond with fear.

No, his response is only slow, growing resentment.

Anger.

He's the worst sort of person to be targeted by a Venerable.

Beaten down, robbed of everything that brought him happiness—

And still, the young man doesn't break.

He watches as He Xuan, freshly released from prison, returns to his ailing father, too old and fragile now to work on the ships he once helped build.

And even now, with his exams passed, when he must want to leave Fu Gu behind...

He stays—and he becomes a shipbuilder himself, starting a business. Small, at first, but...more and more successful, as time goes on.

And, however briefly—he manages to thrive. But it could never last.

Not with that creature on his back—and not with the curse that Shi Wudu placed upon him.

Shi Wudu watches, as the world takes everything he has. Over and over and over again.

But each time, He Xuan rises back up.

Like the waves crashing back up after a storm, he surges with every downfall. He Xuan endures it against all reason.

Until he can't.

Until he's been pushed so far, something inside of him snaps.

Another ship commandeered. Another loan refused. Another day outside of a cell when he goes to bed hungry.

The final straw comes in the late afternoon, when he's returning from a day of hard, manual work.

Gaunt, thin—a tall man, once a muscular youth—but he never quite recovered from the starvation he endured in prison.

Still alive, but he looks far more like a wraith.

And when he returns to his family home, he finds the last living relative he has—his father—has passed away.

Alone, sitting in a chair by the window, his head turned to look out. Waiting for him to return home one last time.

He Sheng, his pride and joy.

Always such a good son.

He Xuan kneels by his father's chair, holding one hand between his own. It's gone stiff and cold by now.

His expression is unreadable—mouth unmoving. He doesn't cry.

In all of the time since the deaths of He Zhong and Qin Meirong, he shed a single tear.

But the expression on his face—the look in his eye as He Xuan looks upon his father one last time—

It's one of deep respect and affection.

After some time, He Xuan rises to his feet once more, gently setting his father's hand back down in his lap.

He makes his way out the door, and Shi Wudu stands outside, watching Mr. He's eyes, still staring blankly through the window.

Lifeless. Vacant. Accusing.

He Xuan's walk back to town is slow, unhurried—and his request is so simple, so small, in the face of everything he has been through.

He just asks around in the local tavern, for someone to help him lay his father to rest. There's no other family to assist him—and it's a difficult job for one person.

More than one of the local townspeople are willing to help. He Xuan is liked and respected by many in the village, as was his father before him, but...

Even now, life won't let him go easily.

"Why should he need help?" A young man sneers.

One of the very same that has been tormenting him these last few years. Making every moment of his life a living hell.

If Shi Wudu could step through the barriers of time, he would gut him with his fingernails alone.

"It should only take one man to bury a dog."

The shipmaster doesn't speak immediately—doesn't react.

But there's a flash in his eyes, a Shi Wudu sees a thread, worn so thin over the last few years, finally begin to snap.

No one will raise a hand to help now, fearing retribution.

That's fine. That's better, actually.

Shi Wudu watches He Xuan make the trek back to his home, his head hanging low.

The only sound in the world seems to be the crunching of dust under his boots. Easy, methodical steps

Taking the ax that he (and his father before him) once used to build their ships, chopping wood from a nearby forest to make a pyre.

It’s careful, methodical—never hurried.

The young man burns his father’s body—gathers the ashes, and buries them in the family grave.

He’s buried a fiancé, a sister, a mother, and now his father.

He Xuan stands before the tombstone now, staring at his family name, and it occurs to him.

Who is going to bury him?

There’s not going to be anyone left. He—

“You’re going to die alone,” a voice whispers next to his ear, cruel and jeering. “Alone in the cold, with no one left to mourn you.”

“...”

Shi Wudu watches with rapt attention as the youth stares down at the family grave, silent.

Finally, a smile spreads across his face.

Slow, lopsided. Not the muted, almost shy smiles that He Xuan showed the world as a child. Nor the quiet, confident grins he used to share with the girl that he loved.

There’s no trace of sanity in this smile.

A man pushed to madness by grief.

“Is that so?” He whispers.

Even the Reverend of Empty Words seems to balk at his reaction, falling silent as He Xuan turns away from the grave, ax still in hand.

“...I suppose there isn’t a point, then.” He mutters, dragging it on the ground beside him, the blade slowly cutting through blades of grass.

No one answers, but He Xuan seems to have developed some level of awareness that a creature is stalking him. Listening to his every word.

And he smiles even wider.

“In being someone worth mourning.”

Life is one long cascade of decisions and consequences.

Nearly four centuries ago, a gambler didn't know when to stop rolling. A friend tried to save him with a set of loaded dice. A merchant reacted out of spite and anger.

Decades later, a young ghost saved the two men on a whim. Kept them from their fate for as long as he could.

And when they could no longer be held back, their curse fell on Shi Wudu, and he— Li Xiaotong was right.

Sometimes it's better to let go, to fail, than to become something that you can't live with.

But Shi Wudu didn't know how to let go of his brother.

And in his refusal to allow him to suffer, he cast that curse upon someone else.

Every single one of those decisions led to He Xuan lifting up his ax that night.

Not a single one of them were his own.

And Shi Wudu watches, as He Xuan attends his final fire festival.

No sister or fiancé by his side. No parents waiting at home. No blind weaver offering him a coin with a warm smile.

Nothing left to live for, to return to.

There is nothing left for He Xuan to fix. No one stops him. Not a soul.

Shi Wudu watches him slaughter them all.

At certain points he stops to laugh tauntingly—and Shi Wudu knows, it's directed at the reverend.

And yet.

The night deepens, thunder rolling in as a storm rages over the sea.

One of the men begs for his life, gets on his hands and knees.

Once a gentle, sweet tempered child—now, a killer.

"I have money—power, position—anything you desire, I can give it to you, just—!"

"Go back in time, then." He Xuan replies flatly, speaking for the first time since he began his rampage—and his voice—

It's cold, almost rational

"Give me my family back, and I'll let you go."

It's almost cruel irony, watching from the sidelines. Unable to interfere, but desperately wishing to do exactly as He Xuan says.

To go back in time.

To give him A-Zhang and Qin Meirong back.

But he can't.

Some things—

Some things can't be fixed.

Shi Wudu didn't touch his sister. Never laid a finger on his fiancé.

He had no hand in He Xuan's imprisonment, or in any of the injustices that followed him afterwards.

And yet—he did this.

This is a story he wrote, through his own mistakes.

He might as well have walked He Sheng to the edge to that clif, giving him one final shove as he fall over, plunging down into the darkness of the night, the storm thundering overhead, all around them with ferocious abandon.

SPLASH!

Cold.

It's cold, and he's alone.

Just like the Venerable said.

Crushed under the weight of the waves, dragged further and further below—

Only darkness remains as air slips away.

The sea floor hits his back, the immense weight of the water crushing down on him, squeezing out whatever life remains.

For a moment—He Xuan almost prays to the water master for relief—

Having no idea that the Water Master is already here.

That he's already watching him.

And that the Venerable was wrong.

There is someone left to mourn him.

Shi Wudu is mourning him right now.

Shi Wudu is beside him, being crushed by that same water. Feeling it fill his lungs, crushing the air out of him.

Drowning, beside him.

Mourning the boy who spent his days thinking about how to fix the world around him.

The boy Shi Wudu murdered years ago, when they were both so young.

He Xuan's body lays against the seafloor, limp, eyes unseeing—illuminated by a pale, unearthly green light.

That of a ghost fire.

It hovers for a moment, a sole flickering point of color in the endless void of the ocean.

And now, it feels like those eyes are staring at him.

No matter how far Shi Wudu has clawed his way from that wardrobe, no matter how many years have passed, no matter how strong he gets—

He never escapes the gaze of the dead.

Crushing him. Weighing down on him, inch by inch, brick by brick.

And it hurts.

It hurts.

It—

The memory shatters, and He Xuan finds himself back in that dark hallway.

And this time, he's the one on his hands and knees.

Trembling from the guilt. The pain. The helplessness.

Feeling a warped hurt so deep inside—he doesn't know if he's capable of letting it go. Until he looks up, and sees his enemy.

The man who ruined his life.

A monster he cursed for centuries with every breath that he no longer takes— Shedding tears for him.

Staring at He Xuan with wide, guilt stricken eyes, filled with the one thing no one ever gave him:

Remorse.

He Xuan fantasized for so many years, about what he would do to reduce that face to tears.

To force the proud, cold hearted creature that stole his future to his knees and force him to apologize.

That was what he did, back in Blackwater Manor.

And while Shi Wudu said the words he wanted, accepting his punishment—

He wasn't sorry.

And He Xuan felt no closure.

Now, he—

"I'm sorry," Shi Wudu chokes out, the agony in his voice so profound, Blackwater is frozen—startled.

"I'm— I'm so sorry!"

Now, the Water Master is weeping.

For He Xuan. For Qin Meirong. For his parents—

But every sob that rips from his body aches with the memory of He Zhong.

Knowing in his soul, exactly how He Xuan loved her.

In the way that only an elder brother can.

Haunted by her lifeless eyes, staring at him across that courtyard. By the memories of her smile, her laugh.

She was like a small creature, swallowed whole by the curse that Shi Wudu unleashed upon them.

Every hope of a future snuffed out—and she never stood a chance.

Shi Wudu—

He took them all away from her.

And he weeps for more than just guilt, or remorse.

He cries for the children he watched grow up. Heaving sobs of grief that cut him to the bone, and all he can do—

All he can do is say those words, over and over again: I'm sorry.

I'm sorry.

I'm so, so sorry.

He Xuan sits there for a moment, struggling to react.

Having thought he was strong enough to live through all of this again, that it was a means to an end, one he could endure as many times as he needed to. But the memories—

They ravage him.

And now, as he finds himself mourning his family all over again—

Someone is beside him.

Shedding the same tears.

Feeling the same pain.

For the first time—

He Xuan isn't grieving alone.

And all he wanted, all he ever wanted—

Was for someone to be sorry .

Even if it's the person who hurt him. Maybe—

Maybe especially then.

Shi Wudu flinches, when he feels a hand on his shoulder. Not fearing the pain, or whatever He Xuan wants to do to him—

Because now, no matter how painful it is—

He wants to be punished.

Even if he knows there's not enough suffering in the world to pay for what he put them through, he—

He wants justice, even if he has no idea what that could look like. Even if that means he loses it all.

But when he looks up—

He Xuan doesn't look angry.

Not anymore.

Because he was right.

Because you can't hate someone that you know.

Not when you've cried with them. For them.

When you've grown up together.

Because no one has ever wept for He Xuan before.

And in that moment, staring into his tear streaked face—

He Xuan finds it.

Forgiveness.

Not because Shi Wudu deserves it, or has earned it. Not because his childhood shaped the cold hearted man he would become.

But because he's the only person who can share in this grief. And, because…

There's more to this.

Things that he couldn't have known before.

That Jun Wu was the one who gave a frightened, traumatized child a spell to switch fates.

And that doesn't excuse Shi Wudu's choice to use it—

But Jun Wu was watching him—watching both of the Shi brothers—when they were children.

For what reason? And now—

Shi Qingxuan said that someone was blackmailing her brother. The identity of that person has now become painfully obvious.

But why go through all of that trouble?

Was Shi Wudu an active player in all of this, or…

A pawn?

And to what end?

Hate is a powerful thing.

Like a cursed shackle, it can settle over your eyes—blinding you to even the things that are right in front of you.

He Xuan has shattered his own shackle, and now, for the first time in so long—

He's starting to see things clearly.

And wants—

He wants more than feeling like this.

'You haven't done anything I can't forgive you for.'

He wants to be someone who can also be forgiven.

But before he can open his mouth, before he can say 'I forgive you—'

Then, they're falling again.

Plunging into darkness.

When He Xuan lands—it's somewhere entirely familiar—but possibly the last place he expected to be.

The streets of the Heavenly Capital, officials milling all around him. For one moment of blind confusion, he thinks he's back, but—

No one is looking at him.

"Hey," a voice crops up beside him—so close to his ear, it makes He Xuan jump. "Come on now, don't be so cold..."

Shi Wudu walks ahead, fanning himself lazily, his hair blowing gently in the breeze. "I don't know what you mean."

Pei steps past He Xuan, following after him.

"I'm just trying to introduce myself," he explains, pressing a hand against his chest earnestly. "Though I suppose you've heard of me already..."

Shi Wudu arches one perfectly shaped eyebrow, his expression half hidden behind his fan.

"Nan Yang, was it?"

Pei stops, his face frozen with shock, then he throws his head back and barks out a laugh.

"Now that's just brutal, no wonder people are calling you a Water Tyrant!" He looks back down at the younger god, a lopsided smile in place, shining like the afternoon sun.

"You really have no idea who I am?"

Pei couldn't notice, but He Xuan notices the way Shi Wudu's fingers tighten slightly where they grip his fan.

How the expression hidden behind it is slightly flustered. (Because, unfortunately for him…the statues were rather accurate.)

“I can’t say that I do,” he replies, his tone cool.

Expecting Pei Ming, as a martial god of his strength and seniority, to crow out in offense, nursing a wounded ego.

But his smile doesn’t fade.

“I see…” He holds out a hand, and Shi Wudu stares, unsure what he wants.

Something behind Pei’s gaze changes, watching his hesitance. He’s always exuberant, but now there’s a gentleness to him.

“Relax, kid,” he coaxes him. “I don’t bite.”

Behind the fan Shi Wudu’s cheeks darken—and he sticks his hand out for him to shake, grumbling.

“I’m a grown—”

Lips press against the back of his hand, and the word ‘man’ catches in the back of Shi Wudu’s throat, fingers clutching his fan for dear life.

“I’m glad that my reputation doesn’t precede me,” Pei murmurs, lifting his head as he lets his hand go. “It gives me the chance to make my own first impression.”

Shi Wudu stares, open mouthed, struggling to understand what Pei, a renowned womanizer, is playing at.

(And yanking his hand back, squeezing his fingers tightly—feeling the way they burn where Pei’s lips lingered.)

“Anyhow,” he takes a step back, leaving the Wind Master wind swept and off kilter, nodding towards the gates. “What do you say to grabbing a meal?”

Again, there’s hesitation—distrust.

“You’d be doing me a real favor,” Pei adds with a shrug.

Shi Wudu’s eyes narrow. “A favor?”

“I’ve been trying to get Ling Wen to socialize with someone who isn’t me for around three centuries now,” the general explains. “She might enjoy some slightly more intellectual company.”

He says that, of course—but he’s brilliant on his own.

That’s one of the first things Shi Wudu notices about him, hanging around the Chief Civil God and Martial God. It’s advantageous for all three of them, naturally.

Shi Wudu is the strongest elemental master, even being so young—and they’re at the head of their sectors as well.

Sticking together shores up all of their political positions within the Heavenly Court, and—

He Xuan watches them, sitting around a restaurant table in the Imperial Capital.

Shi Wudu, making sarcastic commentary—Ling Wen’s deadpan replies. And Pei Ming, laughing with them both.

It seems like a natural scene. Like three comrades catching up after a battle, but— He Xuan knows what the other two at the table don’t.

That Shi Wudu hasn’t had actual friends before. Not in the way that other people think of the term.

Maybe when he was a small child, certainly—but not after his parents died. After that, everything he did, every thought and action, was centered around Shi Qingxuan.

There was no room for himself.

Before, He Xuan thought the three tumors were an overblown political alliance.

Now, watching it through Shi Wudu’s memories—

He realizes that the friendship between the three was real. Even on Ling Wen’s end, when he had always assumed she was too cold blooded for such a thing.

But there’s a protective light in her eyes, when she’s around Shi Wudu.

Like an older sister, worried that her brother is trying to grow up a little too fast.

And she smacks Pei upside the head whenever his eyes linger a little too close or too long, even as he insists that his intentions are purely friendship.

She never believes that, but... Shi Wudu does.

Watching Pei slip away with a different woman on his arm every other day. A smile that aches as much as it irritates.

When he only ever sees the man with beautiful women, he assumes that's all that he wants.

And embarrassing teenage infatuations aside—

He enjoys his friendship with Pei.

His sense of humor. How a man with so much power still manages to remain in step with the rest of the world—not so far removed from the mortal he once was as other gods in the Heavenly Court.

And, despite what he said about bringing Shi Wudu along to dine with Ling Wen for the first time because he wanted her to have 'Intellectual Company,'—

Pei Ming is brilliant.

Irreverent at times, and maybe he should take himself a little more seriously, but...

Sometimes, they'll be eating dinner in the imperial city—and while Shi Wudu and Ling Wen are discussing politics—

(A subject Pei stubbornly refuses to speak on.)

—he'll notice him lazily doodling on a napkin from the corner of his eye.

It took him ages to realize what he was actually doing, at first taking it as some sort of mindless scribbling, fidgeting to take his mind off of the conversation—but it wasn't.

They were battle plans, for whatever war was going on in the mortal realm at the time.

And while they might have looked like basic sketches—in the hands of any general, they would have ended the war in question in one fell swoop.

“...Do you ever actually use those?” Shi Wudu asks him once, leaning over his shoulder to look.

Pei turns his head over so slightly, and when he does, a lock of Shi Wudu’s hair brushes over his cheek, soft as silk. The scent of the expensive soaps and oils the Water Master uses flooding his senses.

His fingers tighten slightly around his pen. “...No,” he snorts.

“Then why go to the trouble?” Shi Wudu muses, looking a little closer. “It seems rather thought out.”

“Nah,” Pei pushes the napkin aside, reaching for his wine. “Just a way of keeping my mind busy.”

Shi Wudu leans away, sitting back down in his seat.

“Well, I suppose that explains how you’ve won so many wars.”

It’s a lazy compliment, one that he expects Pei to crow with delight over, because Shi Wudu rarely gives praise, but—

He just drinks his wine, his gaze growing distant. “No one wins a war, Shui-Xiong.”

And in his eyes, Shi Wudu finds the most surprising thing about General Ming Guang.

“You just outlive everyone else.”

(That he’s a war hero who would rather never fight again.)

But not everyone shares Shi Wudu’s admiration for the general.

Namely, his little brother.

For some reason, he loathes Pei.

He even mentions as much, holding onto his elder brother’s sleeve one evening, glaring as he watches the martial god leave their palace.

“...Don’t be rude,” Shi Wudu scolds him, his voice stern. “He’s your senior.”

Shi Qingxuan shrinks a little under correction—after all, he always listens closely when his brother criticizes him, but...

"I just don't like him," the young man mutters, his eyes slightly narrowed. "He seems slimy."

Shi Wudu snorts, rolling his eyes. "There are worse things."

Many, many worse things.

Himself among them.

The memory shifts forward again—this time to a small meeting of gathered gods of relevance.

Ming Guang, Ling Wen, Xuan Zhen, Nan Yang, Yin Yu, Quan Yizhen, Shi Wudu—and the newly appointed and ascended Wind Master, Shi Qingxuan.

"Is this particularly important?" Xuan Zhen rolls his eyes, leaning back in his chair with his arms crossed—to which Nan Yang rolls his eyes.

"Your being here doesn't help either way, so why don't you just go?"

"HEY—!"

"Come now," Pei sighs, looking back and forth between the two. "You're both four centuries old. You know better than to bicker at an official meeting."

"Is it official?" Shi Qingxuan mumbles, giving him a sharp look. "The emperor isn't here."

(He seems resentful of the fact that Jun Wu's absence has left Pei as the de facto leader.)

"Shi Qingxuan," The Water Master gives him a stern look. "Enough."

"I'm just—"

"If you want to be invited to 'official' meetings in the future, I suggest holding your tongue."

His little brother sinks down in his seat, crossing his arms sulkily.

"...The emperor is indisposed," Ling Wen explains with a shrug. "But there is a relevant piece of news that the upper levels of the Heavens should be aware of—which is why we're here."

"And why is that?"

"The Kiln of Mount Tonglu has opened once more," Ling Wen explains, shuffling her papers. "And it would seem that a new Calamity has emerged."

That news sends a quiet hush across the table, anxieties silently spiking. "Hua Cheng didn't simply take the power for himself?"

Mu Qing seems disbelieving of that fact—as is expected.

Both Martial Gods of the South are on bad terms with Hua Cheng.

"It would seem not," Ling Wen shakes her head. "The new spirit that has emerged is the demon He Xuan."

The mention of that name gives the Water Master pause. "...Do we know anything about him?"

"It's too early to say," Ling Wen shakes her head. "We don't have any information on his mortal life. Who can even say if that's his original name?"

"So we don't even know if he's a threat?" Pei sighs, shaking his head. "That's comforting."

There's something eerie, watching a conversation about himself—his actual identity— among the gods he spent years among, pretending to be someone else.

"Well, Crimson Rain Sought Flower has been reclusive lately. Maybe he'll follow that trend." Pei points out.

Nan Yang and Xuan Zhen both seem a little rankled by the implication that Hua Cheng has been anything but low key.

Still, Ling Wen nods.

"The point is—until we know more, the Heavens should be on heightened alert. More patrols, surveillance—and everything that entails."

The meeting ends, and Shi Qingxuan seems eager to head off to some sort of party with some officials from the junior court—inviting Shi Wudu to go along, but his older brother declines.

"Shui-Xiong," the Water Master stops in the hall at the sound of Pei's voice. "Where are you off to?" He looks past Shi Wudu, in the direction he's headed. "The emperor doesn't take visitors in his private residence often.”

The younger god bites back nerves, shaking his head.

“I know—but…he summoned me,” he lies smoothly. “What can you do?”

As he continues on, He Xuan can feel it, permeating the air of the memory itself—

Just how deeply the Water Master regrets it.

He hasn’t spoken to Jun Wu privately all that often since his ascension, but…

When he steps through the doors to the imperial palace, he freezes.

“…Your majesty?”

The emperor has always been an imposing figure. Tall, composed, wearing gleaming jewels and armor, but now—

Now, Jun Wu is on his knees, facing away from him—hair loose down his back, his armor exchanged for a simple white robe.

And—

There’s something in the air that feels wrong.

Shi Wudu claps a hand over his mouth, a sudden shudder running over him as he tries to understand why—

Is that—?

Is that cursed energy? But what would resentment be doing here? And…

…Has the emperor always had a white streak in his hair?

Shi Wudu had no way of knowing what he was actually seeing. But He Xuan does. And here, in the Kiln—

It makes his blood run cold.

He whips his head around to look at the Water Master—who can’t hear him, can’t see him—

But Shi Wudu is only six years into his godhood, in this moment. Visibly an adult, but —

So horrifically young, in the face of what he's seeing.

So similar to the age Xie Lian was, when he stood before this creature.

And all He Xuan wants to do is to tell him to run .

But then, the creature turns it's head, and—

There's no face.

Just smooth skin where features should be.

Shi Wudu lets out a choked sound, stumbling backwards towards the door. A trained fighter, but—

There's a weight in the air.

Something that makes him feel sluggish.

He reaches into his belt, fumbling for his fan, looking around, because —

Where is the emperor? What is this creature, and why is it—

Slowly, a crack appears in that face.

Opening up to reveal a set of sharp, jagged teeth—and it snarls out one word:

"...Xianle?"

What?! That—

The laughing stock of the—?

Shi Wudu snaps his fan open, attempting to call on the water from the outside, but—

Nothing happens.

His spiritual device—

It's just stopped working.

That's when the creature starts to move.

Crawling towards him like a beast.

Slow at first, then faster—scrambling towards him as Shi Wudu fumbles for the door —trying again and again to summon water, wishing he still had his old weapons, but —

When you ascend, your equipment is provided by the emperor.

And this—

This is the first time He Xuan has ever heard Shi Wudu scream with genuine terror.

But the walls of the imperial residence seals the sound of it in.

No one will hear.

No one will come.

And when he pushes at the door—

It’s sealed shut.

But how—?

BANG!

Long, clawed fingers grip him by the hair—slamming his head into the door so forcefully—

Everything goes black.

He Xuan stands in the darkness, watching faint, blurred images. Distant sounds.

Someone slipping in and out of consciousness.

But one thing is heavy in the air.

Pain.

Overwhelming pain, terror, and—

And when the Water Master slowly begins to regain consciousness, his body aches everywhere.

In places he didn’t even know it was possible to hurt. His vision is still blurred—but he hears something. Two distinct voices.

One, he almost thinks is the emperor’s, but—he’s never heard Jun Wu sound like that.

Horrified.

“W...what the hell did you do?”

And another voice—low, snarling, the mere sound of it making him cringe, remembering—

Remembering how it called him ‘Xianle.’

“Don’t give me that, Wuyong. Don’t you mean what we did?”

Wu...

Shi Wudu’s head aches, stabbing pain ringing in his right temple.

... Wuyong?

Finally, his eyes blink open—coming into focus, and he’s...

In the Emperor’s bed.

Wearing clothes that aren’t his own.

Shi Wudu sits up quickly—instantly regretting it.

His head stabs with pain—and his spine feels like it’s about to split in half.

He falls back against the mattress with a pained whimper—a rare display, from someone with a naturally high pain tolerance.

If He Xuan were anything less than a calamity—Just watching this would make him vomit.

Because Shi Wudu is only half cognizant, but He Xuan—

He can see the deep impressions of teeth on the Water Master’s collar. Broken skin and vicious bruises.

What happened isn’t a mystery.

Except—

It is to him.

That's when He Xuan remembers, having lived out every single one of Shi Wudu's memories up until now—

He's never even...

"W...What happened?" The Water Master whispers hoarsely.

His throat hurts. Why—

Why is it so sore? He...

Jun Wu won't look at him.

Not at first.

And when he does...

He Xuan watches the emperor intently, noticing something so strange—but he can't figure out what the reason behind it could be.

For a moment—Jun Wu genuinely doesn't seem to know who the Water Master is. He doesn't recognize him.

Then, slowly, his eyes widen with understanding—and He Xuan can see so many emotions there.

Shame. Fear. Disgust. Guilt. Remorse.

Sadness.

And He Xuan has just used up a lifetime—a hundred lifetimes—worth of forgiveness.

He doesn't have any left for whatever the fuck this is.

In what universe does he get to feel sad , after what he just did?

"...I'm sorry," he mutters, hanging his head for a moment—one hand pressed against his face, hiding his expression.

Shi Wudu manages to sit up—he's in too much pain to do more than lean against the pillows.

"W...What?" He mutters, straining to remember, but his head feels so heavy. "I think..."

There's something about the confusion in his voice—the way he looks to the emperor for help, for guidance, that reminds He Xuan of the long forgotten presence of his heart.

Because it breaks.

“...I think I hit my head,” Shi Wudu whispers, holding a palm against his temple with a wince.

Jun Wu closes his eyes, taking a deep, unsteady breath through his nose. And when he opens them—his voice is calm.

Sympathetic.

“I wasn’t expecting visitors.”

He says that, as though it’s supposed to mean something to the young god—who only stares at him with confusion.

“...” Jun Wu pushes his fingers through his hair.

Wearing the imperial robes that Shi Wudu is accustomed to seeing him wearing. No white streak in his hair.

“...Things come out when the Kiln opens. Things we don’t yet understand.”

Shi Wudu doesn’t say a word—but the muscles in his jaw tremble. “...What...was that thing?”

Jun Wu stares straight ahead, his eyes focused on the wall.

“A monster.”

“Why...” Shi Wudu swallows, wincing. “Why was it here?”

“...The Kiln doesn’t always produce a fully formed Ghost King,” the emperor explains quietly. “Sometimes, it spits out a half formed beast. Without intelligence, or self control. But by studying them, we can learn more about the enemy.”

Shi Wudu reaches down to touch his throat, only to have Jun Wu take his hand, gently lowering it down into his lap.

That’s—

That’s when he sees that both of his wrists are black and blue, swollen with bruises.

But if he looks too close—

He'll have to think about why.

He looks away sharply—finding Jun Wu's face to be a less horrifying option.

"Isn't that dangerous?"

"My wards were powerful enough to lock it inside my palace, and..."

Shi Wudu falls silent, guilt rising in his throat.

Jun Wu wasn't expecting guests.

That's—

That's why the door wouldn't open.

Why Shi Wudu's powers wouldn't work.

And to be fair—there aren't many gods who would dare enter the Imperial Palace uninvited.

"...Where is it now?"

"I returned to find it attacking you—and I killed it."

It—

It's gone.

Shi Wudu closes his eyes, schooling his fear and pain down into a smooth mask, his breaths evening out.

He Xuan's stomach turns with nausea as he watches—

"I'm sorry for interfering."

As he watches Shi Wudu apologize .

"You didn't know." Jun Wu assures him softly. "It's my fault, for not monitoring it properly. You have my deepest apologies."

Shi Wudu doesn't answer at first, and when he does, he only asks—in the smallest voice—the only time He Xuan has heard him sound so beaten—

"...What did it do to me?"

It takes a long time for Jun Wu to answer. And when he does, he doesn't look at him.

"...Ghosts consume each other when the Kiln opens in order to gain power," he mutters. "It was most likely going to devour you."

And the worst part of it all is the relief on Shi Wudu's face.

"I should go to Xuan Zhen," he mutters, trying to sit up. "I've already —"

Jun Wu's hand lands on his shoulder, pushing him back down.

"It's alright," the emperor shakes his head, hands glowing with spiritual power as he attends to the Water Master's wounds. "I've got you."

And it's—

It feels like a kindness, at the time.

Because he's a prideful person at his core—and he's—

He's unable to shake the sense of humiliation that he placed himself in such a position. That he had been so incapable of defending himself.

What Jun Wu's doing...

It feels like a kindness.

And as the memories shift forward, He Xuan watches with growing horror as the relationship between the Emperor and the Water Master begins to shift.

More and more time spent alone together. Teaching Shi Wudu more about cultivation —

Among other things.

The first time Jun Wu kissed him was during a mid-autumn festival, after the winners of the Battle of the Lanterns had been announced.

Pei came in second that year—which, after so many years of one winner, had come to be celebrated as a victory.

When Shi Wudu had made to descend from the balcony he had been watching from with the emperor, intending to find and congratulate him—Jun Wu stopped him.

He wasn't necessarily upset by the gesture.

It's an incredibly flattering thing, to have someone so powerful want you.

It catered to his ego, maybe.

Made him feel attended to. Special.

In the beginning—there absolutely were perks that came with being the emperor's favorite.

And Jun Wu—he was patient, back then.

There were moments when he was even kind.

But He Xuan isn't watching a love story

More like he's watching someone being lured into the belly of the beast—with absolutely no idea that he's being devoured.

As Jun Wu's grip over him tightens, his power grows. His wealth becomes even more immense. The admiration and envy of others becomes enormous.

Who would try to get away from that?

Who would want to?

But with every passing year—the invisible chains around him grow tighter.

Escape becomes less and less likely.

Eventually, Shi Wudu asks him the question that's been gnawing on his mind—

If Blackwater Sinking Ships, the demon He Xuan, and the man whose fate he stole, are one in the same.

And He Xuan watches Jun Wu lie.

Pulling Shi Wudu back to bed, whispering falsehoods in his ear.

That He Xuan took his own life years ago.

That the secret is only between them.

Being around Jun Wu brings out a colder side of him.

Not so different from the child forced into stone faced silence by the Reverend of Empty Words.

And maybe, if nothing had changed, he would have been completely lost. Becoming a true Water Tyrant, cold hearted to the core.

But two centuries into Shi Wudu's godhood—his life reaches an invariable crossroads. A point where it permanently shifted.

During a patrol in the North.

Elemental Masters don't normally participate in such things—but circumstances were unique.

The younger martial gods sent along were woefully unprepared. And unfortunately...

One of them had offended a powerful local demon. The group was so severely set upon, General Ming Guang was sent to rescue them. And even in his own territory— he struggled.

Which was odd.

"Ming Guang?!" One of the deputy gods calls out to him, struggling to push back a horde of spirits. "What's going on?!"

The General grits his teeth, two balls of flame appearing in either hand. It's strange.

Pei Ming should be at peak strength, here.

Gusu is less than half a day's ride away.

And yet—he doesn't feel it.

Instead, he feels—

A void.

"Just get behind me," he mutters, eyes narrowed as he fires off two shots, each exploding with force into the hordes ahead.

Inflicting great damage—but not enough.

“...Has Nan Yang replied to either of you?”

“Ah, we tried calling him in the array, but...” One of them trails off, sheepish.

Even his newly appointed deputy, Pei Xiu, seems slightly embarrassed to say it:

“He’s fighting with Xuan Zhen in the main square again.”

Ah.

Perfect.

Just fucking perfect. The ONE time he needs help, and they’re in the middle of fucking foreplay—

‘No need to panic,’ Ling Wen speaks up in their private array. ‘I was able to convince reinforcements to come to your aid.’

Not particularly comforting, considering Pei was sent to the situation as reinforcements to begin with, but—

GONG!

The sound of a bell rings loudly throughout the valley, the moon burning more brightly than Pei has ever seen it, nearly as intense as daylight.

That’s when he sees her.

A raven haired woman in elegant white robes trimmed with silver silk, pearls braided into her hair.

And Pei Ming—

He frozen, jaw hanging open in abject shock as she strides forward, unsheathing a sword from her waist, realizing—

Is that—a goddess?

“Miss—” He starts, extending a hand to stop her. He knows every single woman in the Heavenly Court—

(Most carnally, and a few in passing.)

—and none of them (aside from Yushi Huang, but she certainly isn't her) could handle this. Even a martial god—

BOOM!

With one swipe of the blade, the moonlight shining down upon the valley seems to catch ablaze—incinerating the ghosts around them in Heavenly Flame.

That—

Pei stops, his mouth still hanging open, watching as the demonic forces around them are reduced by half.

Enough of a blow that the deputy gods are finally able to swoop in, securing the situation without being immediately overwhelmed.

"..." The dark haired woman lets out a tired sigh, slipping her blade back into its sheath. "I never thought I'd be rescuing a senior like you."

Pei snaps out of it, a surprised laugh slipping from his chest. "Oh, don't go an make me sound like an old man, not in front of such a beautiful young—"

She turns to look at him, and when he sees a familiar set of sapphire eyes—he chokes from the shock.

"...SHUI-XIONG?!"

That heart-stoppingly gorgeous face twists into a scowl, and suddenly one manicured palm is shoved against his chest, sending him back against a tree trunk.

"Would you keep your voice down, you idiot?! You think I want people to know I descended in this form?!"

Pei Ming stares back at her, struck dumb.

"Why?" He questions, watching her with naked awe. "I like this form."

Shi Wudu rolls her eyes, "Of course you like it," she mutters, eyes flickering back towards the others. "But my brother already has a reputation for..."

Clearly, she doesn't want to give the rest of the Heavens the impression that it's a family tradition. Which Pei Ming finds silly, coming from someone who achieves perfection in any gender she's in.

"...Then why use this form at all?"

She sniffs, hiding her face behind her sleeve.

"There's no river or ocean nearby," She mutters. "But it's a full moon, so..."

Right.

Pei had forgotten that some sects had begun to worship the Water Master as goddess of the moon, recently.

"...Well," he clears his throat, resisting the urge to slap his cheeks in an effort to pull himself together. "Thank you for going to such lengths to assist me. And..." His eyes drift over her face. "Allowing me to witness this form."

Shi Wudu rolls her eyes.

"You speak as though it's such a privilege..." She mutters, jewels clinking as she spins around, preparing to change back and return to the Heavens, knowing the deputies have it well in hand now, but...

Pei catches her by the wrist.

"It is."

Shi Wudu stops in mid-step.

Facing away from him—and as such, he can't see how wide her eyes have become.

"In any form you're in," he adds, watching the back of her head.

Her fingers are limp in his grip, and— Shi Wudu bites her lip.

Still, her voice comes out as calm as ever. Frigid, even.

"Between how many women you have in your life, I'm surprised you ever had time to spare a look," she mutters, tugging at her wrist.

And watching her face now, He Xuan realizes. She—

"...It's always been him, hasn't it?"

Her eyes slip over to him.

No one else can see or hear him, but— These are Shi Wudu's memories, after all. And the answer is clear in her eyes.

(Yes.)

Pei still doesn't let her go, not yet.

And when he speaks—

He Xuan has never heard him like that before. Not in all of his years posing as Ming Yi.

"No matter who I'm with, or what I'm doing," Pei murmurs, his thumb sliding over the inside of her wrist, feeling how her pulse thrones beneath her skin.

"I am always looking at you."

(It has always been Pei.)

He's flirted before. Expressed interest countless times.

But this is the first time Shi Wudu has been too undone to stop herself from reacting.

It's unfair.

Her walls are heavy, no one ever seems to get past them, but Pei—

He unfolds her so easily.

"..."

She glances back at the general over her shoulder, and finally, he sees.

Sees the ache in her eyes.

Everything that she's holding back.

Now—

Pei sees how badly she wants him in return.

And she half expects to be pushed back against a tree, or yanked forward into an embrace, but—

Pei lets her go.

She clutches her wrist to her chest as if burned.

"...Are you toying with me?" She mutters, looking away from him.

"No."

"Then I don't—"

"Privileges aren't taken," Pei's reply is simple, but it makes Shi Wudu freeze. "They're given."

It takes Shi Wudu time to understand.

He lays in bed that night after returning to the Heavens, thinking. It's easy to see how so many women have fallen into his bed. It's—

It's more than just good looks.

And in this case...

The choice has been left entirely up to him. A hand extended—all he has to do is take it.

And with every sweet exchange of words, stolen glance, and brush of hands under the table—it's harder and harder not to justify it.

Shi Wudu has always been goal oriented. Focused on protecting his brother. On becoming a more powerful official. Maintaining his position.

All of those things are about survival, but he—

He's never wanted something like this before.

And he's never enjoyed being kissed, or being intimate with someone up until now, and yet—

It feels like he won't be alive until he knows what Pei's lips feel like against his own.

He Xuan is surprised, watching as someone who has scoffed at Shi Qingxuan's female form countless times, approaches Pei in such a way willingly.

Appearing in the entrance to his palace one evening—alone. Not saying a word when he sees her, just shoving him back against a pillar.

It's a kiss that she'll always wish was her first.

She's never been held like that before.

Cradled in someone's arms, kissed with every ounce of someone's attention. As though the only thing in the world that could possibly matter was her. And Shi Wudu—

She hadn't known that it could be like this.

That she could be clinging to an embrace, head spinning.

That the only thing she might dread was that he might stop.

And Pei—

He must be assuming that she's a virgin, because he's so careful with her—patient, gentle.

And she doesn't correct him, because—

She wishes now that she had been.

And, since this is her first time being with someone in this form—she tells herself that it counts.

There's a spellbinding moment of blinding ecstasy, so sudden, she's actually startled. Pei Ming actually has to explain to her that it was a climax—which startles her.

After all, she's been someone's lover for two centuries now. She's reached that point. As a man, it's impossible to miss.

But she never knew that they could feel like that .

And once she realizes, her nails claw into Pei Ming's shoulders, dragging him up to kiss her.

She keeps pulling him back over and over again, drunk on the rush of his mouth.

"Again," she whispers, tightening her thighs around his hips, demanding. "Again."

And who is General Ming Guang, to deny a demand from the Water Tyrant?

In the early stages of their affair, she only ever approaches his bed in her female form—and it doesn't take Pei long to discern why.

That Shi Wudu is presuming that Pei would only want him in that state, and he–

He's always been a proud man, preferring to appear in the form in which he'll be accepted–in which he'll be desired– than risk the blow that comes with rejection.

It takes coaxing, reassurances, and the first time he returns to his original form, astride the general's lap in his bed—

Pei smiles, reaching up to cup Shi Wudu's cheek in his hand, stroking his thumb over the water god's jaw.

"There you are," he murmurs, eyes warm.

Shi Wudu's eyes drift to the side, sheepish, but too proud to say so.

Always so proud.

Pei's thumb strokes over kiss swollen lips, his chin, the curve of his cheek.

He doesn't mind making space for that pride.

It's better than the self loathing.

"Gods, you're so..."

Shi Wudu is silent, desperate for the last word in that sentence—

But Pei just leans up on his elbows, kissing him until he melts, sinking back down into the sheets with him.

Learning that it wasn't that he preferred being with someone in his female form, it was just—

Pei.

He just wants—

It's just better, with him.

From then on, when they're intimate, it's nearly always in his true form. And He Xuan—

He had surmised before, that the two were having an affair.

He had even realized that Pei Ming was in love with the Water Master. But he never...

He never realized how deeply Shi Wudu loved him in return.

And the Water Master's affection is a ferocious thing.

He's seen it, through Shi Qingxuan. Always resented it. Found it controlling, overprotective, and arrogant.

It's harder to say that, now.

Seeing the way Shi Wudu watches Pei sometimes, after he falls asleep.

Pressed against his side, feeling every breath that he takes, chin resting on his chest.

Those are the only times that he ever says it, knowing it can't be overheard.

Whispering those words in the dark.

Pei never gets to hear them: not even once.

And this is the part of Shi Wudu that might be the easiest for Blackwater to understand.

Because the Water Master has too many secrets, and if they were all out...

He doesn't think he could be loved in spite of them.

But even falling in love—so deeply, so fiercely—cannot erase every other pain.

It can't untangle the knot tightening around him, one that he's been unable to escape for far too long now.

He Xuan—

He never meant to see this.

And he can feel Shi Wudu clawing for dear life, even if it's impossible to stop it, because—

Because no one else should have to see this.

Not unless he wants to share it.

Finally, He Xuan understands that reaction before. Begging for death, rather than going through this.

Because—

'I'm NOT GOING THROUGH THAT AGAIN!'

He's reliving it.

Not just once.

The first time he tries to end things with the emperor, it's guilt and threats that drag him back in.

He doesn't say no, when he's pulled to bed.

But he shouldn't have to.

There was never love in the beginning—but there was security. A mutual benefit. Jun Wu was different. And Shi Wudu—

He hadn't experienced better, and didn't expect it.

But now, it's not just settling in exchange for power.

Now, it's enduring a constant stream of cruelty.

And Shi Wudu doesn't always make the most sympathetic victim.

That shouldn't matter , and yet.

He's spiteful, snide, and superior.

That doesn't mean he deserves what's being done to him.

But it makes people less likely to perceive him as someone in need of help.

And to those like Pei, who know the more vulnerable parts of him—

He fights tooth and nail to hide a single sign of trouble.

He Xuan loses track of how many times he watches Jun Wu place cursed shackles upon the Water Master, forcing him to submit before he'll let him go.

But, since the first time, the experience the Water Master has spent several centuries fiercely denying the existence of—

He was never violently forced. Even if Jun Wu raised a hand to him more than once. It was always threats. Manipulation.

Emotionally terrorizing Shi Wudu until he got what he wanted.

Until the last time.

When Shi Wudu one time too many—but He Xuan doesn't think that's what made the difference.

It was the fact that he did it in front of Xie Lian. That seemed to push it over the edge.

Using a spell to lock Shi Wudu's speech, pacing before his throne in the Grand Martial Hall, staring at the Water Master with open contempt.

"After the things you've done..."

Jun Wu's voice echoes in his ears, weighing Shi Wudu down. Making his shoulders tremble.

"How dare you act like a victim?"

And He Xuan can't stop trembling, watching the emperor with deepening hate.

Resentment so vicious, the hatred he held before feels like a shadow in comparison.

The things Shi Wudu has done?

The things Jun Wu taught him now to do?

Using He Xuan's pain—what his family experienced—something he was a direct cause of—

And using it to guilt his accomplice. As though he had no part in it.

Jun Wu steps close to the Water God's back, leaning down to whisper in his ear. “Why don’t you pray to him, hmm?”

The Emperor murmurs, his breath fanning across the side of his neck. “I haven’t stopped you. Go on. Ask him to help you.”

But he knows—Shi Wudu won’t.

Even if he was willing to put Pei in further danger by pitting him against the Emperor.

Even if he thought it was possible that Pei might win—

That would require admitting to the things he has spent centuries fighting to hide.

Fingers brush his hair back over his shoulder, and when lips press against his throat, the Water God cringes, wishing desperately that someone might walk back through that door. That someone might see them like this, but—

The only person that can see them cannot help him.

“I have never forced anything on you.” Jun Wu murmurs against his skin. The touch is gentle, but it rings with a subtle violence.

“But clearly, you need to learn the difference.”

Even if they had never done this—even if Shi Wudu had still Ben his worst enemy—

He wouldn’t have taken any joy in seeing this.

Even in all of the memories that Shi Wudu has seen from him—

His family. His losses. His death.

Mount Tonglu.

The years of wandering alone, devouring any ghost or demon he could get his hands on—but never satisfying that hunger.

How many countless men and women he’s had in his own bed over the years. Which somehow feels like an overly brutal comparison to the man witnessing it.

Even when he found Ming Yi.

A brilliant young architect born to wealth and privilege. A future that was endlessly bright.

Destined to ascend—and likely to be placed high within the heavens.

There was just one little problem.

Ming Yi's most successful projects—that which gained him the most fame—

They weren't his own.

He Xuan learned as much when a young, mortal woman found her way into his bed.

A promising architect herself—though her success had the most painful hindrance of all—

Being born the wrong gender.

For her to even be considered for a position, she was asked to submit a trial schematic to the Royal architect—which she did.

She never got the position—but a few months later, she saw it. The palace she designed, right down to the studs—

All credited to Ming Yi, not her.

And at the time—

He Xuan had been particularly sensitive to the concept of building your success upon someone else's losses.

But now, looking upon so many lives with a newfound, harsh perspective—

Ming Yi was no killer.

He never raised his hand to anyone.

He made a few selfish choices. At his worst, he was a thief.

And with that shallow form of justification— He Xuan enacted the harshest punishment.

If there was fairness, he could have simply revealed what Ming Yi had done. Or forced him to credit the designs he took.

Four, to be precise. Out of an entire career.

Large, successful projects, but still.

Just four.

But He Xuan wasn't interested in fairness. He simply wanted a means of enacting his wrath that allowed him to cling to his self righteousness.

At the time, it felt like reclaiming some amount of power.

As though he was enacting divine retribution—but not for Ming Yi's crime.

And maybe that wouldn't have bothered him before, when he pursued vengeance at any and all costs.

But now...

He watches Ming Yi suffer.

Year in and year out.

Locked in the depths of Blackwater Manor. Repenting over and over again, suffering beyond the scale of his mistakes.

Before, when he had so thoroughly dehumanized him, He Xuan never spared his begging a second thought.

He was a thief, and now he was being stolen from.

That was fair. That was what he deserved.

But even then—

He Xuan thinks he must have known that it was wrong.

And he only justified it by telling himself that the charade wouldn't last long. That all he needed was an opening. To lure the water master in.

Then, when all of it was said and done—Ming Yi would get his godhood, and He Xuan —

He would find peace. But that didn't happen.

And for so long, He Xuan blamed timing. Blamed the Heavens for being so secretive. Blamed Hua Cheng, for the information he demanded to settle his debts.

But now, it's clear:

He had so many chances to kill the Water Master.

For years, in fact.

But he dragged his feet.

All for one reason, something he couldn't admit at the time—

But now, it's so obvious.

Shi Qingxuan.

Every day he kept Ming Yi locked up was another day that He Xuan could be him. Could live his life.

Even when he pretended to loathe it, finally, after so many years...

He had things that he was looking forward to. Even if he never said so. Days spent being dragged here and there, always complaining, and yet... Passing through these memories, they both see the same thing:

The slow evolution of compromises that He Xuan made with himself.

Simply allowing himself to be friends with Shi Qingxuan.

And later, even more.

When Shi Wudu learned the truth between them, he had been so sure that it was part of He Xuan's plan. That she had been a means to an end, one he could easily discard.

But not anymore.

And still. Seeing all of that. All of his mistakes, all of his pain, regrets, and sorrows—

Even as their memories reach the present, having lived out the entirety of the other's lives—

He Xuan can't compare any of that to what he watched the emperor do.

Even if he couldn’t have known what he was going to see, when he brought them here. Even if it was necessary.

Even if he deserved most of it, he—

Finally, the white walls and endless ceilings of the Kiln appear before them again.

—he didn’t deserve that.

No one does.

The Successor

Chapter Summary

He Xuan brought Shi Wudu here to force himself into forgiveness, into letting go of the resentment that could poison his own future, if he allowed it.

And it worked.

But now...he's left not knowing how to feel.

Not sure what the person he's staring at is to him anymore.

Not an enemy. Not a stranger. Not a friend.

Chapter Notes

Content Warning: this chapter contains violence, victim blaming, and I would suggest taking all of the tags in this story into account before reading this chapter, because it covers extremely difficult subject matter. Please continue with caution.

This is a playlist I made(that is in roughly chronological order) that covers the arc with He Xuan and Shi Wudu in the kiln.

This is the song that inspired this chapter.

See the end of the chapter for more notes

He Xuan staggers slightly—unsure of how long it's been.

Hours.

Maybe even days.

Shi Wudu is still chained to the floor, arms torn and bruised from countless attempts at breaking free.

And after all of that—he only says one thing.

"Don't...don't tell anyone."

Not about what Shi Wudu has done. That secret is already out. He doesn't care.

Not about the fact that they came here.

Not even about Shi Wudu and Pei, no.

His shoulders hunch, his body wracked so violently with silent shame as he pleads—

“Please, just—d...don’t tell...”

“...I won’t,” he replies quietly, watching as the Water Master slumps with relief, sagging in his chains.

Bonds that slip away from his wrists with a clatter, now that He Xuan has no reason to hold him down.

And if He Xuan feels exhausted, all the way to the bone…

Shi Wudu looks hollow.

Eyes staring blankly ahead, hair having fallen down from its ties, hanging loosely about his shoulders.

Like a man facing his execution, and yet—he’s been given mercy. Except...

He’s not sure if this could actually be called that.

“...I didn’t...” He Xuan starts, then stops, feeling somewhat lost.

He brought Shi Wudu here to force himself into forgiveness, into letting go of the resentment that could poison his own future, if he allowed it.

And it worked.

But now...he’s left not knowing how to feel.

Not sure what the person he’s staring at is to him anymore.

Not an enemy. Not a stranger. Not a friend.

“...I didn’t know,” he mutters finally, looking away.

Which is obvious. They never would have been here if he had, but—

“Neither did I,” Shi Wudu whispers. “But...Shi Qingxuan was right.”

He Xuan looks over at him sharply, startled, and Shi Wudu—

He shakes his head, wiping his hands down his face.

“She was always telling me…”

That ‘Ming-Xiong’ was amazing. Echoing his good qualities constantly.

He Xuan knows that now.

He saw.

“…I honestly think…” He Xuan stares, the words feeling so alien, coming out of his mouth. He’s become so accustomed to anger, to only seeing the worst in people. “If things had been different, we could have been….”

He isn’t used to looking at someone, and seeing their better angels.

Especially not him.

Shi Wudu’s lips quirk tiredly as he looks up at him.

“No point in worrying about that. We’ll never…”

His words trail off, and even the ghost of a smile on his face begins to fade.

His eyes grow so wide, He Xuan’s first instinct is to look behind him, half expecting the emperor or a twisted, mangled beast to pop out of the floor after that expression, but—

They’re alone.

And when he looks back at the Water Master once more—

His eyes are glazed over.

The Kiln—

It’s showing him something.

But—what would it be showing him, but not He Xuan?

“…Wudu?” He mutters, a term of such familiarity feeling so alien on his lips, but not so much so as the ‘ge’ that manages to slip from him before he claps a hand over his mouth.

Force of habit, after witnessing four centuries of Shi Qingxuan calling him that—all in the span of what only could have been two days, maybe—

Maybe three.

It doesn't last long—he's out of it for only a solid minute.

Long enough for He Xuan to kneel in front of him, shaking his shoulders, trying to snap him out of it, and—

Looking over his shoulder, he finally does see someone.

Not the emperor, or any of his forms. Not one of the wandering beasts the Kiln tends to attract.

No—

Standing before him, at the entrance to the Kiln, is someone that he thought he would never see again.

Long raven hair, swaying gently about her waist in the breeze. Robes of black, red, and gold, and eyes—

Eyes that burn like alchemical flame, violet under the kiln's light.

The Guoshi of Tonglu. The Queen of Wuyong.

The—

The Goddess of the Kiln.

Watching her youngest child—the last Ghost King she forged.

"...What are you doing here?" He whispers, his jaw slack.

Zhao Beitong does not reply.

"Are you..." He looks back at Wudu, staring blankly ahead. "...Are you doing this?!"

"No." Her answer is so sudden, ringing with such finality, it leaves him startled. "I did not do this, He Sheng."

She simply stands there, watching him with such—

Such care. Pride. Remorse.

Such sorrow.

Almost as though she's bearing witness.

Part of her lives on in He Xuan, as a result of his time in the Kiln—the process of becoming a Ghost King. But not as substantial as what resides in Hua Cheng.

He's never heard her voice, since then. Never seen her. Never felt her presence. Not even in the times that he's returned to the Kiln since.

So, why now?

That doesn't—

There's a rattling gasp from behind him as Shi Wudu snaps out of it, falling forward until he catches himself with his hands, and he—

Tears are falling down his face.

He whispers something under his breath, and at first—He Xuan doesn't understand it.

Not until he says it again, this time with more desperation.

"It's...it's not enough."

Over and over again.

It's not enough.

It's not enough.

It's not enough.

He Xuan grabs him by the shoulders again, giving him a harsh shake.

"Snap out of it," he mutters, looking him in the eye. "What did it show you?"

The Water Master is trembling so violently, it's hard to keep a grip on him, even though he isn't struggling.

Though finally, when he does manage to regain enough focus—his eyes settle on He Xuan's.

Filled with such profound remorse, it leaves Blackwater speechless.

"...You..." He whispers, his voice cracked and hoarse after everything they've been through. "You're...a good person."

The way he says that—it sends the hairs on the back of He Xuan's neck standing up.

And then—he looks up, his eyes loathing as he stares at the vast, endless ceilings above.

"...Take it," he mutters, his voice hollow.

So tired, but building with strength as he cries;

"THAT'S WHAT YOU WANTED, ISN'T IT?!" He glares, tears falling faster, and—

He Xuan knows exactly who he's speaking to.

"Don't—!"

"I DON'T WANT IT ANYMORE!"

He Xuan feels his stomach plunging, trying to stop him, realizing in this moment of frantic panic—

Because Shi Wudu's godhood—it's too powerful of a gift to give up. In what's to come, with the enemy they're facing—that could make the difference. They need—

But unlike before, when Shi Qingxuan offered her own divinity—
Nothing happens.

No reply is given.

Only silence.

A low, frustrated moan rips from Shi Wudu's throat.

Not unlike a wounded animal, caught in a snare.

Begging for release.

"YOU...YOU TOLD ME I KNEW HOW TO GET OUT!" He screams so loud, it vibrates against the walls of the Kiln.

"Wait—"

"YOU TOLD ME!" Shi Wudu sobs. "YOU—!"

He wrenches from He Xuan's grip, standing up unsteadily.

"YOU SAID—!"

Then, he cuts off, his voice breaking in a pained yelp as he falls to his knees once more.

He Xuan is by his side, reaching to help him, when—

When he sees it.

His stomach twisting with anger and nausea.

Growing around the Water Master's throat like a dark bruise, ancient characters winding together like black ink—sealing him in. A—

A cursed shackle.

He Xuan stares, his mouth hanging open with shock, and Shi Wudu...

He clutches his throat, his breaths coming faster.

"No..."

Shi Wudu claws at his throat, trying to stumble forward, not even sure where he would go, there's nowhere to run, but—

CLANG!

He falls to his knees again, this time—

Feeling that weight sealing around his ankle, dragging him down.

He Xuan has watched him endure this more times now than he can count, but—

Not like this.

This—

This feels permanent.

Shi Wudu clutches at his throat, clenching his teeth.

".. .No."

This time, he doesn't just say it—he snarls it, so vehemently, it rips from his throat.

“...Look,” He Xuan starts, reaching out to grab his shoulder, his voice rising in pitch from emotion, watching what’s happening to him. “I know it hurts, but it—I—!”

Shi Wudu heaves breaths faster and faster, his knees wobbling. It hurts.

It—

It hurts.

“I can fix it,” He Xuan explains, holding onto his shoulder even tighter, trying to make him listen—trying to make him see.

Here, in the Kiln—he remembers how.

“Crimson Rain and I, we had a plan for the Crown Prince, I—if we can help him, we can—!”

It hurts.

It hurts, it hurts, it hurts, it hurts, it hurts, it hurts...it hurts, it hurts, it hurts, it hurts, it hurts, it hurts, it hurts, it hurts, IT HURTS IT HURTS IT HURTS IT HURTS IT HURTS IT HURTS IT HURTS IT HURTS IT HURTS IT HURTS IT HURTS IT HURTS IT HURTS IT HURTS IT HURTS!!!!

“Look at me,” He Xuan pulls at him, trying to shake him out of it, watching as that final shackle begins to form—slower than the other, the blues Water Master’s eyes burning, filling with black. “I can make it better, I—”

He’s come this far.

“...I can fix it,” he pleads.

But it’s the words that finally slip from Shi Wudu’s lips that make him stop. That make him feel cold, his heart, his—

It’s aching.

Shi Wudu pushes him back, rising to his feet again. Not calm—that isn’t the right word.

Tired.

“...I don’t want to get better,” he croaks.

He's so, so tired.

And it's not enough.

There's something in his hand—and even as his vision grows blurry, he can see that name etched into the handle.

He—

He looks toward the ceiling one last time.

He knows how to get out.

He Xuan only sees it too late.

Only when, quick as a snake, Shi Wudu's hand flies up to his throat—
And Blackwater sees the flash of a blade.

"...WAIT—!"

But, like every other time in his life—

Shi Wudu does not hesitate.

CRASH!

The air is filled with this sharp, cracking sound.

The sound of a cursed shackle shattering.

Shi Wudu's knees hit the ground hard, but he doesn't fall.

No.

He's being held.

Cradled in the arms of his oldest enemy.

And he can't—

He can't breathe.

He Xuan falls back to the ground, trying—

Trying to fix it.

His hand pressing over the slash in the Water God's throat, sending spiritual power into the wound as quickly as he can, as much as he can spare, but—

But nothing happens.

And he—

He doesn't understand.

(Of course—he wouldn't. That day, when Pei Ming brought that blade before the emperor, 'Ming Yi' was already imprisoned in Paradise Manor. Mourning the death of the true earth master, even if he didn't show it—with Ren Song in the corner, drenched in blood and guilt.

Hua Cheng snarling in his face, uttering those words he paid no mind to back then.)

(What's left of you, after?)

"...No," Blackwater chokes, tightening his hand around Shi Wudu's throat, desperate to stop the blood that's pouring down. "You—!"

(What's left of you, He Sheng?)

"You don't—you don't get to do that!"

Shi Wudu's eyes stare up at him blearily, the shackles that were once forming slowly fading.

Overhead, the sky rumbles.

"You—!" He Xuan rocks back, one arm clutching the Water Master to his chest—

Weeping.

Weeping for him .

"You BASTARD, you don't—!" His face presses against the top of Shi Wudu's head, fighting to resolve the swirling emotions in his chest.

Anger.

Hurt.

Confusion.

Sorrow.

'You don't get to make me care about you, and then—'

And then just leave .

Shi Wudu's lungs feel tight.

There's this bubbling wetness sliding down his throat. More blood than he can swallow, choking him—

Drowning him.

But that—

His head slumps to the side, his cheek pressed against He Xuan's chest. He thinks that might be okay, actually.

Isn't that how these stories usually end?

Every act of selfishness—every moment he wore himself down, telling himself his heart was made of stone, that he could do anything, could endure anything—All for Shi Qingxuan—

A debt was growing.

Maybe his life isn't enough.

Maybe all he's ever done is watched the world through the crack in a wardrobe door, lying to himself.

Saying that he wasn't afraid of it.

But now—

He feels something tugging at the edges of his soul.

Pulling him down.

Towards rest.

This—

More blood lands on his cheek—this time, from the tears He Xuan is shedding.

This is how fairy tales end.

The villain slain—the hero avenged.

There's—

There's nothing to cry about, really.

He got more than he deserved.

So many years with his sister.

He fell in love.

To him, it—

It feels more than fair.

But to He Xuan—

This is the cruelest fate imaginable. The kind of pain he hasn't felt since he drowned, all of those centuries ago.

The kind of pain that makes you scream from your soul, wishing the sky would shatter.

Families are terrifying things.

Not formed by blood or obligation—but by ties so strong, they can't be cut.

And oh, how they hurt one another, even as they grow together.

Cycles of love, hate, and forgiveness. Constantly being reborn as a new version of yourself.

But that bond remains, even if you wish you could let go, even if it hurts.

Because it's yours, and it is a part of you.

He Xuan feels a soft pressure against his cheek.

Shi Wudu's hand.

And when he pulls back to look into the Water Master's eyes;

He understands.

Why a man who clawed tooth and nail his entire life, surviving against all odds, can let go now.

Because he knows Pei Ming will keep his promise, yes, but—

He also knows that there is someone left behind who loves his sister just as fiercely as he did.

That he'll keep her safe.

But He Xuan—

He—

He isn't ready. Even after surviving so much. After enduring loss after loss—

He isn't ready to feel that again.

And when Shi Wudu sees that pain in his eyes—his fingers press against his cheek with one last burst of fading strength.

'It's okay.'

He can't speak, but he mouths those words as the last of the color drains from his face.

As his hand falls from He Xuan's cheek.

'It's okay.'

His eyes roll back, slowly sliding shut.

Ba-bump.

He Xuan trembles as the Water Master goes limp in his arms.

Ba-bump.

Then—silence.

Horrible, aching silence.

No one ever tells you that it's possible to mourn the absence of a sound.

To feel how far beyond the point of no return you have gone—with a life crumbling to ash in your arms.

And oh, how Blackwater weeps.

Having achieved everything that he wanted, everything he told himself he needed, to be at peace.

Only to realize that the man he's holding was never a monster.

Monsters don't exist.

Only people who make monstrous choices.

The man in his arms was never his enemy.

Not really.

They were both just children.

They were sons. They were friends. They were—

Older brothers.

Each swept up in a current that was never of their own making.

And it—

It drowned them both.

"...Why didn't you stop me?"

His voice sounds hollow to his own ears.

Stripped raw.

Zhao Beitong hasn't moved from where she stands, watching her creation with such sorrow.

"No one could have stopped this, He Sheng."

Maybe—

Maybe she's right.

Hua Cheng tried.

Shi Qingxuan tried.

Even Xie Lian, however unintentionally, tried.

He Xuan couldn't have stopped.

Couldn’t have forgiven him. Not until—

Not until he knew him. Until he suffered with him. Until he…

He Xuan closes his eyes, rocking back and forth, clutching him close.

He Xuan didn’t do this.

Shi Wudu didn’t do this.

His arm tightens around the Water Master’s back, and while his face is pressed into Shi Wudu’s hair—his eyes lift up.

Narrowed.

Burning with hate.

Seeing it with such vicious clarity.

Jun Wu.

Jun Wu did this.

His fingers dig into Shi Wudu’s back.

And Blackwater will make him bleed for it.

No matter how long he has to wait.

No matter what he has to endure.

“…”

His hand comes up, smoothing the back of Shi Wudu’s hair as he lowers him to the floor of the Kiln.

“What will you do now?” Zhao Beitong asks him softly.

“…What I have to,” he mutters.

His palm presses against Shi Wudu’s cheek, wiping the blood away.

Then, he rises to his feet—

His palms glowing with magic, deep blue light illuminating the slain God’s pale, unmoving face.

“Rest now, gege.”

The secret Shi Wudu begged him to keep weighs deep in his heart.

His own weight to live with, now.

“I won’t let him touch you—not ever again.”

Because he’s watched Jun Wu enough to know what he’ll do.

That he wouldn’t risk a surviving witness—even as a ghost.

If he gets a hand on the body—the ashes—

He’ll scatter Shi Wudu’s remains.

He Xuan doubts that he’ll linger on as a ghost. There was far too much peace in his eyes in that final moment.

But still.

He won’t allow Jun Wu to touch him.

Slowly, carefully—the spell takes hold.

Blue light surrounding the Water Master’s body, and beside him—a new form is growing into place.

Visually identical, right down to the last hair.

But one once held a soul.

The other is a mere cadaver.

In death, however, it is impossible to know the difference.

He takes one thing from Shi Wudu’s actual body. The gold locket, hanging around his neck.

That—

That belongs to Shi Qingxuan.

Finally, with the false corpse completed, he carefully lifts it up into his arms, preparing to leave it somewhere to be found.

His real grave will have to be in Ghost City. He—

He doesn’t think Hua Cheng would deny him that. Even after everything he’s done.

He couldn't bear to take him back to Blackwater manor. Not—

Not after what he did to Ming Yi.

Then—

He feels it.

The moment he steps outside the Kiln, onto the world beyond.

The surge of an ancient spell, finally broken—it's caster's magic fading from this world.

A fate, twisted and broken by hate, fear, and lies—returning home. Like a gear clicking back into place.

Over his head, the sky rumbles.

Behind him, for the first time in two thousand years—

The blood of a god stains the floors of the Kiln, white marble soaked in red. And then—

CRASH!

There's endless golden light.

Burning, enveloping him. Carrying him up.

Stripping him of any skins, false forms, or pretenses.

And for the first time in four hundred years—

He Xuan sucks in a deep, gasping breath.

Feeling air actually fill his lungs for the first time in so long— He had forgotten how it felt to breathe.

The weight, the crushing weight of that water, ever present, awaking this constant clawing need to fight, to breathe, to escape—

It's gone.

He Xuan isn't isn't drowning.

BOOM!

When his eyes open again—they're no longer filled with darkness.

They burn—like liquid gold.

His skin is no longer waxen and pale—regaining the sun kissed, deeply tanned shade it had in his human life.

And now that he can breathe—

He feels weightless.

Taking in shallow, ragged breaths of disbelief.

All the while, staring at the clear blue sky overhead in disbelief.

Because how?

There's no rhyme or reason to why a person ascends. No one can control it. But how, after everything that he's done, could he deserve this?

For a moment, the martial Avenue is silent, other heavenly officials frozen with shock and terror.

Taking in the sight of this new, unfamiliar figure, dressed in robes of black and gold. A new god, surely.

On that front, they aren't wrong. But before long…

They notice the limp, bloody form he's carrying in his arm.

That's when the shouts and screams begin.

"It's—!"

"IT'S THE WATER MASTER!"

There's panic, someone shouting for the martial gods to come and help, and He Xuan's mind is moving at a mile a minute, knowing that there's no time—

Until he hears that voice, speaking above the crowd.

"Remain calm, everyone."

He Xuan falls silent, his eyes slowly drifting to the side. Finding that face.

The face he's seen in countless nightmares now. Enough to know exactly what he is.

A murderer.

A liar.

A traitor.

A predator.

“Given what we learned this week—he hasn’t committed any crime.” There’s murmurs of disbelief, the other officials shrinking away from him. On some logical level, He Xuan knows exactly what the emperor is doing. Playing on the fact that he’s spent four centuries robbed of his godhood. Offering him an easy out.

It benefits him.

Eliminates a powerful ghost king as a threat. And any time he defies him, well…

That’s what shackles are for.

He Xuan knows all of that, clearly in his mind, before Jun Wu speaks again, replying to someone crying out—

“But he’s a MURDERER , your majesty!”

“…Is an executioner a murderer when he slaughters a criminal?” Jun Wu replies calmly.

He Xuan stares down at the corpse in his arms. That face.

Remembering—

‘You’re a good person.’

“Shi Wudu’s life was his to take by right.”

“But he’s—”

“The new Water Master.” Jun Wu concludes. “That seems fitting, doesn’t it?”

“…” He Xuan lifts his head, looking the Emperor in the eye.

A criminal.

After everything he’s done—

He called his victim a criminal.

Rage.

Boiling deep inside of him, rising up like an uncontrollable wave of hate.

And he thinks of the one thing he could say that would make him feel what Shi Wudu did.

That deep, petrifying fear. The feeling of being hunted.

His lips pull back over his teeth, fangs gleaming viscously in the sun, snarling the words—

“...Zhao Beitong sends her regards.”

Then—

It’s there.

That flash of genuine emotion in his eyes.

Fear.

And He Xuan makes an oath:

“The next time you see me—you die.”

And before he can respond, before he can make a sound—

He Xuan slips something from the sleeve of his robes, hurling it at the emperor’s chest.

BOOM!

And with that, just as suddenly as He Xuan, Black Water Sinking Ships, the final Water Master of Jun Wu’s heavenly dynasty—

He descends.

Leaving his predecessor's body on the street of the Martial Avenue. And the emperor, for the first time in 800 years—

Bleeds.

Staring down at the blade buried deep in his chest.

And on the handle, an engraving that's all too familiar—and prophetic.

Because no matter how many times he disposed of it—it always comes back to haunt him.

The God Slayer.

When He Xuan lands back in the mortal realm, he staggers, one hand pressed against his head.

It takes a minute to adjust to the new sensation of breath itself.

Even now, having shirked the heavens, just as the last Ghost King to ascend before him—

The pain is gone.

And before he can process that, move past any of it— He has to find a place for him to rest.

But when he steps back inside the confines of the kiln... The blood is there.

The chains are there.

Zhao Beitong is there, watching him silently.

But Shi Wudu—

He's gone.

"..."

Immediately, he turns to Zhao Beitong, who remains pointedly taciturn.

"Did you touch him?!"

"No."

Her form is flickering—the edges of her wavering.

Which makes no sense.

He's more powerful now than he was before his ascension, her projection should be stronger.

“Then where is he?!”

Zhao Beitong looks at him—almost as though she’s looking through him. Her expression tinted countless emotions, twisting in their complexity.

“I…”

Her form flickers again, this time in its entirety, like a flame flickering out, and then —

She’s gone.

He Xuan glares, looking around the walls of the Kiln, pressing a hand against his chest, trying to feel her there.

“WHAT ARE YOU—?”

Then—he stops.

Feeling how the ground beneath him has begun to rumble.

The very foundations of the Kiln begin to creak and groan. The only possibility he can think of is possibly the most terrifying. Did he—

Did the Kiln swallow him?

But before he can give that any more thought, before he can even return outside to see if something took him during his short, ill fated trip to the heavens—

There’s a building roar all around him. One so loud, so violent— It drowns out all sound. All noise, all thought.

In the far distance, the mountains that surround the ancient, barren land of the Kiln begin to shake, the sky turning red, as—

As Mount Tonglu awakens once more.

ARTWORK INSPIRED BY THIS STORY

Included with permission from artists, do not reproduce or reuse for any reason.

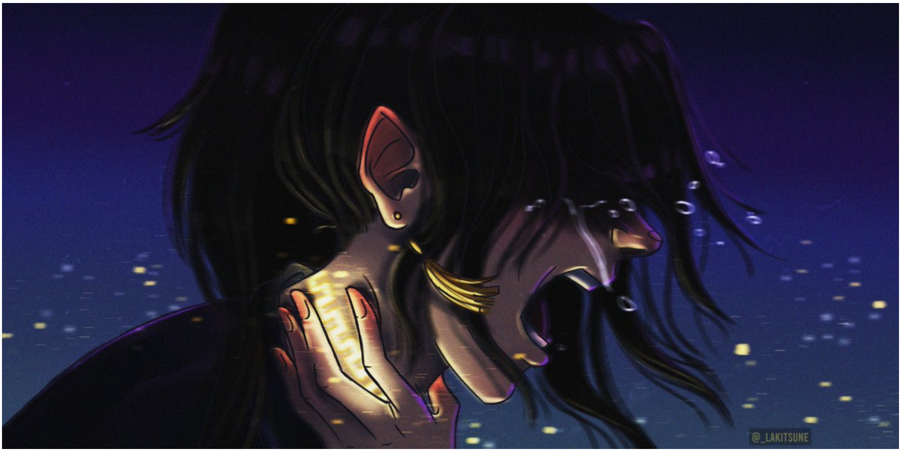
content warnings: artwork that includes blood, depiction of suicide, and the aftermath of sexual violence.

"Peace in Drowning."

[image]

CREDIT: ROWAN

"Monsters don't exist...Only people who make monstrous choices."



CREDIT: LAKI

"I've hunted you across the years..."

[image]

CREDIT: MECHAMISH

"No one ever tells you that it's possible to mourn the absence of a sound..."

CREDIT: MARTA

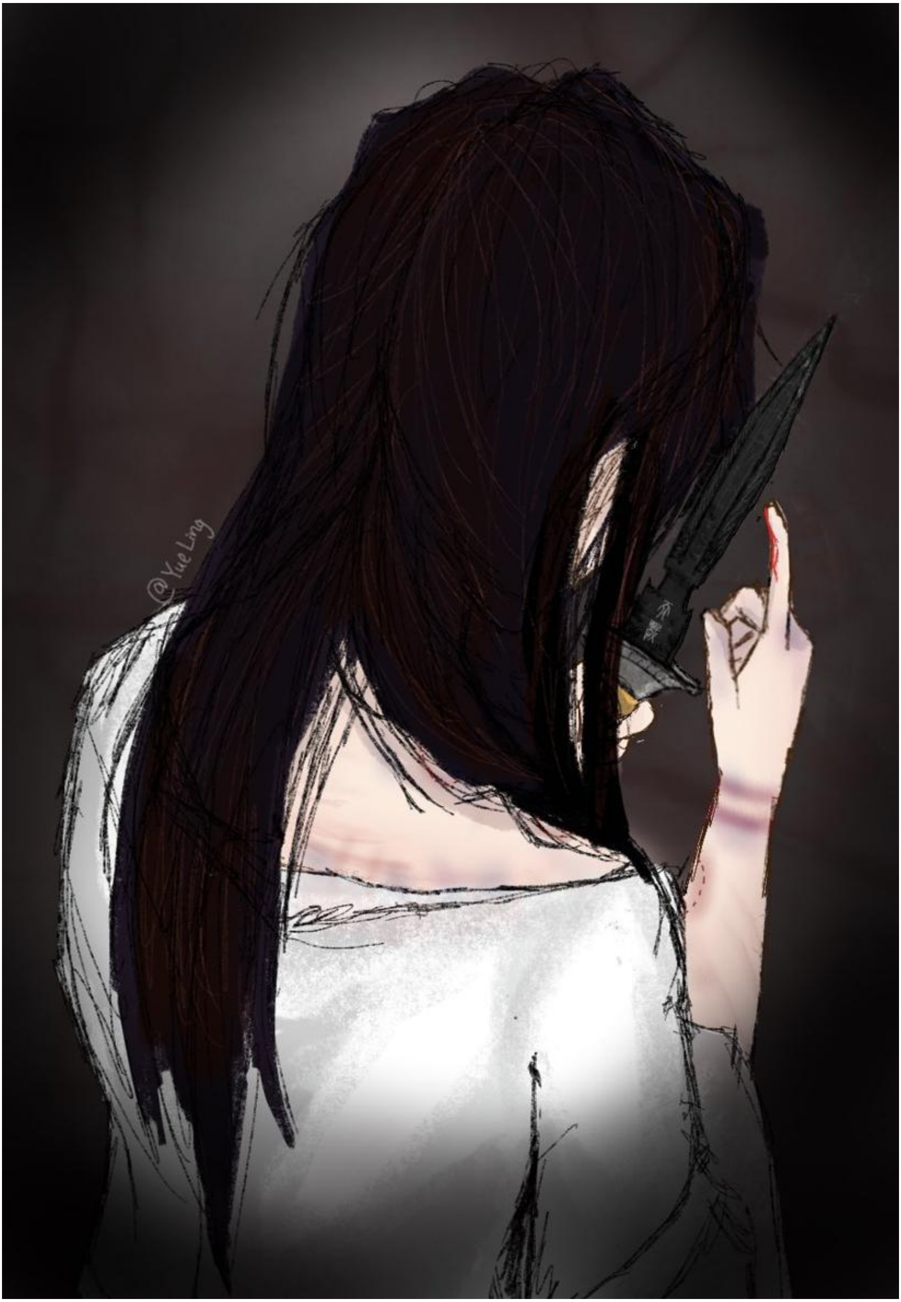
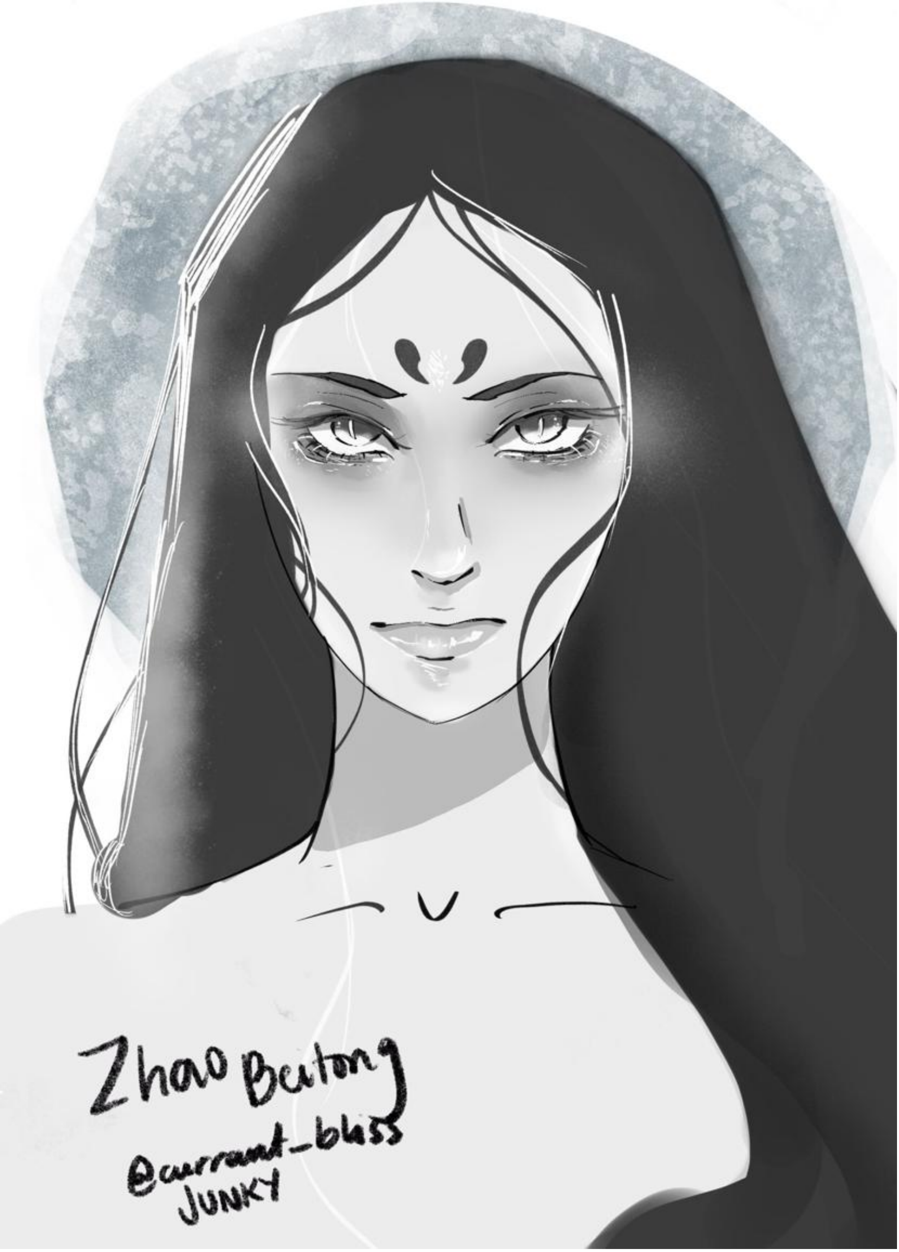
Shi Wudu holding the Godslayer (Ch. 62)



CREDIT: YUE LING

ZHAO BEITONG



Zhao Beitong
@currant_bliss
JUNKY

CREDIT: JUNKY

"No One Mourns Like a Ghost..." (Lyrics from Goodbye, by Ramsey, featured on the series Arcane: League of Legends.)

"I can hear the sound of a heartbeat before it goes out"
"Won't ever leave my memory of bloodshed all around"
"And I can see a tear on my father's face before it falls out"
"Oh, my enemy,
how could I have ever let you down?..."
@_lokitsune

CREDIT: LAKI

Chapter End Notes

I know we've been away from Hualian for quite some time, I promise we'll get back to them soon! Thank you for being patient with me through the detour that I have lovingly dubbed "The Blackwater Arc + The Water Masters Arc"! In case it hasn't become obvious at this point in this story, He Xuan and Shi Wudu are two of my favorite characters in TGCF, really in the entire MXTX universe, and I really wanted to explore their characters and emotions since we don't get to see them as much in the canon storyline. I know this is a HUGE departure from canon, and not everyone is going to like it, but!! This was probably one of my favorite arcs to write in the story so far, so thank you for your patience and support!

And thank you to Mish, Junky, Laki, Yue Ling, Marta, and Rowan for their beautiful artwork, and allowing me to share it!

xoxo, Evie

Don't Go

Chapter Summary

> “...You don’t have to tell me if you don’t wish to,” he prefaces his question carefully. “I know that our positions are different, and —”
>
> “You want to know if I knew?”
>
> The prince falls silent, biting his lip—and Hua Cheng...
>
> He sighs.
>
> “I did.”

Chapter Notes

> this chapter deals heavily in grief and existential dread, apologies in advance

See the end of the chapter for more notes

Back in the heavens—

Chaos unfolds.

Officials screaming and fleeing—others trying to discern where Blackwater—or, the Water—ah—

Where He Xuan went.

And when the martial gods arrive on the scene, the panic becomes even worse.

“What’s happened here?!”

“PROTECT THE EMPEROR!”

“WHERE’S XUAN ZHEN?!”

And the first among them, of course, was Pei Ming.

Who was already at the forefront, rushing to the central square the moment he heard the crash, people screaming the Water Master’s name—a thousand different possibilities running through his mind, but—

Pei is deeply, intimately aware of how the body reacts to trauma.

Before his ascension, during one of his first battles, a cannon blast malfunctioned during a cavalry sweep, sending him flying off of his horse, shrapnel buried in his right side.

He recovered—but his ears...

They never stopped ringing, after that.

It got worse during a battle, or when he was stressed.

He was nearly deaf on the right side of his body by the time of his ascension, and since then—he forgot what it felt like.

Until now.

When everything around him becomes distant.

When it sounds like everyone is shouting through water, and his—

His ears won't stop ringing.

Louder and louder.

He doesn't even feel his legs move. He doesn't remember making the decision to move.

But he does.

Every single person in his way is ripped aside.

He shoves one civil god so violently, they break an arm on the landing—but he—he doesn't care.

Not until he gets to him.

And when he does—

Pei's knees hit the ground hard.

Never once did they embrace when there was anyone around to witness it.

He was too proud for that.

But now, everyone—every single god in the Martial Avenue—witnesses the strongest among them crumble.

Gathering the fallen Water Master in his arms, disbelieving, stroking his fingers through his hair. Sitting back with him in his lap, staring at his face, waiting—

Waiting for those eyes to open and look at him again. For his lover to scold him for making a scene. To ask where his sister is. To—

To say anything, anything at all—and Pei would listen.

“No…” He mutters, grasping his wrist, pressing Shi Wudu’s palm against his cheek.

It’s already begun to cool.

Pei’s fingers tighten around his wrist, a shudder running through him as he turns his face into Shi Wudu’s palm, tears falling silently.

“No.” He shakes his head, his expression contorting with agony.

No. No. He—

It’s just another bad dream.

He gets those. Where he wakes up, gasping with fear and panic—

Only for his love to find him in the dark, pulling Pei against his chest. Hushing him. Reminding him—

That there’s no more war. That he—

That he doesn’t have to fight anymore.

But…

Pei presses their foreheads together, curling tighter around him, the ringing— It’s so loud now, he can barely hear himself think.

‘You would have been perfect.’

That was the last thing that he ever said to him.

‘And I’m so, so sorry.’

‘I would make a good husband.’

He knew.

When he shoved him through that portal in blackwater manor—

He knew that was it.

And maybe, in the depths of his soul—Pei knew it too. Because he—

Shi Wudu was never afraid of suffering, or dying.

Only of losing people.

Pei was always in doubt of where they stood with one another. Both of them were so fearful of rejection, they never gave what they had a name. Never made an outright confession.

But that.

That final act.

That's how Pei realized the Water Master loved him in return.

And now, of all people—

He finds himself remembering Xuan Ji.

What she said that night, on Mount Yu Jun.

'True love would burn you.'

That the flames of it would consume his heart, reducing it to ash.

Now, all he has left are embers.

He presses a final kiss against his lips—the tears falling faster when there's only cold stillness in response.

He reaches out with his spiritual power, trying to find some sign of him anywhere, even as a ghost, but—

Pei shudders, a sob finally ripping from his chest.

"...Where did you go?" He chokes, shaking as he begins to break in earnest. "You don't—"

Ling Wen comes to a halt behind him, her hand covering her mouth to silence a pained moan.

"—you don't get to go first!" Pei sobs.

He's so much older, he thought—he always thought—

Ling Wen sinks to her knees beside him—the only one he's allowed close, practically biting Nan Yang's head off when he tries to see for himself.

She finds one of his hands, squeezing it—and finding it limp and cold against her own.

"…"

Her lips quiver, tightening at the corners.

She presses the back of his hand against her forehead, her own tears falling silently in comparison to Pei, who can't seem to even take a breath between the sobs.

"…He really murdered the only family of the mother of his child?" She whispers, disbelieving, because—

Who could be so cold hearted? Pei doesn't respond.

Can't bring himself to.

And then, the worst of all— It's the scream.

This horrible, hysterical wail.

One that cuts Pei all the way to the bone, jarring an already mortal wound to his heart.

"GEGE!"

Shi Qingxuan's knees almost buckle, when she sees what Pei is holding in his arms. When she sees the locket around his neck, stained with blood.

The only reason she doesn't hit the ground is because Nan Yang catches her by the elbows—and she doesn't even stop to acknowledge it.

She just scrambles forward, staggering down to the ground when she's close enough, and—

She's had nightmares about losing him before. And they never felt real. Because that was always the worst thing that could ever happen to her.

And when she woke up for one horrifying moment, she would think it was true—and she would always run to him.

Running into his office, in their childhood home. Crawling up into his lap, crying as she hugged his neck.

And he would always soothe her, hugging her so tightly. Reminding her that they would—

That they would always be together.

And no one could ever take him away from her.

Shi Qingxuan waits now, looking around numbly, for herself to wake up. To be in her childhood bedroom again.

For her brother to be just down the hall.

But—

But she can't.

She grabs her brother's sleeve, shaking him.

But he won't open his eyes and look back at her.

"What..." She breathes shallowly, her lips trembling.

"He..." Her eyes drift to Pei's, frantic. "He wouldn't! He..."

It's not true.

Ming-x—

He Xuan—he—

He would never hurt her.

Maybe in small, little ways. The kind of hurt that aches like a tired muscle. Pleasantly used.

But never—

Never like this.

Pei doesn't argue. Just stares at her with eyes full of this soul crushing sadness, and she can't stand to look, because—

Because it's real.

Because she isn't waking up.

Because her brother isn't moving.

"...No," She whimpers, tugging at his arm, trying to pull it around her. "No, no, no..." So he can hold her, like he used to.

Instead—it falls back down, limp.

And Shi Qingxuan—

She screams.

Somewhere between terrified screaming, heartbroken, and grief stricken sobbing. Shaking at his shoulder, her breaths coming so quickly, the world is spinning.

"Give—" An arm wraps around her, pulling her close, and she—

She screams into Pei's chest, weeping.

"GIVE HIM BACK!"

Pounds her fists against his back, hysterical.

Every single cry wrenching out of her, ripping her to pieces.

Screaming those words over and over:

Give him back.

Give him back.

"HE'S ALL I HAVE—JUST GIVE HIM BACK!"

Pei doesn't say a word. Doesn't make her stop.

Just holds her against him, letting her howl and rage with grief, sobbing hysterically between frantic begging. For someone to make him better. To take it back.

To give Shi Qingxuan her big brother back.

And if it were possible—if Pei could take his place—he would.

Looking over her shoulder now, eyes clearing—not because the pain has lessened, but because he has to keep Shi Qingxuan in mind now—

He finally sees.

The deep slash in the Water Master's throat. Blood nearly dried.

And it strikes deep, clattering around in his mind.

Taking him so far back.

Jogging a memory that he refuses to look back on anymore, not wanting to be swallowed whole.

A soft smile. Dark hair blowing gently in the breeze.

A sword being dragged across someone's throat.

Ling Wen presses her hands against her forehead.

It's hard to hear herself think over Shi Qingxuan's cries, but—

When she notices Mu Qing standing over the emperor, kneeling down to assist him... her gaze hardens.

"Stop!" She rises to her feet, marching over, shoving her own grief deep, deep down.

Not feeling it, for now.

"You can't give him medical treatment—not from that blade."

Mu Qing sends her a strange look, one hand on the emperor's shoulder. "Shouldn't we try to stop the bleeding?"

"Bandage him here—then..." Ling Wen glances around. "Nan Yang and Qi Ying, take him back to the Imperial Residence and seal him inside."

"What?" Nan Yang hesitates, looking Jun Wu over. It doesn't look like he's been hit in the heart or lungs—but still, any wound like that to the chest could be serious. "Why would we do that?"

Ling Wen sends him a cold look. "You think the emperor hasn't told me his wishes in a scenario in which he was wounded?" She questions flatly. “Who else would he tell? You?”

Feng Xin blanches, “There’s no need for that. I just—doesn’t he need medical care?”

“Not that kind.” The Civil Goddess shakes her head as Mu Qing cuts his robes open, bandaging the wound as tightly as he can. “You take him—seal him, and no one goes inside. Not until he can come out under his own power. Understand me?”

The instructions are baffling, and yet...

If Jun Wu had given anyone instructions for a situation like this... It really would have been to someone like Ling Wen.

As such—people spring into action.

Leaving only a trio behind in the street.

A small, broken family.

They need to move him.

Pei knows that, in his heart. But—

He has no idea where.

They’re gods, after all. Things like—

Things like this aren’t something they plan for.

And Shi Qingxuan—she just clutches onto his hand, rocking back and forth, whimpering over and over again—

‘Where are you?’

‘Come back to me.’

‘Gege!’

‘...Gege, where did you go?’

It’s dark.

Endless blackness, stretching on as far as the eye can see. He really—

He really thought there would be oblivion after. Like falling asleep, and having no more dreams.

But Death isn’t so kind.

Not nearly so awe inspiring, either.

Really—it’s just an endless, dark hallway. And he’s been walking for hours.

Humans spend most of their lives in hallways. The spaces between rooms. Getting from one place, to the next.

But he’s been walking for so long without a hint of light—it feels like there’s no end to it

On, and on, and on.

Not thinking, not really.

About what happened. Where he’s been. Where he’s going.

Just…walking.

Always alone. Always in the dark.

Until he hears something coming from ahead of him.

Footsteps.

Rapid—like someone is running.

And then, he hears a voice.

Grumbling.

“Stupid…fucking…”

He frowns, a disorganized mind struggling to keep up with what he’s hearing.

“DUMBFUCK AUTH—!”

THUD!

Someone slams into him from the front, hard—and they’re both sent sprawling.

He’s slow to sit up, rubbing the side of his head—and when he does...

There’s a young man sprawled on the ground in front of him, swearing and rubbing his back.

With brown hair, cropped short—sticking up in an unkempt mess. And the strangest clothes he’s ever seen.

Almost like inner robes, but the fabric of his pants is unlike anything Shi Wudu knows—and he’s wearing these strange slippers? Not quite boots, with laces on the top, and a strange, curving symbol stitched into the side.

...What on earth?

And the stranger—he’s staring at him too, green eyes wide with shock, and the first words out of his mouth—

“Holy shit,” he mutters, looking him up and down. “That is an insane cosplay.”

...A what?

“Seriously dude—did you make that yourself? Fucking hell...” He stares, leaning away when the young man reaches for one of his lapels, swatting his hand away.

“Do I look like someone who makes their own clothes?” He questions coldly.

The short haired man stares, yanking his hand back with a frown.

“…You know that’s like, really gatekeep-y of you,” he grumbles, crossing his arms. “Not every fan can afford to order those fancy pre-made costumes online! You’re like…a pro, aren’t you?

“Onl—?

“Pro cosplayers are so stuck up, you’re not SPECIAL, you’re all just dressing up—!”

“What the fuck are you talking about?” He finally speaks over him. “And what’s on your face?!”

“Y—hey, look, I’ve really cleared up recently, alright?! Who doesn’t have a little acne scarring? You look like you can probably afford an esthetician once a week but SOME OF US—!"

"A what? I'm talking about that thing over your eyes!"

"YOU CAPITALIST—!" He rages, then deflates. "...You mean my glasses?"

The dark haired man across from him nods and—

He sniffs, adjusting them on the bridge of his nose.

"How have you never seen glasses?"

Then, he looks him over, and...notices the slash in his throat.

"That's..." He swallows hard, looking in the dark, endless hallway around them, finally seeming to process his surroundings. "...That's not real, is it?"

The dark haired man before him reaches up to touch it, and... When he shakes his head, he...

"...Oh," the bespectacled man mutters, his voice suddenly rather small. "So...you're dead?"

When the 'cosplayer' nods, he shrinks down even further, hands clutched to his chest.

"...Oh." He repeats, thinking back.

"...You seem surprised."

"Why shouldn't I be?" He grumbles, gesturing at himself wildly. "Look at me! I'm— I'm in my PRIME!" His voice cracks slightly as he reaches up, running his fingers through his hair. "No, no...I'm not dead. I...I'm just in a coma or something!"

"A coma?"

"Yeah!" He wipes his hands down his face, rocking back and forth. "There's probably some totally sexy girl sitting by my bedside right now, reading me poetry and—all that romantic bullshit—and then some sad idol group song is gonna come on and—and then I'll wake up before the ad break!"

"The wh—?"

“It doesn’t matter...” He moans, rubbing his temples. “Seriously, how did I—?!”

“What’s the last thing you remember doing?”

“Driving.” He answers immediately, and then, when he remembers the context... “... Which was kinda the problem , but...”

He looks him over.

“...My name is Shen Yuan,” he mutters, holding a hand out, eyeing him suspiciously. “What’s yours?”

The dark haired man eyes him back with equal levels of suspicion—but eventually, he reaches out to take it.

“Shi Wudu.”

And for some reason—just hearing that makes Shen Yuan leap to his feet, pumping his fists for joy.

“FUCK YEAH!”

Shi Wudu leans back, and now HE’S the one clutching his chest with confusion. “What—?”

“THAT’S what the system meant!”

“—system—?”

“It’s TRANSMIGRATION!” He spins around, “That’s not the same as dying—and I have read so many novels— I’m basically the BEST person this could happen to! Like—am I happy about this?” He stops in the middle of pacing, his hands aloft, “No. But this is the next best option! Wait—” He stops to think.

“...Does this mean I’m going into Tian Guan Ci Fu? ” He rubs his chin, thinking. “But so many people get SCREWED in that one! Unless...” He becomes even more contemplative. “Unless I get Xie Lian...but then...”

Shen Yuan gets a little pale.

“...I’d have to get with an ancient ghost king...” He taps his finger against his chin. “...Not to mention all of the shit that happens to him, then again...if you’re already dead...Mount Tonglu is next...that’s not so bad, right?”

Shi Wudu stares back at him blankly, trying to figure out whether or not he's lost his mind.

"...I mean, I'm not gay," he holds up a finger pointedly, shaking his head. "But...if I had to be...apparently, out of all of the protagonists, he's the best one in bed."

Then, he notices the way Shi Wudu is staring at him. "If you count the author interviews as canon, anyway!"

Shen Yuan would guess that he's not transmigrating into Shi Wudu, not with how the rest of his plot line goes. In any case...

Transmigrating into one of the leads would be the best case scenario. He hasn't read the book in ages, he can barely remember.

Honestly, the most recent book he was reading was Proud Immortal Demon Way . Actually, he had just finished the audiobook in his car when he...

That—that would be the worst case scenario, even if he does remember it perfectly.

This— this is better.

"...Well, I should be going. But..." He stops, rubbing his arm, watching the look on Shi Wudu's face.

Confused—but mostly... Just broken.

"...Look, your character started off like kind of an asshole, but..." He shrugged. "You ended up being one of my favorites."

Shi Wudu stares, wondering if hell is just being chased down by scrawny, weirdly dressed teenagers who spout nonsense, but...

Something about it seems sincere, and that—that feels like a compliment.

"Just...your biggest hang up was that pride, and doing everything on your own..." Shen Yuan shrugs, rubbing the back of his neck. "Anyways—good luck."

With that, he keeps walking down the hallway—and despite being an admittedly weak looking person...

He walks pretty tall.

Shi Wudu stares after him for a moment—baffled, tired, and…

He just wants to rest.

But if he sits here forever, well…

He sighs, pushing himself to his feet once more.

Walking, walking, and walking.

Until finally—he reaches a door.

"…" He looks back over his shoulder, wondering…if maybe, he could run back the way he came.

And if he ran far enough, fast enough— He might see them again.

But he…

Shi Wudu turns back.

He's been walking so far, for so long.

He doesn't know the way back. Not anymore.

And when he pushes the door open—he finds himself inside a cavern. Or— More like a chamber.

Black floors and walls like polished jade—stretching as far up as the eye can see. And all around him…

Are little ghost fires, casting the room in a pale green glow.

And on each side of the room, is a door.

Larger than any other doors he's ever seen—one red, and one black.

And the red one—

That one feels familiar.

Like it—

Like it's calling to him.

And it seems to have a gravity all its own, pulling him in until he stands before the precipice, one hand on the handle.

He's been here before.

That thought is so clear now, ringing in his mind.

He's been through this door before. And—

It's safe, on the other side.

It doesn't hurt. And he—

He can rest.

But when he pulls on the handle—

It remains firmly shut.

"...What?" He whispers, giving it another tug.

Once, twice, three times—as hard as he can.

"...Why?" He tries again, throwing his weight into it—leaning back on his heels, pulling until his bones scream in protest—

But nothing.

"I—I have nothing left KEEPING ME HERE!" He screams, slamming his fist against the wood in frustration.

"WHY CAN'T I JUST GO?!"

Nothing answers him—and the door won't budge.

Behind him—another door looms.

"...No," he mutters, stubbornly refusing to turn around, tugging stubbornly.

He won't look. He—

"I know I—I was an awful person," he croaks, tears filling his eyes once more. "BUT ISN'T THIS ENOUGH?!"

He made mistakes, but he paid his debt, and he—

He doesn't deserve that. He doesn't, he—

Creeeeaaak....

There’s the low, grinding sound of a door sliding open, and Shi Wudu squeezes his eyes shut, still desperately pulling on the red door.

“NO!”

He shakes his head vehemently, clinging for dear life.

“I’M NOT GOING THERE!”

He won’t .

He—

“I’M SH—!”

Before he can finish speaking—there’s pain in his throat.

So sudden, so searing, he lets the handle go, stumbling back and clutching his sound. “I don’t...”

Ba-bump...

His entire body convulses, his chest stabbing with unbearable pain.

“But...” He stumbles forward, clutching that handle one more time.

Ba-bump....

“...Why?” He whispers.

If he can’t see Pei, or Shi Qingxuan—then he doesn’t want to stay.

So, why can’t he—?

The pain in his chest and throat spoke in that moment, to the point where he can’t even stand—but instead of falling to his knees—

He seems to sink right through the floor, as if it were made of nothing more than smoke.

And then, he’s falling.

Down, down, down...

Until everything fades to black.

After that—everything comes in flashes.

Voices, talking—the words indistinguishable, but—

It’s no one that he recognizes.

Then, he’s being lifted up in someone’s arms.

His eyes only manage to open a fraction of an inch, and—

All he sees, in that brief flash of a moment, is a streak of white hair, and a voice murmuring—-

“Not this time.” Then—everything fades to black.

There are no doors. No hallways. No strangers screaming about things he understands, just—

Rest.

Blissful, silent rest.

Xie Lian has run into a bit of an unusual problem.

Or well—maybe he shouldn’t say it’s abnormal, he hasn’t known him long enough to know what is normal, but—

He’s been in Ghost City for an hour, and he hasn’t found Hua Cheng yet. Which might not sound strange—but it is.

Typically, any time he seems to want to see Hua Cheng, or makes an effort to look for him—the Ghost King seems to magically appear, almost as if he knew Xie Lian was looking for him in the first place.

But now, even after checking the Gambler’s Den first—he hasn’t appeared.

His next step is Paradise Manor—and he knows that Hua Cheng doesn’t have any guards (nor need them, apparently) but it still feels odd, walking inside of such a luxurious place with no one stopping him.

He isn’t in the throne room—nor the reconstructed armory.

Xie Lian finds himself wandering back and forth, knowing it’s probably pointless, because if Hua Cheng was in Paradise Manor, he would have sought him out by now.

He finds himself stopped in the ghost king's bedroom, thinking.

The most obvious thing to do would be reaching out in Hua Cheng's private communication array, but—

Xie Lian feels the tips of his ears grow hot and he shakes his head, crossing his arms.

No, that's not an option.

Not with that password, anyway.

Of course—Shuo might know where he is, but he's all the way back in Puqi shrine, and Xie Lian has no idea what his password is, so...

(One again, his mind is drawn back to the set of dice in his pocket.)

"Your highness?"

The prince nearly leaps out of his skin.

He recognizes the voice—that of Hua Cheng's...assistant? He supposes that would be the best way to phrase it—

The Ghost Officer.

"Oh, hello!" Xie Lian smiles in the direction of his voice. "I was just..."

"If you're looking for Hua Chengzhu, he isn't home at the moment."

That's when Xie Lian realizes how odd this must look—after all, he's standing in the middle of Hua Cheng's—

Well, his bedroom .

"Oh! I—yes," he agrees, nodding frantically as he feels around the furniture, stumbling towards the door. "Well—I—I wasn't trying to—"

He's fumbling for any explanation that makes it clear this isn't what it looks like.

"San Lang actually brought me here the last time I was—!"

Oh no.

Xie Lian fights the urge to shrink down onto the floor, turn into a puddle, and evaporate.

Why is he making it sound worse?!

At this point—the Ghost Officer just seems to take pity on him, placing a hand on his hip as he watches the prince nearly self implode.

"...He's in the forge, your highness. He usually goes there when he doesn't want to be disturbed."

He—

Oh.

Xie Lian pauses, suddenly crestfallen.

Well—in that case, he doesn't want to intrude...

As he contemplates, Yin Yu stares at his expression, letting out a low sigh. "But he did mention to send you there if you came looking."

(He did no such thing—but Yin Yu has observed the crown prince enough to understand that the simple statement of, 'But Hua Chengzhu would never find his highness to be a disruption,' would not convince him at all.)

"Oh," Xie Lian sighs, relieved.

That makes sense—before he helped Pei take Shi Qingxuan back to the Heavens, he promised that he would come to Ghost City to discuss what had happened as soon as possible.

"And where is the fo—" Then he pauses, thinking. "There's a forge?"

Yin Yu nods, stepping aside.

"Hua Chengzhu has always been keen on bladesmithing," he explains, "And with a blade like E-Ming, maintenance is required. You can find it in an antechamber beneath Qiandeng Temple. Do you need assistance finding your way?"

"...No," Xie Lian replies quickly. "I can find it."

After all—he may be blind, but he's walked the length of ghost city before, and he knows the lay of the land.

“But thank you for your help, Mr…?” He waits, giving the officer a chance to introduce himself—he’s never availed himself of the opportunity, and Xie Lian feels rude—

And he doesn’t take the chance now, bowing his head politely.

“It’s no problem, your highness. If you need any further assistance while you’re in the city, I’ll make myself available to you.”

With that, he leaves Xie Lian to his devices, and it makes the god wonder. Why so shy about offering a name?

Names are important things—even if they aren’t necessarily your true identity. Reducing him to a mere noun, the “Ghost Officer” feels a bit dehumanizing.

He contemplates the matter as he walks out of Paradise Manor.

Normally, walking through any crowded street—he’s bound to bump into people, a natural consequence of being unable to watch where he’s going. But in Ghost City, the crowd parts around him easily, giving him a respectful berth as he passes though.

He finds it surprising—though rather convenient, not to mention pleasant. Who knew that ghosts in general were so considerate?

When he reaches the gates of Qiandeng Temple, finding the antechamber is a relatively simple task.

He slips off one of his boots, stomping the bare sole of his foot into the ground once, feeling the answering vibrations going through his joints—feeling where the hollow spaces beneath the temple are located.

On the West Side—near the back.

The actual entrance isn’t inside the temple, he quickly discovers—rather on the ground outside.

And unlike most of the rooms in Ghost City—this one is locked.

The only other example of that Xie Lian can recall is the dungeon, and this one is sealed in the exact same way.

With the statue of a woman—who he deduced before to be a martial goddess— standing before him, holding a brass plate with a set of dice upon them.

Before—Xie Lian was absolutely perplexed as to who this woman might be. Now… He has suspicions.

In any case—he very nearly reaches for the dice sitting in the tray, assuming that he'll get the right roll eventually, but—

Then, he remembers what happens if you roll two fours. A terrifying, eight legged consequence.

At that point, saying Hua Cheng's password is almost—

Creeeeaaaaak…

With a heavy groan of stone rolling back, the seal on the ground opens on its own, revealing a set of stairs descending beneath the temple—and Xie Lian lets out a soft sigh of relief.

Hua Cheng must know he's arrived, then.

He makes his way down the steps, bracing one hand against the wall, feeling old, worn stone sliding under his fingertips, and the further he descends…

It's warm.

Not unpleasantly so—more like standing in a patch of sun coming in through a window.

That warmth only intensifies when he reaches the bottom of the steps—but given how cold Ghost City tends to be, a place between the realms of the living and the dead—

This is actually rather pleasant. Xie Lian feels as though he could lie down right now and sleep comfortably.

Well—

CLANG!

If not for the sound.

The repeated strikes of hammer against metal fill the space as he's drawn further in— and it's only when he rounds the corner that he hears it come to a halt.

"…Gege,"

After everything that's happened—Xie Lian knows he shouldn't smile.

And yet, the sound of Hua Cheng's voice makes his mouth turn up slightly at the corners—even if he's tired.

"San Lang," he replies, placing his hand on one of the work tables, feeling his way through the room. "I hope I'm not disrupting anything..."

"No," Hua Cheng shakes his head quickly, setting his hammer aside. "Gege already told me he would be coming, after all."

Yes, he supposes he did...

The Ghost King steps aside from his anvil, walking over to place a hand on Xie Lian's shoulder, looking into his eyes to get a better grasp on his expression.

"Those fools in the Heavens didn't blame you, did they?" He asks quietly, his voice low—dangerous.

Xie Lian pauses, surprised. "...No," he shakes his head, "I was more worried about making sure none of them blamed you—"

"I don't care if they blame me," Hua Cheng mutters darkly. "It makes no difference."

"..."

The corners of Xie Lian's mouth tip downward.

...Something is bothering him—that much is clear.

But when the ghost king goes to lift up his hand, Xie Lian notices something far more pressing.

"...San Lang," he gasps, his eyes widening with concern. "Are you not wearing any gloves?!"

"Hmm?" Hua Cheng arches an eyebrow. "No, why?"

"Well..." Xie Lian fumbles to grab his hand, trying to make sure he isn't harmed. "Wouldn't you get hurt?"

But when he grasps Hua Cheng's hand—it's slightly calloused, but unharmed. Just a little warmer than usual.

"...I don't burn easily," the ghost king shrugs.

Though when he looks down, seeing the way their hands are joined... He looks away, his lips twitching.

Still, he doesn't pull his hand out of Xie Lian's grip.

"Oh..." The god sighs, relieved. "...What are you working on?"

"Nothing particularly exciting," Hua Cheng shrugs,

"The search for Zidian is taking more time than expected—and his highness shouldn't have to deal with that vermin longer than he has to."

(By that, of course, he means Qi Rong.)

"So, I thought it would be easier to create a new device to solve the problem."

It's easier said than done. The enchantments on Zidian are...complex, to say the least. But better to be working on another solution while the first plan is delayed.

Xie Lian can't help but grimace, remembering that Zidian's disappearance is his fault.

If he hadn't started that fire in Paradise Manor...

"I'm sorry, San Lang, I've made things complicated..."

"No," the ghost king assures him without hesitation. "It will be found eventually—and I doubt anyone will find it useful until then."

Xie Lian glances up, curious.

"If you lost track of Ruoye, do you think any cultivator who came upon it would be able to use it?"

Well—no. Xie Lian was still able to control the device in Shi Qingxuan's body—but only because Ruoye recognized the soul of it's master.

"Yes, but Ruoye was forged..."

Xie Lian starts to explain, then hesitates—seeming to come to the conclusion that now is neither the time nor the place for that conversation.

“...From my own body,” he concludes vaguely—to which Hua Cheng seems interested —but forces no further explanation from him.

“Zidian wasn’t forged in such a way,” the ghost king agrees. “But the enchantments on the weapon are such that only two groups of individuals could use it, one—” He holds up a finger, “Highly skilled cultivators—which few mortals are—or two,” he holds up another finger.

“Its rightful master, and the master’s descendants if the weapon is passed down.”

“Rightful master?”

“It was initially a commission,” Hua Cheng reminds him. “But the cultivation clan in question offended me.”

Making Hua Cheng the rightful owner.

“...Do you normally take commissions?”

After all—Hua Cheng never seems hard pressed for gold.

The ghost king shrugs. “No. But they had something I wanted.” Then, his eyes narrow.

“At least—I thought they did at the time.”

“...Did they lie?”

“They told me they had information on the whereabouts of something that I was looking for,” Hua Cheng explains quietly. “And I was desperate enough to make a deal, rather than forcing the information from them.”

Desperate?

Just what could make Hua Cheng desperate?

“...What were you looking for?” Xie Lian looks in his direction, wide eyed and curious.

Hua Cheng stares back at him, his eye dark, conflicted, but—

Burning with affection.

"Something precious to me," his tone is soft…tender, almost. And before Xie Lian can ask more—

"And when I found out their information was false, I took the weapon back. It would only function properly for myself, or someone of high cultivation level. It's not a danger, being missing. It only allows Qi Rong the opportunity to be more of a nuisance than usual."

Hua Cheng glances toward the anvil, where the handle for a new potential whip awaits, gleaming under the firelight.

Not bad, but the enchantments required take time—energy.

"…But his highness didn't come here to ask me about weaponry, did he?" He questions, his tone resigned.

"I mean…I'm always interested in weaponry, and it's a shame I can't see San Lang work, but…" Xie Lian sighs.

No, that wasn't why he came.

"…You don't have to tell me if you don't wish to," he prefaces his question carefully. "I know that our positions are different, and—"

"You want to know if I knew?"

The prince falls silent, biting his lip—and Hua Cheng…

He sighs.

"I did." He looks back down at his hammer, sitting on the table—one end burning red hot. "That was He Xuan's goal from the very beginning."

"…The Beginning?"

"In Mount Tonglu." Hua Cheng sighs, unable to look at him. "But I didn't know about the relationship with the Wind Master—not until we went to the Crescent Moon Kingdom."

Xie Lian pauses, his eyes widening with understanding.

"That was why you imprisoned Ming Yi," he breathes, surprised.

"…In part," Hua Cheng agrees. "But more so because his actions were becoming erratic—his positions in the Heavens as a spy may have been compromised, and…he almost got Shuo killed."

That makes the prince stiff with worry. “He did?”

The Ghost King nods.

“In order to maintain his cover within the Heavens…” He sighs. “The real Ming Yi had to be imprisoned within Blackwater Manor.”

Xie Lian isn’t surprised. It’s a gruesome, but logical reality. “Imprisoning any god for that length of time is difficult.”

Hua Cheng explains, remembering how He Xuan’s debts skyrocketed just from hiring out Yin Yu to keep Ming Yi confined over time. “But as time went on, he lost focus, became inconsistent…and the night after we left the Crescent Moon Kingdom… Ming Yi escaped.”

And unfortunately, the only one who was available—not distracted by being, as Hua Cheng so aptly (and prophetically, to his disgust) phrased it, “balls deep in the Wind Master,” or, in Hua Cheng’s case, revealing his identity as a Ghost King to Xie Lian—

Was Shuo.

“If the actual Ming Yi had made it to the Heavens and exposed He Xuan, he wouldn’t have had the chance to escape, so Shuo…stopped him.”

But was unable to take him alive.

Xie Lian takes that in silently, his eyes wide.

Well.

That explains who set off the dragon spell.

“If the Heavens had learned what happened, it would have placed a target on him, and I was…displeased.”

(He says that, phrasing his reaction in a far more ‘delicate’ way.)

And Xie Lian is surprised for more than one reason.

But the most pressing among all of them is—

Shuo was strong enough to kill the actual Earth Master?

Xie Lian isn’t fixating on that because he’s impressed, no—but because…

"…It wasn't He Xuan who attacked Shuo and Shi Qingxuan at the Terrace of Cascading Wine, was it?"

If it was—Hua Cheng would have reacted very differently.

And given how He Xuan reacted back in Blackwater Manor, when Shi Qingxuan said she had fallen in love with him…

(Even if it was in an attempt to save her brother's life.)

Xie Lian doesn't actually believe He Xuan would have physically hurt her.

Not under any circumstances.

"It wasn't." Hua Cheng agrees. "We're still working on finding the actual culprit. But most of what happened in Fu Gu…was something else."

Something strong enough to completely incapacitate Shi Qingxuan, the Wind Master —after severely injuring Shuo, who was strong enough to kill the true Earth Master single handedly.

And after fighting Xie Lian, who certainly didn't go easy on the creature. That, taking into account what it knew about Xie Lian, what he saw…

His stomach twists with anxiety—but if Hua Cheng is already looking into the matter, there's nothing worrying about it can do.

And he promised Shi Qingxuan and Pei that he would ask…

"...Do you know where He Xuan would have taken the Water Master?" He asks cautiously. "Or what he would have done to him? I understand if you can't tell me..."

And if it were not for Shi Qingxuan's situation—how precarious things are for her—he wouldn't have asked.

"...I don't know where they are," Hua Cheng admits. "That in itself presents a very limited number of locations where they might be. But..."

His expression turns grim, and his words make Xie Lian's stomach sink. "I would be surprised if Shi Wudu was still alive by now."

That was always his goal, after all. And Hua Cheng never exactly tried to dissuade Blackwater from killing the Water Master, he just...

Encouraged finding a way to leave Shi Qingxuan out of it—in no small part for Xie Lian's sake.

Xie Lian sighs, shoulders slumping.

His expression is so torn—Hua Cheng's gaze slides away, unable to look. And he speaks...in a way that Xie Lian has never heard before.

Not from Hua Cheng.

"This lowly one is sorry that dianxia is disappointed."

"..." Xie Lian looks up.

...Disappointed?

"What?"

Hua Cheng won't look at him, even if Xie Lian can't see the remorse in his expression. Not for what happened to the Shi siblings, but...

Then, Xie Lian remembers what Pei said, when Shi Qingxuan was thrown back through the portal.

How it genuinely seemed to cut at Hua Cheng.

Saying that he was heartless. And that...

Pei Ming expected more, from someone Xie Lian held a high opinion of.

Does...

Does Hua Cheng think that Xie Lian is disappointed in him?

"Oh, San Lang..." The prince whispers, surprised. "I could never be disappointed in you."

He receives no reply, and unable to see the ghost king's expression, or read his reaction—the prince presses on.

"You weren't helping Blackwater, you only came along to help me. I never thought you enjoyed watching anyone walk into that situation..."

If anything, Hua Cheng had seemed stressed the entire time, eagerly trying to get Xie Lian AWAY from what was happening.

"...You really don't blame me at all?" The calamity questions, his voice quiet. Xie Lian nods, earnest.

"But you wouldn't have done as I did."

That draws a tired smile to the prince's lips.

"We're different people," he admits. "But that doesn't mean I expect you to do everything I would. Or that you should."

That was something Xie Lian learned the hard way, when he was young.

If you expect everyone around you to think and feel the same way as you do—you'll end up alone.

Or with people feeling the need to be dishonest with you–friends becoming obligated to pretend to be something that they're not.

And since then...

Xie Lian has learned that he’s not as morally righteous as he believed himself to be, when he was young.

That he doesn’t have the right to judge anyone.

“...The only thing that confused me was...you seemed unhappy about going along with it,” Xie Lian explains softly. “I’m not disappointed—or upset with you—I just...don’t understand why...”

“...” Hua Cheng leans back, running his fingers through his hair.

Pulled up in a high, messy top-knot, to keep it out of his face while he works—bangs curling slightly in the heat of the forge.

“...I made a deal with Blackwater a long time ago,” he explains carefully. “That I wouldn’t stand in his way on this matter, if he helped me.”

“...Helped you with what?”

Hua Cheng’s eyes finally return to him, glancing his god over. And he gives the prince a familiar reply.

“Something precious to me.”

“...”

Xie Lian stares back at him, wide eyed and earnest, even if he’ll never see the look in Hua Cheng’s eyes.

“Is it something I can help with, too?”

And oh, how soft they grow when they look at him.

“One day,” the ghost king agrees. “I’ll tell gege when the time comes.”

He would tell him now, if he could.

Every single thing, every moment, every lie, he would tell Xie Lian all of it.

“...It must be really important,” Xie Lian mutters, rubbing the side of his neck.

“The most important thing in the world.”

That seems to startle the prince, and finally, Hua Cheng asks him something of his own.

“Gege?”

“...Yes?”

“Have you ever loved something so much, you were afraid to make room in your heart for anything else?” He murmurs, his eyes never leaving Xie Lian’s face.

“...Yes,” Xie Lian agrees slowly, and just as Hua Cheng turns back to the forge, he reaches up to grasp the chain around his neck—his gaze pensive. “I have.”

He loved Hong’er so fiercely, losing him, the pain of that, made him afraid to attach to anyone else again.

And when he started to feel...attraction...towards Hua Cheng, part of him was afraid that might mean he had less space in his heart for Hong’er, even after all of these years.

It felt like a betrayal.

“When I was young,” Hua Cheng explains slowly, fingertips loosely grasping the handle of his hammer. “I had nothing.”

Xie Lian doesn't interrupt, just listens to him speak—his heart aching with sympathy. "And once I did have something, something that gave my life meaning..."

It became his everything.

Xie Lian is still his everything.

Hua Cheng doesn't regret that. He's never encountered something that made him wish there was more room in his heart. He has friendships. Other things that are important—

But he only has one reason. One meaning.

"...You told Ming Guang that I wasn't heartless, dianxia, but I..." Hua Cheng glances back over his shoulder, eyeing Xie Lian with a conflicted gaze.

"I can be."

In the name of protecting what he loves.

And maybe that's why he could never completely condemn the Water Master.

Because there are no lines he wouldn't cross, in the name of protecting those close to his heart.

The person close to his heart.

And Xie Lian's response...

...Isn't exactly what he expected.

He crosses the room, placing a hand over Hua Cheng's on the work table.

"...So can I," he replies gently, squeezing his fingers. "So can anyone, when we want to protect the things that we love. That's part of being human."

That was one of the hardest things that he had to learn. And even more so—

That sometimes, becoming something something that would sadden the people you love is worse than losing them.

Even if it's harder to hold onto your heart—you should. Even if it hurts—

It's always worth it.

Hua Cheng stares down at their joined hands, eyes distant. "...You would still call me that?"

Normally, Xie Lian isn't so comfortable with touching Hua Cheng casually. But after everything they've been through in the last few days, and the ache he hears in his voice...

Xie Lian reaches up, pressing his palm to the Ghost King's cheek.

"We're all human, San Lang." He whispers, his heart swelling when he feels Hua Cheng lean into his touch. "When we ascend. When we fail. When we die."

Hua Cheng closes his eye, turning his face into Xie Lian's palm.

"We never stop being human."

It doesn't feel like it, sometimes.

There are moments when Hua Cheng only feels human, feels remotely different when an animal, if he's with his god.

Every other moment is little better than oblivion.

It's hard to know how long they remain like this—but it's peaceful.

...Until it isn't.

BOOM!

The sound is so distant, but still so forceful—Xie Lian jumps, trying to look around, listening closely for the source of the sound—

But Hua Cheng's arm locks around his waist, stopping him from moving. "...San Lang?"

The Ghost King doesn't reply, his eye wide, knuckles white where they grip Xie Lian around his hip.

Fighting to contact He Xuan in the communication array. Shuo, even —but he receives no answer.

The only one he does hear from is Yin Yu, his voice quiet—

'It's begun.'

Xie Lian places a hand against Hua Cheng's chest, preparing to ask him what's going on, when—

When he feels bare skin under his palm.

Some frantic, distant part of his mind immediately thinks—

'Oh heavens, not again.'

Of course it's logical that he wouldn't be wearing a shirt—it's a forge , after all. Plenty of smiths take of their upper robes while they...they...

Suddenly, before he can ask anything more, he's firmly pushed away. "San—?"

"You need to leave."

The prince stares back at him, startled. "I don't—?"

If he could see Hua Cheng's face—how dilated his pupil has become, the sudden extension of his fangs—he would know something was wrong.

But as things stand, he doesn't—

"It's not safe," Hua Cheng mutters.

He tries to push Xie Lian even more insistently towards the door. "One of my people will meet you at the gate and take you to Paradise Manor, don't come out until—"

Infuriatingly, Xie Lian chooses this moment to drag his feet. "You expect me to leave you in such a state?!"

"Yes," hua cheng replies firmly, grasping him by the shoulders. "You don't know what's about to—"

Suddenly, the floor of the forge rattles, like a small earthquake is passing through, and instead of pushing Xie Lian towards the door...

Suddenly, Hua Cheng drags him back in.

Xie Lian is frozen in shock—having been turned around with Hua

Cheng trying to force him to leave , and now, the Ghost King is pressed against his back, both arms locked around Xie Lian's middle, and—

And his face, buried in the prince's neck. "S…San Lang—?"

"Don't go."

Xie Lian is frozen, his cheeks already slightly pink, unable to think about anything other than the sensation of Hua Cheng's nose, brushing just over his pulse. How his lips very nearly touch the prince's skin as he speaks.

"I lied—please, don't go."

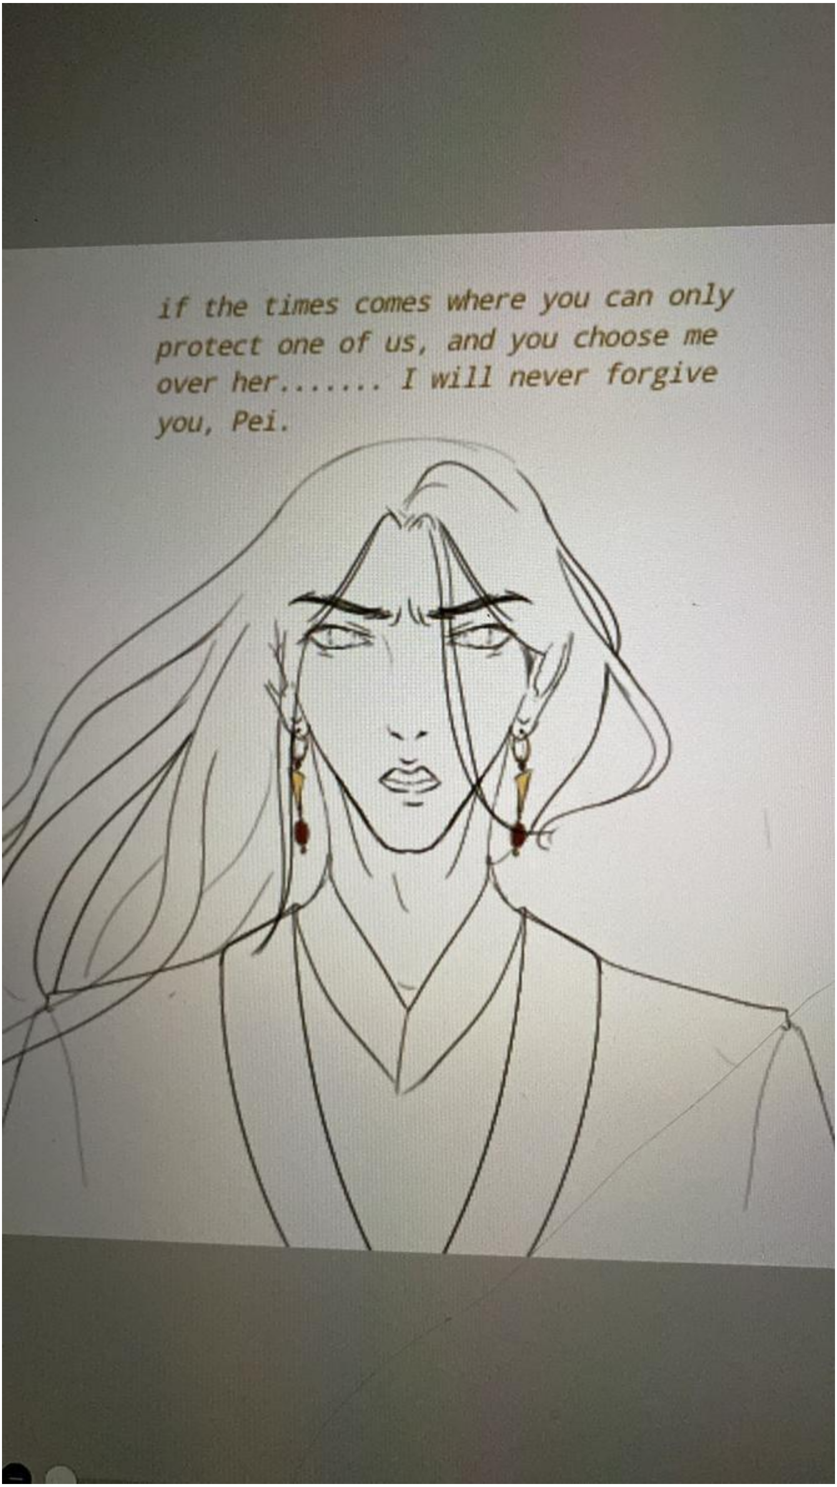
Xie Lian can barely think—struggles to string a sentence together to form speech, but —

He doesn't need to.

Because rather than being forced to suffer any longer, his mouth gaping like a fish— fingers grip his chin, turning and tilting his face up—capturing him in a fierce kiss.

ARTWORK INSPIRED BY THIS STORY

Do not reproduce or re-use for any reason.



if the times comes where you can only protect one of us, and you choose me over her....... I will never forgive you, Pei.

CREDIT: BLUE

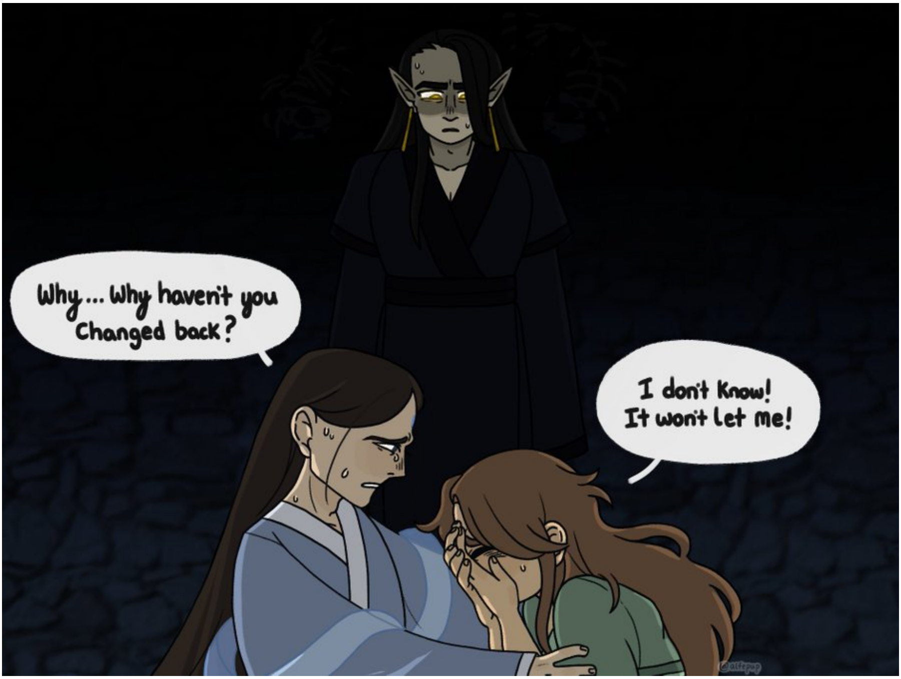
@alfepup



Why... Why haven't you Changed back?
I don't Know! It won't let me!
@alfepup

CREDIT: ALFIE

Chapter End Notes

congrats to SVSSS stans, it's FINALLY made an appearance in No Paths Are Bound!! And to those who aren't...I'm sorry if that one section was a little meta! Now, if you notice some details of Shen Yuan's story are different from canon, that's on purpose! I plan on doing re-tellings of MDZS and SVSSS after I'm done with this story, so the references to those stories in this fic include canon divergence!

thank you to Blue and Alfie for their artwork, and allowing me to share it!

xoxo, Evie

Being Needed

Chapter Summary

> “San Lang…” He rasps, fighting for coherency, “What’s gotten into—? Mmmph!”
>
> Now, he’s being kissed again, with Hua Cheng’s arm hugging him so tightly around the waist, his toes brush against the floor, but his feet—they don’t really touch them.
>
> And whatever’s going on—it seems to be affecting all of Ghost City.

Chapter Notes

> CONTENT WARNING: this chapter contains canon typical dubious consent, very similar to what occurs in Ch. 127 of the novels. Be warned!

See the end of the chapter for more notes

Back in Puqi Shrine, another fierce battle is waging.

Lang Qianqiu slams his forehead against a tree so violently, its trunk groans in protest.

“Why is he so INSUFFERABLE today?!” By that, of course—he means Qi Rong.

“Who knows…” Shuo groans, rolling over.

For once, he doesn’t have a snappy, sarcastic statement to make about Lang Qianqiu’s inability to tolerate Qi Rong’s jibing—which is odd.

“…And what’s wrong with you?” The martial god frowns. “You’ve been quiet.” The forest demon doesn’t lift his face from the grass.

“Maybe I’m just enjoying my own thoughts.”

Lang Qianqiu shrugs, rubbing his ear irritably.

Qi Rong’s been at it for three days now—but in the last few hours, it’s been unbearable.

Belligerent screaming, shouting, curses, threats—and no matter how much he's beaten, he goes on.

"I'd believe that if you ever knew how to shut up," he mutters, which leads to Ren Song sitting up sharply—exhausted, but offended.

"Excuse me?!"

"I've never met someone more excited to show off how smart they are by insulting people."

"Not people, just YOU!" He glares.

"And maybe I'm quiet because I nearly got my soul sucked out of my body by some Creepy FACELESS asshole, ever think of that?! Not everyone has ENDLESS ENERGY, MOTHERFUCKER!"

Lang Qianqiu slams his head against the tree again, relieved. Well, that shows he isn't dying.

"You really don't know what's going on with Qi Rong, though? I thought you were the 'expert.'"

Ren Song sits up, rubbing the side of his head as he looks to where the green ghost is bound, rolling and screaming in the dirt.

"If I knew, I'd make him stop."

It's been stressing out poor Guzi, anyway—leaving the child crying, trying to comfort his 'father.'

But then—

Qi Rong starts cackling .

Rolling onto his back, howling with laughter.

"YOU'RE SO FUCKING SCREWED! HAHAHA—OH, THIS ANCESTOR IS GOING TO ENJOY THE SHOW…"

Lang Qianqiu lifts his head, shooting him another annoyed look. "Wanna clue us in, you freak?!"

Qi Rong smirks, eyes gleaming an acidic shade of green under the moonlight. "Don't need to."

Suddenly, he stops screaming, cursing, or thrashing.

Suddenly, he sits up.

Looking straight at Shuo, his lips curving up onto a deranged, sharpened smile.

“Too bad your big brother won’t be around to look out for you this time,” he sneers, watching the demon’s eyes widen sharply in response. “I almost feel sorry...but who am I kidding? HAHAHAHAHA—!”

Before he can finish speaking, Lang Qianqiu’s boot fixes itself in his throat, pressing him back down against the ground.

“You murder a person, then you think you can just fucking GLOAT in front of their family?!” He snarls.

They might not get along—but wrong is wrong.

Qi Rong wheezes, looking up at him with a wide, deranged smile.

“Oh, I wouldn’t defend him if I were you!” He rasps, grasping at Lang Qianqiu’s boot, his own feet kicking limply. “He’s gonna KILL YOU!”

That makes both The prince and the demon pause, staring. “What—?”

BOOM!

The explosion is distant—and still, it manages to rattle the entire valley, sending birds and animals fleeing in its wake.

And before Lang Qianqiu can react, or figure out what that is—

He’s being tackled to the ground—with Qi Rong’s laughter only getting louder.

And when he looks up—it isn’t the green ghost on top of him, no.

“What are you doing?!”

It’s Shuo.

Eyes wide open—but so dilated, they’re almost black, fangs and claws already extended.

Snarling in the prince’s face, like he intends to rip his throat out.

“GUZI!” Qi Rong barks, giving the child a sharp look. “C’mere and untie your old man!”

The child hesitates, watching Ren Song with wide, worried eyes. “…Is gege okay?”

“Who gives a damn!” He snaps. “Now hurry up!”

Lang Qianqiu glares. “Don’t even THINK about—!”

He tries to get up—only to be shoved back down forcefully, a vicious snarl ripping through his ears—and Qi Rong cackles.

“You’ve got bigger problems than ME, dumbass! AHAHAHA!”

Guzi fumbles with the bonds around his wrists, and once they’re loose, the ghost springs into action.

Ripping the bonds around his ankles with his own claws before scrambling to his feet, running off in the opposite direction, leaving Guzi scrambling after him.

“WAIT! Dad, don’t leave me!” He cries, following him down the road. Lang Qianqiu grits his teeth.

“What the HELL is going on with you?!” He glares up at him, startled to see how brightly the ghost’s eyes are burning down at him. “You want them to get away?!”

As he goes to push him off again, Ren Song lashes out with his claws—leaving three deep cuts in the God’s cheek.

“Son of a BITCH!” He growls, this time managing to catch Shuo by the wrists. Normally the two are more evenly matched in terms of brute physical strength—

But Shuo is still recovering from the attack, and Lang Qianqiu is significantly bigger than him.

As such, shoving him with full force is enough to send the demon flying back, slamming into a tree before hitting the ground.

Lang Qianqiu sits up, touching his cheek with a pained hiss, leaping to his feet so he can go after Qi Rong, until he hears—

Until he hears a sob.

The kind of sound that cuts straight through a man’s focus, aching to the bone.

And when he looks back over his shoulder…

Ren Song has changed back to his original form—not the harmless (maybe slightly attractive) human teenager that he pretends to be for the villagers.

He's sitting back against the tree Lang Qianqiu just bodily threw him against—eyes wide, unfocused.

Petrified.

"…Wh—?"

"BAO!"

His scream is so loud, it echoes through the valley, like— Like a wounded animal.

Who—?

…Who is Bao?

Ren Song sobs, tearing at his hair.

"Who—?"

"WHERE'S MY BROTHER?!"

Initially, it sounds terrifying, coming from an ancient demon like Ren Song—but the closer Lang Qianqiu listens, the more it sounds like the terrified, frantic sobbing of a child.

"Where's my brother?! I WANT MY BROTHER! GEGE—!"

The martial god is frozen, staring as Ren Song rocks back and forth, crying so hard, he can barely take enough air in to make a sound.

"Gege…" he croaks, and there's—

There's so much fear, in his voice.

"Gege, I'm lost…"

"…" Lang Qianqiu looks back in the direction where Qi Rong just disappeared, visibly torn—and behind him, Ren Song continues to weep.

“I...I didn’t let go of the thread, I didn’t!” He sobs, “So where’d you go?!”

He can’t...

“I don’t w-wanna go back there...”

Ren Song whimpers, the beginnings of hyperventilation ripping at his lungs, and in his panic...

He begins clawing at his own face.

“H-he’s gonna g-get me, I c-can’t go back there, he’s gonna get me, he’s GONNA GET ME—!”

He falls silent, however, when arms wrap around him.

At first, he panics—scrambling, clawing as a feral cat as he tries to get away, but—

Lang Qianqiu’s grip tightens as he sits down against the tree, with Ren Song clutched in his lap, cradled between his arms.

“Nothing’s gonna get you.” The demon freezes, eyes wide.

The arms around him tighten—grounding.

Safe.

“I’m not gonna let anything get you, okay?”

“...” Then, his eyes flood with tears all over again. But…

Not from fear.

Lang Qianqiu half expects him to keep trying to gauge his eyes out, but... Instead, Ren Song turns his face into his chest, crying—

Crying his heart out.

Clinging to the martial god for dear life.

Lang Qianqiu made this promise once—when he was too young, too naive to understand:

‘I won’t let anything hurt you.’

But now…

'Not ever again.'

He holds Shuo tighter, making sure he doesn't try to claw at his own face again. Holds him as he cries, screams, and begs.

Now, it feels like he understands.

The difference between wanting someone to need you—and actually being needed.

Xie Lian, he—

He can't breathe.

Hua Cheng's hand is loosely wrapped around his throat, holding his chin in place— but that isn't why.

Well. Maybe that's part of why. Especially when he notices how the ghost king's palm envelops his entire neck, but—

It isn't choking him.

No, what is choking him is the white hot energy pouring down his throat, filling him up to the point where it feels like he's about to burst.

It's too much, he can't, he—

Hua Cheng's tongue slides against his just so, in a way that's nothing short of sinful , and Xie Lian—

A low, broken sound slips from his throat as their lips part, which only seems to egg the ghost king on—using the arm gripping his middle to spin Xie Lian until they're facing one another once more.

"San Lang…" He rasps, fighting for coherency, "What's gotten into—? Mmmph!"

Now, he's being kissed again, with Hua Cheng's arm hugging him so tightly around the waist, his toes brush against the floor, but his feet—they don't really touch them.

And whatever's going on—it seems to be affecting all of Ghost City.

Even now, severely distracted, he can hear the chaos that seems to be unfolding above. Nothing cataclysmic, but certainly enough to cause unrest.

Does that have something to do with why Hua Cheng is acting like this?

Why so much power is flooding in through his lips?

If this is so overwhelming for Xie Lian, just getting a part of it through Hua Cheng's touch...

...How painful must it be for him?

They break apart once more—only because the ghost king seems interested in giving Xie Lian a chance to breathe, burying his face in the prince's throat, mouthing over his pulse as Xie Lian gasps for air.

His eyes roll back into his head, half lidded.

Oh, he's a horrible person.

But he...

He doesn't exactly see another way to help him.

And so—hands trembling with nerves, rather than fear—he grips Hua Cheng by the cheeks, pulling him back up—and pressing their lips together once more.

Whispering as he does—

"I'm sorry, it's for your own—!"

Then, their lips are moving together once more—and Xie Lian isn't thinking.

His hands drop down, unsure of where to go—mortified at first when he feels the bare skin of Hua Cheng's shoulders under his palms, but...

The ghost king's flesh is smooth and warm under his touch.

And with every movement, he can feel muscles coiling and tensing, power radiating through every inch of him, and—

Xie Lian exhales shakily through his nose, cupping the back of Hua Cheng's neck as his other hand grips his shoulder.

The action brings his feet slightly further off the floor, and when Xie Lian feels Hua Cheng lean forward, well—he assumes it must be to help , but—

When he feels his back hit the stone wall of the forge, it becomes clear the intentions were slightly more self serving.

It's—

Xie Lian gasps, his arms tightening around Hua Cheng's neck and shoulders as he feels a knee slip between his legs, pressing insistently.

It's far more intense than before.

And now, with Xie Lian slightly less clueless about the art of kissing someone—far more mutual.

They're moving together instead of Xie Lian simply allowing Hua Cheng to do as he likes, the way he did in Paradise Manor, and it's so much more than just their mouths.

Hua Cheng's hands are heavy, sliding down his sides—almost scorching through his robes, squeezing his hips.

Xie Lian's head is spinning, thoughts slowly thickening and running together, coming undone halfway to completion, sweet and slow like honey.

And then, one of those hands slides down, fingers wrapping around his thigh— drawing a surprised yelp from the prince, because he's never—

He's never been touched like this before, not—not ever , and—

That hand grips him tighter, lifting his thigh up, up, further up, Xie Lian can't understand what he's doing, not until—

Not until his leg is hitched around Hua Cheng's hip. Oh—

Xie Lian—

(He moans.)

Oh no.

Shuddering moans and gasps falling from his lips only seem to entice Hua Cheng further, pressing closer and closer, until their bodies are flush against one another— with Xie Lian sandwiched between Hua Cheng's bare torso and the wall behind.

(Both hard, one pleasantly so.)

And when Hua Cheng walks forward, Xie Lian—

He was already aware a few moments ago that he had a building…problem, but—

Hua Cheng has a similar issue.

A very big, very noticeable issue, rubbing directly against Xie Lian's problem, and—

It's not Hua Cheng's fault. He clearly doesn't have a clue what's going on—he wouldn't be touching Xie Lian like this if he did. He probably…

He's probably thinking of his precious, amazing person. The person he's in love with.

Xie Lian knows that, he feels horrible about that, and still, at this rate, ethic sutras or not, if Hua Cheng keeps moving against him like this, he'll…!

"S-San Lang—!"

The only response he receives at first is a growl, one that he feels in the pit of his stomach.

"W-Wait—!"

And, in his moment of sheer panic, he finds something he hasn't possessed in centuries—maybe not since his second banishment, but—

"Stop!"

He doesn't plead, no—he actually thinks that might entice Hua Cheng in this state.

Xie Lian heard something similar from Shi Qingxuan once, the last time when they were in Paradise Manor together—accidentally dumped into the middle of a far off village—and when one of them scratched her cheek—

She used her ‘god’ voice.

Xie Lian has something similar.

As a matter of fact, Mu Qing used to tease him for it when they were little, calling it his ‘dianxia,’ voice—which made Xie Lian embarrassed, but people always listened when he used it.

And even in this situation—Hua Cheng is no exception.

He leans back immediately, even though it seems to cause him great strain—

(Xie Lian can actually hair a pained sound slip past his lips.)

“Down.”

Xie Lian sounds more confident than he feels—and all he means is for Hua Cheng to let his leg down, but—

He takes it literally.

Dropping down heavily onto the floor, and Xie Lian—

He presses a hand against his forehead, because obviously he didn’t mean for Hua Cheng to drop down onto the ground, but—

That’s—that’s his fault, the Ghost King can’t think clearly right now, Xie Lian—

Xie Lian has to do the thinking for both of them. He—

He can do that, can’t he?

As long as he doesn’t let it get…to that point…he can do this, right?

A low, strained sound rumbles in Hua Cheng’s chest, hardening Xie Lian’s resolve. Well—

He has to.

“…” He extends his hand, meaning for Hua Cheng to take it—which he does, but only to flip it over, kissing the inside of Xie Lian's wrist, up his forearm, the end of his elbow—

(Xie Lian thinks he might faint.)

"N-No!" He repeats sternly, pulling his arm back.

Hua Cheng stares up at him, breathing hard, his eye slightly out of focus, but fixed on him.

Xie Lian holds out his hand again—and this time, when the ghost king takes it, he grips his fingers tightly, guiding Hua Cheng back to his feet.

And the prince knows this isn't Hua Cheng's fault, he can't control himself clearly—

But the moment he tries to snatch the god up again, Xie Lian pushes his chest firmly, ordering—

"Sit!"

Which Hua Cheng does, landing heavily on the work bench behind him.

Xie Lian can't help but feel a little bad, speaking to his friend like he's some sort of dog, but he—he doesn't mean it like that, he's just...

The prince presses a palm against his forehead, listening to the labored, uncomfortable breathing from the calamity.

It must be so difficult for him to show restraint right now, but he's trying so hard, and Xie Lian—

His chest aches with sympathy, and... (Deep down, affection.)

"I know," he murmurs, stepping closer—allowing Hua Cheng's arms to wrap around his waist this time without complaint

And this time, when the ghost king pulls him in—Xie Lian clambers into his lap, sliding his arms around Hua Cheng's shoulders once more.

"I know it hurts," he mutters, bringing their faces together once more. "It's okay..." It's easier to control the pace of things, in this position—and Xie Lian...

Is experiencing one of those rare moments where he aches for his sight, wondering what Hua Cheng's expression is like right now. Wondering if he looks pained, or guilty, or—

...The opposite of that.

And while this brings greater control, yes...

There's also something inherently...satisfying about it. In a way that he can't place. Having someone hold him, hips between his thighs, the way Hua Cheng surges up hungrily for each kiss.

Xie Lian knows he shouldn't—that this is nothing of the sort, but—

Part of him, somewhere deep, deep down, beneath several layers of self loathing, in the pits of a chasm of self denial...enjoys it.

So much so, instead of stopping Hua Cheng's hands when they drift over his backside, squeezing—he just gasps, sliding forward, hugging his arms tighter around his shoulders, and...

Letting his palms slide down, fingernails dragging lightly over the ghost king's skin.

Which seems to only please Hua Cheng even more, spurring him to grip Xie Lian even tighter, their hips finding a natural rhythm, one that keeps in pace with their mouths, tension building and building until the prince sits up on his knees, ordering the ghost king to stop.

Which he always does, though sometimes with a groan of dismay, breaking their mouths apart, burying his face in the prince's neck—and once, when his fangs scrape across the Xie Lian's skin, and he lets out a soft cry in response—

He pulls back, alarmed, even in this state.

And Xie Lian, hurrying to soothe him, not thinking about how this expands beyond the boundaries of simply trying to relieve Hua Cheng from the distress of being so flooded with energy, and having no idea how this would sound to anyone else—

He pulls him into another kiss.

"It's alright," he whispers, sliding his fingers through Hua Cheng's hair, wondering—

Wondering why this, this closeness, this intensity—is so easy , after how many years he spent steering away from the very thought of intimacy.

“You’re doing so well, San Lang…”

Of course, Xie Lian only means that as a compliment—a way of soothing Hua Cheng, who seems terribly out of sorts and distressed, but—

It seems to have the opposite effect when it comes to calming him down.

Thud!

Xie Lian’s gasp of surprise is swallowed directly into Hua Cheng’s mouth as he stands up—the prince’s full weight settled easily in his arms, as if he weighed less than a feather—spinning them around, and —

With a sweep of his arm, tools and schematics on the work table are sent scattering to the floor with a clatter.

And then, Xie Lian is laid in their place.

With Hua Cheng over him, on top of him, stealing every breath of air that comes out of the prince’s lungs.

Xie Lian tries to sit up on his elbows, tries to clear his throat, preparing to order Hua Cheng back down again, but—

Fingers wrap around his neck—just as they did before. Not harshly, not painfully— but insistently pushing his head back down, pinning him against the table top.

And it’s probably for the best that he can’t see the look on Hua Cheng’s face.

The way his eye scorches down upon the prince, burning like a cursed star. Hair tousled, slipping down from its top-knot, one fang peeking through a lopsided smirk.

And he isn’t himself.

Logically, Xie Lian knows that.

Hua Cheng wouldn’t be doing any of this if he was himself, but—

His hand tightens slightly around the god's throat, drawing out a soft moan, and—

The Ghost King shushes him leaning back down.

Whispering his first coherent words in an hour:

"Don't worry..." He purrs, lips pressing against Xie Lian's once more, his other hand pinning both of the prince's above his own.

And Xie Lian—

He thinks there are two different versions of himself. One who existed before now, and one who existed after.

"You're doing so well..."

Xie Lian can't really think about stopping now, fingers digging into the ghost king's shoulders, taking every kiss he is given, scrambling to take more.

More, more, more .

Even when his own upper robes slowly fall open, exposing more and more skin, he doesn't put a stop to it.

In any other situation, feeling the chain around his neck pressing against someone else's skin would set him in a panic, make him go running for the hills, but now—

The contrast between the cool metal and the heat of Hua Cheng's skin sets him aflame.

He...doesn't want to stop.

That morning, Hua Cheng sits up sharply, sucking in a deep, lurching breath that he wouldn't normally need.

What—

What happened? Where is he? Where's—?

"Oh," the sound of his god's voice, near and calm, nearly makes him deflate with relief. “San Lang, you’re awake!”

Hua Cheng whips around to look at him, and—

They’re in Qiandeng Temple now—with a few cushions brought from one of the side chambers, having been laid beneath Hua Cheng as he slept.

All while Xie Lian is off to the side, working at the loom. “I was starting to get worried...”

The prince sighs, tying off his work before turning fully to face him. "You slept for quite some time."

Hua Cheng falls silent for a moment, looking his god over with a keen, discerning eye.

...And Xie Lian seems to be completely unharmed.

Extremely relaxed, in fact.

Serene might be the better way to describe it.

His hair is completely loose, freshly combed—and he's in different robes from the night before. For once, on a very rare occasion, he's wearing black.

A fine color on him, one that draws the Ghost King's eye. "What...happened?"

“I think I should be asking you the same thing,” Xie Lian shrugs, fiddling with the hem of his sleeve. “There was a loud noise—and then you were completely out of sorts for the rest of the evening.”

“Out...of sorts?” Hua Cheng questions. “Out of sorts,” Xie Lian confirms calmly.

